"The committee appointed on the part of the house of representatives to enquire, in conjunction with a committee on the part of the senate, into the state of the new building on Capitol Hill, offered by the proprietors for the accommodation of congress, upon what terms the said building could be obtained until the capitol may be ready for their reception, report—That having examined the building in question, they consider it much better adapted to the convenience of both houses of congress than that they at present occupy. The committee appointed by the owners of the building, have represented it as having cost (with the land attached to it) thirty thousand dollars, five of which have been expended on objects necessary for the accommodation of congress, which will become useless when they shall leave the building. This committee has stated that the proprietors will be fully satisfied to enter into a contract with the United States under which they shall receive 5000 dollars, with an annual rent of 1650 dollars, (being an interest upon their capital of 6 per cent. with the addition of the price of insurance) making the lease determinable at the pleasure of congress. Should these terms be acceeded to by congress, the committee believe that the building will be ready for their reception on Monday next. The terms appear to the committee of both houses to be equitable, and they have submitted a bill to carry them into effect."

Mr. Lowndes then reported a bill to authorise the president of the United States to lease on the terms therein mentioned "the new building on Capitol Hill, with the appurtenances, for the better accommodation of congress;" which was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole—passed through a committee of the whole; engrossed and read a third time, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

[The spot where this large and commodious building is erected was a garden, on the 4th July last, the bricks with which it is built were clay, and the timber used in its construction was growing in the woods on that day. The halls of the two houses are spacious and convenient, with all the necessary committee rooms, &c. The citizens deserve great credit for providing this accommodation for the national legislature, deprived of its proper place of meeting by a barbarism unknown to the history of civilized nations.]

The reverend Mr. Glendy is appointed chaplain to the senate.

Monday, Dec. 11. Many petitions were presented and referred: They were chiefly for pensions, and indemnifications for services in or losses sustained during the war. Among the former was that of a poor fellow wounded at Dartmoor. Several petitions were also received praying the abolition of the duties on saddlery, malt liquor, boots, &c. [all which it appears it is contemplated by government to repeal.]

Mr. Hopkinson and Mr. Sargeant respectively presented petitions from sundry citizens of Philadelphia concerned in manufacturing establishments, praying that a standing committee may be appointed, "whose province and duty it shall be to watch over the interests of our manufacturing citizens, there not appearing to the memorialists any propriety in the reference of the subjects of commerce and manufactures to the same committee;" which petitions were referred to a committee of the whole house.

A petition was presented from the New-York manufacturing company, praying that the importation of cotton goods of a coarse texture, be absolutely or virtually forbid.

Various propositions were submitted which shall be noticed in their progress.

Mr. Taylor, of N. Y. from the committee of elections, made a report on the petition of Westel Willoughby, Jun. contesting the election of William S. Smith, a member returned to serve in this house from New-York state.

The report states it to be ascertained to the satisfaction of the committee, that the whole number of votes given in the district, which is composed of the counties of Madison and Herkimer, was 5293; of which 2510 was returned for William S. Smith; 2466 for Westel Willoughby, jun.; 300 for "Westel Willoughby;" and seven scattering votes; that it is proved, the error of the omission of the word 'junior' to a part of the returns was committed by the returning officers, the votes having in fact been given for Westel Willoughby, junior. The committee recommend that Mr. Smith's seat be vacated, and that Mr. Willoughby be declared entitled to his seat.

The report was referred to a committee of the whole house.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a list of specific appropriations, transferred from one object to another during the late war, &c. which was referred to the committee of ways and means.

Tuesday, Dec. 12.—The following members appeared this day, viz:—From New York, Mr. Cady; from Maryland, Mr. Goldsborough; from Virginia, Mr. Basset; and from Kentucky, Mr. Hardin.

The report of the committee of elections, on the contested election of Wm. S. Smith, by Westel Willoughby, jun. was taken up in committee of the whole; and after being reported to the house, the case was so clear, the report was concurred in without opposition. The seat of Col. Smith is therefore vacated, and Mr. Willoughby declared duly elected and entitled to a seat.

A great many petitions on various subjects were presented and referred, &c.—Nothing else done.

Wednesday, Dec. 13.—The speaker laid before the house a letter from Nathaniel Macon, Esq. notifying his election to the senate of the United States by North Carolina, and resigning his seat as a representative.

The following new members appeared this day viz: from Massachusetts, Mr. Mills; from New-York, Mr. Kent; from Delaware, Mr. Clayton; from Pennsylvania, Mr. Griffin.

Thursday, Dec. 14, was occupied like yesterday in receiving and referring petitions, &c. and transacting other minor business.

Friday, Dec. 15. Mr. Jackson, from Virginia, appeared and took his seat.

A number of petitions were presented and disposed of.

Mr. Lowndes, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill making additional appropriations for defraying the expences of the army and militia, during the years 1814 and 1815. This bill, which was accompanied by a letter from the secretary of war on the subject thereof, was twice read and committed.

A letter was received from the secretary of the navy, transmitting a statement of the application of the monies appropriated for the navy establishment, for the year ending the 30th December last, inclusive, and of the unexpended balances of former appropriations; which was ordered to be printed.

Monday, Dec. 18. Mr. Easton offered for consideration, a resolution, the object of which was to appoint a select committee to enquire into the expediency of changing the mode of leasing the lead mines in the Missouri territory, in such manner as to secure the lessees in the quiet enjoyment of their leases, and to enable the government to realize a revenue therefrom.

Mr. Yancey proposed so to amend the motion as to refer the subject to the committee on public lands; when, on motion of Mr. Robertson (who thought of including the salt springs in the enquiry) the resolve was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Lowndes,

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Yancey in the chair, on the bill making additional appropriations for defraying the expences of the army and militia during the years 1814 and 1815.

Mr. Lowndes explained briefly the object of the bill. The deficiency in the present year's appropriations, arose from the error in estimating the expense at four millions only, barely enough for the support of ten thousand men, when in fact for the principal part of the two first quarters of the year more than four times that number ought to have been provided for. The deficiency of the preceding years, it was well known, was caused by the heavy expences of large detachments of Militia exceeding the estimate which had been made, &c. Mr. L. handed to the chair, for the information of the house, the following letter from the paymaster of the army to the Secretary of war, which was read:

ARMY PAY OFFICE,

City of Washington, Dec. 16th, 1815.

SIR—From the best calculations I have been able to make, the deficiency of appropriations for the regular military establishment for the year 1814, may be estimated at 800,000 dollars, namely,

On account of pay,	615,000
On account of subsistence of officers, including their private servants,	85,000
On account of retained bounties to recruits,	100,000
	$800,000

And for the year 1815, at 1,700,000 dollars namely,

On account of pay,	1,250,000
On account of the subsistence of officers, including their private servants,	150,000
On account of retained bounties to recruits,	300,000
	$1,700,000

Forming an aggregate arrearage for these two years of 2,500,000 dollars, viz:

On account of pay,	1,865,000
On account of the subsistence of officers, as above mentioned,	235,000
On account of retained bounties,	400,000
	$2,500,000

A further sum of 3,500,000 dollars, is also estimated to meet, in part, the outstanding claims of militia, volunteers and Indian warriors, heretofore called into the service of the United States, exclusive, however, of the claims of certain states for expenditures upon their militia, which are not yet duly recognized on the part of the United States. It may be classed as follows:

On account of pay,	3,095,000
On account of the subsistence of officers, including their private servants,	265,000
On account of forage of the horses of officers, only	60,000
On account of the clothing of officers' private servants,	80,000
	$3,500,000

To give you a more condensed view of the preceding statements, the following recapitulation is submitted:

Pay of regular troops,	1,865,000
Pay of militia, &c.	3,095,000
	4,960,000
Subsistence of regular troops,	235,000
Subsistence of militia, &c.	265,000
	500,000
Forage of militia, &c.	60,000
Clothing of militia, &c.	80,000
Retained bounties to recruits for the regular service,	400,000
	$6,000,000

I am very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
ROBERT BRENT, P. M. U. S. A.

The hon. WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of War.

On motion of Mr. Lorandes, the blanks in the bill were so filled as to embrace the following appropriations;

For the Quarter Master's Department,	950,000
For the Pay of the Army and Militia,	5,617,000
For the subsistence of do.	2,810,372
For forage,	60,000
For clothing,	108,000
For bounties and premiums,	400,000
For the Medical and Hospital Departments,	100,000
For fortifications.	200,000
For the Ordnance Department,	140,000

The bill so amended as to read for defraying expenses incurred during the war, instead of "during the years 1814 and 1815," was passed.

Tuesday, Dec. 19. A number of petitions were presented and distributed among the several standing committees.

A letter was received from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the annual statement of imports during the preceding year; which was referred to the committee of ways and means.

The motion of Mr. Easton respecting the Missouri Lead Mines, offered yesterday, was taken up, modified in its language and agreed to.

Wednesday, Dec. 20. Mr. Birdseye of New York, and Mr. McKee, from Kentucky, appeared and took their seats.

After the reference of several petitions—

Mr. Johnson of Ky. from the military committee reported a bill "for the relief of the infirm, disabled and superannuated officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, the late war and of the army of the United States for the time being;" which was twice read and committed.

Thursday, Dec. 21. Mr. Mason, of R. Island, and Mr. Wendover, from N. York, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. Hubert presented the petition of a committee appointed by the breeders of merino sheep and manufacturers of fine woollen cloths, residing in the county of Berkshire, Mass. praying that such measures may be adopted, as will afford security and encouragement to the enterprize in which they were engaged.

Many other petitions were presented and referred—among them one from certain citizens of Philadelphia, praying the establishment of a National Bank.

The senate has been chiefly occupied in what is called "executive business," since the commencement of the session.

Foreign Articles.

A probability is held out that the Turks have granted favorable terms to the Servians and that hostilities have ceased. The report of an insurrection at Smyna is contradicted; but a revolt has taken place at Cairo, in Egypt, which has been followed by great excesses. The plague rages with increased force at Constantinople, in consequence of the great concourse of people at the festival of Bairam.

Among the passengers who lately arrived at New-York from France, was col. Antonia baron de Belina, a Pole, late equerry to Napoleon, a commandant of a regiment of Polish lancers. He had been 22 years in the French service, made all the campaigns with Napoleon, accompanied him to Elba, and would have followed his fortunes to St. Helena, but the English government would not permit him.

Depression of agriculture.—We stated in the REGISTER, of the 2d instant, that, with wheat at $2 per bushel, the English farmers were hard put to it to "keep soul and body together"—that ruin was staring them in the face. In a late paper we published an abstract of the corn law, passed by parliament to protect them. There is a volume in these simple facts; and a late London paper says—

"It is calculated that not fewer than a million of acres of tillage land lie at this time in an uncultivated state, from the extreme depression of the landed interest; 3000 acres, which compose two-thirds of the parish of Yelling, in Cambridgeshire, is in this state, paying, in consequence, neither property tax, tythe, or parochial rate of any kind."

A treaty has been concluded between Denmark and Prussia, by which the former cedes to the latter the duchy of Pomerania and the island of Rügen, acquired by treaty from Sweden; in exchange for which, Prussia cedes to Denmark the duchy of Lauenburg, acquired from Hanover by the treaty of Vienna. By this exchange, Denmark acquires a territory contiguous to Holstein, and extends her boundary to the Elbe.

Fate of Murat. We have a detailed account of the proceedings and end of "Joachim Napoleon," late king of Naples. It is well recollected that in May last he fled from Naples to France—from thence, after the battle of Mount St. John, he retired to Corsica. Here he attempted to make a stand, and enlisted in Ajaccio about 600 men. With a part of these he left the island in several small vessels, on the 28th of September, and landed at Pizzo, in Calabria Ulterior. He there declared himself their king, and called upon the people to rally round him. But instead of that, they armed themselves as well as they could—a desperate skirmish ensued, and Murat and his principal followers, after fighting most manfully, were overpowered and made prisoners. He was brought before a military tribunal, and shot at Pizzo on the 13th of October.—Four of the six small vessels that composed his expedition, were captured by the Neapolitan gunboats, stationed for the purpose, of which it appears the government was apprised. The party that actually landed with Murat, were—general Franceschetti; marshal Natali; captains Lanfranchi, Viagiani, Pasqualini, deputy inspector Calvini; lieutenant Multedo; sergeants Perilli, Sartarelli, Catania, Santini, and Pellegrini; corporal De Giulio; two chamberlains Armanno and Doggi; one cook; blacksmith; and about 12 soldiers.

We have London dates of Oct. 27. Nothing important is mentioned, except an increased and increasing discontent in the people of France. A great many arrests are made, and the most vigorous and arbitrary measures resorted to, to keep down the "seditious." Some of the Prussian troops have returned. Who is there in France to head the people and drive out the foreigners that lord it over the country and make the king a puppet?

Louis XVIII has established a privy council to "discuss only what is specially submitted to them." Among those named, are the marshal Oudinot, duke of Reggio; the duke of Feltre; marshal Macdonald, duke of Tarentum; counts Marbois and Dupont, and prince Talleyrand.

They talk in England that the bank may resume its specie payments. The guinea is said to be worth only 21s.—that is, at par.

"DELIVERED." Bridgetown, Barbadoes, Oct. 10. At a court of vice-admiralty held yesterday, a number of vessels, taken by the army and navy at the late conquest of Guadaloupe, were condemned as prizes; also sundry vessels taken before by the squadron on this station.

RICH CARGO. Cadiz, Oct. 6. There has just arrived at this port a Spanish frigate called the Preve from Vera Cruz and the Havanna, in 47 days. Her cargo is 2,136,502 piasters—23,890, another consignment: 436,265 marks of silver ingots and worked; 1473 marks of provincial money; 1491 ounces of gold money; 2595 arobes of grana; 64,875 cochineal; all from Vera Cruz and 9700 piasters from Havanna, and a quantity of Havanna tobacco.

London, Oct. 26.—The following is a copy of a letter from lord Sidmouth to the mayor of New-Castle:

Whitehall, Oct 19, 1815.

"Sir—As the hopes which had been entertained, of a favorable termination of the disturbances at Shields and Sunderland, and of the seamen engaged in them, to a state of obedience to the laws, have proved fallacious, I am commanded by the prince regent to signify to you his royal highness' pleasure, that you, and the magistrates within your jurisdiction, do forthwith adopt, in concert with the magistrates of North Shields, of South Shields, and of Sunderland, the most effectual means within the scope of their authority, for the purpose of putting an end to these criminal and disgraceful proceedings.

"A considerable naval and military force is collected and stationed on the spot, with a view of affording support and assistance to the magistrates, if necessary, in the execution of a duty which is indispensable and which his royal highness confidently trusts and expects will be duly performed.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

(Signed)

"SIDMOUTH.

"The worshipful the mayor of } Newcastle-upon-Tyne." }

A letter to the same effect was sent to the duke of Northumberland, and to the bishop of Durham as rotulorum custos of the county of Durham.

[Our last advices from England say that the seamen had become quiet.]

CHRONICLE.

Charles Ridgely (of Hampton) has been elected governor of Maryland, by a majority of 2 votes in joint ballot—for Mr. R. fed. 47—Mr. Bowie, rep. 45. The house of delegates vacated the seat of one republican member, and there was one of each party absent, through indisposition. The council is also federal by the like majority. It appears that every indication of hostility in the Creek Indians has subsided. The regular troops that were marching for their country have been halted. Among the curiosities of the times, we observe that cotton is shipping at New York for Charleston, and at which latter place a vessel has arrived from England with rum and molasses. Sea-island cotton being 55 cents at Charleston, and worth only 45 at New-York, and, to appreciate the value properly it is necessary "as the times go" to state, that the monies of both cities are about at par. One of the elegant cotton mills belonging to the Union Manufacturing Company, of Maryland, near Baltimore, was burnt to the ground on Wednesday the 13th inst. by accident. It was one of the most complete mills in the U. S. and drove about 6000 spindles. The loss is estimated at 60 to $70,000, and it throws about 200 persons out of employment. Another cotton mill, valued at $20,000 was recently burnt at Springfield, N. J.

Latent of the Epervier. By a vessel arrived at Charleston, we learn that the Epervier, was seen on the 8th of Aug. in lat. 39 4 N. long. 61, 18 W. under double reefed topsails. The next day there was a very heavy blow. The Epervier sailed for the United States with despatches on the 10th of July.

The Washington 74 is said to sail and work remarkably well. This ship has arrived at Boston.

Arrived at Quebec, on the 23d ult. the British ship Archduke Charles, from Portsmouth, (Eng.) with stores, and one hundred and fifty-five officers and men, of the 103d, 76th, 19th, 70th, and 37th regiments.

THE WASP SUNK. From the Norfolk Beacon.—Notwithstanding the reports which we have heretofore published, a conversation with an officer of the first rank and respectability in the navy, permits us to entertain no doubts of the loss of the U. States sloop of war Wasp, and that her end was as glorious as her cruise had been brilliant.

All readers of newspapers must recollect that about a year ago, there was an account of a British frigate putting into Cadiz much cut to pieces, and one hundred men killed and wounded; reporting her having had an engagement with a large American Frigate off that port.

It was known at the time that we had no Frigate in that quarter, and that the Wasp was believed to be cruising in that neighborhood; but little was thought or said about it at the time, as the report was not generally credited. We now learn, from a source which cannot be doubted, that there was an action between a British Frigate of the largest class, and an American Ship, and that it was, undoubtedly, the Wasp.—Lieut. Conkling, who commanded the schr. Ohio, one of commodore Sinclair's squadron, on Lake Erie, and who was captured in August, 1814, off Fort Erie, and sent to England, has lately reported himself to his commanding officer; to whom, it appears, he related, having met with one of the Lieutenants who was on board the above mentioned Frigate; and was informed by him, that the Ship they engaged was not a Frigate, as was stated; and that his commander, as well as every person on board, could see by her battle lanterns being lighted, and from the flashes of her guns, that she was a Corvette Ship, mounting 22 guns; and that they believed themselves, it was no other than the Wasp; but, after being so gallantly beaten off, and having suffered so severely, they were reluctant to acknowledge how inferior the force was, which inflicted such severe chastisement on them. It appears, by the Lieutenant's own account, that the action lasted several hours; that the Frigate sheered off to re-fit, intending, if circumstances would admit of it, to renew the action at day-light, which was not far distant; but, at its earliest dawn, there was no vestige of their gallant opponent. From the crippled state of the ships, and the short time intervening between their separation and day-light, the Lieutenant believed it impossible that they could have been out of sight of each other had their opponent been above water.

[The above account essentially coincides with the opinions of the best informed naval men about the seat of government, who generally agree in the belief that the Wasp was the vessel engaged by the British frigate above alluded to.]—Nat. Intel.

North Carolina. The following resolution of thanks to the President of the U. States, (says the Raleigh Register) passed the House of Commons yesterday—76 to 51.

Resolved, That the firmness, energy and wisdom which have characterized the public conduct of the President of the United States during the late arduous contest of our country, and his prompt acceptance and ratification of an honorable treaty, entitle him to the gratitude and thanks of the Legislature.

John W. Eppes. who was appointed a senator of the U. S. by the legislature of Virginia, vice Mr. Giles resigned, has declined the office, as he states in a letter to the speaker of the house of delegates, on account of the "present deplorable condition of his health." Mr. Eppes appears to be exceedingly unwell.

Nathaniel Macon has been appointed a senator of the United States by North Carolina, vice Mr. Lock resigned, on account of ill health.

Algiers. We have a report, to which hardly possibility (from many circumstances) can be attached, that the Algerines have cut off the head of the dey for making peace with the United States—declared war against us, and captured two American vessels. We have some "conservators of the peace," in the Mediterranean—2 frigates, and several sloops of war.

Flaxseed. The quantity of flaxseed sown last year in Ireland, is said to have exceeded 50,000 hhds.

Gen. Jackson. An entertainment was recently given at Alexandria, in honor of the hero of New Orleans. Many invited guests of distinction attended. The following volunteer toast was given, on the occasion, by captain Porter:

"Baltimore—she gives graves to her invaders; to her defenders, a monument."

THE TREATY. From the National Intelligencer of Thursday. We have heard and believe, though the proceedings thereon have not been disclosed, that the commercial treaty with Great Britain received the necessary consent of the senate on Tuesday, by an almost unanimous vote.

Several of the London papers have been loud in their complaints of this convention; and we, therefore, suppose it is on the principles of reciprocity; which modest John Bull always thinks is a great concession on his part!

The Canada papers complain—that the specie is flying back to the states. As it went from us by smuggling and treason, it is right that it should return by fair trade.

The British colonies. It appears resolved, that all intercourse with the British colonies, the carriage of a few unimportant articles excepted, shall be confined to British shipping. The British are more bothered to know what to do with their seamen in peace, than they were to get them in war.

The glass manufacturers lately arrested at Liverpool, have given bonds in £60 each, not to depart for America.

Mistake corrected. It has been stated, that when com. Bainbridge anchored at Gibraltar he fired a salute of seventeen guns which was returned with fifteen; and the commodore immediately sent an officer on shore to demand that his salute should be returned gun for gun; and that more guns should be promptly fired, and that the lt. governor apologized and fired the other two guns. We are now assured, from an officer of the squadron, that the above report is a sheer mistake, or misrepresentation. The facts, we learn, are, that when the squadron arrived at Gibraltar, an understanding, as usual, was immediately had between the commodore and the commander of the garrison, respecting a salute; and it was agreed that fifteen guns should be fired, and the like number returned. In firing the salute on board the Independence, by mistake, seventeen guns were fired; when the commodore immediately dispatched an officer to acquaint the commander of the mistake. Only fifteen guns were at first returned; but before the officer reached the commander, he had given orders to fire the two additional guns, though under no agreement so to do. We can add from information on which we rely, that the squadron and its officers were treated with distinguished respect and attention by the British officers in Gibraltar.—Bost. Cent.

Richmond, Dec. 13. On Friday last, a few hhds. of new tobacco, were sold in this market for $26 per cwt.—and on Monday last, a lhd. old tobacco was sold for 30 dollars per cwt.

Dec. 15. Yesterday, Mr. John Randolph, of Roanoke, brought into market a small part of his new crop of tobacco, say 17 hhds. which was sold at $30 30 cts. per cwt.

Indian prisoners. The treaty which was concluded at Portage des Sioux, with the Pottawatamie Indians (says the Missouri Gazette) stipulated for the immediate restoration of prisoners. In obedience thereto, they have surrendered up Mrs. Cannon, her son-in-law, and daughter. Their friends reside in Logan and Christian counties, in Kentucky.

The subjoined letter from captain Philips to gen. Bissell is an official statement.

Fort Clark, Sept. 9th, 1815.

SIR—I have the pleasure to inform you that on the sixth inst. three American prisoners, John Stork, Abey Cannon, and daughter, taken by the Pottawatamies on the Wabash in February last, were delivered into my hands. I thought it advisable to provision these people and retain them at this place, until a safe opportunity occurs of returning them to their friends. They are in good health, and speak much of the humanity of the Indians.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH PHILIPS, Capt. Comm'd'g.

Mexico. Excellent news!—Kingston, (Jam.) Nov. 2. We have at length intelligence direct from general Anaya, at Mexico. This brave Mexican, whose sang froid and courage were equally remarkable during the invasion, after having once experienced some contrariety, landed at last on the Mexican soil, where he was received with the acclamations of the people, and his calumniators arrested by order of government. The supreme congress of the republic has entrusted him with an important mission, and he will shortly repair to the north.

The Spaniards lately landed in Mexico 2500 men of the famous expedition to the Spanish Main. The government of Fernando wished to employ this reinforcement to free the communication between Tomtoco and other points. The insurgent general drew them into the interior, and killed 600 in one action—a column of 200 men, with their arms and baggage, joined the independent standard; the rest fell back to Xalapa, where they arrived reduced almost to nothing.

General Anaya has sent us a copy of the Mexican constitution, of which we will give an analysis in a future number.

Dr. Robinson, who accompanied general Anaya to Mexico, and was on the way with him to attend the Mexican congress, writes on the 10th July, from Huatusco, (5 or 6 leagues from the city of Mexico) "We have just received the agreeable news that the patriots have completely beaten a division of the royalists, in the province of Puebla."

VENEZUELA. Kingston, (Jam.) Nov. 3.—By a passenger arrived on Tuesday from Curacao, in the Fortunatus, we have received a circumstantial detail of the actual situation of Venezuela, which is certainly any thing than being favorable to the cause of Ferdinand 7th.

Maturin, Guyria, and all the savannas of Cumana and Barcelona, are in the entire possession of the independents, and it is presumed, on good grounds, that the island of Margaritta has, likewise, dissolved the unnatural connection.

In the west of Venezuela, general Urdinati, at the head of an army from New Grenada, has possessed himself of the provinces of Merida, Truxillo, and Barinas, after a most brilliant career, terminating with a decisive action, fought at Les Piedras, in which battle, the Spanish general Calgada was killed. A spirit of discontent prevails in Cora, Maracaybo, and even de la Hache.

Through the same channel we are made acquainted with an insurrection in Quito, the natural result of the battle fought at Papayan, and success of the independent Buenos-Ayrenes, at Lima, whose capital was known to be threatened, and must, by this time, have fallen.

NEW GRENADA. Carthagena, one of the united provinces of the republic of New Grenada, which, as the Spaniards say, "God preserve!"—having purged herself of traitors and Tories, holds up the flag of freedom undismayed. May it float forever over her walls! The royal force there is nearly annihilated. "Perish the invaders!"

BUENOS AYRES. A warm friend of the Weekly Register, at Buenos Ayres (personally unknown) has forwarded to the editor a file of papers as late as Sept. 26. They do not appear to contain any thing important, except to shew the general organization and harmony of the republican government; and, though no particulars of the progress of the army is stated, we have reason to believe, from several addresses, &c. that the war against the royalists and Tories of Peru has been successful. [By another source, we have reason to hope that Lima had fallen into the hands of the whigs.]

The Buenos-Ayres Gazette extra, of June 18, contains an official communication from Jose Rondeau, chief magistrate of Buenos-Ayres, to the Director—thanking his excellency for his nomination to the chief magistracy, &c. promising to co-operate in any sacrifice for the common good, &c. It concludes thus—"if history shall give a faithful account of this province to posterity, it will record these words—America is free, respected and independent, because immortal Buenos Ayres desired it; because the people willed it; because the intrepid warriors of the south supported it."

An artist of Tucuman, in Paraguay, has made an elegant rifle, and presented it to the Supreme Director of Buenos-Ayres. It is suggested, that it may be forwarded to the president of the United States, as the "first fruits of the manufacture of arms in the South America."

Banks. At a meeting of the merchants of Philadelphia held at the Merchants Coffee House on the 24th ult. after hearing a report from a committee theretofore appointed, the following resolutions were passed unanimously; and committees appointed to carry them into effect:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draft a memorial to the Legislature of this state, praying for a correction of the evils arising from the numerous Banking Institutions, and the increased amount of Bank paper.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draft a memorial to congress, praying the establishment of a National Bank.

Harrisburg Pa. on the 29th June, 1810 contained 299 houses, 82 of which was brick; on the same day of the present year, 455 houses, of which 146 were brick.

INFLUENZA.—This complaint, which has lately afflicted, though in a lenient degree, so large a proportion of the inhabitants of our city, was diffused more widely and generally than heretofore remembered. From Philadelphia to Charleston inclusive, it is believed full one half of the whole population were affected by it.

In one of the northern papers, it is stated that the following periods have been noticed when the influenza prevailed in North America: 1647, 1655, 1697—8, 1732, 1737, 1747, 1756—7, 1761, 1772, 1781, 1789, and 90, 1802, 1807, 1815.

From which it appears that the longest interval has been forty-three years, and the shortest four years, while the average interval is fourteen years.

Joseph Lancaster. By an article from the Belfast Recorder, (observes the Albany Register) it appears that the Lancastrian system of education is progressing rapidly, and with a degree of success beyond the most sanguine expectations which had been formed of it. It requires but little foresight to perceive, that this system may yet be the engine of destruction to the British monarchy, hierarchy and aristocracy. The article, above alluded to, from the Belfast Recorder, says—"No wonder that Mr. Lancaster should feel himself so exalted above the things of this life. No wonder, that enthroned in the bosoms of those five hundred boys, whom he so pathetically and eloquently addressed on Saturday, he should look down with philosophical indifference on "the maces, the sceptre and the ball," that crowns should fade before him, and the great ones of the world be considered by him as the humble instruments of his great and benevolent work."

An old hunter. Died on the 5th Oct. in Laurens district, South Carolina, Mr. Solomon Niblet, aged one hundred and forty-three years. He was born in England, where he lived until he was 19 years of age; he then emigrated to this country, and resided in the state of Maryland until about 55 years ago; he then came to this state, where he resided until his death. He never lost his teeth nor his eye sight; and a few days before his death, he joined a hunting party, went out and actually killed a deer.

Worcester, (Mass.) October 11—On Monday, preceding the late hurricane, a very large flock of hen-hawks and white-headed eagles, consisting of not less than 5000, were seen by persons in Millbury and Shrewsbury, flying to the eastward.

Remarkable circumstance.—There is a woman now living near Miller's lane, in Manchester, with her fifth husband! She is in the 30th year of her age, and was a widow not more than nine weeks at a time—the last time she became a widow, it was only seven weeks. She has had thirteen children—and what is more remarkable, she was mother of five children, all born alive and baptised, before she was twenty years of age. London pap.

ARMY PAY OFFICE, 2
City of Washington, August 1, 1815.

ROBERT BRENT,
Paymaster U. S. Army

War Department.

SECTION OF BOUNTY LANDS.

Whereas, by documents exhibited at this office in support of applications for land warrants, it appears that many persons disregard or misconstrue the information heretofore published, relative to the proceedings requisite in all cases where the original claimant does not personally apply at this department; it is therefore deemed expedient to elucidate the several points alluded to above by the following observations:

1. In regard to the power of attorney directed to be executed in the cases abovementioned, it is deemed of primary importance, that it be formally acknowledged before a magistrate, and that this acknowledgment be subscribed by the person who thus delegates his authority to another, as well as confirmed by oath or affirmation, in presence of the said magistrate, who then attests the execution of this formality.

2. Every deposition or affidavit ought to be subscribed by the deponent, or person making it, as well as confirmed by his oath or affirmation; and should then be attested in due form by the magistrate before whom it is made. It is particularly required that those individuals who depose to the identity of another, should subscribe their deposition to render the identification valid.

3. A substitution of a power of attorney may be made authentic in very few words, and may be inscribed on the original power, if a sufficient space for the purpose be there found: if executed on a separate paper, it is to be attached to the original instrument in the usual manner, and secured by the notarial seal. In applications for land warrants, the following simple form will be admitted, viz:

Know all men by these presents, that I, A. B., attorney of C. D., by the annexed power duly constituted and appointed, do, by virtue of the power of substitution with which I am thereby expressly invested, make, constitute and appoint E. F.,

&c. my lawful substitute and attorney, for the purposes therein mentioned; and do hereby authorise him to do and perform all acts and things necessary in and about the premises, as largely and amply as I might or could do if I were personally present.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal at — this — day of — A. D. —.

(Signed) A B [Seal]

I G H, notary public, &c.

do hereby declare and make known, that the above substitution was duly executed by the aforesaid A B, before me. In testimony whereof I have hereunto affixed my official seal and signature, at — this — day of —, A. D. 181—.

N. B. As there are many sections of the United States, where a notary public does not commonly officiate, the aforesaid substitution shall be there legalized by the official attestation of the clerk of the county court.

4. In the information heretofore published relative to ascertaining a "a legitimate heir at law" who may apply for military bounty land in right of a deceased soldier, the expression "certificates from competent authority" has been thought by some not sufficiently explicit:—to remove, therefore, all doubt on this point in future, be it known that this insertion of the term 'competent authority' arose from representations of long standing at this office, confirmative of the fact that in different states, component parts of the American union, the legal mode of proving 'heirship' for the purposes of inheriting real estate, is different from that practised in other states: it is obvious therefore, that the meaning and intention of the secretary of war in sanctioning the term "competent authority" is, that the person so pretending to be a "legitimate heir at law," should be required first to exhibit his proof of it to that tribunal, or civil officer, that is authorised by the constitution and laws of the state wherein he resides to take cognizance of the point in question, for local or other purposes. A duly authenticated certificate from that tribunal, or public officer, has ever been, and will continue to be deemed at this office conclusive evidence in such a case. Thus, an official certificate declarative of the fact that such an one is a "legitimate heir at law" of such an one, issued by a court of record, an ordinary, a judge of probate—according to the laws and usages of different states, have ever been deemed equally admissible at this office.

It should be observed, however, that in cases of posthumous claims to the military bounty land authorized by an act of congress of the 18th of December, 1814, it is essential that the claimant should establish, not only that he is "a legitimate heir at law," but also the particular degree of consanguinity he bore to the deceased soldier in whose right he claims.

5. Although the rule will be adhered to, not issue a land warrant to an executor, nor to an administrator, yet in all cases where "the legitimate heirs at law" are minors, a guardian constituted and appointed in conformity with the laws of the state where the said minors reside, may obtain a land warrant in trust for them on his exhibiting at this office official credentials proving his said quality.

Naval Affairs.

A fifth letter from an officer of the U. S. navy to his friend, a member of congress, dated at New York, Dec. 26, 1815.

SIR—When I had last the honor of addressing you, I was far from thinking that so much importance would be attached to my letter, not only by yourself, but by many other intelligent gentlemen with whom I have since had the pleasure to converse. The facts and reasonings embraced within the purview of it, touching the policy of Great Britain in diverting our attention during the late war from the Atlantic to the lakes, had always appeared very obvious to me, and I surely thought they were equally so to the well informed part of my countrymen. If however (as you are pleased to intimate) I have suggested some new ideas upon the subject, and completely shewn our error, I shall have no cause to regret the pains I have been at in committing my thoughts to paper; since it is an undeniable axiom, that we can never amend our mistakes until they have first been discovered.

The flattering attention which you have seen fit to bestow upon the several points discussed in my four former letters, has encouraged me on this occasion to lay before you a few plain, though deeply interesting remarks, relative to the vast expense annually sustained by the United States for the support of that numerous class of officers, who are attached to the different yards and establishments on the Atlantic and the lakes. Besides, that the greater part of these are totally useless to the service and hang upon it like dead weights, their retention has given birth to evils that have already existed too long, and call loudly for correction. It is my intention therefore to bring the subject at once before the public.—You have no doubt seen the last 'Naval Register' published on the first of August; as, if I recollect right, I think you made mention of it in your letter of the 19th ult.* It is complete, and in my opinion the most correct of any that has ever been issued from the navy department. It shews the respective names and dates of the commissions of the officers, as well as the ships or stations to which they are attached. This register has upon the whole a very imposing appearance, and to a stranger unacquainted with the real state of the fact, would beyond doubt convey the idea of an extensive naval force; at any rate, he could do no less than believe that we had twelve or fifteen ships of the line, from twenty to thirty frigates, an equal number of sloops of war, and a due proportion of small craft. Upon counting the names, he would find 32 captains, 18 master-commandants, 150 lieutenants, 48 surgeons, 72 surgeon's mates, 53 pursers, a few chaplains, and 494 midshipmen!—Besides these he would find a lieutenant-colonel commandant of marines, 2 majors, 20 captains, and 39 lieutenants; and having cast his eye also over the number of boatswains, gunners, carpenters, &c. he would find himself obliged to conclude in the end, that our navy was at least three times as great as it really is. Here, you will perhaps inquire how it happens that with a navy which has not yet exceeded in numerical force on the Atlantic, three ships of the line, eight frigates, a few sloops of war, and some smaller vessels, we can find employment for such a number of officers? Let us turn again to the register for an answer. We there see, that there are stationed at what are called navy yards captains and master commandants sufficient to command 19 sail of ships, with each two or more lieutenants under him; and that in the aggregate, these places are provided with twenty-five surgeons having a mate or two a piece, which all the world knows is enough for 25 ships. Exclusive of these, we also find at them, seventeen pursers, and such a host of midshipmen as would tire one's patience to enumerate.

The most surprising fact of all, however, is the unprecipitated number of sailing-masters, amounting to no less than 97!—though I have reason to believe that some reduction of their number has taken place, in consequence of the sale of the flotilla, for the service of which they were no doubt employed. In pursuing these remarks, I find that of 62 officers, the whole number of the marine corps, only one major, four captains, and thirteen lieutenants are in actual service afloat; the residue being reported either at head-quarters at some naval establishment on shore, or on furlough. Of the 32 post-captains, I find that thirteen only are afloat, and that not a smaller proportion of any of the other grades are similarly situated.—All these facts are drawn from the contents of the register above alluded to, which, having been printed and published by order of the secretary of the navy, and bearing an official form, I have no reason to believe incorrect. At least if it is so, the fault is not mine.

The first remark I shall make upon this novel disproportion between the number of officers and ships is, that if all these naval stations continue to be kept up hereafter, these surplus officers will assuredly continue to find employment at them. On the other hand, if they were at once reduced and consolidated, the annual saving of expense occasioned thereby might be expended in building ships; and in these ships they could certainly be employed with more advantage to the service and greater benefit to themselves. Admitting even that the money were appropriated to any other purpose, such as we could not employ afloat might retire on half-pay. In either case, it cannot escape your notice that a great benefit would result, and the service either receive some compensation for the pay and emoluments of its present surplus members, or be relieved from the burden of supporting them in idleness at full pay. To employ them afloat however is universally allowed to be preferable to any other method. An officer surely can be of no essential use, as an individual, without experience, and experience can only be acquired in that way. The numerical force of our navy is indeed at this time too small for the number of officers attached to it, and we cannot have the means of employing them at sea except by adopting the measure before adverted to, or some other of equal import. If we intend to sustain that high character on the ocean which we now possess, it is indispensably necessary to increase the number of our ships, that our officers may obtain the requisite experience to fit them for the stations they are destined to fill.

With regard to the evils arising from the present maintenance of these superabundant officers, they are not essentially different from those I have before pointed out as arising from the many useless navy yards. And, although it is much to be desired that to remedy these evils they should all be employed afloat, yet as the existing state of the navy will not admit of such a disposition, I am decidedly of opinion, that the best should be selected and the remainder discharged. A measure of this kind I am persuaded would be attended with the most salutary effects, and could not but receive the unqualified approbation of every real friend of the service. Twelve years ago such a selection was made, and the service was happily freed of many improper characters. If it were necessary to enforce such a policy then, I am induced to think, from daily observation, that at this day it is no less so. For should our navy continue to increase, and many of the officers who now belong to it be promoted to high grades, we have no guarantee for the undiminished high standing which it so gallantly acquired during the late war by the skill and experience of its elder members. It is well known that the commanders of our ships, during that period, entered the navy at its commencement, and that they have ever since been employed on the most active branches of the service. By these means they have naturally obtained a degree of practical skill and experience of which no others can boast, and on this account have generally been successful in contending with the British ships. You must have remarked however, that in the few instances where the British were successful, the surrender of the ship has invariably followed the loss of her commander—and to what must this be attributed? Surely to nothing but a want of experience in that class of officers from which we are to select our commanders. The rise of these, sir, has been too rapid for the steady pace of their experience; it has grown out of the extraordinary features of the late war, and produced an evil that I fear will require the boldest efforts to correct. It is an old axiom of philosophers, that the first step toward the correction of an evil is to be thoroughly sensible of its existence—I have assured you that a want of general experience prevails among the younger members of the service—I have endeavored to point out the cause—and shall now suggest a simple remedy,—Keep no more officers than can be employed to advantage.

I am your ob't.

The Navy.

No. III.—(and last.)

In preserving the present yard establishments, so far from incurring any unnecessary expence, we shall, in truth, save by them to a large amount. I go further, and say, that there is no way of saving but through them. Assertions like these, however hazardous they may seem to persons not well acquainted with the subject, risk nothing. The friends of the navy are desired to bear in mind, what I stated the object to be, in having these establishments. When well conducted, in having supplies of all kinds on hand, and a sufficient number of good workmen, delay is avoided, time gained, and expence saved. By way of illustration, I observe, that, suppose in time of war, a squadron of four frigates and three sloops of war, only, are chased into the harbor of New-York, or put in, crippled in action or in a gale, and require considerable supplies and repairs—in such case, I assert, without fear of refutation, that, if there be no public dock-yard at that place, the repairs to be done, and the supplies to be furnished, to a squadron no larger than the one I have enumerated, putting into port under such circumstances, would cost the nation much more than the annual amount of all the officers attached to an extensive and efficient navy-yard. The timber and plank used would be 50 per cent upon contract prices; all other description of stores 12½ per cent upon an average; all work done and labor performed, 40 per cent upon the wages of a yard establishment; and all this makes no calculation for the delay in collecting workmen and stores of every description, through the navy agency, and the amount of expence consequently incurred by the detention of the vessels in port. In bearing out the further assertion, that there is no other mode of saving but through the dock-yards, it is to be remarked, that in such depots only, stores can be preserved in proper houses for safe keeping, and admitting of proper arrangement; and, that unless this be done, the loss in stores would be immense, and the amount of labor necessary in conducting the naval service, would be nearly doubled, as the case at present; while many of the stores which become unfit for one purpose, are lost to the public, instead of being converted to another use, as is the universal practice in every well regulated yard. I speak now to facts so notorious that they cannot be disputed.

It may be said, perhaps, that in this part of the subject, I am arguing beside the question—that the necessity of dock-yards is admitted, but that the dispute is respecting the number.—In answer, I say, that the necessity for one at New York or up the North River, is apparent. I would preserve that at Portsmouth, as nearest to our eastern boundary line. I would retain that at Philadelphia, as a building yard. I would select another site between the Chesapeake and St. Mary's, as the place where the ships on the southern coast could receive supplies and repairs, and where various kinds of naval stores could be contracted for on the most advantageous terms, and distributed to the other yards at the discretion of the board. I would continue that at New Orleans, by all means, as indispensable to the flotilla required for the defence of that important post, and to afford supplies to vessels of war belonging to that station. Unless this be done, or an establishment fixed elsewhere upon that coast, our vessels will not be able to procure a mast, spar, anchor, cable, or supplies of any kind for the immense distance between the Mississippi and the capes of Virginia, if the "naval officer's" recommendation be adopted. That there is no sound discretion in this, no judicious foresight, I think too plain to need any attempt to prove; that a less number of yards than what I here contend for, will be of very little national advantage, is clearly shewn from the extent of our coast, and from those emergencies which a state of war will inevitably produce to render them indispensable.

I expect to encounter here the usual objection of expence in having so many yards, and the little probability there is, that so many can be made use of in time of war. But a nation must have large establishments; and persons who make objections to them, on the score of expence, ought first to know in what manner expence is incurred. It is not in the number of superfluous officers, as is the common cry, but it is the want of a well organized system, working harmoniously and vigorously: it is in the want of a sufficiency of good officers and mechanics; of materials contracted for on the most advantageous terms; of laborers; of store-houses, admitting of a proper arrangement and preservation of stores; and, then, of a vigilant administration of the navy board over the whole. But, the peace establishment of as many yards as I have enumerated, ought not to exceed $700,000 per annum, to be apportioned amongst them at the discretion of the board, according as they might deem each place most eligible for any work to be done during the year. For this sum, all the vessels we now have, could be kept in a state of readiness; masts, spars of every kind, capstans, gun carriages, water casks, iron work, &c. &c. all kinds of stores which require time to make, could be making and collecting at the different depots, and distributing to different points, at the pleasure of the board; while, at the same time, our vessels cruising on the coast, could receive, as they might require, any supplies whatever. Nor will this estimate be much, if any, beyond the expence of the four establishments admitted by the "naval officer," for, if four, only, be continued, the number of mechanics, seamen and laborers attached to them, must be doubled, and that of officers increased one-third. Neither, under these regulations, will the four yards be able to make supplies, by way of preparation, unless to a very inconsiderable extent, indeed. Divide our navy amongst them, even small as it now is, and these four yards would expend no small part of the appropriation allowed for them, in keeping the ships constantly ready for service. If we have no more in time of war, we shall then have no choice of using which we please. Those of most importance to us, will be the most closely watched; our favorite dock-yards at Boston and Newport will surely be the aim of the enemy; and, if they are carried by overwhelming force, what then becomes of our navy? Under every view, therefore, of the question, it is most judicious to increase, not diminish, the number; and, under a system like this, at least in its general outlines, in 5 years we could have 15 sail of the line, and 10 frigates, stores well supplied, establishments well organized, and our navy efficient.

There is one other part of this subject, to which I think it well to draw some attention, and that is—the inexpediency of making the dock-yards for repairing and equipping vessels, the same as those where they are built in the first instance. I think it will embarrass the service. But as this can only be matter of speculation as yet, I merely make the suggestion. This much, however, appears to me plain, that Newport affords no such advantages for a grand naval depot as the North River. As a yard, to furnish supplies and make repairs to vessels, it would be invaluable. But on the North River, we should have at command, iron, hemp and copper, we should be near the lakes—our situation to the union would be more central; workmen of every description; and stores of every kind, could be procured with certainty and despatch—and what of local disadvantages might be found, would be removed by very common expedients.

The general force of the reasons I have advanced upon this subject is now left to the public. It must be seen, I think, that if we are to have a navy, we must have dock-yards. But, if the recommendation of the "naval officer" is to be taken, to break up all but 3, or at most 4, then the question is decided.—If all the experience, derived from the war just ended, is to be lost upon this generation; if no preparations are to be made for another conflict; if, indeed, we may now repose calmly in a state of insensibility, dead to the past and regardless of the future, then let us take the counsel offered. But, if the caution of our best and wisest politicians is to be heeded, to prepare for war while we are at peace, have means and time—let us now make ready. The next war, come when it may, will shew no drawn battles. When we fight again, it will be with fleets on both sides. England knows this perfectly well. She sees, with a glance searching into futurity, that, in only one generation more, this nation will have twenty millions of souls; that our resources for a navy will be immense; that the effect of our political institutions upon the moral condition of the whole earth, must have an accelerating impetus; and, that, unless, within a few years, she annihilates our naval power, her system of commercial monopoly, and maritime greatness, is at an end. The day on which Hull took the Guerriere produced new relations, which will be continually developing themselves; and the American republic, enlightening the world with her political institutions, is, hereafter, by all human calculation, to take a firm stand in defence of those free principles of maritime law, hitherto driven from the ocean by the arms of Great Britain.

I consider this as no digression from the main object of these remarks. Our situation is a serious one. The old world is fast bound in chains of tyranny and superstition, and, to all human appearance, there is none to break them. But, if true to ourselves, we are safe. If true to posterity, they realize the most splendid prospects that ever visionary formed. But, let us reason from the past to the future; use experience and facts; and, as far as they teach us, let us go. And, finally, if our navy be deemed of importance to our national security, interest and glory, let every friend to it keep his eye steadily fixed upon the truths which it has been the aim of these papers to enforce—

That dock-yards are essential to dispatch and economy, in equipping and repairing vessels of war:

That it is no time to break up any of them:

That they ought to be increased; and

That this is the time to make effectual preparation for another war, come when it may, upon us.

A NAVY ADVOCATE.

Foreign Articles.

London papers to December 31. The internal state of France is unsettled. The allied troops, whenever they appear in small bodies, are attacked by the people, or refused supplies by the French "patriots," for which the "blood-thirsty villains" (as the folks always called the French, in the same circumstances) take ample vengeance in conflagration, murder and pillage. Fresh corps of Prussian troops are pushing into France, to get equipped. It is confidently stated that Austria and Prussia have made an alliance, offensive and defensive, to counterbalance the good understanding that appears to exist between Russia and France. Several fortresses are to be built on the Dutch frontier, to be in readiness by the time the French fortresses are to be given up. The emperor of Russia arrived at Berlin on the 24th October. Corps of British troops, with large supplies of the munitions of war, were yet entering France, to join Wellington.

Savary, Lallemand, &c. are detained at Malta, as "prisoners of war." It is generally understood that there is no war in Europe. How is it?

Several vessels were about to sail for St. Helena, with the frame of a palace, &c. for the accommodation of "general Bonaparte."

The London Sun of the 20th November, states, that active exertions were making to obtain seamen for the Niger frigate, capt. S. Jackson; and that the moment she was ready, the hon. Mr. Bagot, minister to the United States, would embark and proceed on his embassy.

It appears, from travels in South America, in 1804, that some of the rich miners and landholders of Mexico enjoy an annual income of from two to six millions of francs. The duke of Monteleone, from his landed estates, had an income of a million and a half; he has 10 villages, which contain a population of 17,700 souls.

Ney's trial was progressing. He denied the competency of the military commission to try him, being a peer of France, and his case was referred to the chamber of peers. The London ministerial papers are quite angry that he has not been shot at any rate—they might try him afterwards.

There appears to be considerable fermentation at Paris. There are strong patrols night and day. The grenadiers of the guard, and the gendarmes are called out.

The French funds are very low—56 : 25. Some Russian troops have returned to Paris. The commandants of Valenciennes and Landau have refused to give up these fortresses to the allies. It is said they are besieged! but Louis is king of France!! The emperor of Austria is preparing to be crowned king of Lombardy and Venice—Venice, the republic that so much excited the sensibility of some when Bonaparte took it to himself.

"Legitimacy." The return of the Bourbons into France as well as Spain, has brought back all the old curses of royalty which Bonaparte and the Cortes did so much remove. The protestants are yet massacred by the catholics in France.

The pitiful creature Angouleme, is supposed to be at the bottom of these murders. The French people have a glorious prospect of "religious liberty," if he gets on the throne; which, however, I think that he will not. The following, from a late British paper is interesting on this subject:

"Private letters are said to have been received from the south of France, stating the renewal of the persecutions of the protestants in that quarter, if, indeed, they have been at all suspended. On the 17th of October, seven of the principal inhabitants of Nismes, protestants, were assassinated.—A wretch of the name of Thirstallon was the leader of the catholic band of assassins on this occasion, and has since been arrested. On a former occasion, it is added, he was set at liberty, on account of his threatening to disclose the names of his employers! We shall now see whether the French government will bring him to justice. The duke of Angouleme is now in the south; we shall see whether this prince, so much flattered both by French and English newspapers, will clear himself of these suspicions which have been expressed respecting his political principles, by affording that protection to the protestants which the laws give them. Surely the subject is of sufficient importance for the interposition of the allied powers."

Two vessels have lately arrived in England from the Mediterranean, with nearly $1,200,000 on government account.

THE INQUISITION.—that "venerable institution" abolished by Bonaparte, and restored by Ferdinand: "In the annals of the Inquisition published by Don Florento, it is stated, that in the first twenty-eight years, this tribunal sentenced 130,400 persons to be burnt alive; 70,930 to be burnt in effigy; 1,405,071 to various penances."

PRELIMINARY TREATY OF PEACE.

LONDON, October 27.—On the 2d October the following bases of the treaty of peace were signed at Paris, by the plenipotentiaries of Russia, Great Britain, Austria and Prussia, on the one part, and by the duke of Richelieu, on the part of France, viz.

Art. I. The boundaries of France as they were in 1790, from the North sea to the Mediterranean, shall form the fundamental principles of the territorial arrangements so that those districts and territories of former Belgium, of Germany and Savoy which by the treaty of Paris 1814, were annexed to old France, shall remain separated therefrom.

II. Where this principle is departed from, the boundaries of 1799 shall be modified and better arranged according to mutual conventions and interests, both in regard to civil jurisdiction, so as to cut off inclosed districts, and assign, on both sides, a more regular territory, and also in regard to military jurisdiction, so as to strengthen certain weak parts of the boundaries of the counterinuous countries.

In conformity to this principle, France cedes to the allies—

Landau, Saarlouis, Phillippeville, and Marienburg, with those circles of territory which are more fully laid down in the plan of the treaty proposed by the four allied cabinets, on the 20th September.

Versoy with the necessary territory shall be ceded to the Helvetic confederation, in order to bring the canton of Geneva in direct communication with Switzerland, and the French line of customs shall be there established in the manner most convenient for the administrative system of both countries.

The works of Huniguen shall be demolished. The French government binds itself to erect no others within a distance of three miles from Basle.

France relinquished her rights to the principality of Monaco. On the other hand the possession of Avignon and the Venaissin, as well as the county of Mompelgard, and the possession of every other territory which is included within the French lines, shall be anew secured to France.

III. France pays to the allied powers, by way of indemnity for the expences of their last armaments, the sum of seven hundred millions of francs. A special commission shall fix the modes, the periods, and the securities for this payment.

IV. A military line of the following seventeen fortresses, viz:—Conde, Valenciennes, Boucham, Cambray, Le Quesnoy, Maubeuge, Landrecies, Avesnes, Rocroy, Givet, Mezieres, Sedan, Montmedy, Thiouville, Longwy, Bitche, and the bridge head of Fort Louis, shall be occupied by an army of 150,000 men, of the allied powers. This army, which shall be placed under the command of a general chosen by these powers, shall be wholly maintained at the expence of France.

A special commission shall fix all that relates to its maintenance, which shall be regulated in the best way for supplying all the wants of the army, and at the same time the least burdensome for the country.

The longest duration of this military occupation is fixed at five years. However, on the expiration of three years, after the allied sovereigns have weighed the situation of things and of mutual interest, as well as the advances which may have been made in the restoration of order and tranquility in France, they will come to a common decision with the king of France, whether the above term of years may be shortened.

The plenipotentiaries having definitely adapted those bases, have concerted upon the course to be adopted in order to arrive in the shortest possible time at a formal arrangement, and have consequently determined—

“1. That a general treaty shall be drawn up upon the bases above laid down, and adding to them such articles as by common consent shall be judged necessary to complete it. The French government will nominate on its part the person who is to unite with those whom the four courts have charged with the drawing up of the treaty.

“2. That the commissioners appointed for the military affairs shall proceed, conjointly with the commissioners whom the French government shall appoint for this purpose, to draw up a project of a convention to regulate every thing relative to the military occupation, and to the support of the army employed in this occupation. The same commissioners shall also determine the manner and the periods of the evacuation of all such parts of the French territory, as are not comprehended within the line of the military occupation.

“3. That a special commission appointed for that purpose by the contracting parties, shall draw up, without delay, a plan of a convention to regulate the mode, the periods, and the guarantees of the payment of the seven hundred millions of francs to be stipulated by the general treaty.

“4. The commissions formed to examine the reclamations of several powers, relatively to the non-execution of certain articles of the treaty of Paris, shall continue its labors with the understanding, that it is to communicate them as soon as possible to the plenipotentiaries in the principal negotiation.

“That as soon as these commissioners shall have terminated their labors, the plenipotentiaries shall unite to examine the results of them, to determine on the definitive arrangements, and to sign the principal treaty, as well as the different particular conventions. The process verbal having been read, the plenipotentiaries have approved it, and signed

RASUMOUSKY,	WISSEMBERG,
CASTLEREAGH,	CAPO D'ISTRA,
RICHELIEU,	HUMBOLDT,
WELLINGTON,	HARDENBURG.”

SEDITION ACT. Chamber of Deputies, Oct. 24.—The committee to whom was referred the bill relative to seditious cries, reported it, as taken into a new draft; and the further consideration of it was postponed until Friday. The following is an outline of the bill:—

“Louis, by the grace of God, &c.

“It was our wish to have left the repression of crimes to the ordinary tribunals. But under extraordinary circumstances to prevent disorders arising from civil discord, it is necessary to institute more severe punishments. The 63d articles of the charter reserves the re-establishment of prevotal courts. This institution promises for the future the happy results which it produced under our ancestors. But it is necessary to establish in the mean while a provisional legislation.

“We therefore decree, &c.

Art. 1. All persons convicted of having composed, distributed or sold writings, tending to excite the overthrow of the government, &c. shall be prosecuted and tried as guilty of sedition.

Art. 2. Establishes the punishment of transportation.

Art. 3. Applies the same punishment to the pulling down of the white flag and hoisting any other.

Art. 4. Declares that the court of assizes shall take cognizance of these crimes.

Art. 5. Declares seditious, all cries, speeches and writings, tending to diminish the respect due to the king and his family, or by which either the name of the usurper or the overthrow of the constitutional charter may be invoked.

Art. 6. Applies the punishment to the sellers and distributors of images, tending to the same end.

Art. 7. Is directed against persons who may display any other arms, cockades or signals than those acknowledged in France.

Art. 8. Affects those who may endeavor to spread alarm concerning the re-establishment of tithes, and the spoliation of the purchasers of national property.

Art. 9. Provides against provocations to these crimes, although indirect, if it be understood that they are committed.

Art. 10. Allots to the authors of these crimes the punishment of five years imprisonment, at most, and a fine of 3000 francs.

Art. 11. Concerns those officers who may be deprived of their pay, and state pensioners who are deprived of their allowances.

They are to forfeit their functions conformably to the code.

They are to remain under the surveillance of the high police, which cannot exceed five years.

In case of a repetition of offence, ten years of imprisonment or ten years surveillance.

Finally, the tribunals may order the printing and publishing of these judgments.

Dreadful fire. At the great and venerable city of Casan, in Russia, 1000 houses and 21 churches were destroyed by fire on the 5th Sept. (O. S.) A furious storm that prevailed at the time, rendered abortive all attempts to check the progress of the flames. The merchandize consumed was of great value.

The British mint has been also partially destroyed by fire, supposed to be accidental. The loss estimated at from 60 to £80,000.

Mrs. Clark and her family cut a great figure in the British papers. Notices of ladies like her, from duchesses down to chambermaids, crim. con. cases of priests and nobles, robberies and swindling tricks, and trials for crimes, and accounts of executions, sometimes fills one half of a London newspaper.

From a late London paper. The following has been issued from the secretary of state's office for the war department, in Downing-street:

"Sir—I am directed by lord Bathurst, to acquaint you, in reply to your letter of the —, that his majesty's government have it under consideration, whether it may be advisable to afford next year some degree of encouragement to persons willing to proceed as settlers to the British provinces in North America, and that as soon as this question shall be decided, I will not fail to communicate the advantages which it is proposed to hold out to them: but I think it right now to apprise you, that whatever determination may be ultimately come to upon this question, no grants of limits will henceforth be given in those provinces to non-residents, beyond the means of the parties offering to proceed thither may enable them to cultivate. I am," &c.

London, Nov. 31. The JAVA will be launched from Plymouth dock-yard on the 16th of next month. She mounts 30 guns, 24 pounders, on the upper deck; 28 carronades, 42 pounders, and 2 34 pounders on the upper deck. Complement of men 480.

Brussels, Oct. 5. Several persons who have been guilty of excesses and acts of violence towards the allied soldiers in the French frontier departments, and who are already at Lunenburg, are to be conveyed to different fortresses in Germany, to work there upon the fortifications. Notwithstanding the punishments inflicted from time to time, there is still great reason to complain of the spirit of the inhabitants, who do not seem inclined to take example from others.

[Now, if "Devil-Bonaparte" had done thus to the Spanish patriots, what would the "friends of order" have said?]

Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On Thursday, the 21st inst. Mr. Darlington offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the president's message as relates to roads and canals, be instructed to enquire into the expediency of extending prompt and efficient aid, on the part of the general government, to the company incorporated for the purpose of cutting a canal from the waters of the Chesapeake to those of the Delaware, commonly called the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. D. said he flattered himself that the house would not only agree to the resolution, but act effectually on the subject of it. It was fashionable, he added, to call ourselves an enlightened people. He was not disposed to controvert this principle, but he hoped we should by our acts substantiate our claim to this character. The members of the government had, he believed, been made sensible, by the course and events of the war, of the importance of inland communication, and he hoped they would during peace profit by their experience, and give it all the aid in their power.

The motion of Mr. D. was agreed to.

Friday, December 22. Mr. Robertson made the following report:

"The committee on the public lands who were instructed by a resolution of the house to enquire into the expediency of granting rights of occupancy and pre-emption at two dollars per acre to all such persons as shall be actually seated, on the 1st day of October, 1816, upon any section of land obtained by treaty or conquest from the Creek nation of Indians during the late war,

Report, That from the year 1785 to the present time, laws to prevent unauthorised individuals from settling on public unappropriated lands of the United States, have been in constant operation; that the policy and wisdom of such laws appear to be undeniable. If those by which they have been violated have in some instances been vested with the right of pre-emption, yet it seems clearly impolitic to hold out invitations to a further disregard of them. The committee are not aware that the system in this respect requires alteration or amendment. They therefore respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant rights of occupancy or pre-emption to such persons as shall settle on the public lands which have been obtained by treaty or conquest from the Creek Indians during the late war."

This report being under consideration, Mr. Thomas opposed, and Mr. Robertson replied in defence of it.

Mr. Easton moved the following instruction to the committee on roads and canals:

Resolved, That the committee on roads and canals be instructed to enquire into the expediency of opening and improving the following roads, to wit, from Shawnee-town to Kaskaskias in Illinois; from the town of Hamilton in Ohio, to Vincennes in Indiana, thence to the town of St. Louis in Missouri, thence by the way of Arkansas to the northern boundary line of the state of Louisiana.

Mr. Easton's plan was as follows:

"The president of the United States to be authorised to appoint a suitable number of commissioners to survey, mark, and lay out the said roads, and to designate the places where it will be necessary and proper that persons should settle, for the purpose of keeping houses of entertainment for the accommodation of travellers—that the governors or secretaries of the respective territories be authorised to lease to an inhabitant who will settle at those places, a tract of land not exceeding 640 acres, nor less than 320, on condition of their opening and keeping in repair the road, for the distance allotted to them, for the term of ten years, which allotments shall be next adjoining the lands so leased to them respectively; and at the expiration of the leases, the lessees, their heirs or assigns, upon satisfying the president of the United States for the time being, that they have fulfilled the conditions of the leases respectively, shall be entitled to receive a patent for the lands so leased from the government: provided, that no one lessee shall be required to keep the road in repair for more than five miles for a tract of 320 acres, nor more than ten miles for a tract of 640 acres; and the commissioners in laying out and marking said roads, shall report to the governors or secretaries the several allotments specially, specifying in what allotments the lessees ought to be entitled to 640 acres, and in what allotments they will be entitled to a less quantity of land, and to what amount; which said allotments shall respectively be numbered and laid down upon a plat of the said roads, to be plated by the surveyors to be employed to run the same—one copy whereof shall be deposited with the governor of the territory in which the road shall be, and other copies of the plats of said roads, to be deposited in the office of the commissioner of the general land office."

The resolution was agreed to.

The house adjourned until Tuesday.

Tuesday, December 26 After the presentation and reference of twenty or thirty petitions, several of which were from manufacturers claiming the protection of government,

Mr. Taylor of New-York, from the committee of elections, made a report on the petition of Erastus Root, contesting the election of John Adams, a member returned in consequence of the error committed by the deputy clerk of Green county (one of the two composing that congressional district) who, in copying the polls, spelt the name Rott instead of Root, whereby 576 of his votes were vitiated, which left a majority to Mr. Adams, who was therefore returned. The committee report that Mr. Root had in fact the majority of votes, as appeared by evidence before them, and was admitted by Mr. Adams. The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That John Adams is not entitled to a seat in this house."

"Resolved, That Erastus Root is entitled to a seat in this house."

The report was further explained by Mr. Taylor, and no objection having been made to it on any part, it was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Root appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

MILITARY.

Mr. Johnson of Ky. from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill "making provision for three additional military academies."

[This bill proposes that there shall be three additional military academies; one within the District of Columbia, one at Mount Dearborn in South Carolina, and one in the vicinity of Newport, at the junction of the Ohio and Licking rivers, in the state of Kentucky, with the same establishment of officers, and under the same regulations generally as the present military academy—the number of cadets in the several military academies never to exceed in the whole the number of eight hundred.]

The bill was committed.

THE TREATY.

The following message was received from the president of the United States by Mr. Todd his secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives,

I lay before congress copies of a proclamation notifying the convention concluded with Great Britain, on the third day of July last, and that the same has been duly ratified; and I recommend to congress such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States.

JAMES MADISON,

December 23, 1815.

The message and treaty were referred to the committee of foreign affairs.

Thursday, December 28. Mr. McLean of Ohio, offered for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the committee of commerce and manufactures be instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing by law, a port of entry at Cincinnati in the state of Ohio."

[Mr. McLean supported his motion by some remarks that would have confounded my lord Sheffield—stating that it was designed to import goods direct from Europe, &c. to this place "in the woods," &c. &c.]

On motion of Mr. Johnson of Ky. the proposed resolution was amended by adding to the end of it the words "Louisville in the state of Kentucky;" and, thus amended, was agreed to.

A letter was received from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a statement of the duties and drawbacks on goods imported into the U. States and exported therefrom during the years 1812, 1813, and 1814; which were ordered to be printed.

The engrossed bill to authorise payment for property lost, captured and destroyed by the enemy whilst in the service of the United States, during the late war, was read the third time, and passed—yeas 113; nays 15.

On motion of Mr. Johnson, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Desha in the chair, on the bill making provision for the support of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers of the army of the revolution, of the late war, and of the army for the time being.

The bill having received several amendments was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Commercial Convention.

JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

WHEREAS a convention between the United States of America and his Britannic majesty, to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of his Britannic majesty, was signed at London on the third day of July in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, by plenipotentiaries respectively appointed for that purpose, which convention is in the words following, to wit:

A CONVENTION,

To regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of his Britannic majesty.

The United States of America and his Britannic majesty being desirous by a convention to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people, in such a manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory, have respectively named plenipotentiaries and given them full powers to treat of and conclude such convention, that is to say, the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof, hath appointed for their plenipotentiaries John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay and Albert Gallatin, citizens of the United States; and his royal highness the prince regent, acting in the name and on behalf of his majesty, has named for his plenipotentiaries the right honorable Frederick John Robinson, vice-president of the committee of privy council for trade and plantations, joint paymaster of his majesty's forces, and a member of the imperial parliament; Henry Goulburn, esq. a member of the imperial parliament, and under secretary of state, and William Adams, esq. doctor of civil laws; and the said plenipotentiaries having mutually produced and shewn their said full powers, and exchanged copies of the same, have agreed on and concluded the following articles, videlicet:

Article the first.—There shall be between the territories of the United States of America and all the territories of his Britannic majesty in Europe, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries respectively shall have liberty freely and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports and rivers in the territories aforesaid to which other foreigners are permitted to come, to enter into the same and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories respectively, also to hire and occupy houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce; and generally the merchants and traders of each nation respectively shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

Article the second.—No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of his Britannic majesty in Europe of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the U. States than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce or manufacture of any other foreign country, nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States or to his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country, nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States or of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels, and the same duties shall be paid on the importation into ports of any of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe of any article in the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, whether such importation shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

The same duties shall be paid and the same bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles, the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe to the United States, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the United States, or in British vessels; and the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed, on the exportation of any articles, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States to his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, whether such exportation shall be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

It is further agreed, that in all cases where drawbacks are or may be allowed, upon the re-exportation of any goods, the growth, produce or manufacture of either country respectively, the amount of the said drawbacks shall be the same, whether the said goods shall have been originally imported in a British or American vessel; but when such re-exportation shall take place from the United States in a British vessel or from the territories of his Britannic majesty in Europe in an American vessel, to any other foreign nation, the two contracting parties reserve to themselves respectively, the right of regulating or diminishing, in such case, the amount of the said drawback.

The intercourse between the United States and his Britannic majesty's possessions in the West Indies, and on the continent of North America, shall not be effected by any of the provisions of this article, but each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights, with respect to such an intercourse.

Article the third.—His Britannic majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States of America, shall be admitted, and hospitably received at the principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, videlicet, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Prince of Wales Island, and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on trade between the said principal settlements and the said United States, in all articles of which the importation and exportation, respectively, to and from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited; provided only, that it shall not be lawful for them in any time of war, between the British government and any state or power whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British government, any military stores or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted, no higher or other duty or charge than shall be payable on the vessels of the most favored European nations, and they shall pay no higher or other duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels, than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in the vessels of the most favored European nations.

But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any articles from the said principal settlements to any port or place, except to some port or place in the United States of America, where the same shall be unladen.

It is also understood, that the permission granted by this article, is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories, but the vessels of the United States having, in the first instance, proceeded to one of the said principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, and then going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another, shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade. The vessels of the U. States may also touch for refreshment, but not for commerce, in the course of their voyage to or from British territories in India, or to or from the dominions of the emperor of China, at the Cape of Good Hope, the Island of St. Helena, or such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain, in the African or Indian seas, it being well understood that in all that regards this article, the citizens of the United States shall be subject, in all respects, to the laws and regulations of the British government, from time to time established.

Article the fourth. It shall be free, for each of the two contracting parties, respectively to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party, but before any consul shall act as such, he shall in the usual form be approved and admitted by the government to which he is sent, and it is hereby declared that in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or government of the country to which he is sent, such consul may either be punished according to the law, if the laws will reach the case, or be sent back, the offended government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

It is hereby declared that either of the contracting parties, may except from the residence of consuls such particular places as such party shall judge fit to be so excepted.

Article the fifth. This convention, when the same shall have been duly ratified by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their senate, and by his Britannic majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory on the said United States and his majesty for four years from the date of its signature, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

Done at London, this third day of July in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

(L. S.)	H. CLAY,
(L. S.)	ALBERT GALLATIN,
(L. S.)	FRED. J. ROBINSON,
(L. S.)	WILLIAM ADAMS.

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, JAMES MADISON, president of the United States of America, having seen and considered the foregoing convention, have by and with the advice and consent of the senate, accepted, ratified and confirmed the same, and every clause and article thereof, subject to the exception contained in a declaration made by the authority of his Britannic majesty on the 24th day of November last, a copy of which declaration is hereunto annexed.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and have signed the same with my hand. Done at L. S. the City of Washington this twenty-second day of December, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the President;

JAMES MONROE,
Secretary of State.

DECLARATION.

The undersigned, his Britannic majesty's charge d'affairs in the United States of America, is commanded by his royal highness the prince regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his majesty, to explain and declare, upon the exchange of the ratifications of the convention concluded at London on the 31 of July, of the present year, for regulating the commerce and navigation between the two countries, that in consequence of events which have happened in Europe subsequent to the signature of the convention aforesaid, it has been deemed expedient and determined in conjunction with the allied sovereigns, that St. Helena shall be the place allotted for the future residence of general Napoleon Bonaparte, under such regulations as may be necessary for the perfect security of his person, and it has been resolved, for that purpose, that all ships and vessels whatever, as well British ships and vessels as others, excepting only ships belonging to the East India Company, shall be excluded from all communication with or approach to that Island.

It has therefore become impossible to comply with so much of the third article of the treaty as relates to the liberty of touching for refreshments at the island of St. Helena, and the ratifications of the said treaty will be exchanged under the explicit declaration and understanding that the vessels of the United States cannot be allowed to touch at, or hold any communication whatever with the said island, so long as the said island shall continue to be the place of residence of the said Napoleon Bonaparte.

(Signed) ANTHONY ST. JNO. BAKER.

Treaty with Algiers. JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
To all and singular to whom these presents shall come, Greeting:

WHEREAS a treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America and his highness Omar Bashaw, dey of Algiers, was concluded at Algiers on the 30th day of June last, by Stephen Decatur and William Shaler, citizens of the United States, on the part of the United States, and the said Omar Bashaw, dey of Algiers, and was duly signed and sealed by the said parties, which treaty is in the words following, to wit:

Treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States of America and his highness Omar Bashaw, dey of Algiers.

ARTICLE THE FIRST.

There shall be, from the conclusion of this treaty, a firm, inviolable and universal peace and friendship between the president and the citizens of the United States of America on the one part, and the dey and subjects of the regency of Algiers in Barbary on the other, made by the free consent of both parties, on the terms of the most favored nations: and if either party shall hereafter grant to any other nation any particular favor or privilege in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party, freely when it is freely granted to such other nations; but when the grant is conditional, it shall be at the option of the contracting parties to accept, alter or reject such conditions, in such manner as shall be most conducive to their respective interests.

ARTICLE THE SECOND.

It is distinctly understood between the contracting parties, that no tribute, either as biennial presents or under any other form or name whatever, shall ever be required by the dey and regency of Algiers from the United States of America, on any pretext whatever.

ARTICLE THE THIRD.

The dey of Algiers shall cause to be immediately delivered up to the American squadron, now off Algiers, all the American citizens now in his possession, amounting to ten more or less; and all the subjects of the dey of Algiers now in possession of the United States, amounting to five hundred more or less, shall be delivered up to him, the United States, according to the usages of civilized nations, requiring no ransom for the excess of prisoners in their favor.

ARTICLE THE FOURTH.

A just and full compensation shall be made by the dey of Algiers, to such citizens of the United States as have been captured and detained by Algerine cruizers, or who have been forced to abandon their property in Algiers in violation of the twenty-second article of the treaty of peace and amity, concluded between the United States and the dey of Algiers, on the 5th of September, 1795.

And it is agreed between the contracting parties, that in lieu of the above, the dey of Algiers shall cause to be delivered forthwith into the hands of the American consul, residing at Algiers, the whole of a quantity of bales of cotton, left by the late consul general of the United States, in the public magazines in Algiers, and that he shall pay into the hands of the said consul the sum of ten thousand Spanish dollars.

ARTICLE THE FIFTH.

If any goods belonging to any nation with which either of the parties are at war, should be loaded on board vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free and unmolested, and no attempts shall be made to take or detain them.

ARTICLE THE SIXTH.

If any citizens or subjects with their effects belonging to either party shall be found on board a prize vessel taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be liberated immediately, and in no case, on any other pretence whatever shall any American citizen be kept in captivity or confinement, or the property of any American citizen found on board of any vessel belonging to any other nation, with which Algiers may be at war, be detained from its lawful owners after the exhibition of sufficient proofs of American citizenship and of American property by the consul of the United States, residing at Algiers.

ARTICLE THE SEVENTH.

Proper passports shall immediately be given to the vessels of both the contracting parties, on condition that the vessels of war, belonging to the regency of Algiers, on meeting with merchant vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States of America, shall not be permitted to visit them with more than two persons besides the rowers; these only shall be permitted to go on board without first obtaining leave from the commander of said vessel, who shall compare the passport, and immediately permit said vessel to proceed on her voyage; and should any of the subjects of Algiers insult or molest the commander or any other person on board a vessel so visited, or plunder any of the property contained in her, on complaint being made by the consul of the United States residing in Algiers, and on his producing sufficient proof to substantiate the fact, the commander or Rais of said Algerine ship or vessel of war, as well as the offenders, shall be punished in the most exemplary manner.

All vessels of war, belonging to the United States of America, on meeting a cruiser belonging to the regency of Algiers, on having seen her passports and certificates from the consul of the United States, residing in Algiers, shall permit her to proceed on her cruise unmolested, and without detention. No passports shall be granted by either party to any vessels, but such as are absolutely the property of citizens or subjects of the said contracting parties, on any pretence whatever.

ARTICLE THE EIGHTH.

A citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties, having bought a prize vessel condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificates of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for six months, which, considering the distance between the two countries, is no more than a reasonable time for her to procure proper passports.

ARTICLE THE NINTH.

Vessels of either of the contracting parties, putting into the ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, shall be furnished at the market price—and if any such vessel should so put in from a distance at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land, and re-embark her cargo, without paying any customs or duties whatever, but in no case shall she be compelled to land her cargo.

ARTICLE THE TENTH.

Should a vessel of either of the contracting parties be cast on shore within the territories of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her crew—no pillage shall be allowed. The property shall remain at the disposal of the owners; and if re-shipped on board of any vessel for exportation, no customs or duties whatever shall be required to be paid thereon, and the crew shall be protected and succoured, until they can be sent to their own country.

ARTICLE THE ELEVENTH.

If a vessel of either of the contracting parties shall be attacked by an enemy within cannon shot of the forts of the other, she shall be protected as much as is possible. If she be in port, she shall not be seized or attacked, when it is in the power of the other party to protect her; and, when she proceeds to sea, no enemy shall be permitted to pursue her from the same port, within twenty-four hours after her departure.

ARTICLE THE TWELFTH.

The commerce between the U. States of America and the Regency of Algiers, the protections to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen, the reciprocal rights of establishing consuls in each country, and the privileges, immunities and jurisdictions to be enjoyed by such consuls, are declared to be on the same footing in every respect with the most favored nations respectively.

ARTICLE THE THIRTEENTH.

The consul of the United States of America shall not be responsible for the debts contracted by citizens of his own nation, unless he previously gives written obligations so to do.

ARTICLE THE FOURTEENTH.

On a vessel or vessels of war, belonging to the U. States, anchoring before the city of Algiers, the consul is to inform the Dey of her arrival, when she shall receive the salutes which are by treaty or custom given to the ships of war of the most favored nations, on similar occasions, and which shall be returned gun for gun; and if after such arrival, so announced, any christians whatsoever, captives in Algiers, make their escape and take refuge on board any of the ships of war, they shall not be required back again, nor shall the consul of the United States or commander of said ship, be required to pay any thing for the said christians.

ARTICLE THE FIFTEENTH.

As the government of the U. States of America has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquility of any nation, and as the said states have never entered into any voluntary war or act of hostility, except in defence of their just rights on the high seas, it is declared by the contracting parties, that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two nations; and the consuls and agents of both nations shall have liberty to celebrate the rites of their respective religions in their own houses.

The consuls respectively shall have liberty and personal security given them to travel within the territories of each other both by land and sea, and shall not be prevented from going on board any vessels they may think proper to visit: they shall likewise have the liberty to appoint their own drogoman and broker.

ARTICLE THE SIXTEENTH.

In case of any dispute arising from the violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeals shall be made to arms, nor shall war be declared on any pretext whatever; but if the consul residing at the place where the dispute shall happen, shall not be able to settle the same, the government of that country shall state their grievance in writing, and transmit the same to the government of the other, and the period of three months shall be allowed for answers to be returned, during which time no act of hostility shall be permitted by either party; and in case the grievances are not redressed, and a war should be the event, the consuls and citizens and subjects of both parties respectively, shall be permitted to embark with their effects unmolested, on board of what vessel or vessels they shall think proper, reasonable time being allowed for that purpose.

ARTICLE THE SEVENTEENTH.

If in the course of events, a war should break out between the two nations, the prisoners captured by either party shall not be made slaves, they shall not be forced to hard labor, or other confinement than such as may be necessary to secure their safe keeping, and shall be exchanged rank for rank; and it is agreed that prisoners shall be exchanged in twelve months after their capture, and the exchange may be effected by any private individual legally authorized by either of the parties.

ARTICLE THE EIGHTEENTH.

If any of the Barbary states or other powers at war with the United States, shall capture any American vessel and send into any port of the regency of Algiers, they shall not be permitted to sell her, but shall be forced to depart the port, on procuring the requisite supplies of provisions; but the vessels of the war of the United States, with any prizes they may capture from their enemies shall have liberty to frequent the ports of Algiers, for refreshment of any kinds, and to sell such prizes, in the said ports, without any other customs or duties, than such as are customary on ordinary commercial importations.

ARTICLE THE NINETEENTH.

If any of the citizens of the United States, or any persons under their protection, shall have any disputes with each other, the consul shall decide between the parties, and whenever the consul shall require any aid or assistance from the government of Algiers to enforce his decisions, it shall be immediately granted to him; and if any disputes shall arise between any citizens of the United States and the citizens or subjects of any other nation having a consul or agent in Algiers, such disputes shall be settled by the consuls or agents of the respective nations; and any disputes or suits at law, that may take place between any citizens of the United States and the subjects of the regency of Algiers, shall be decided by the dey in person, and no other.

ARTICLE THE TWENTIETH.

If a citizen of the United States should kill, wound, or strike a subject of Algiers, or, on the contrary, a subject of Algiers should kill, wound or strike a citizen of the United States, the law of the country shall take place, and equal justice shall be rendered, the consul assisting at the trial; but the sentence of punishment against an American citizen shall not be greater or more severe, than it would be against a Turk in the same predicament, and if any delinquent should make his escape, the consul shall not be responsible for him in any manner whatever.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-FIRST.

The consul of the United States of America shall not be required to pay any customs or duties whatever on anything he imports from a foreign country for the use of his house and family.

ARTICLE THE TWENTY-SECOND.

Should any of the citizens of the United States of America die within the limits of the regency of Algiers, the dey and his subjects shall not interfere with the property of the deceased, but it shall be under the immediate direction of the consul, unless otherwise disposed of by will. Should there be no consul, the effects shall be deposited in the hands of some person worthy of trust until the party shall appear who has a right to demand them, when they shall render an account of the property; neither shall the dey or his subjects give hindrance in the execution of any will that may appear.

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, JAMES MADISON, president of the United States of America, having seen and considered the said treaty, have, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, accepted, ratified and confirmed the same, and every clause and article thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and have signed the same with my hand.—
Done at the city of Washington this twentieth day of December, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

Emigration to America.

FROM CORBETT'S REGISTER.

Several persons have addressed me with a view of obtaining information, necessary to them, having an intention to emigrate to America. I should very willingly comply with their requests; but, in the first place, it must be obvious to them, that I cannot have the time to do it. In the second place, it is impossible for me to know the particular circumstances and capacities of the parties applying so thoroughly as to be able to give them advice. And in the third place, I shall never advise any person to go to America, or to any other foreign country, unless I am personally acquainted with such person, and am pretty certain that he would better himself by such a removal. What I have written about America all my readers know. With that information, and with other information, that they may acquire, they must judge for themselves. There can be no doubt of the happiness of a country, which so rapidly increases in population and resources, while the expences of government are so trifling. A people, whose population is now nearly as great as that of England and Scotland, and whose government, debt and all, does not demand more than a twelfth part of the sum from them that ours demands from us, must be happy. But, whether Englishmen, going amongst that people, would be happier than they are at home must be left to the decision of their own judgment. It is very certain, that to go to America with a view of living an idle life, would produce sad disappointment. Sincere placemen, pensioners, grantees, venal newspaper writers and reviewers, puffers, parasites, and quacks in every department, will certainly act wisely in remaining at home. Gentlemen who teach religion, if they have benefices to tolerable good chapels, may remain safely here; they would not better their lot by emigration to America. Lawyers, whether in silk or camblet gowns, will do well to remain; for, though there is a great deal of law-work in America, the native growth of lawyers is very sharp and eloquent. And, besides, they wear neither gowns, nor wigs, nor bands, which form no small part of the possessions of the English bar. For medical men, there is always room, and always will be as long as people continue to die. The truth is, that of the three professions, this is the best. I mean, it contains the best men, and the wisest and cleverest men. The priest or the lawyer may thrive by subserviency.—Religion and law accommodate themselves to time and politics; but he who has a broken leg, or an affection of the liver, thinks of nothing but the skill of the surgeon or physician that he employs. Besides, the very nature of the researches and the observations of medical men, make them despise superstition. Hence it is, that we very rarely meet with one of them, whose mind is not independent. These may safely go to a country, where the population is continually increasing, and where skill joined to diligence is sure to meet with due reward. The big bellied farmers, that require a stout horse or a strong gig to carry them about their fields to see what their men are doing, had better remain here till lower prices and the tax-gatherer have sweated them into a reasonable bulk and weight, for though the land in America produces very fine things, it will not produce much without labour; and, as laborers for hire are very scarce, the farmer must labor himself, or his sons and daughters must labor for him. But of all the classes of the community boroughmongers would profit least from emigration to America. In the state of Massachusetts there did seem to be a party that wished for the introduction of the noblesse. Yet I question whether our lords would, in that state, find a change for the better, because the aristocrats of Massachusetts seem to have been hankering after this for themselves. But the boroughmongers would be like fish out of water in reality. All their jargon about closeboroughs and open boroughs, and butage-tenures, and pot-wallopers, all their bargaining and trafficking would vanish for ever. They ought not to emigrate by any means. Neither ought the voters at Sarum, Gatton, Honiton, and such places, move an inch. They will find no country like Old England. All corporations, if they know when they are well off, will stick fast. Tax-gatherers grow out of national debts and standing armies, as naturally as toadstools grow out of the rotten stumps of trees; and, though ours are astonishingly expert, in the first place their trade is a thriving one here, and in the next place, there is only an army of six thousand men in America, and the debt, compared, to ours, is a mere nothing. Military and naval officers would gain no knightships in America, and their numerous wives, whose eyes our 'squires' dames are ready to tear out, would never be ladies; would never once hear the dulcet sound of "your ladyships;" though they were to hang the whole of their tawdry wardrobe upon their backs from morning till night. The makers of Honoverian whiskers, of muffs, tippets, and trifles for dragoons, and of stimulant draughts, and corsets for worn-out bucks, had better remain in England. The masters of work-houses whose virtues and piety, like that of Don Manuel Ordonez, are such, that they universally "grow rich in taking care of the concerns of the poor," ought not to quit a country where their trade is so flourishing; and those useful members of society, informers, thief-catchers, jailors and hangmen, would emigrate from plenty to starvation. In stating these discouragements to emigration, I wish to be understood as bearing no enmity towards America; and if any American chooses to draw a different conclusion, I must leave him to the enjoyment of his errors.

CHRONICLE.

An Algerine fleet of eight vessels, in search of the Dutch, lately overhauled the American schooner Active, armed at Boston, examined her papers, detained her but a very short time, treated her people civilly, and politely dismissed her! It would appear to be safer for an American vessel to be overhauled by the Algerines now, than it was to meet an English man of war, before the late contest.

The first anniversary of the Hartford convention, was observed on the 15th by the republicans of Hartford, with two-fold emotions of mourning and exultation. In the early part of the day, they displayed the flag of the union at half-mast; in the afternoon, it was raised to the mast-head in token of the discomfiture of the plotters. The American Mercury publishes the names of the convention, "that they may never be forgotten." The following is the list:—

George Cabot,	Nathan Dane,
William Prescott,	Harrison G. Otis,
Timothy Bigelow,	Joshua Thomas,
Samuel S. Wilde,	Joseph Lyman,
Stephen Longfellow, jr.	Daniel Waldo,
Hadijah Baylies,	George Bliss,
Chauncey Goodrich,*	James Hillhouse,
John Treadwell,	Zephaniah Swift,
Nathaniel Smith,	Calvin Goddard,
Roger M. Sherman,	Daniel Lyman,
Samuel Ward,	Edward Manton,
Benjamin Hazard,	Benjamin West,
Mills Olcott,	William Hall, junr.

*Deceased.

Don Jose Manuel Herrera, and suite, has arrived at New-Orleans, on his way to Washington city, as minister plenipotentiary from the Mexican republic to the United States. He appears to be a gentleman of great consideration in his country. The news brought by him is highly favorable. The whigs are in possession of all the open country; some of the great towns were still held by the royalists and Tories, but had no communication with each other, except by strong convoys, which were often harassed and sometimes beaten. Query—If Mr. Madison should not receive M. Herrera, will those who reprehended him for denying don Onis the character of ambassador from Spain, some time ago, be dissatisfied with it? It's another affair!

Com. Decatur. An elegant public entertainment was given to the gallant Decatur, at Barney's Fountain Inn, Baltimore, on Tuesday last. Every thing as got up in great style. Gen. Smith, in the absence of the mayor, presided. The company was very numerous, consisting of gentlemen of all parties, among whom were many of our elderly and most venerable fellow citizens. Nothing was omitted that could confer honor on the illustrious guest. Several members of congress, with the officers of the army and navy on this station, were invited.—The toasts were truly American. Among them were the following—

The valor we celebrate—It has illustrated the brightest page of our history; it deserves our deepest gratitude.

Our country—At peace with all nations; envious of none.

The Constitution. The memory of Washington. The President of the United States. The Navy—the Army.

Algiers and the other Barbary powers—taught by Decatur's gallant squadron to respect the laws of nations.

Lawrence, Burrows, Allen—Lamented martyrs to the honor of their flag.

Major-general Jackson—beloved by his followers, honored by his country, admired by the world.

Those who fell in defence of Baltimore—they were our fathers, our sons, our brothers; blessed be the memory of the dead.

Commerce—may its importance be estimated by a proper tariff.

The memory of commodore Preble.

Agriculture and manufactures—The former protects itself; the latter requires protection.

The memory of James A. Bayard—His services at Ghent secure the recollection of his worth.

Roads and canals—The arteries and veins of the body politic.

VOLUNTEERS.

Commodore DECATUR gave the following:

The citizens of Baltimore—Their patriotism and valor defeated the veteran forces of their enemy, who came, saw, and FLED!

After commodore Decatur retired, the president gave—

Commodore Decatur—The man whom his country delights to honor.

By captain Spence, of the navy—Commodore ROBERTS; remembered in the day of trouble, not forgotten in the hour of mirth.

By Mr. Sterrett—That noble courage, which extends humanity to the suffering subjects of other nations, after relieving the citizens of its own country from servile bondage.

By Mr. Stiles—General STRICKER, foremost in defence of the city; he met the enemy and checked his insolent advance.

By General Winder—SPANISH AMERICA; let us pay to her the debt which we owe for the aid of others in our struggle for freedom.

By Mr. Prieby—OUR COUNTRY; we love her in the hour of her prosperity, and when adversity assails her, our best blood is at her command.

General JACKSON left Washington City on Monday last, for his residence in Tennessee. His health has been much improved since his last indisposition.

Washington, December 21.—His excellency the chevalier De Onis, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his Catholic majesty Ferdinand VIIIth, near the United States, presented yesterday his credentials to the president and was received in that capacity.

The chevalier, we understand, addressed the president in the following terms:

Mr. President—The king, my master, Ferdinand the 7th, actuated by the most sincere wishes of re-establishing the mutual relations of a perfect harmony and generous friendship between Spain and the United States; and deeply affected with the sense of the evils occasioned to both countries, by the interruption of that fair and liberal correspondence, which his Catholic majesty from the first moment of his exaltation to the throne, so cheerfully intended to carry on and strengthen with this confederation, has just sent me the credentials I have the honor to present to your excellency, by which his majesty accredits me as his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near this republic.

I will think myself happy if by fulfilling the orders of the king my master, directed to the said object, I obtain the confidence of this government, and can contribute to banish for the future every shadow of misunderstanding between two nations, who, as well by their situation as by their political and commercial interests, ought to be perpetually united by the ties of the most sincere friendship. My personal sentiments, and the admiration I entertain of the virtues of the American people, are new titles by which I am pledged to employ all my zeal to the mutual happiness of both nations; and if assisted, as I hope I shall be, by your excellency's wisdom and friendly disposition, I cannot but anticipate the most happy issue to my mission.

To prevent mistake or misapprehension, the editor begs leave to remind his readers, that the extra half sheet which accompanies this number, is pagged for, and designed to precede the last.

We give our patrons a rich treat of matter this week—viz. the documents accompanying the treasury report; a list of the 14th congress, with a political designation of the members, and a table shewing the strength of the parties in both houses; statistical facts belonging to the district of Columbia, and the states of Virginia and Kentucky; a statement of the finances of Virginia; a variety of foreign and miscellaneous articles, among which is the treaty of peace between France and the allies, and the new French sedition law; a mass of valuable matter appertaining to the peace establishment of the army of the United States; regulations of the department for securing bounty lands; two essays on naval affairs; proceedings of congress for the last week; the commercial treaty with Great Britain; the treaty of peace with Algiers; advice to emigrants, by Cobbett; and the Chronicle.

Many articles in type lying over.

We have several choice things prepared for our next; among which is a quantity of original tables respecting the "war on the ocean," which we venture to say, will interest every reader. Similar tables, regarding the "war on the land," are in progress.

Legislature of Georgia.

GOVERNOR'S COMMUNICATION TO THE LEGISLATURE.
Executive Department, Georgia, 2
Milledgeville, 8th Nov. 1815.

Fellow citizens of the Senate, and House of Representatives.

It is known to you all that since the Legislature were last in session, the war which was then waging against the American people, has been concluded by an honorable peace. Permit me to congratulate you on this event. A nation whose habits and pursuits make it at all times their interest to be at peace with the rest of the world, and whose inclinations correspond with their interest, has just reason to be grateful to Heaven when they can enjoy that blessing. In the miserable distracted state of the world which has been witnessed for twenty-five years past, it is a miracle that we should have so long escaped the broil of war. And now after a short, and to us glorious struggle, the cloud has passed away, and we are basking in the sunshine of peace.

The subjects which appear proper to be communicated to the Legislature specially are not numerous. Such as have occurred during the recess, and fall within this description, will now be presented to your view.

Notwithstanding the large drafts which the occasions of the war have rendered necessary on the state Treasury, yet the amount of funds in that office at this time, nearly equals the amount of any former year. This is justly attributable to the wise policy adopted by the Legislature, of adding 50 per centum to the state tax for the purpose of reimbursing in part the amount of the direct tax assumed by the state to the United States. This year again, the quota of direct tax, though double the amount of the last year, has been settled from the proceeds of the sales of lands in the Mississippi Territory. In addition to the disbursements made under the appropriation of the last session for the erection of fortifications on the sea coast, there has been advanced to the quarter master's department of the army of the United States, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, and to the contractor for the army the sum of thirty thousand dollars. The first was specially authorised by the last legislature; but the second was drawn from the military fund after the enemy had invaded the state, at a period when the contractor's department was utterly destitute of funds and unable to supply the troops in service without such aid.

Both these advances of twenty and thirty thousand dollars have, however, been recognized by the war department, and their repayment assumed.—

VOL. IX.

The executive has not long since been notified, that the funds were ready for their discharge at the city of Washington, and the necessary drafts have been transmitted there for that purpose. We have also good grounds for the expectation, that the expenditure for fortifications on the sea coast will be reimbursed to us whenever the proper vouchers can be transmitted to the seat of government.

The whole correspondence and documents relating to these subjects, will accompany this communication.

It is proper further to mention, that divers smaller advances have at different periods been made, when they appeared indispensable for the promotion of the public service. These have been so guarded as to leave no doubt of their reimbursement.

The legislature will have an opportunity to discover, from personal observation, the progress which has been made in the erection of the penitentiary edifice. A report will in due time be laid before them from the commissioners, detailing the expenditure of the monies appropriated for that object.— It will be seen on inspection, that much of the interior work remains to be done; and it is believed that a completion of the whole of the present building, including the necessary wall, cannot be reasonably calculated on earlier than the next meeting of the legislature. The intervening time will afford an opportunity for revising and rendering more perfect the penitentiary code. The introduction of a system of punishments entirely new in the state, and the accommodation of that system (in a certain degree necessary) to the existing state of society here, was a work in which it must reasonably be expected that many imperfections will be found on experiment. Some it is believed will be discovered on a revision, which require correction before the code goes into operation. The legislature alone can direct the course proper to be pursued for the accomplishment of this object.

I have received a requisition from major general Gaines of the U. States army, for two thousand militia, to rendezvous at Fort Hawkins. The object of this requisition was, to have an effective force organized and in the field, sufficient as well to protect the commissioners who are engaged in running the boundary line, as our own frontier, from any hostile menaces of the Creek Indians. I am sorry to say, that a compliance with this requisition has been much retarded by the system of electing officers for detachments: And had an immediate pressure been made by the enemy, we might have had reason to regret serious disasters to the commissioners as well as our own frontier.

Whilst on this subject, I will again call the attention of the legislature to the condition of the volunteer infantry and rifle companies. Of the latter in particular, there are many remnants through the state, who in point of fact are complete exemptions from the public service. The authority to consolidate them, given by the act of the last session, is inefficient, owing to their dispersed situation.— Both descriptions ought, by law, to be thrown back into the line, and none suffered to remain in the character of volunteers any longer than they shall preserve their full complement of men.

There is one subject, to which it is believed to be important that the attention of the legislature should be seriously directed, without delay. We have felt by fatal experience, the injurious effects of being overtaken by a state of war, without possessing the necessary means for prosecuting it. A state of peace is the proper period for providing and laying up those means. The ample funds now at the command of the state, and the facility with which the proper arms, artillery and ammunition may be procured and transported, would appear so favorable to the purpose, than to neglect the opportunity, would leave the public councils inexcusable to the state. Experience too has taught us the kind of arms most efficient in the hands of an American soldier. These are rifles of the proper construction, and light artillery. Of muskets we have a considerable supply with their proper accoutrements; and this supply must annually increase by the operations of the act of congress, of the 23d day of April, 1808.

In the present untoward state of the world, we are the only people on the globe, who can with truth call themselves free. This freedom so dear to us, we are bound by the most sacred ties to protect and preserve. "In armed nation is invincible." In proportion as we prize the great blessing, so are the inducements to transmit the same unimpaired to posterity. In proportion as the enmity or hostility of others may tempt them to assail it, so are our obligations of duty to be prepared to repel their efforts.

In reviewing our own blessings, it would afford consolation to every philanthropic mind, if profiting by the example of our condition, other nations would be wise enough to direct more of their energies towards the objects of true private and public happiness. But it would appear as if Heaven had, for a time, given up the nations of Europe to be scourged by their own madness. Even now, when he, whose ambition was considered there as the great destroyer of the peace of empires, is no longer able to molest or destroy; the improved condition of Europe, is attested by the daily groans of millions who dare not consider their houses as their homes. These scenes passing in actual review before the world, may contribute to make an American citizen prize as he ought his own happiness. When we consider how apt a free people are to hold in too little estimation the high destiny to which Providence has conducted them, it is not improper to say, that for us it is fortunate things are so. The lesson may be a salutary one; for although we might for a while prize as we ought our distinguished state of happiness, yet it ought to be borne in constant recollection, that we are liable to shipwreck on the same rocks which have proven fatal to other republics. The scenes before us may serve to retard the catastrophe. There is, however, one advantage we possess over former republics, and indeed over every other nation ancient or modern, which if properly improved, may save us to the end. Our people are better enlightened. This circumstance will save us so long as it shall be properly appreciated. It is the pivot on which hangs the political salvation of the largest and fairest portion of the globe. Who then can duly appreciate the value of those abundant sources of education which are spread over the union; or who can be insensible to the weighty duty imposed on each in his own sphere, of administering to them nurture and support.

Fellow-citizens—Permit me to recommend to you harmony in your deliberations. If peradventure matters of discussion should arise, in which different opinions prevail, let not passion assume the empire of reason. The former is not the road which leads to the temple of truth.

PETER EARLY.

Legislature of Kentucky.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the senate,

And of the house of representatives,

We meet on the present occasion, under auspice much more favorable to our common country, than at any former period. The blessings of peace are again restored to our land, and the abundant productions of our fields, furnish to every part of the state, all the necessities, and many of the comforts of life; and demand from us our most grateful acknowledgments to Him from whom we receive so many blessings.

On former occasions it has been my duty to point out to you the dangers which overhung our country, from a war with one of the most powerful nations of Europe, brought on us by his cupidity, envy and ambition, and which, in its progress, threatened the subversion of our national institutions, and the prostration of our independence.

Under a long sunshine of peace, we had forgotten much of war:—Most of those, who in the former war, had stood the battle's brunt, and led us to victory, were in the silent tomb. Of those who remained, age had generally unnerved the vigor of early life:—The generation which had sprung up in the meantime, had betaken themselves to the pursuits of civil life. The nature of our government, whose end and object is the general happiness of the whole of the community, rendered us averse to war, and solicitous to avoid, by any honorable means, as appeal to arms. Our forbearance was considered by the enemies of our institutions, as the result of weakness in the government, and the loss of its citizens of that high sense of national honor and love of country, which had once been our distinguished characteristic.

When, at last, that appeal was made, the eyes of the world were upon us. They considered it as the test of our national character; and the ordeal which was to prove, whether our government was capable of sustaining the shock of external war, aided by internal intrigue. The spirit of the nation which lay dormant, not extinguished, was no sooner roused into action, than it burst upon the heads of our enemies, and struck terror and consternation through their ranks. The haughty grounds taken by our adversary, during a period auspicious to his views, have been abandoned. Terms of peace proffered by our ministers at an early period of the negotiation, were finally accepted by our enemy; but not until the negotiation had been spun out to see the events of a pending campaign, and which terminated highly honorable to the American arms. No longer is our character obscured by our forbearance, and our love of peace. Our brilliant successes at sea, and our splendid victories by land, have placed us on high ground among the nations of the earth.

To secure this standing, and to transmit it unimpaired to our posterity; to avail ourselves of the experience which the late war has given us, by providing against these errors in our policy which it has pointed out; and to cherish and improve the blessings of peace, after the privations of war, is the duty of the whole American family, but more especially of its several legislative bodies.

Toward the attainment of these ends:—

We should avail ourselves of a period of peace to increase and improve our fortifications; our arsenals; our armies, and every species of military equipment.

We should gradually increase our navy, as the increase of population, and the resources of the nation will permit.

We should re-organize the militia, and consequent thereon, revise the militia law; and as far as practicable, prevent in future those evasions and delays, in complying with executive requisitions for militia, which were so severely felt during the last war.

In short, we should recollect that to be always prepared to resist aggression, is the surest method of escaping it; and that in peace, is the safest and cheapest time to prepare for war.

We should extend the fostering care of government to our infant manufactories;

And we should improve and extend our internal navigation and our highways.

It is true, that to the national government it more properly belongs to provide for, or give impulse to some of the measures here suggested: but much may be done by the state legislatures, by a frank and liberal co-operation in their part, on subjects connected therewith, or having an influence thereon.

I particularly recommend to your consideration the propriety of establishing a state magazine; and making provision by law, for procuring arms, ammunition, camp equipage, &c. sufficient to meet any public emergency.

The navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers by steam boats, regularly sailing up and down those waters, afford to our country, a fair prospect of receiving many of our imports upon much cheaper terms than can be obtained by bringing them from the ports of the eastern states. Should this succeed it will also be highly advantageous in opening a direct barter of our export produce for our imported goods, thereby saving to the state the commissions and per centages of the intermediate agents and merchants employed in our present circuitous trade.

The experiments which have been made by the steam boats on the western waters, give strong assurances of ultimate success. There has, however, not been a sufficient number of them in operation to enable me to speak with entire confidence. It is believed by many, that a sufficient capital has not yet been employed in that line, to give the experiment a fair trial. I submit to the information which the general assembly will possess in its collective capacity, the determination of the question, and whether it should be left to individual enterprise to ascertain its utility, or whether the state should lend its aid in the undertaking.

Whilst we are reaping the fruits of an honorable peace, we should bear in mind, those brave men, who fell in the war, and whose valor, together with that of their compeers in arms, secured to us that peace. Many of them left wives and children who are dependent upon the bounty of their friends. I therefore, recommend that provision be made by law for the support of the widows, and for the education of the children of the militia of this state, who were killed or died in public service during the late war.

It will also be proper for the general assembly at their first session after the return of peace, to review the laws fixing the salaries of the civil list. Owing to the rapid increase of our population and to other causes, the duties of some of the officers have been much increased, and their salaries will be found inadequate to the services rendered.

No part of the seven thousand dollars appropriated by the act of the last session, "to provide camp equipage for the troops destined for Detroit," have been used. I was enabled through the quartermaster department of the general government, to supply what was requisite without any advance from the treasury of the state.

I have also been enabled since the adjournment of the general assembly, to pay from the treasury of the state, to the bank of Kentucky, the sum of twenty-seven thousand dollars of the money borrowed from it; and I have no doubt the debt may be further diminished in the course of the present session of the general assembly.

I assure you, gentlemen, that I shall derive great satisfaction, in co-operating with you in all your measures which may conduce to the welfare of my fellow-citizens.

In a few months the time for electing a citizen to succeed me in administering the government will arrive. I look forward to that period as the termination of my public course. I cannot take my leave of the general assembly without expressing to them the grateful sense I shall always entertain for the favorable light in which my countrymen have viewed my public conduct, and offering to the Divine Disposer of all human affairs, my devout acknowledgments for his many favours extended to our country, and my fervent prayers that his protecting arm, may long preside over its destinies.

ISAAC SHELBIX.

December 5th, 1815.

Scraps.

The legislature of North Carolina has terminated its annual session.

During the session, they passed an act providing for the appointment of electors to vote for a president and vice-president of the United States. The act lays off the state into fifteen electoral districts, and provides that a candidate for elector of president and vice-president of the United States, shall be selected from each district, and voted for in general ticket, that is, each voter shall vote for the whole fifteen. The election to take place on the second Thursday in November, 1816, at the usual places of holding elections for members of assembly throughout the state.

The legislature, previous to its adjournment, directed the governor to purchase on behalf of the state a statue of general Washington, and cause the same to be erected in the main passage of the state house.

They appointed commissioners to examine and report on the practicability of improving the navigation of the Tar, Neuse and Yadkin rivers; and also named commissioners to examine and report on the utility, expenses and proper location of a state penitentiary.

They also passed a resolution requesting the senators and representatives of the state in congress to use their best exertions to prevail with the general government to open a direct outlet to the ocean from the waters of Albemarle sound; and a resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution, for providing an uniform mode of electing members of congress and electors of president and vice-president.

[Nat. Int.]

Wealth of Georgia.—A communication was made by the governor to the legislature, a few days since, in compliance with a resolution of the house of representatives, respecting the amount of money due this state by the general government, for lands ceded to the latter by the former in 1802. Of the original debt, which was one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, it appears that three hundred and thirty-one thousand four hundred and forty one dollars have been received in the purchase of arms and the payment of army quota of the direct tax—leaving a balance due Georgia at this time of more than nine hundred thousand dollars! It is in contemplation, we believe, to vest a large portion of this sum in a state bank, which, if prudently managed, can scarcely fail to yield a considerable revenue—enough probably to defray the ordinary expenses of government; the profit on the bank stock at present held by the state being nearly equivalent to the whole expenditure of its civil list.

A bill, appropriating ten thousand dollars for opening the Oconee from Milledgeville down, and a like sum for improving the navigation of Savannah river above the city of Augusta, has passed the house of representatives by a large majority.

(Georgia Journal, Dec. 13.)

The war on the ocean.

It is with uncommon pleasure that the editor presents to his readers the tables hereunto annexed, exhibiting, at one view, a great variety of interesting and important facts belonging to the late war as carried on by sea. We are indebted for the exhibit of the result of the battles in which national vessels were engaged, on either side, to the labors of an intelligent friend, who promises us a similar statement as to the battles on the land.—The utility of these things for general reference is too obvious to need remark. And besides, they bring immediately before us our gallant seamen in all their glory. Of the twenty-three naval engagements which occurred during the war between national vessels and private armed and national vessels, seventeen resulted in the capture or destruction of the enemy—and two only of the five victories of the British, if so they may be called, were gained by any thing like an equality of force. These two were the cases of the Chesapeake and Argus, in both which, however, the enemy was the superior—in the other cases of the Essex, the President, and of the glutilla on Lake Borgne, the opposing force was overwhelming. Abating, therefore, the capture of the Alert by the Essex from the list, as there was no equality in that “affair,” and the account stands—American victories seventeen; British victories two! If to this we add the fearful difference between the killed and wounded on either side, we have a pretty just view of the vastly superior courage and skill of our seamen over the “lords of the ocean.”

Our reflections on this gratifying subject may be advantageously pursued in contemplating the effect of our naval victories; for the character gained by them is of inestimable value. Before the war, accustomed to pursue and only to enquire where their enemy was, the British officers, in their intolerable arrogance and pride, were pleased to hold the most contemptible opinion of our “fir built frigates, manned by bastards and outlaws”—“things with a bit of striped bunting at their mast-head.” Hence it was that the fool Bingham, of the Little Belt, hoped to gain honor by insulting commodore Rodgers, in the President; who, if mercy had not prevailed over justice, would have sent him to the bottom in the twinkling of an eye; and that capt. Laugharne of the Alert, falling in with the Essex, emulous of distinction, and determined to be made a knight or a lord of for capturing a “Yankee frigate,” run down upon the weather quarter of our ship, gave three cheers and commenced the action! The generous Porter, pitying the deluded creature and sure of his prize, ordered only a partial discharge of the guns of his ship; and, in eight minutes, away goes all the high notions of the English captain with the fall of his flag, and the use of six feet water in his hold! Five or six days after, the Guerriere, “one of the finest ships that ever floated”—the crack frigate of the British navy, falls in with the Constitution. Captain Dacres and his crew are in high glee—they merrily joke as to what they will do with the Yankees, and are full of fun. The captain would allow them fifteen minutes to take the Constitution, but they would do it in ten, and to it they went with three cheers, firing a considerable time before Hull condescended to give them a gun in return. But when the proper season had arrived, he opened such a terrible cannonade that the enemy thought his ship was on fire, and again shouted, certain of victory. Vain hope—in fifteen minutes, the Guerriere is like a log on the water—a mere wreck torn to pieces, and one-third of her late joking crew are lying dead or wounded on the deck. Still it was thought that the question of superiority was not decided—the Guerriere’s masts were “rotten” and her shot “room eaten.” but the subsequent capture of the Frelie, the Macedonian, the Java and the Peacock following with such rapidity, without a solitary victory on the British side, made them begin to think differently of us. An English frigate had been considered a match for a 74 of any other nation, but now the “tightest” vessels of their navy were found to be mere “cock-boats” compared with the “non-descripts” of the United States; and a million of pitiful excuses were manufactured to sustain the falling glory of their thousand ships of war. From meanness they resorted to that “better part of valor” called discretion; it was ordered that British frigates should avoid a combat with American frigates—and further to protect them they were generally convoyed by 74’s, a class of ships that we had none of. The term “cruizing frigate” was expunged from the admiralty book; for they always sailed in squadron wherever it was thought probable a yankee might be; and we were therefore obliged to seek the laurel in unfrequented seas, or on the British coasts, where they apprehended no danger. The Plantagenet 74, neglected to bring the President frigate to action off Sandy Hook; and the ridiculous caution of the Phoebe and Cherub in their vile attack upon the little Essex, at Valparaiso, must forcibly bring to the mind of every one the fears of Falstaff when he saw the dead body of Percy. The battles of the fleets on Erie and Champlain, also, shewed our seamen in a new character—a character they are destined to fill with even greater glory than they have acquired in single combat, ship to ship.

The British have condescended to acknowledge our superiority in many things belonging to the construction, equipment and management of vessels of war. This is humiliating enough to those who thought they knew a little more than every thing. And they were also relieved of a complaint that they always preferred against their other enemies, viz. the difficulty of bringing them to close action; for they themselves universally clawed off after they knew the effect of our fire, except in the case of the Shannon, which was a “whip ship” when Lawrence fell, and the command devolved on unexperienced men. If he had kept the deck unhurt for five minutes more, captain Broke would not have been made a knight of for beating an inferior foe.

In tables like these, perfection is no to be expected—for it is impossible that errors should not exist, as well in facts given as those assumed. It is, however, believed that they are so nearly correct in their various particulars, as to answer every ordinary purpose.

NOTE. Where the mark (*) occurs in the table, the numbers which they refer to are doubtful; but are believed to be nearly correct. In some cases, the loss of the British had to be taken from their own official reports, but it is only where more authentic information could not be had. Great care has been used in compiling the table, to render it as perfect and correct as possible. The best sources of information have been carefully consulted; and it is hoped that but few errors will be found.—The numbers in the 1st column refer to the “notes” which are annexed, the numbers of which correspond with the numbers on the table. Numerous references are made to the pages of the Weekly Register, where the details are to be found; by which the reader will be enabled, with much ease, to trace the several accounts and details of any particular action, through all the volumes of that work where they are contained.

Notes, for the table of naval actions (referred to by the nos. in the 1st column.)

3. The Wasp was captured and the Frolic re-captured soon after the close of the action, by the Poitiers, 74, and carried into Bermuda.
5. This action was fought off St. Salvador, a Portuguese South American port. The Java was so crippled that commodore Bainbridge found it necessary to destroy her. Lieut. gen. Mislop, governor of Bombay, and several other British military and naval officers of distinction were captured in the Java. From the Java's muster book, it seems her crew amounted to near 440. See interesting details by “an American,” vol. IV. p. 275.
8. The Decatur was a private armed vessel; the Dominica belonged to the British navy.
9. The Pelican sloop of war was greatly superior to the Argus, as will appear by a comparison of their respective forces. At the close of the action, it seems the British frigate Leonidas fell in with them, to which circumstance the capture of the Argus was attributed.
11. This was the first time that an American squadron had ever met that of an enemy. The British squadron under the command of com. Barclay, an officer of great experience, sailed from port in search of the American; they met—and after three hours incessant firing, com. Perry successfully executes one of the grandest manœuvres in naval warfare—that of passing through the enemy's line. The reader is referred to com. Perry's masterly report, of the battle vol. V. p. 61, and to the biographical sketch of his life, suppl. vol. V.
12. Valparaiso is a port of the province or government of Chili, on the western coast of South America. The action took place within gun shot of the Spanish fort, and in open violation of the neutrality of the port. The Essex fought under great disadvantages, yet maintained the very unequal contest against double her force, for two hours and a half—see capt. Porter's official account, vol. VI. p. 338. The Phoebe carried long guns; the Essex cannonades.

14 and 15: These two vessels the Wasp captured with the loss, in both engagements, of 7 killed and 22 wounded; while the loss of the Reindeer and Avon was 34 killed and 75 wounded. Capt. Blakeley destroyed the former; the latter was re-captured, just in time to save the crew before she went down, so destructive was the fire of the Wasp.

16. A comparison of the forces of the respective squadrons will shew the great superiority of the British over the American. So entirely satisfied were the British commanders of this, that they had made no provision for a reverse; and a precipitate retreat on land immediately followed their defeat on the lake. This memorable battle was fought in sight of the hostile armies, which were at the same time engaged at Plattsburg.

17. The General Armstrong was a private armed schooner, owned in New-York. She was attacked at midnight, in the neutral port of Fayal, by twelve boats from a British squadron, having on board 400 men, who were beaten off with dreadful carnage, having near 300 men killed and wounded, and several of the boats with their crews sunk. See details, vol. VII. p. 153.

18. This was the action between the gun vessels on lake Borgne near New-Orleans, and the barges of the British squadron then at Ship island.

19. The British squadron which captured the President consisted of the Majestic razee, the Endymion, Pomone and Tenedos frigates and Despatch brig. The President was annoyed by the Endymion, which had outsailed the rest of the squadron, she was therefore obliged to fight her, with the hope of “throwing her out of the engagement” before the other vessels of the squadron could get up to her assistance. Decatur succeeded in this; but in his crippled state he was unable to escape them, and struck to the Majestic razee.

20. The Chasseur was a private armed brig owned in Baltimore; the St Lawrence “his Britannic majesty's” schooner.

21. The Cyane is of the class of frigates, and mounted 34 guns; the Levant a sloop of war of the largest class, mounting 21 guns.

22. The island of Tristian de Cunha, off which this action was fought, lies on the coast of Brazil, S. America. The Penguin had been fitted out, as appears from a letter of instructions from admiral Tyler to capt. Dickinson, for the express purpose of capturing the Wasp—but mark the result: The Penguin falls in with the Hornet, a vessel greatly inferior to the Wasp, and is herself captured in 22 minutes!

23. The Saratoga was a private armed vessel.—And, chased by a frigate, had thrown the most of her guns overboard before she encountered the Morgiana (a British packet), carried by boarding.

RECAPITULATION.

British national vessels captured	66
Carrying in all (the deduction of 18 guns being made for the gun boats which escaped on Champlain, but put into the table to shew the relative force of the two squadrons, the gun-boats being also estimated in our aggregate)	910
In those cases where the force of the contending parties is certainly known, it appears, in the aggregate, that
The British fought	615 guns.
Americans	599
General balance in favor of the British	16
But the difference between the Essex 46, and the Alert 26, being deducted, for the affair between them does not deserve the name of a battle	20
And the real advantage on the side of the British was	35

* These were chiefly packets barrying 8 or 10 guns. The privateers would average about the same. Several of the affairs between them and the privateers as well deserve a place in the table of battles as some that are there; and they should have been added by me, if I had thought of it in time. In several instances they were gallantly defended, especially the Princess Amelia, captured by the famous commodore Barney in his privateer Rosney; and it often happened that the force of the contending parties was very near equal in men as well as in guns, the crews of the privateers being reduced by manning their prizes.

During the winter of 1814-15, though the Chesapeake was so closely blockaded, twenty-seven sail of merchant vessels sailed from Baltimore for foreign ports. Six of these were captured in the bay or lost near the cape in consequence of the 'hard weather,' selected to make their escape, for the mouth of the Chesapeake was so completely blocked up that it was only in snow storms or dreadful gales of wind that they could expect to make so long a run and pass the enemy's upper and lower squadrons. Three others were captured at sea; but several made two safe voyages to the W. Indies and back, to the great profit of their owners. Besides these not less than twenty other Baltimore vessels were at sea, sailing from and returning to other ports. It is probable that this city had as many merchant vessels employed on foreign voyages during the war as all the rest of the United States, not counting those that had sailed before the war began.

Having thus proceeded to shew, as far as we are able, the facts and probabilities belonging to the war on the ocean (for of the loss of American merchant and private armed vessels captured or destroyed by the enemy we have no record) we feel it just to give the British statements below, chiefly as curiosities—for they are as false and scandalous as any other "British official" we ever examined, as may be seen by those cases wherein our facts may be put in opposition to the admiralty assertions.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

While we carefully review the preceding exhibits we have ample reason, indeed, to feel proud of our doings on the sea, coping with an enemy that had blocked up the ships of Europe (combined at one time against her) in their own ports. Let this fact be remarked as we go along—it is a volume of praise; and, possibly, Great Britain lost more vessels (she undoubtedly lost more honor), in our little brush with her, than she lost in all the wars that sprang from the French revolution, commencing some 30 years ago, and continuing with very little intermission, until nearly the middle of the last year!—But the fact is—the losses she suffered in the late war is but the type of what will be done in another, come when it will. In a short space of time, we shall have ships of the line, frigates and sloops enough—vessels superior to any that float in their construction and equipments; which, collected in bodies or moving about the sea with the rapidity that peculiarly belongs to them, will, perhaps, give employ to ten times their number, and indeed be too many for the ships of Great Britain, (calculated to fight or catch them) to manage; while a numerous flying squadron (such vessels as no other people than ourselves ever built or ever sailed) will be dashing every where,—even into the midst of convoys, laughing at the sluggish ships appointed to guard them—and their orders will be to clear the ocean so far as they can—i. e. to destroy the prizes they make, as well to keep their own force entire as to secure us against recapture. If the war had lasted three months longer, astonishing effects would have resulted from the force of this species that was fitting out under the enterprise and skill of Porter. We can equip and man one hundred such vessels in six weeks.

Naval Affairs.

Our old friend the naval officer has again presented us with the subjoined letter on the subject of an admiral's grade in the navy of the United States, which, in common with every real friend of the service, we cannot but consider as of the highest importance under the existing circumstances of that gallant portion of the public force. Will it be credited by posterity, that a navy, which struck dismay into the "mistress of the ocean," and awed into instantaneous submission the long-dreaded tyrant of Algiers—will it be credited that such a navy, after achieving these and many more glorious feats of a like nature, was not, even unto this late day, dignified and adorned with the grade of admiral? If this paper should happily reach the hands of those whose duty it is to repair this ungenerous defect in the naval corps of the United States, we earnestly entreat them to give a fair and candid perusal to the following letter, and to weigh well the justice of the statements it contains:

A sixth letter from an officer of the U. S. navy, to his friend, a member of congress, dated at

SIR—If I were not sure, that you are acquainted with the fact, that whatever promotions may take place in the naval corps of our country, a long time must elapse ere I can be benefited by them, I should feel some delicacy in touching upon a point to which, in your last letter, amongst many other topics, you were pleased to draw my attention.—But, as I am confident, that you can have no reason to believe me influenced by any other than the permanent interests of our country, and the prosperity of its navy, (with which those interests are closely connected) I shall, without reserve, state such facts and reasonings as cannot but convince you, that the vital interests and future respectability of our navy, chiefly depend upon the creation of a higher grade of officers than any which now exist in the naval corps.

In the first place: it is an undeniable fact, that no military corps of any nation on earth, was ever actuated by purer views than the naval corps of the United States. During the course of those brilliant achievements which the officers of that corps so unexpectedly obtained over the British in the late war, no ribbands—no garters—no titles—no rewards of a substantial nature were held out to them. They were influenced only by the sacred principles of patriotism, and, in seeking for the applause of their fellow citizens, they had the grateful felicity to acquire it. I admit that some of them have been rewarded with swords, medals, services of plate, dinners, &c. and that all of them have, in some way or other, been distinguished by remunerations from the public; but, as they have broken the charm of invincibility, so long and so successfully arrogated by the navy of Great Britain, and, contrary to the expectations and predictions of the world, acquired for their country imperishable fame, I am anxious that they should be rewarded with something of a more agreeable, beneficial, and equally durable nature. There are but few of our commanders, even of the lowest rank, who have not performed exploits that, in England, would have been rewarded with the title of nobility; in Sweden or in Russia, with the order of the sword or cross; and in France, with the higher order of the legion of honor. Captain Broke, of the British navy, was knighted for the capture of the Chesapeake frigate and Hope received a service of plate for having been placed hors de combat by the President; altho' in the United States, where acts more renowned and really worthy of great reward, had become quite common, he would have merited only disgrace.* Upon the score of mere fame or public applause, I am, indeed, not disposed to complain. As far as the voice of the country could be heard, and as far as the grateful tribute of admiration could extend itself, the naval officers of the United States were elevated far above those of any other nation. Every where applause attended them; of some I will almost venture to say that they were nearly oppressed with the abundant commendations of their generous countrymen, and that, in consequence, they often met with difficulties of which none but themselves could be aware. These difficulties were of a delicate nature, and arose entirely from the peculiarity of their situation. In proportion to the progress of the officer's fame, it is obvious that his mode of life must, by the same rule of proportion, accommodate itself to the nature of that progress, and, as a matter of course, that his daily expenditures must increase. For you will, I presume, readily grant, that the plaudits of his countrymen would neither pay his tavern or taylor's bills, nor carry him from one part of the country to the other upon his needful concerns. To be exalted into private difficulties of this kind, cannot, indeed, be very desirable; yet all these officers feel it to be in some measure incumbent upon them to make a respectable appearance proportioned to the dignity and splendor of their character. That they should, therefore, under these circumstances, frequently meet with unpleasant occurrences, cannot be doubted, for fame rarely lessens the expenses of any man.

It is not so with our brethren of the army. A solid recompense always awaits them in the course of their services: for a colonel, by distinguishing himself, has a sure ground to expect promotion to the rank of a general. The naval officer, on the contrary, is totally deprived of this hope; his views are bounded by the rank of a post-captain, and when that rank is attained, his course is run, and he has reached the zenith of his profession. During the late war, no higher object presented itself upon which the elder, as well as the younger members of the service could fix their minds; and it resulted as a natural consequence, that the latter aimed only at the acquisition of such accomplishments as would fit them for that station. Had the rank of admiral existed in our naval code, their minds would have rested upon a higher and more important object. They would have seen the necessity of industriously devoting themselves to the attainment of those attributes for which the compass of a whole life has been required, in order to fill the station of admiral with honor and utility. Nelson, himself, from the commencement of his career in the station of a cabin boy, looked forward with anxiety to the proud day which should hail him as an admiral, and, from first to last, strenuously exerted himself to acquire the requisite qualifications. But the youthful naval officer of the United States, has no such splendid object held out for his exertions; he sees no rank beyond that of post captain; and (his being, with no great difficulty, attained in the common routine of promotion, he does not conceive it necessary to apply himself to any of the higher branches of nautical knowledge, because the station may be filled with no great abilities, and therefore, does not require that extensive skill and experience which would be necessary to prepare an officer to discharge the duties of the first class. Having reached the rank of post of captain, he finds himself at once upon a level with the eldest and highest officers in the service; for the rank or appellation of commodore proceeds only from courtesy, and is at best of a temporary and unsubstantial nature. Under circumstances of equality like these, bickerings, cabals, disputes and parties, must necessarily be generated, highly injurious to so young a naval corps as ours; where the influence and the example of a senior is of such inestimable importance to the proper training, and future respectability, of a youthful officer. On this account, obedience to orders, arises in many instances more from a sense of courtesy, than from any acknowledged right on the part of the eldest officer to require and enforce that obedience. These facts I mention here, in order to shew the moral effect the absence of the grade of admiral has on our service, and the severe feelings under which many of the elder members must frequently labor in the course of their official transactions. Our post captains, as the case now stands, have nothing farther to hope for on the score of promotion; some of them have spent the prime of life in the service of their country—many are growing grey and wrinkled by premature old age—while others, worn down by care and fatigue, and crowned with the highest honors that could be bestowed upon them, very naturally turn their attention to that ease and tranquility which, in every station of life, man is so eager to obtain. There are some, too, who, while professional pride worked upon them in the pursuit of the highest grades in the service, steadily employed themselves at sea, now court with eagerness those situations on shore where they may enjoy comfort and inactivity during the remainder of their lives. To remedy all these evils, congress have only to create the grade of admiral. A fresh impulse will then again be given, not alone to the professional feelings of the post captain, but to all other officers whose ideas, at this time, have not extended beyond the necessary qualifications for the commander of a single ship. They would then see the necessity of acquiring more extensive information, in order to fit them for the command of fleets and squadrons, when occasion required.

It is a fact which cannot have escaped your observation, that no navy on earth, equal in size to ours, is at this day without the grade of admiral. Even the Algerines, Tunisians and Tripolitans are aware of the respectability and advantages derived by their respective navies, from the possession of this rank, and they have therefore studiously incorporated it into all their maritime establishments.—No navy on earth has, indeed, made greater efforts than ours to earn a title to the rank of admiral, and I am clearly of opinion that it cannot be justly withheld. The officers have seen their brethren of the army rising gradually above them in rank, while they alone remained stationary. There are now lieutenants in the navy of great merit, who, within these few years, have seen lieutenants of the army rise from the same rank with themselves to a rank far superior to any in the navy, even to the rank of general. There is no rank in the navy above that of colonel, and, therefore, when a naval officer finds himself obliged to co-operate with a general officer of the army, whatever may be his skill and experience, he must, of necessity, be thrown into the back ground, and considered only in the light of a subaltern. For, although the army can exercise no authority whatever over the navy, nor the navy any authority over the army, yet the commanding officer of either, being senior, can cause his superiority to be severely felt by the other in cases where no perfect understanding exists between them. Things should not be left in this state. The public weal ought not to depend upon the whim or caprice of a single individual; nor the respective grades of the army and navy be so regulated, as to preclude the cordial co-operation of the commanders of both without disparagement. The creation of the rank of admiral, as I before observed, would inevitably silence all bickerings and jealousies; and in enterprises where naval and military talents were required, produce an emulation highly advantageous to the public concerns.

There still remains, however, another point, to which I beg your attention for a few moments. In a future war, perhaps, it may be necessary for our national ships to co-operate with those of a foreign power in alliance with us, for the same object: now, let me ask, whether it would be politic, or proper, to compel our commanders to place themselves under the flag of a foreign admiral, merely because the foreigner held that post in the service of his country, and, perhaps, had not been as many months in actual service as our commanders had years?—Take a recent event, for example. What American would have consented to place Bainbridge or Decatur, (commanding a fleet of some thousands of men, and such as never yet put to sea without an admiral) under the command of the pusillanimous Dutch admiral, who went against Algiers with five frigates? Then, how could the two forces have acted conjointly against the common enemy? Our fleet was commanded only by post captains, and the wide difference between that and the rank of admiral, rendered it wholly impossible for the respective commanders to have any intercourse with each other on terms of reciprocity. Had it been possible for them to have co-operated in a manner, consistent with the dignity and honor of our navy and nation, Algiers might have been laid in ruins. A case of a similar nature occurred during the war with Tripoli; for, as our naval force in that quarter was not commanded by an admiral, no co-operation could take place between it and the Swedish force, which at that time was engaged in hostilities with the same power.

To conclude. The rank of admiral has been steadily and strongly called for, not only by those more immediately interested in the creation of it, but, judging from the tenor of the public prints, the general voice of the nation. The latter appears to have had its due weight with the secretary of the navy in framing his report relative to the gradual increase of the navy, and I am disposed to attach so much importance to it in the present instance, as to believe that congress will not deem it an insufficient reason, in connection with the arguments above stated, to create at once the grade of admiral in our naval corps. It is, indeed, right, that a proper attention should be paid to the wishes of the people, as expressed in the public prints; and, in recommending a gradual increase of the navy, in obedience to 'the voice of the nation,' the secretary did no more than what every wise and pious officer would conceive himself bound to do under similar circumstances. May I not venture to hope, then, that an equal deference will be paid to public opinion on the subject of admirals? In fine, if the 'importance of a permanent naval establishment appears to be sanctioned by the voice of the nation,' the creation of the rank of admiral in our naval corps, is obviously no less so—and I do not a little regret that the secretary has not noticed in his report a measure so vitally important to the country, and, at the same time, so peculiarly interesting to the navy. I am, your obed't.

Indian Treaties.

JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

WHEREAS a treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America, and the Poutawatamie tribe or nation of indians, residing on the river Illinois, was concluded and signed on the eighteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, at Portage des Sioux, by commissioners on the part of the United States, and certain chiefs and warriors of the said tribe or nations of indians, on the part of the said tribe or nation, which treaty is in the words following, to wit:

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded between William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said states, of the one part; and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Poutawatamie tribe or nation, residing on the river Illinois, on the part and behalf of the said tribe or nation, of the other part.

The parties being desirous of re-establishing peace and friendship between the United States and the said tribe or nation, and of being placed in all things, and in every respect, on the same footing upon which they stood before the war, have agreed to the following articles:

Article the first.—Every injury or act of hostility by one or either of the contracting parties against the other, shall be mutually forgiven and forgot.

Article the second.—There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals composing the said Poutawatamie tribe or nation.

Article the third.—The contracting parties hereby agree, promise and bind themselves, reciprocally, to deliver up all the prisoners now in their hands (by what means soever the same may have come into their possession) to the officer commanding at fort Clarke, on the Illinois river, as soon as it may be practicable.

Article the fourth.—The contracting parties in the sincerity of mutual friendship, recognise, re-establish, and confirm, all and every treaty, contract and agreement, heretofore concluded between the United States, and the Poutawatamie tribe or nation.

In witness of all and every thing herein determined between the United States of America, and the said Poutawatamie tribe or nation, residing on the river Illinois: we, their underwritten commissioners and chiefs aforesaid, by virtue of our full powers, have signed this definitive treaty, and have caused our seals to be hereunto affixed.

Done at Portage des Sioux, this eighteenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand

JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all whom these presents shall come, greeting:

WHEREAS a treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America, and the Teton tribe or nation of indians, was concluded and signed at Portage des Sioux, on the nineteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, by commissioners on the part of the said United States, and certain chiefs and warriors of the said tribe or nation of indians, on the part of the said tribe or nation, which treaty is in the words following, to wit:

A treaty of peace and friendship made and concluded between William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said states, of the one part; and the undersigned chiefs and warriors of the Teton tribe of indians, on the part and behalf of their said tribe, of the other part.

The parties being desirous of re-establishing peace and friendship between the United States and the said tribe, and of being placed in all things, and in every respect, on the same footing upon which they stood before the late war between the United States and Great Britain, have agreed to the following articles:

Article the first.—Every injury or act of hostility committed by one or either of the contracting parties against the other, shall be mutually forgiven and forgot.

Article the second.—There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals composing the said Teton tribe, and the friendly relations that existed between them before the war, shall be and the same are hereby renewed.

Article the third.—The undersigned chiefs and warriors, for themselves and their said tribe, do hereby acknowledge themselves and their aforesaid tribe to be under the protection of the United States of America, and of no other nation, power or sovereign whatsoever.

In witness whereof, the said William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners as aforesaid, and the chiefs and warriors of the said tribe, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals this nineteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

Chemical Manufactures.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

The importance of encouraging domestic manufactures seems at last to be admitted by all classes of our citizens. While we are dependent upon foreign nations for our supplies of articles of the first necessity, we shall not only be subject to great inconveniences from the political and commercial changes in Europe, but shall exclude ourselves from some of the most productive sources of national wealth and national independence. Our soil, in all its varieties, is not better adapted to grow on its surface the various products which clothe and feed us, than in its hidden recesses, in its mines and minerals, to afford the means of perfecting the arts and administering relief to the diseases of life.—What can, indeed, be of more use, or of more lasting importance, than to secure within our own country the manufacture and collection of all those chemical combinations and medicines, which are indispensable to the physician and the artisan—to the merchant and to the laborer? While so much stress is laid, and properly laid upon the encouragement of the cotton and woolen manufactures, it has always struck us as a strange circumstance that so little public attention has been devoted to the manufacture of chemical articles of the first necessity in the arts and in medicine. During the late war extreme inconvenience was felt from the scarcity and high price of many of those articles; and the return of peace has not sufficiently awakened us to a proper consideration of the want and increasing importance of a domestic supply from domestic establishments. Congress are strongly called upon by suitable duties and encouragements to second the meritorious exertions of those citizens who have employed their capital and time in enterprizes of this nature.

With these cursory remarks we beg leave to introduce a brief history of an establishment in Salem, (Massachusetts) for chemical preparations, which, though humble in its origin, is, in its present improved state, well entitled to the patronage and attention of the government, and reflects great honor on the intelligence, industry and perseverance of the founders.

In the year 1812 a laboratory was erected in Salem, upon a small scale, for the purpose of manufacturing sulphuric acid, under the direction of Mr. John Hunt, an enterprising and ingenious young gentleman, of that town, who had devoted much of his time to chemical experiments. These experiments were first made for his amusement, and afterwards to gratify a scientific taste gradually acquired and matured in the midst of the practical business of an apothecary's shop. Having ascertained that his manufactures could be made equal, and, in many instances superior to those imported, and at the same price, he was induced to turn his attention to more extensive objects. In the mean time Messrs. Secomb and Williams, of the same town, with a discernment and enterprize which entitles them to great credit, seconded his views and entered into a joint concern with Mr. Hunt, and erected (what was truly a novelty in this part of the United States) a chemical laboratory for the manufacture of medicinal and other useful preparations. The state of the country was at this moment favorable to such an establishment; all or nearly all foreign supplies were cut off by the war, and the high price of many articles and the increasing demand for others, gave them new encouragement to perseverance in their plan. In the years 1813 and 1814 they enlarged their establishment to a very considerable extent, and they now manufacture in large quantities the following articles—Roman Vitriol, the Sulphuric, Nitrous, Nitric, Muristic and Prussic acids; Salt: Saturni, Vermilion, Lunar Caustic, Calomel, Corrosive Sublimate, Red Precipitate, &c. &c. Of the two first mentioned articles they manufacture about 4000lbs. per week, and of the others in proportion. The quality of all their manufactures is excellent. They have been repeatedly examined by our most scientific physicians and artisans and pronounced universally to be equal, and in many instances superior, to those which are imported from foreign countries; and can be afforded as cheap, if a reasonable protecting duty be applied in their favor. During the war, the profits were very considerable; but as many of the articles are now not subject to any duty, there is a great falling off in the prices. It is also a very important consideration that all the materials for these manufactures exist in our own country;—there is, therefore, not only a great benefit in securing to ourselves, under any embarrassments of our foreign commerce, a complete supply of all these articles; but an additional gain of the consumption of domestic materials, which would be otherwise be lost. There cannot be the least doubt that this establishment, and others of a like nature, will continue to flourish, if a reasonable duty be laid on foreign importations. If they continue to be left without paying any duty, or a very small duty, this establishment as well as others, must probably decline. Within a few weeks two entire cargoes of sulphuric acid have arrived in the United States, a circumstance that never occurred in a former period of our history. This article is free of duty, and it will almost necessarily follow from its free introduction, that the domestic manufacture must cease; but with a fair and reasonable duty, the domestic manufacture will rapidly advance and equal our whole demand.

In fact there cannot be a doubt, that with suitable encouragement, the chemical laboratories within the United States would very soon supply us with nearly all the most important and useful preparations in the arts and in medicine. It is therefore earnestly to be hoped that congress and the secretary of the treasury will give every patronage to establishments of this nature, which, while they reward the zeal and enterprize of our ingenious citizens, are so important to the real prosperity and independence of the nation.

Congress.

In the senate up to Tuesday last no important business has been done except of that called executive.

Friday Dec. 29. The Speaker presented the memorial of the legislature of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the fractional sections of public land in that territory may be subdivided; and a petition from the same body praying that the territory may be admitted as a state into the union; and another petition from the same body, praying that the officers and men who served under lieut. col. Nelson and major Hinds may receive payment for their services; and another petition from the same body, praying that such inhabitants of their territory as may have suffered losses by the hostile Indians, may be remunerated by grants of land out of that lately ceded to the United States by the said Indians.

The house, in committee of the whole, then took up the bill for establishing three additional military academies—and some time being spent therein, rose, reported progress and had leave to sit again.

Mr. Yancey made a report on the petition of Wm. Morriset, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Lattimore, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the legislature of the Mis-

Mississippi territory, reported a bill to enable the people of the Mississippi territory, to form a constitution and state government, and for the admission of such state into the union on an equal footing with the original states; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Forsyth, from the committee of foreign relations, reported the following bill.

A bill to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of his Britannic majesty, according to the convention concluded the third day of July, 1815.

Be it enacted, &c. That the same duties be and the same are hereby imposed on articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe imported into the United States in British vessels, as are or shall be imposed on the importation of the like articles in American vessels.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the same tonnage and other duties and charges are hereby imposed on British vessels in any of the ports of the United States, as are or may be payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, except such British vessels as shall come from the East or West Indies or the dominions of his Britannic majesty in North America.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That the same bounty shall be allowed on the exportation of any article, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, to his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe when such exportation shall be in British vessels, as are or may be allowed, when such exportation is or may be in vessels of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where drawbacks are or may be allowed on the re-exportation of any goods, the growth, produce or manufacture of the territories of his Britannic majesty, the same drawbacks shall be allowed on such re-exportation where the original importation of the same may have been in British vessels, as are or may be allowed on such re-exportation where the original importation may have been in vessels of the United States.

Sec. 5 And be it further enacted, That so much of each and every act of congress as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force until the 3d day of July 1819, and no longer.

The bill was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole.

The house adjourned until Tuesday.

Tuesday, Jan. 2—After receiving many petitions—The engrossed bill for enlarging the time for ascertaining the annual transfers and changes of property subject to the direct tax, and for other purposes, was read a third time and passed.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the bill for establishing three additional military academies. After some remarks thereon, it was agreed (91 voting in the affirmative) to strike out three and insert one. The location of it was not agreed upon—Washington city, Harper's Ferry and Pittsburg were mentioned. The committee rose, reported progress and had leave to sit again.

Wednesday, Jan. 3—Mr. Sargeant presented the petition of Charles Stewart, late commander of the frigate Constitution, on behalf of himself and the officers and crew of said frigate, setting forth, that during the late war with Great Britain, he captured the British ship Levant, and sent her into a port under the jurisdiction of the government of Portugal, from whence she was forcibly retaken by British forces, and praying that the value of said ship may be paid to himself, his officers and men, as prize money.

Many other petitions were presented and disposed of.

The house then, in committee of the whole, took up the bill for the establishment of additional military academies. As the scite for the one agreed to be established yesterday, a point on the Ohio, near the mouth of Licking Creek, Nashville, Harper's Ferry, Carlisle, Pa. Abbington, Va. and Knoxville, Ten. were proposed. All negatived, except the latter, which was agreed to, 81 to 63. The house took up the bill, and ratified the proceedings of the committee. It was recommitted, with a view to an arrangement of the details, but is expected to pass nearly in its present shape. The number of cadets, it is supposed, will be increased from 2 to 600.

Thursday, Jan. 4. Many petitions were presented, and disposed of. On motion of Mr. Pleasants, the president was requested to lay before the house any documents or papers which, in his opinion, were proper to be communicated relative to the transactions at Dartmoor.

After some pointed observations from Mr. Jennings, he introduced the following resolution—which was passed by a considerable majority.

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to enquire into the expediency of extending by law, to all settlers on the public lands of the United States who have settled thereon since the first day of January, 1803, the same privilege extended to such settlers prior to that day by the second section of the act of congress, passed March 3d, 1807.

Mr. King, of Mass. submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to—

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The house then, in committee of the whole, spent some time on the bill to carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty of commerce with Great Britain—some amendments being made, the committee rose, and reported it to the house, which adjourned without deciding upon it.

Chronicle.

SOUTH AMERICA.

We have been favored with intelligence from New Granada, interesting and important. This UNITED REPUBLIC seems about to triumph completely over superstition as well as civil tyranny. The following extract from the "First bulletin of the army of Carthage" affords us a pleasing evidence of the progress of liberal principles in that quarter.

"Yesterday night at 11 o'clock, the laboratory of this city was struck by the most terrible lightning—it passed over several boxes of the most combustible materials, harmless, and only set fire to some quick matches. If such an event had taken place in one of the king's magazines, it would have been told to the public as a miracle. But our government, whose best support is the intelligent and enlightened mind of its citizens, will abstain from employing hypocrisy and fanaticism, which form the peculiar character of our enemies."

The following is an extract from the official account of a victory obtained over the royalists and tories near Papayan.

"I have the pleasure to communicate to you, for the information of his excellency the president, the glorious triumph obtained by our arms on the banks of the river Palo, over the Spaniards; who, with a complete train of artillery, attacked our republican camp on the 5th of this month (July.) After two hours of the most active fire, they were totally defeated; leaving 300 killed and 500 prisoners. The commander, Vidarranzaga, with a few attendants, escaped by a precipitate flight. If our cavalry had been in better condition every one of the enemy must have fallen into our hands; but 600 muskets, 4 field pieces, 100 tents, an immense number of cartridges, horses, baggage waggons, &c. are in our power. The chief of the staff, with 600 men, marched for Papayan on the 6th. We believe that this glorious campaign has completely destroyed the resources of the enemy, and ruined his hope of resisting the arms of liberty. Our loss was 2 officers and 30 soldiers killed, and 9 officers and 100 soldiers wounded. God preserve you many years." Signed at Caly, July 13, 1815, by Francisco Cabal, and addressed to "the secretary of the war department of the United Provinces."

"Thus (observes our correspondent) the government of New Grenada has received, in the space of 40 days, the most pleasant intelligence from the republican army of the south, under the brave Cabal; from that of the north, commanded by the worthy general Bernudez, who has already nearly annihilated Don (Quixote) Morillo's forces; and from that on the frontiers of Venezuela, under the intrepid general Urdaneta, who, lately, in Las Piedras, totally defeated the Spaniards under the bloody Calzada, who was killed, with the most of his companions. The freedom of the provinces of Barinas, Merida, Truxillo, and of a great part of that of Caracas, is the glorious result of that victory,—Venezuela, of course, being on the point of regaining her independence. The republicans are also making great progress in Cumana and Barcelona. Margarita has gained her independence, and the flag of liberty again appears on the forts of that island."

Don Onis being received as minister from Spain, Mr. Erving has the orders of government to proceed on his mission to the court of Ferdinand, and is now on his way for Boston to embark.

Among the distinguished characters now at Washington city are Decatur and Stewart of the navy and Hopley of the army.

The Americans as well as the British on the Canadian lines, having laid down their arms against each other have formed a very extensive alliance to defraud their respective governments by smuggling to a great amount, back and forth.

"Il-legitimate." The legislature of Connecticut have rejected, 131 to 39, a very modest proposition, that $15,000, paid into the treasury of that state by the stockholders of the Phoenix Bank, should be appropriated as a fund for the support of the bishop!

Fire. A boat, lying at Augusta, Geo. with 500 bales of cotton on board, was lately consumed to the water's edge. Loss $50,000.

Emigration. Among those who have lately arrived in the United States, as their future home, are several late British officers, who had an opportunity of knowing something of our country and people during the war.

It is said that the United States' frigate Macedonian is about to sail for France and Spain, and then proceed to join the Mediterranean squadron.

General Armistead T. Mason, of London county, is chosen senator in the congress of the United States from Virginia, vice William B. Giles, resigned, for the remainder of the senatorial term of Mr. Giles.

American canvas.—The commissioners of the navy have issued proposals for a supply of canvas, "fabricated of hemp grown in the United States."

Tobacco.—Ten hhds. (new crop) Tobacco have been sold at Lynchburg for $35 per hundred.

Ship-timber.—The commissioners of the navy have issued a notice that they will make contracts for a supply of live oak timber suitable for line-of-battle-ships, frigates and sloops of war.

The Algerine Treaty.

Documents accompanying the message of the President, transmitting to the Senate the Treaty of Peace with Algiers.

United States' ship Guerriere,
Bay of Algiers, July 4th, 1815.

SIR—We have the honor to refer you to the official reports of commodore Decatur to the navy department, for an account of the operations of this squadron previous to our arrival off Algiers on the 28th ultimo.

Having received information that the Algerine squadron had been at sea for a considerable time longer than that to which their cruisers usually extend, and that a despatch boat had been sent from Gibraltar to Algiers to inform them of our arrival in the Mediterranean, we thought that they might have made a harbor, where they would be in safety. We, therefore, whilst they were in this state of uncertainty, believed it a proper moment to deliver the President's letter, agreeably to our instructions. Accordingly, on the 29th ultimo, a flag of truce was hoisted on board the Guerriere, with the Swedish flag at the main. A boat came off about noon, with Mr. Norderling, consul of Sweden, and the captain of the port, who confirmed the intelligence we had before received, and to whom we communicated information of the capture of their frigate and brig. The impression made by these events was visible and deep. We were requested by the captain of the port, Mr. Norderling declaring he was not authorized to act, to state the conditions on which we would make peace; to which we replied, by giving the letter of the president to the dey, and by a note from us to him, a copy of which (No. 1.) we have the honor to transmit herewith. The captain of the port then requested that hostilities should cease pending the negotiation, and that persons authorized to treat should go on shore, he and Mr. Norderling both affirming that the minister of marine had pledged himself for our security and return to our ships when we pleased. Both these propositions were rejected, and they were explicitly informed that the negotiation must be carried on on board the fleet, and that hostilities, as far as they respected vessels, could not cease. They returned on shore. On the following day the same persons returned, and informed us that they were commissioned by the dey to treat with us on the proposed basis, and their anxiety appeared extreme to conclude the peace immediately. We then brought forward the model of a treaty, which we declared would not be departed from in substance, at the same time declaring that although the United States would never stipulate for paying tribute under any form whatever, yet that they were a magnanimous and generous nation, who would, upon the presentation of consuls, do what was customary with other great nations, in their friendly intercourse with Algiers. The treaty was then examined, and they were of opinion that it would not be agreed to in its present form, and particularly requested that the article requiring the restitution of the property they had captured, and which had been distributed, might be expunged, alleging that such a demand had never before been made upon Algiers.

To this it was answered that the claim was just and would be adhered to. They then asked, whether, if the treaty should be signed by the dey, we would engage to restore the captured vessels; which we refused. They then represented that it was not the present dey who had declared the war, which they acknowledged to be unjust, conceding that they were wholly in the wrong, and had no excuse whatever, requesting, however, that we would take the case of the dey into consideration, and upon his agreeing to terms with us more favorable than had ever been made with any other nation, to restore the ships, which they stated would be of little or no value to us, but would be of great importance to him, as they would satisfy the people with the conditions of the peace we were going to conclude with him.

We consulted upon this question, and determined that, considering the state of those vessels, the sums that would be required to fit them for a passage to the United States, and the little probability of selling them in this part of the world, we would make a compliment of them to his highness in the state they then were, the commodore engaging to furnish them with an escort to this port. This, however, would depend upon their signing the treaty as presented to them, and could not appear as an article of it, but must be considered as a favor conferred on the dey by the United States.

They then requested a truce, to deliberate upon the terms of the proposed treaty, which was refused; they even pleaded for three hours. The reply was, "not a minute; if your squadron appears in sight before the treaty is actually signed by the dey, and the prisoners sent off, ours would capture them." It was finally agreed that hostilities should cease when we perceived their boat coming off with a white flag hoisted, the Swedish consul pledging his word of honor not to hoist it unless the treaty was signed, and the prisoners in the boat. They returned on shore, and although the distance was full five miles they came back within three hours, with the treaty signed, as we had concluded it, and the prisoners.

During the interval of their absence a corvette appeared in sight, which would have been captured if they had been detained one hour longer. The treaty has since been drawn out anew, translated by them, and duly executed by the dey, which we have the honor to transmit herewith.

Mr. Shaler has since been on shore, and the cotton and money mentioned in the 4th article, have been given up to him. They now show every disposition to maintain a sincere peace with us, which is, doubtless, owing to the dread of our arms: And we take this occasion to remark, that, in our opinion, the only secure guarantee we can have for the maintenance of the peace just concluded with these people, is the presence, in the Mediterranean, of a respectable naval force.

As this treaty appears to us to secure every interest within the contemplation of the government, and as it really places the United States on higher ground than any other nation, we have no hesitation, on our part, in fulfilling such of its provisions as are within our power, in the firm belief that it will receive the ratification of the president and senate.

We have the honor to be, with respect,

Sir, your obedient servants,

STEPHEN DECATUR,

WILLIAM SHALER.

The hon. James Monroe, secretary of state.

(No. 1)

The American commissioners to the dey of Algiers.

The undersigned have the honor to inform his highness the dey of Algiers, that they have been appointed by the president of the United States of America, commissioners plenipotentiary to treat of peace with his highness, and that pursuant to their instructions, they are ready to open a negotiation for the restoration of peace and harmony between the two countries, on terms just and honorable to both parties; and they feel it incumbent on them to state explicitly to his highness, that they are instructed to treat upon no other principle, than that of perfect equality, and on the terms of the most favored nations: no stipulation for paying any tribute to Algiers, under any from whatever, will be agreed to.

The undersigned have the honor to transmit herewith, a letter from the president of the United States, and they avail themselves of this occasion to assure his highness, of their high consideration and profound respect.

The British Treaty.

Documents transmitted by the President to the senate, with the convention of commerce between Great Britain and the United States.

Extract of a letter from the American commissioners, Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, to the secretary of state, dated London, May 18th, 1815.

"Having had reason to believe, that the British government had abstained from answering the communication of the joint commission from Ghent, of the — day of December, 1814, until they received official information of the American ratification of the treaty of peace, we thought it advisable, soon after that event was known to us, to repair to this city, in order that we might ascertain the disposition of this government as to the commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Shortly after our arrival here we were invited by lord Castlereagh to an interview with him. A minute of the substance of the conversation which took place on that occasion, as drawn up and agreed to by the parties, is enclosed. We communicated to Mr. Goulburn, the next day, our answer upon the three subjects to which the conversation related.

In the interview with lord Castlereagh, he had stated, that four or five days might be necessary on their part, to prepare for the proposed conversation. Nearly three weeks having elapsed without hearing any thing further on the subject, we took what appeared to us a fit occasion to intimate our intention of leaving London. A few days after, we received an invitation from the vice-president of the board of trade, Mr. Robinson, to call at his office, on the 11th inst.; we accordingly attended, and were received by him and Messrs. Goulburn and Adams, two of the British commissioners, who had negotiated the treaty of Ghent.

They opened the conversation by adverting to what had led to this interview, and professed themselves to be ready to receive any propositions we might choose to make. We observed, that, in the treaties which America had heretofore made, particularly with this country, regulating commercial intercourse, there were generally comprised two subjects, one, which respected commercial regulations, applicable to a state of peace as well as of war; the other, which respected the rights and duties of the parties; one being at war, and the other remaining at peace. Accordingly, our government had instructed us to bring forward both those subjects.

As to the commercial intercourse, without at this time going into details, or minor points, which it might be necessary in the progress of the negotiation to adjust, we would content ourselves, in this unofficial conversation, with touching on the most important topics, which it seemed to us desirable to discuss and arrange. These were, that the two countries should respectively be placed on the footing of the nation the most favored; that in the trade between America and the British European dominions, all discriminating duties, on tonnage and on merchandize, either imported, or exported, should be abolished. That the trade between America and the West Indies should be regulated, and placed on some more permanent basis, than the occasional acts of the colonial authorities: That the nature and kind of intercourse between America and the adjoining British provinces should be defined, and provided for; And that the trade with the British India possessions should be opened to America on liberal principles.

In regard to the discriminating duties, we remarked, that a proposition to abolish them, first came from Great Britain, and a provision to that effect, was inserted in the unratified treaty of 1806. Congress had taken up the matter at their last session, and passed an act, which we explained. We thought it desirable that they should be abolished, in order to prevent those collisions, and that system of commercial warfare, in which the two countries would probably be involved by an adherence to them.— As an example, we mentioned the great extra duty to which, as we understood, the article of cotton was liable, by the British laws, when imported in foreign vessels, and which, if persisted in, would certainly be met by some countervailing regulations.

With respect to the trade to British India, we observed, that we had no equivalent to offer for it; that it was for Great Britain to consider, whether a commerce, consisting as it did, almost entirely in the exchange of our specie for India produce, was not of a nature to deserve the most liberal encouragement; but, that we had rather enter into no stipulation on the subject than be restricted to a direct intercourse as had been proposed by the unratified treaty, both on the outward and return voyage.

On the other subject, the rights and duties of the parties, one being at war, and the other in a condition of peace, we proceeded to remark, that whilst the prospect of a long European peace appeared to exist, as was the case when the treaty of Ghent was concluded, it was less important to provide for questions arising under this head. But it was impossible to shut our eyes to the demonstrations every where making of a new war, which, if it should assume a maritime character, might again menace the harmony and good understanding between the two countries. It was desirable, therefore, to anticipate and provide for the evil. The first and most important point was that of impressment. Great Britain had always professed a willingness to receive and consider any proposition which America should be disposed to make on that subject. It would, perhaps, be unprofitable at this time to go into a discussion of the right, as to which we would merely remark, that it was impossible that there could be a stronger conviction on the part of Great Britain, that it was with her, than there was on the part of America, that it was on her side. It was better to look to some practical arrangement, by which, without concession of right by either party, the mischiefs complained of on both sides might be prevented. To this end the attention of our government has been turned. We believed that Great Britain had never heretofore contended that the American government was bound to prohibit the merchants of the United States from employing foreign seamen, any more than it was bound to forbid their shipping contraband articles. America was, however, now willing to take upon herself such an obligation, and to exclude British seamen from her merchant service, and we believed such exclusion might be as effectually executed as our revenue laws. Here we called their attention to the act which congress had passed on that subject, and to the message of the president to that body towards the close of its last session, upon the supposition, that if the exclusion of British seamen should be absolute and entire, there would no longer exist any ground for the claim of impressment, and of course no objection to its abandonment. We stated, that besides the motive which existed with our government of guarding against collision with Great Britain, another powerful one operated, that of encouraging our native seamen, and of not being obliged to rely on the uncertain supply of foreigners.—To this system, as a substitute for that of impressment, it did not appear to us that Great Britain could object, unless it was thought to be impracticable in its execution. We had no doubt, ourselves, that even admitting that there might be, as in cases of smuggling, occasional instances of evasion of the system of exclusion, it would nevertheless be, upon the whole, much more favorable in its result to Great Britain. This system would apply to, and operate upon, every American vessel: whilst that of impressment reached only the cases of those vessels with which it accidentally came in contact.—We were aware of the difficulties which had heretofore opposed a satisfactory arrangement on this subject. Still it was one of such vital importance, so tending to bring the two countries into collision, that it was impossible it should receive a consideration too earnest and too anxious.

The next point which it seemed to us important to settle, was the trade of America with the colonies of the enemies of Great Britain. Towards the end of the last European war, questions growing out of that trade had been terminated by the conquest of those colonies by Great Britain; but many of them having been restored at the peace, the disputes which heretofore existed might again arise. The former arrangements on this subject might, with some modifications, serve as a basis.

We then stated, that we did not intend, in this preliminary and unofficial conversation, to discuss the other points belonging to this branch of the subject. A definition of blockades was desirable and could not, it seemed, be attended with much difficulty, as we believed that there was no real difference between the two countries with respect to the abstract principle. But we apprehended that the disputes which might hereafter take place, on that subject, would arise almost exclusively from questions of fact, which no previous definition could prevent.

As, in the event of war, Great Britain might desire to know the disposition of our government on the subject of privateers, and prizes, we would only now say, that the principle which might be adopted with respect to Great Britain, whether of admission or exclusion, must equally and impartially apply to all the parties to the war.

These were all the topics noticed by us, and we enforced and illustrated them, by various other observations.

The British gentlemen, professing not to have expected those points to be brought forward which applied to a belligerent state of one of the parties, expressed a wish to know whether, in our view, the two subjects were inseparable, and whether we could not come to an agreement on those topics, which were probably less difficult to be adjusted, leaving the others for further consideration, and future arrangement? We replied, that heretofore they had always been blended together by our government, and that we intended to bring them all for consideration; that at present, however, we only presented them for consideration, as it would be premature at this time, to make any of them a sine qua non; and that, whether a treaty, omitting some of them, would be acceptable, must depend on its general tenor, and upon the extent and importance of the subject which might be comprehended in the arrangement.

They proceeded to remark, that some of the subjects had been always found to involve extreme difficulty, particularly that of impressment; that Great Britain was certainly prepared at all times, to receive and to consider any proposition that America might be disposed to make in relation to it; but, one of the gentlemen remarked, that, from the deep interest which was felt by Great Britain in it, she must view with great jealousy, by which he said he meant vigilance, any such proposition; that the enquiry which they had just made, as to our willingness to separate the two subjects, proceeded from a wish to ascertain whether it were likely that any practicable result could be speedily obtained, if they entered upon the negotiation at this time.

On the subject of discriminating duties mentioned by us, they said their government would receive favorably the proposition for a mutual abolition of them. As to the trade with India, their government was not disposed to shut us out from it. In regard to the trade to the West Indies, considering the difficulties which had heretofore presented themselves in placing it, by treaty, upon a footing satisfactory to both parties, they feared it would not now be practicable to enter into any stipulation respecting it, which should meet the views of the two countries.

The interview terminated by their stating that they would report to the cabinet the substance of what had passed between us, and by their pledging themselves to do all in their power to afford us an early answer.

On the 16th inst. having been again invited by the vice-president of the board of trade to call at his office, we accordingly attended, and were received by the same gentlemen. They stated that they had reported to the cabinet what had passed at the last interview, and were now prepared to give us an answer on the several topics to which the conversation related. In doing this, they would observe the order which had been marked out by us.

1st. On the commercial intercourse between the two countries, they were authorized to state, that their government was ready to treat with us on the footing of the most favored nation; and were also willing to enter into any arrangement by which all discriminating duties on importations and tonnage should be mutually done away. They were willing to admit us to the enjoyment of the trade with British India, unclogged by the restriction on the outward voyage contained in the unratified treaty; but must still insist on that contained in the treaty of 1794, on the return voyage. Considering, that we had candidly stated, that we had no equivalent to offer, except what was to be found in the trade itself, they would expect for this concession, a spirit of accommodation on our side, in other parts of the commercial arrangement, the fur trade, or some other.

The trade with the British West Indies, they stated, had always been a subject of great difficulty, and their government was not prepared to make any change in that colonial policy, to which they had so long adhered; but they would hope that this would not form any obstacle to the negotiation.

With respect to the trade with their North American possessions, they were ready to receive and discuss any propositions we might have to offer, with an anxious desire to place it on a footing mutually satisfactory.

2dly. On those subjects which related to a state in which one of the parties should be at war, and the other in peace; it was not necessary to disguise that they had been always attended with great difficulties. Still they were willing, in a spirit of amity, and with candor, to receive and discuss any propositions we might offer.

With regard to blockades, they could not think it necessary to enter into any treaty definition of them, as the questions which might hereafter arise on that subject (according to our own statement) would relate rather to the fact, than to the principle, on which the two governments seemed to agree. Indeed, they thought that such a definition might tend to weaken, as implying a doubt of the correctness of the principle.

In relation to the trade with enemies' colonies, besides the intrinsic difficulty of the question, as heretofore experienced in all attempts to arrange it, there was another, arising out of their want of information, as to whether France had adopted any, and what system of colonial policy, since the restoration of her colonies. It might be, that she had opened their trade to foreign nations, in peace as in war, in which case the questions that had heretofore existed, could not be agitated again.

Impressment had, they continued, of all this class of subjects, been found most difficult to arrange. They were aware how important it was considered in both countries, and how, in both, it touched public sensibility. As heretofore, they were now ready to receive and consider any proposition our government might have to make respecting it. And even without any treaty stipulation, their government was now anxiously engaged in devising means to prevent the abuses of which we complain. If the law which we had mentioned, at the last interview, should be effectual in its object, it would doubtless do away a great motive with them for impressment. Still they were bound to consider, with the most vigilant attention, any proposition for the abandonment of what they must consider a right essential to their safety. That law did not, however, as they understood, settle the question, who were to be considered as British subjects, a question on which the two countries might not be able to come to an understanding.

With regard to our ideas respecting privateers and prizes, they were certainly fair and unexceptionable.

As they had hinted at some accommodation in the fur trade, or in other parts of the commercial arrangement, for their supposed concession respecting the India trade, we thought the occasion suitable for stating, that we were positively instructed not to consent to the renewal of the trade between British subjects and the Indians within our territories. We stated, that the disposition of our government on this subject, did not proceed from commercial, but political considerations. They did not insist upon it, or seem to think, that the determination of our government would prevent an arrangement of our Canada trade. One of them enquired, whether we expected, in like manner, to be excluded from the trade with the Indians in their territories? To which we replied, certainly.

We explained the law for the exclusion of foreign seamen from our service, and mentioned that the naturalization of seamen would be almost altogether prevented in future, by the necessity of a continued residence of five years. We stated, that we were authorised to enter into stipulations that would forbid the employment of British seamen as might, under our laws, be hereafter naturalized, but that we could not do it with respect to those already naturalized. We had thought, that, as to them, an exception might be made, permitting, on both sides, the voluntary employment of such seamen, natives of one country, as might have heretofore been naturalized under the laws of the other country. We added, that the number of British seamen, already naturalized, which could constitute, as it appeared to us, the only difficulty in an arrangement, was very inconsiderable. Doctor Adams concurred in opinion that they were not many.

We made some further explanations, and, finally told them, that, considering the dispositions which we had been happy to meet with them, we would now say, that we would enter upon the negotiation, reserving to ourselves, however, the right, as our powers were several, as well as joint, to withdraw from it, if circumstances should make it eligible to do so, and to leave to Mr. Adams, whom we daily expected, to conclude it.

The interview closed, by their undertaking to provide themselves with the necessary powers to proceed in the negotiation; and by an assurance, that they would continue to do all in their power to bring it to a speedy and successful issue.

Extract of a minute of a conversation which took place at Lord Castlereagh's, between his lordship and Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, April 16, 1815.

"Lord Castlereagh then called the attention of the American commissioners to a communication made by them at Ghent relative to their power to treat on the commercial intercourse between the two countries. He said, before he gave an answer to that communication, he should be glad if it were agreeable to the American commissioners, that there should be an unofficial conversation between them and the British commissioners, who negotiated the treaty of peace, together with Mr. Robinson, whom he would associate with them for that purpose to ascertain if it were likely that some general principles could be agreed upon, to form the basis of a treaty of commerce. He should prefer, that this conversation, like that which he understood had taken place in the former negotiation between lords Holland and Auckland, and Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, should be free from official forms, and thought such a course best calculated to ascertain if it were likely that the two governments could come to any practical result on this interesting subject.

"It was observed by one of the American commissioners, that such a conversation would be on terms of inequality, the American commissioners being invested with powers, and the other gentlemen having none; unless it was understood, not only that it should be considered as entirely unofficial, but that the same gentleman should afterwards be commissioned to conclude a treaty, if it were thought that one could be formed. Lord Castlereagh remarked in reply, that such was certainly his intention.

"The conversation ended in an understanding that the American commissioners would consult together upon the three topics mentioned by Lord Castlereagh, and communicate on the following day, to Mr. Goulburn, the result of their deliberations." The American Plenipotentiaries to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, 3d July, 1815.

SIR.—We have the honor to transmit a convention for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, which we concluded this day with the British plenipotentiaries.

Messrs. Clay and Gallatin's despatch of the 18th May last, has informed you of the preliminary steps taken by them on that subject. Mr. Adams arrived in London on the 25th of May, and on the 5th of June we were invited by Messrs. Robinson, Goulbourn, and Adams, to meet them on the 7th. At this conference after a mutual exhibition of our powers, and some general observations, we delivered to them our project of a commercial convention, a copy of which (marked 1.) is herewith enclosed. They promised to take it into immediate consideration, and on the 9th, informed us that they would prepare and transmit to us a contre projet.

Believing that there was no prospect of an immediate arrangement on the subject of seamen, and knowing that without it no treaty, defining the rights and duties of belligerent and neutrals was admissible, we excluded all that related to that branch of the subject from our project, and confined it to objects purely commercial.

We took the 3d article of the treaty of 1794, respecting the intercourse with Canada, as the basis of the corresponding article, omitting, according to our instructions, whatever related to the Indian trade. In drawing the other articles, we were principally guided by the unratified treaty of 1806, by the instructions given in relation to it by the secretary of state, in his despatch of May 20th, 1807, and by the act of congress, of 3d March last, for abolishing all discriminating duties. From the previous explicit declarations of the British plenipotentiaries, we deemed it useless to offer any article on the subject of the intercourse with the West India islands, and only inserted a clause, to prevent the application to that intercourse of the provisions contemplated by the convention.

On the 16th the British plenipotentiaries addressed to us a note, enclosing their contre projet, (marked 2,) and on the 17th we transmitted our answer (marked 3.) The whole subject was discussed at large in conferences held on the 19th and 21st.—The British plenipotentiaries, in a note of the 20th, (marked 4,) stated the substance of their answer to ours of the 17th. In the conference of the 21st, we delivered the additional clause to the 2d article of the contre projet, (marked 5,) and afterwards on the same day, we transmitted our note (marked 6.)

It will be perceived by these notes that we had come to an understanding as to the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, and that we disagreed on three points; the intercourse with Canada; placing generally, both countries on the footing of the most favored nations; and the intercourse with the British East Indies.

On the first point the British plenipotentiaries persisted in refusing to admit that the citizens of the United States should have the right to take their produce down the river St. Lawrence to Montreal, and down the river Chambray (or Sorel) to the St. Lawrence. And without that permission the article was useless to us, and unequal in its practical operation. The provision that the importation of our produce into Canada should not be prohibited, unless the prohibition extended generally to all similar articles, afforded us no security; as no similar articles are imported into Canada from any other foreign country; whilst the corresponding provision, respecting the importation into the United States, through Canada, of the produce and manufactures of Great Britain, effectually prevented us from prohibiting such an importation; since this could not be done without extending the prohibition to the importation of all similar articles, either of British or other foreign growth or manufacture, in the Atlantic ports of the United States.

The article for placing respectively the two countries on the footing of the most favored nation, limited, as was insisted on by the British plenipotentiaries, to the intercourse between the United States and the European territories of Great Britain, was unnecessary; since all that appeared desirable on that subject was secured by the second article; and a provision of this nature, unless offering some obvious advantage, was deemed embarrassing, on account of the difficulties attached to its execution.

With this view of the two subjects, and finding that to arrange them in a satisfactory manner was impracticable, we proposed in our note of the 21st to omit altogether the articles relating to them.

On the subject of the intercourse with India, the British Plenipotentiaries, contrary to the impression made in the unofficial conversation to Messrs. Clay and Gallatin, had insisted on our official conferences, that our admission to that trade was, on the part of Great Britain, a concession altogether gratuitous; and for which, particularly as to the privilege of indirect outward voyages, she ultimately expected an equivalent. Whilst we strenuously contended that an equivalent was found in the trade itself, which was highly beneficial to India, or, at all events, considering the nature of the commercial intercourse generally between the two countries, in the other provisions of the convention. On the same ground we urged our claim to be placed in India on the same footing, at least, as the most-favored nations. To which was replied that they made a distinction between nations which had possessions there, and those which had none. The refusal not being altogether explicit, we renewed our proposal to that effect in our note.

The British plenipotentiaries, in a note of the 23d (marked 7,) acceded to our proposal to omit the 3d and 5th articles, and refusing that on the subject of India, offered to omit the article altogether and to sign a convention embracing only the provisions, respecting the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe.

This proposal we rejected in our note of the 24th (marked 8.) But in order to meet, if practicable, the views of the British government, and to avoid making any distinction between the East India trade and the other branches of commercial intercourse, we proposed to limit the duration of the whole convention to four years, and we offered, as an alternative, an arrangement for the sole purpose of abolishing the discriminating duties, in conformity with the act of Congress of the last session.

In a note of the 26th (marked 9,) the British plenipotentiaries informed us that they found it necessary to refer our last proposals to their government, and by their note of the 29th, (marked 10,) they accepted our offer of a convention embracing the East India article, and limited to four years, to be calculated from the date of its signature. We replied to this in a note dated 30th June, and (marked 11,) and on the same day arranged, in a conference, the details of the convention.

We beg leave to add that the same restriction which confines our vessels to the principal ports of India, is, except in special cases, imposed by the act of parliament, on British subjects; and that, besides the discrimination in the export duty from England, the difference on the import duty on the article of cotton, had, by a late act of parliament, been increased to two pence sterling per pound in favor of every species imported in British vessels, and even of Brazil cotton, imported in Portuguese vessels.

We have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
H. CLAY,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

The hon. James Monroe, secy of state, Washington.
PROJECT OF THE AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS.

(No. 1.)

Article 1.—There shall be, between the territories of the United States and all the dominions of his Britannic majesty in Europe, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation. The people and inhabitants of the two countries respectively shall have liberty, freely and securely, and without hindrance and molestation, to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places and rivers, within the territories and dominions aforesaid, to enter into the same, to resort there, and to remain and reside there, without any limitation of time; also, to hire and possess houses and warehouses, for the purposes of their commerce; and generally, the merchants and traders on each side, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always, as to what respects this article, to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

Article 2.—No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation in the United States of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of his Britannic majesty's dominions in Europe; of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are or shall be payable on the like articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country. Nor shall any higher duties or charges be imposed, in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States, or to his Britannic majesty's dominions in Europe respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to every other foreign country. Nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United States, or of his Britannic majesty's dominions in Europe, to, or from the said states, or the said dominions, which shall not equally extend to all other nations. No other, or higher duties, or charges, shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States, on British vessels (such only excepted as may be bound from or to British possessions, or which vessels of the United States are not permanently admitted) than shall be payable, in the said ports, by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of his Britannic majesty's dominions in Europe, on the vessels of the United States, than are or shall be payable in the said ports by British vessels. The same duties of exportation and importation, and also, the same drawbacks and bounties shall be respectively paid and allowed, in either country, on all articles the produce, growth, or manufacture of the United States, or of his Britannic majesty's dominions in Europe, whether such exportation or importation be in vessels of the United States, or in British vessels.

Art. 3. His Britannic majesty agrees, that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted, and hospitably received, in all the seaports and harbors of the British dominions in the East Indies, and that the citizens of said states may freely carry on a trade with the said territories, in all articles of which the importation or exportation respectively to or from the said territories shall not be entirely prohibited: Provided only, that it shall not be lawful for them, in any time of war between the British government and any other power or state whatever, to export from said territories, without the special permission of the British government there, any military or naval stores, or rice.

The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels, when admitted into the said ports, no other or higher duty or charge, than shall be payable on British vessels in the ports of the United States. And they shall pay no other or higher duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of said vessels, than shall be payable on the same articles, when imported in British vessels. But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from the said British territories, to any port or place, except to some port or place in America, where the same shall be unladen; or to some port or place, or ports or places, in China, or in the India seas, whence the said vessels shall proceed as aforesaid, to some port or place in America; and there unladen the whole of the articles exported, in the manner above mentioned, from the aforesaid British territories. And such regulations shall be adopted by both parties as shall, from time to time, be found necessary to enforce the due and faithful observance of this stipulation. It is also understood, that the permission granted by this article, is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any part of the coasting trade of the said British territories without the special permission of the British government there:—but the vessels going from one port to another of the said territories, for the sole purposes either of discharging their original cargoes, or part thereof, or of completing their return cargoes, are not to be considered as carrying on the coasting trade. Neither is this article to be construed to allow the citizens of the United States to settle or reside within the said territories, or to go into the interior parts thereof, without the permission of the British government established there; and if any transgressions should be attempted against the regulations of the British government in this respect, the observance of the same shall and may be enforced against the citizens of America, in the same manner as against British subjects, or others, transgressing the same rule. And the citizens of the United States, whenever they arrive in any port or harbor in the said territories, or if they should be permitted, in manner aforesaid, to go to any other place therein, shall always be subject to the laws, government and jurisdiction, of whatsoever nature, established in such harbor, port or place, accord-long as the same may be. The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment at the Island of St. Helena, or at such other ports or places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian seas, but subject, in all respects, to such regulations as the British government may, from time to time establish there.

Art. 4. The navigation of all the lakes, rivers and water communications, the middle of which is the boundary between the United States and his Britannic Majesty's dominions on the continent of North America, shall, at all times, be free to the citizens of the United States, and to his Majesty's subjects. The said citizens and subjects may freely carry on trade and commerce with each other, and for that purpose pass and re-pass by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories of the two parties, on the said continent: and no higher or other tolls, or rates of ferrage, than what are, or shall be, payable by natives, shall be demanded on either side. All goods and merchandize, whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by his Majesty's subjects, and such goods and merchandize shall be subject to no higher, or other duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States, on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States; and, in like manner, all goods and merchandize, whose importation into his Majesty's said territories in America shall not be entirely prohibited, may freely, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same, in the manner aforesaid, by the citizens of the United States; and such goods and merchandize shall be subject to no higher, or other duties than would be payable by his Majesty's subjects, on the importation of the same from Europe, into the said territories. All goods, not prohibited, to be exported from the said territories respectively, may, in like manner, be carried out of the same by the two parties. No duty of importation, or exportation, shall be levied by either party, on peltries or furs, which may be brought, in the manner aforesaid, by land or inland navigation, from the said territories of one party into the said territories of the other party.

Art. 5. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties respectively, to appoint consuls for the protection of trade; and agents for the protection of seamen, to reside in the dominions or territories of the other party; and the said consuls and agents shall enjoy their liberties and rights which belong to them by reason of their functions. But before any consul or agent aforesaid, shall act as such, he shall be, in the usual form, approved and admitted by the party to whom he is sent; and it is hereby declared to be lawful and proper, that in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or government, a consul or agent aforesaid, may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be dismissed, or even sent back, the offended government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

Art. 6. It being the intention of the high contracting parties that the people of their respective dominions shall be placed on the footing of the most favored nation, it is agreed that in case either party shall hereafter grant any additional advantage in navigation or trade to any other nation, the citizens or subjects of the other party shall fully participate therein, freely where it is freely granted to such other nation, or yielding the same compensation where the grant is made for some equivalent.

THE BRITISH COUNTER PROJECT.

The British Plenipotentiaries to the American Plenipotentiaries.

BOARD OF TRADE, JUNE 16, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to transmit to the plenipotentiaries of the United States, a contre projet for the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between the two countries. The American plenipotentiaries will observe, that the article respecting the British East Indies, is not proposed to be included in the body of the treaty, but in a separate article, and more limited in point of duration than would be suitable to the arrangement of the treaty itself. The undersigned, nevertheless, flatter themselves that the American plenipotentiaries will see in the proposed article for the East India intercourse, a proof of the liberal and conciliatory disposition with which the British government is disposed to act upon the subject.

It will be recollected that at one of the unofficial conferences, and subsequently, at the first official conference held with the American plenipotentiaries, the undersigned stated by order of their government, that if the power of going from the United States to the British dominions in the East Indies by an indirect course were conceded, Great Britain must be considered as entitled to some equivalent for the concession, and that the fur trade was pointed out by the undersigned, as capable of furnishing that equivalent.

The American plenipotentiaries having stated that their instructions did not permit them to grant by stipulation any commercial intercourse between his Majesty's subjects and the Indians residing within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States, and not having suggested any other means of finding an equivalent, the undersigned would have been fully justified in tendering a contre projet which wholly omitted the concession in question. But his Majesty's government, anxious to renew the commercial relations of the two countries, in the true spirit of peace and harmony, has authorized the undersigned to offer a separate article by which the indirect voyage from the United States to the British East Indies will be permitted without equivalent, for the space of two years, in the confident hope, that during that period the American government will be enabled to propose such an equivalent as may induce Great Britain to make that permission commensurate with the general duration of the treaty.

The undersigned will be happy to have the honor of seeing the American plenipotentiaries on any day which may suit their convenience, and request them to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

F. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

Art. 1. There shall be between all the territories of his Britannic Majesty in Europe, and the territories of the United States of America, a reciprocal liberty of commerce. The inhabitants of the two countries respectively shall have liberty fully and securely to come with their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers, in the territories aforesaid, to which other foreigners are permitted to come; to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any part of the said territories respectively, also to hire and occupy warehouses for the purposes of their commerce, and generally the merchants and traders of each nation respectively shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce, but subject always to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

Art. 2. No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the territories of his Britannic majesty in Europe, of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, and no other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, than are or shall be payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any other or higher duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries on the exportation of any articles to his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, or to the United States, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed upon the exportation or importation of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, or of the United States, to or from the said territories of his Britannic majesty in Europe, or to or from the said United States, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

No other or higher duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of any of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, on the vessels of the United States, than shall be payable on British vessels, nor in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

Art. 3. The navigation of all lakes, rivers, and water communications, the middle of which is, or may be the boundary between his Britannic majesty's territories on the continent of North America, and the United States, shall with the exceptions herein after mentioned, at all times be free to his majesty's subjects and the citizens of the United States. The inhabitants of his Britannic majesty's territories in North America, and the citizens and subjects of the United States, may freely carry on trade and commerce by land or inland navigation as aforesaid, with goods and merchandize the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British territories in Europe or North America, or of the United States, respectively, within the territories of the two parties, respectively, on the said continent, (the countries within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company only excepted) and no other or higher duties or tolls or rates of ferrriage or portage, than what are or shall be payable by natives respectively, shall be taken or demanded on either side.

All goods and merchandize whose importation into the United States shall not be wholly prohibited, may fully, for the purposes of the commerce abovementioned, be carried into the said United States in the manner aforesaid by his Britannic majesty's subjects, and the said goods and merchandize shall be subject to no higher or other duties than would be payable by citizens of the United States, on the importation of the same in American vessels into the Atlantic ports of the United States. And in like manner all goods and merchandize the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, whose importation into his majesty's said territories in America, shall not be entirely prohibited, may fully, for the purposes of the commerce above mentioned, be carried into the same by land, or by means of such lakes, rivers, and water communications as above mentioned, by the citizens of the United States, and such goods and merchandize shall be subject to no other or higher duty than would be payable by his majesty's subjects on the importation of the same from Europe into the said territories. No duty shall be levied by either party on peltries or furs which may be brought in the manner aforesaid by land or inland navigation from the said territories of another, but tolls or rates of ferrriage or portage may be demanded and taken in manner above mentioned on such peltries or furs.

It is hereby declared, that nothing in this article contained, as to the navigation of rivers, lakes or water communication shall extend, to give a right of navigation upon, or within the same, in those parts where the middle is not the boundary between his Britannic majesty's territories and the United States of America.

Art. 4. It shall be free for each of the two contracting parties to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other party. But before any consul shall act as such, he shall, in the usual form, be approved and admitted by the government to which he is sent; and it is hereby declared, that, in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or government of the country to which he is sent, such consul may either be punished according to law, if the laws will reach the case, or be sent back, the offended government assigning to the other the reasons for the same.

It is hereby declared, that either of the contracting parties may except from the residence of consuls such particular places as such party shall judge proper to be so excepted.

Art. 5. It being the intention of the contracting parties, that the inhabitants of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, and the inhabitants of the United States shall, in respect to commerce between the said territories, be placed on the footing of the most favored nations; it is agreed, that in case either of the contracting parties shall hereafter grant any additional advantage in commerce or navigation to any European nation, as to the importation or exportation to or from such other European nation and his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, or to or from such European nation and the territories of the United States, the citizens and subjects of the other contracting party shall likewise enjoy the same freely, where it has been freely granted to such other European nation; and were conditionally granted, on the same terms and conditions on which such advantage shall have been granted, on terms and conditions which may be afterwards agreed upon as equivalent thereto by the contracting parties.

First separate article. His Britannic majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States shall be admitted and hospitably received at the principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, videlicet: Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and prince of Wales' Island, and that the citizens of said the United States may fully carry on trade between the said principal settlements, and the said United States, in all articles of which the importation and exportation respectively, to and from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited; provided only that it shall not be lawful for them in any time of war between the British government, and any power or state whatever, to export from the said territories, without the special permission of the British government, any military stores or naval stores, or rice. The citizens of the United States shall pay for their vessels when admitted, no other or higher duty or charge, than shall be payable on the vessels of the most favored European nations. And they shall pay no other or higher duties or charges on the importation or exportation of the cargoes of the said vessels, than shall be payable on the same articles when imported or exported in the vessels of the most favored European nation.

But it is expressly agreed, that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any articles from the said principal settlements to any port or place, except to some port or place in the United States of America, where the same shall be unladen.

It is also understood, that the permission granted by this article, is not to extend to allow the vessels of the United States to carry on any of the coasting trade of the said British territories, but the vessels of the United States having in the first instance proceeded to one of the said principal settlements of the British dominions in the East Indies, and then going with their original cargoes, or part thereof, from one of the said principal settlements to another, shall not be considered as carrying on the coasting trade.

The vessels of the United States may also touch for refreshment, but not for commerce, in the course of their voyage to or from the British territories in India, at the Cape of Good Hope, the Island of St. Helena, or such other places as may be in the possession of Great Britain in the African or Indian Seas. It being well understood, that in all that regards this article, the citizens of the United States shall be subject, in all respects, to the laws and regulations of the British government from time to time established.

Second separate article. It is hereby agreed and declared, that the first separate article in this treaty shall be limited in its duration to the period of two years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the said treaty.

(3)—The answer of our commissioners to the British contre projet, and note accompanying it.

The American to the British plenipotentiaries.

Harley-street, June 17th, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries of the 16th inst. enclosing their contre projet for the arrangement of the commercial intercourse between the two countries.

Anxious to ascertain with as little delay as possible, whether there be any probability that such an arrangement can now be concluded, as shall be satisfactory to both parties; the undersigned will not at this time enter into a discussion of the subject, and leaving minor points for subsequent consideration, will only propose the following alterations to the contre projet of his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries, videlicet:

Art. 2. 1st. To reinstate the clause in the projet of the undersigned, which provided that the same duties, drawbacks and bounties, should be paid and allowed in either country, on the importation or exportation of articles the produce, or growth, or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, or of the United States, whether such importations or exportations should be in British vessels or in vessels of the United States.

2dly. To reinstate the clause in the projet of the undersigned, which excepted from the provision to equalize tonnage duties, British vessels bound to or from British possessions, to which vessels of the United States were not permanently admitted; or to introduce a new article, providing that neither the intercourse between the United States and his Britannic majesty's possessions in the West Indies, nor that by sea between the said states and his Britannic majesty's possessions in North America, shall be affected by any article in the treaty, but that each party shall remain in the complete possession of its rights, in respect to such an intercourse.

Art. 3. To reinstate, in substance, the article proposed on that subject by the undersigned, so that the commerce by land, or inland navigation, sanctioned by the articles, be confined to that which may be carried on between the citizens of the United States and his Britannic majesty's subjects; and so as not to preclude the citizens of the United States from carrying articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of the said states, down the river St. Lawrence, as far at least as Montreal, and down the waters of Lake Champlain, as far at least as the St. Lawrence. Or, if no satisfactory arrangement can at present be formed on this subject, to omit the article altogether.

Art. 5. To place generally each nation on the footing of the most favored nation, without restricting that privilege as relates to the citizens of the United States to the commerce with his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe.

Second separate article to be omitted.

The undersigned will have the honor to wait on his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries on Monday the 19th inst. at two o'clock, at the office for trade, when the undersigned hope they will be able to communicate to them, their final determination on the proposed alterations.

The undersigned request his Britannic majesty's plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

The substance of the answer of the British commissioners to the letter of our commissioners of the 17th June.

The British to the American plenipotentiaries.

Board of Trade, June 20th, 1815.

In compliance with the request of the American plenipotentiaries, the undersigned have the honor to communicate to them in writing, the substance of the observations which were made on the part of the British plenipotentiaries in the conference of yesterday, upon the different points referred to in the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 17th inst.

Upon the first point relating to a part of the second article of the contre projet of the undersigned, the British plenipotentiaries stated it to be the intention of their government to agree, not only to a mutual equalization of such duties as may be properly called tonnage duties, but also of all duties upon the importation of goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of the two countries respectively, whether imported in British or in American ships; they stated further, their readiness to accede to a similar and mutual equalization of bounties payable upon the above articles. Upon the subject of drawbacks, they represented that the clause as proposed by the American plenipotentiaries, appeared to give to the vessels of the U. States which might be engaged in the general re-exportation of American produce from this country to all other parts of the world, an advantage equal to that enjoyed by British ships, and that this privilege went beyond the general principle of an article which was confined to the trade between the two countries respectively. They expressed a wish to receive from the American plenipotentiaries, a more precise explanation of their views upon this point.

Upon the second point referred to in the note of the American plenipotentiaries, the undersigned expressed their readiness to agree to a clause, which should contain the latter alternative suggested by the American plenipotentiaries.

Upon the third article relating to the intercourse between Canada and the U. States, the undersigned disclaimed any intention of obtaining, by any interpretation of the words of the article, as they had proposed it, a right to an intercourse with the Indians residing within the acknowledged limits of the U. States, which the American plenipotentiaries had already stated, that their instructions forbade them to concede. And they expressed their readiness to agree to the insertion of such words as would clear up any doubt which might exist upon the subject.

As to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence as far as Montreal, and that of the waters flowing from lake Champlain to that river, the undersigned stated themselves not to be authorised to stipulate the concession of that indulgence in the way proposed by the American plenipotentiaries. The undersigned likewise stated their objections to extending article 5 beyond the intercourse between the United States and his Britannic majesty's dominions in Europe.

In regard to the two separate articles of the contre projet, the undersigned stated that they had no authority to grant the first, unless accompanied by a limitation in point of time; and when the American plenipotentiaries proposed, as a substitute for that article, one which should give the United States the same privileges as the most favored European nations in their intercourse with the British possessions in that quarter, the undersigned, whilst they admitted that in some respects it stood upon different grounds from an article which should grant the indirect voyage to the East Indies, without any equivalent or limitation in point of time, did not feel themselves authorised to hold out any expectation that this new suggestion would be acceded to by G. Britain.

The undersigned request the American plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

F. ROBINSON,
HENRY GOULBURN,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

(5)

Additional clause proposed by our commissioners to the 2d article of the contre projet.

Second sketch of article for equalizing duties.

The same duties shall be paid on the importations in the ports of any of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, of any articles, the growth, produce or manufacture of the U. States, and the same drawbacks shall be allowed on the re-exportation thereof, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the U. States or in British vessels, and the same duties shall be paid on the importation in the U. States of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, and the same drawbacks shall be allowed on the re-exportation thereof, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the U. States or in British vessels. The same duties shall be paid and the same bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of the U. States, to his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the U. States or in British vessels, and the same duties shall be paid, and the same bounties allowed on the exportation of any articles, the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe to the U. States, whether such exportation shall be in vessels of the U. States or in British vessels.

The American to the British plenipotentiaries.

Harley-street, June 21st, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British plenipotentiaries, dated the 20th inst. communicating the substance of the observations which they had made in the conference of the 19th, upon the different points referred to in the note of the undersigned of the 17th inst.

The views of the undersigned with respect to the second article being precisely the same with those stated by the British plenipotentiaries, there will be no difficulty in framing a clause embracing the objects contemplated by both parties, and which shall be free from ambiguity.

The explanation given by the British plenipotentiaries upon that part of the third article which the undersigned apprehended might be liable to a construction in reference to the Indian trade, not intended by either party, is perfectly satisfactory. But they regret that they cannot accede to the alterations proposed in other respects by the British plenipotentiaries to the article which had been offered by the undersigned, particularly as they affect the privilege of inland navigation by the river St. Lawrence and by the waters flowing from lake Champlain, nor have they found it practicable to frame any article compatible with the different views entertained by the two parties respecting the intercourse between the U. States and Canada. They therefore recur to the proposal made in their note of the 17th inst. to omit that article altogether, that proposal not having been noticed in the note of the British plenipotentiaries of the 20th inst.

They make the same offer as to the 5th article of the contre projet.

And thirdly, they hereby renew the proposal made verbally in the conference of the 19th inst. to substitute for the two separate articles, one placing the U. States in their intercourse with the British possessions in India, on the footing of the most favored European nation.

The undersigned request to be made acquainted with the determination of the British plenipotentiaries on those three propositions.

The undersigned tender again to the British plenipotentiaries assurances of their distinguished consideration.

Board of Trade, June 23d, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 21st inst. and are happy to find that no difficulty exists on either side to the second article.—Upon the subject of the third article, the undersigned regret to learn that the American plenipotentiaries have not found it practicable to frame any article compatible with the different views entertained by the two parties respecting the intercourse between Canada and the United States: And as the undersigned are equally unable to accede to the proposition made on the part of the United States respecting the navigation of waters lying exclusively within the territories of his Britannic majesty, they accede to the proposal of omitting the article altogether. They have also no objection to the omission of the fifth article.

In regard to the trade with the British East-Indies, the undersigned are not authorised to substitute for the two separate articles which they had proposed, one which shall put the intercourse of the U. States in that quarter upon the footing of the most favored European nation, inasmuch as it would have the practical effect of granting, in another shape, that which the undersigned are instructed to withhold, unless accompanied by a greater limitation of time than they would think it expedient to apply to other arrangements of the treaty. If, however, the American plenipotentiaries adhere to their objection to the substance of the two separate articles as proposed on the part of Great Britain, the undersigned are ready to omit altogether any article upon the subject of the East-Indies.

The undersigned are nevertheless disposed to consider the arrangements of the second article (as agreed upon, or understood) to be of sufficient importance to the mutual interests of Great Britain and the United States, particularly in the common object of securing a free commercial intercourse between the two countries, to induce them readily to sign a treaty or convention for that single purpose, independent of the other points to which the negotiation has referred.

The undersigned are happy upon this occasion to renew to the American plenipotentiaries the assurance of their high consideration.

F. ROBINSON,
WILLIAM ADAMS.

(8.)

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

Harley-street, June 24th, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the British plenipotentiaries of the 23d inst. expressing their assent to the proposal of omitting the 3d and 5th article of the contre projet. To the proposal of omitting also altogether any article upon the subject of the East Indies, and of signing an arrangement, embracing all the provisions contained in the second article, the undersigned do not feel themselves authorised to accede. But they offer to sign a convention, embracing that article entire, and the first separate article, the whole of which convention shall be limited to the term of four years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, or they will agree to a convention for the sole purpose of abolishing all discriminating duties on American and British vessels, and their cargoes, in the intercourse between the United States and his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, in the manner contemplated by the 2d article, as explained and mutually agreed on in the conferences on that subject, omitting all the other provisions contained in the same article, and which had for object, to place the two countries respectively on the footing of the most favored nation.

The undersigned request the British plenipotentiaries to accept the assurances of their distinguished consideration.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

Board of Trade, June 26th, 1815.

The undersigned have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the American plenipotentiaries of the 24th inst. in which they offer to sign a convention, embracing the second article entire and the first separate article; the whole convention to be limited to the term of four years from the date of the exchange of the ratification, or to agree to a convention for the sole purpose of abolishing all discriminating duties on American and British vessels and their cargoes, in the intercourse between the United States and the British territories in Europe, omitting all the other provisions contained in the same article, and which had for object, to place the two countries respectively on the footing of the most favored nation.

As neither of these proposals were contemplated in the instructions with which the undersigned were originally furnished, and which were framed with a view to a less limited arrangement, they have felt themselves under the necessity of referring the last note of the American plenipotentiaries to the consideration of their government, and will not fail to communicate the result of that reference as soon as they shall be enabled to do so.

The undersigned are happy to avail themselves of this opportunity of renewing to the American plenipotentiaries the assurances of their high consideration.

The British to the American Plenipotentiaries.

Board of Trade, June 29, 1815.

In reference to the note which the undersigned had the honor to address to the American plenipotentiaries, on the 26th inst. they are now instructed to acquaint them that the British government is ready to agree to a convention for four years, (to be calculated from the date of its signature,) which shall contain the whole of the second article, as proposed by the undersigned, and as explained and mutually agreed upon in their several conferences, and also the first separate article, relating to the East-Indies, as proposed on the part of Great-Britain the latter article also to be in force from the same date. The undersigned, in making this communication to the American plenipotentiaries, feel it to be their duty to state, in the most explicit manner, that although in the earnest desire of promoting a good understanding between the two countries, the British government has, at the present time, forborne to insist on making in the body of the treaty any marked distinction between its concessions in regard to the East-Indies and its other concessions for which a stipulated equivalent is obtained, yet that it still considers itself as granting to the United States a privilege in regard to the East-Indies, for which it is entitled to require an equivalent; and the undersigned must therefore be distinctly understood as reserving to his majesty's government in any future negotiations the clear right either of withholding this privilege altogether, after the expiration of four years, or of renewing the grant of it for such equivalents, or subject to such modifications as expediency may seem to require at the time of such future negotiations.

The undersigned request to have the honor of seeing the American plenipotentiaries on Friday next, the 30th instant, at 2 o'clock, at the Board of Trade, and avail themselves of this opportunity of again offering the assurances of their high consideration.

The American to the British Plenipotentiaries.

Harley-Street, June 30, 1815.

The undersigned have had the honor to receive the note of the British plenipotentiaries dated the 29th inst. and stating the terms on which their government is ready to agree to a convention on the subject of the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great-Britain.

The undersigned have already, in the conferences which they had the honor to hold with the British plenipotentiaries, expressed their opinion that the proposed convention taken altogether, was founded on principles of reciprocity, was equally advantageous to both parties, and contained in itself a fair equivalent for every presumed concession made by either party.—But both governments will undoubtedly have a clear right after the expiration of four years of refusing to renew or of subjecting to modifications any of the stipulations now agreed on which may appear to either party injurious, or requiring some further equivalent. The same earnest desire of promoting a good understanding between the two countries which has been expressed on the part of Great Britain has induced the undersigned to agree to a convention more limited both as to its objects and duration than they had contemplated, with a hope that in the mean time its deficiencies may be supplied and such other provisions may be adopted as will conduce to mutual convenience and tend to strengthen the relations of amity and friendship happily restored between the two countries.

The undersigned will have the honor to meet the British plenipotentiaries this day and feel pleasure in renewing the assurances of their high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
 H. CLAY,
 ALBERT GALLATIN.

Thert. hon. F. J. Robinson,
 H. Goulburn, esq. and Dr. Wm. Adams.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's charge d'affaires in the United States, has the honor to acquaint the American Secretary of State, for the information of the President, that he has received his Royal Highness the Prince Regent's ratification, in the name, and on the behalf of his Majesty, of the commercial convention between the two countries, signed at London, on the 3d of last July, and that he has been authorized, and is ready, to proceed to the exchange, whenever the ratification on the part of the United States shall have taken place.

In communicating this intelligence, the undersigned has received the Prince Regent's commands, at the same time, to transmit to the government of the United States the accompanying declaration, explanatory of the intentions of his Majesty's government, in so far as regards the intercourse of vessels belonging to the United States with the Island of St. Helena; the existing circumstances of the world having rendered it necessary that that island should for the present, be excepted from the ports of refreshment enumerated in the third article of the said convention.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity of requesting the American Secretary of State to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

ANTHONY St. JNO. BAKER.

Indian Treaties.

JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting :

WHEREAS a treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Kickapoo tribe or nation of indians, was concluded and signed at Portage des Sioux on the second day of September, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, by commissioners on the part of the said United States, and certain chiefs, warriors, and deputies of the said tribe or nation of indians, on the part of the said tribe or nation, which treaty is in the words following, to wit :

A treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said states, of the one part; and the undersigned chiefs, warriors, and deputies of the Kickapoo tribe or nation, on the part and behalf of the said tribe or nation, of the other part.

The parties being desirous of re-establishing peace and friendship between the United States and the said tribe or nation, and of being placed in all things and in every respect on the same footing upon which they stood before the war; have agreed to the following articles :

Article the first.—Every injury or act of hostility by one or either of the contracting parties towards the other, shall be mutually forgiven and forgot.

Article the second.—There shall be perpetual peace and friendship between all the citizens of the United States of America, and all the individuals composing the said Kickapoo tribe or nation.

Article the third.—The contracting parties do hereby agree, promise, and oblige themselves, reciprocally, to deliver up all the prisoners now in their hands (by what means soever the same may have come into their possession) to the officer commanding at fort Clark, on the Illinois river, to be by him restored to their respective nations as soon as it may be practicable.

Article the fourth.—The contracting parties, in the sincerity of mutual friendship, recognize, re-establish, and confirm all and every treaty, contract, and agreement, heretofore concluded between the United States and the Kickapoo tribe or nation.

In witness whereof, the said William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners as aforesaid, and the chiefs, warriors, and deputies of the said tribe, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals this second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

To all and singular to whom these presents shall come greeting :

WHEREAS a treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America, and the Iaway tribe or nation of Indians, was concluded and signed at Portage des Sioux, on the sixteenth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, by commissioners on the part of the said United States, and the king and certain chiefs and warriors of the said tribe or nation of Indians, on behalf of said tribe or nation of Indians, which treaty is in the words following, to wit :

A treaty of peace and friendship, made and concluded between William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, Commissioners Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, on the part and behalf of the said states, of the one part; and the undersigned, king, chiefs and warriors of the Iaway tribe or nation, on the part and behalf of the said tribe or nation, of the other part.

The parties being desirous of re-establishing peace and friendship between the United States, and the said tribe or nation, and of being placed in all things and in every respect, on the same footing upon which they stood before the war, have agreed to the following articles.

Article the third.—The contracting parties do hereby agree, promise and oblige themselves, reciprocally, to deliver up all the prisoners now in their hands, (by what means soever the same may have come into their possession,) to the officer commanding at St. Louis, to be by him restored to their respective nations, as soon as it may be practicable.

Article the fourth.—The contracting parties, in the sincerity of mutual friendship, recognize, re-establish and confirm, all and every treaty, contract and agreement, heretofore concluded between the United States, and the said Iaway tribe or nation.

In witness whereof, the said William Clark, Ninian Edwards, and Auguste Chouteau, commissioners as aforesaid, and the aforesaid king, chiefs and warriors, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals, this sixteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the fortieth.

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, James Madison, President of the United States of America, having seen and considered the said treaty, have, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, accepted, ratified and confirmed the same, and every clause and article thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and have signed the same with my hand. Done at the City of Washington, this twenty-sixth [L. s.] day of December, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the Independence of the United States the fortieth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the President :

JAS. MONROE,

Secretary of State.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.

Thursday, Jan. 4.—On motion of Mr. Morris, Resolved, That the committee on Military Affairs be instructed to enquire and report the aggregate quantity of lands due for bounties to the soldiers enlisted into the army during the late war; and in case it shall appear that a deficiency exists, and vice president of the United States, each state either in the quantity or quality of the lands already designated or appropriated for that purpose, that the said committee report by bill or otherwise, the provisions necessary for the full and speedy allotment of lands engaged to be granted to the said soldiers.

Thursday, Jan. 9. Mr. Bibb, from the committee on foreign relations, to whom the subject was referred, reported the following bill, which was read and passed to a second reading.

A bill, concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and his Britannic majesty.

Be it enacted and declared by the senate and house of representatives of the United States, in congress assembled, That so much of any act or acts as is contrary to the provisions of the convention between the United States and his Britannic majesty, the ratifications whereof were mutually exchanged, the twenty-second day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, shall be deemed, and taken to be of no force or effect.

Wednesday, Jan. 10.—The above bill was read a second, and, by unanimous consent, a third time, passed, and sent to the house of representatives for concurrence.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 5.—Many petitions were presented, among which were a number from manufacturers, praying protection, &c.

Mr. Jennings, from the committee on the subject, made a detailed report, accompanied by a bill to enable the people of Indiana territory to form a constitution and state government, and for the admission of said territory into the union as an independent state, on an equal footing with the original states; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Pickens, of N. C. rose to make a motion on a subject which he had for some time considered of great importance to the national interest. Although he had heretofore in vain pressed it on the consideration of the house, he thought the change of the circumstances of the nation, and the harmonious relations of political parties, at present, justified the hope that he should now meet with better success. The proposition he was about to submit had at different times been supported by the unanimous vote of both branches of the legislature of North Carolina; and under the sanction of this respectable authority, he thought it his duty again to offer it to the consideration of the house, which he did in the following shape:—

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, two-thirds of both houses concurring therein, that the following amendment to the constitution of the United States, be proposed to the legislatures of the several states, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the said states, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said constitution:

“For the purpose of choosing representatives in the congress of the United States, each state shall be divided by its legislature into a number of districts, equal to the number of representatives to which the states may be entitled—each district shall contain as nearly as may be equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. In each district, the qualified voters shall elect one representative.

and vice president of the United States, each state shall be divided by its legislature, into a number of districts, equal to the number of electors to which the state may be entitled; each district shall contain, as nearly as may be, equal numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to serve for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. District persons qualified to vote for representatives in the congress of the United States, shall choose one elector. The legislature of each state shall have power to regulate the manner of holding elections, and making returns of the electors. In case all the electors should not meet at the time and place appointed for giving their votes, a majority of the electors met shall have power, and forthwith proceed to supply the vacancy.

“A division of the states into districts for choosing representatives in the congress of the United States, and into districts for choosing electors of president and vice-president of the United States, shall take place as soon as conveniently may be after each enumeration and apportionment of representatives.”

The resolution was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole.

The house, according to order, resumed the consideration of the bill to carry into effect the commercial convention with Great Britain. [A very animated but dignified debate has taken place on this. “It turns,” says the National Intelligencer, “not so much on the merits of the treaty, as on the necessity of legislation to carry its provisions into effect. Thus, one of the questions so much agitated in the year 1795, in regard to Jay’s treaty, is revived: the two political parties appearing, though the government has since changed hands, to maintain the same doctrines on the subject of treaty stipulation, which they then declared and supported.”] Adjourned until Monday.

Monday, Jan. 8.—Mr. Pinkney, from Maryland. Mr. Randolph, from Virginia; and Mr. Blount, from Tennessee, appeared and took their seats.

Many petitions were presented among which were a number from manufacturers.

Mr. Sumner laid before the house the resolution of the legislature of North Carolina, requesting the senators and representatives in congress, from that state, to use their best endeavors to prevail on the general government to open a direct outlet to the ocean from the waters of the Albemarle sound.

Mr. Pleasants, from the committee appointed to wait on the president of the United States with a resolution requesting information from him respecting the transactions at Dartmoor prison, reported, that they had performed that duty, and received for answer that due attention would be paid to the request of the house.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. Calhoun, from the committee on the National Currency, reported a bill “to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.” Accompanying the bill was a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, to which was annexed the following “Outline,” which we here publish, as containing, with few unessential variations, a correct synopsis of the plan embraced by the voluminous bill reported by the committee:

OUTLINE OF A PLAN FOR THE NATIONAL BANK.

I. The Charter of the Bank.

1. To continue 21 years.
2. To be exclusive.

II. The Capital of the Bank.

1. To be $5,000,000, at present.
2. To be augmented by congress to 50,000,000; and the additional sum to be distributed among the several states.

3. To be divided into 350,000 shares of 100 dollars each, on the capital of 35,000,000; and to be subscribed,

By the United States, one fifth, or 70,000 shares,	7,000,000
By corporations and individuals, four-fifths, or 280,000 shares,	28,000,000

4. To be compounded of public debt, and of gold and silver, as to the subscriptions of corporations and individuals in the proportions

Of funded debt, three fourths, equal to 21,000,000

Of gold and silver, one-fourth, equal to 7,000,000

The subscriptions of 6 per cent. stock to be at par,
The subscriptions of 3 per cent. stock to be at 56 per cent.

The subscriptions of 7 per cent. stock to be at 106 51 per cent.

5. The subscriptions in public debt may be discharged at pleasure by the government, at the rate at which it is subscribed.

6. The subscriptions of corporations or individuals to be payable by instalments.

(1) Specie at subscribing,
On each share 5 dolls.	1,400,000
At 6 months 5 dolls.	1,400,000
At 12 months 5 dolls.	1,400,000
At 18 months 10 dolls.	2,800,000

7,000,000

(2) Public debt , at subscribing,
Each share 25 dolls.	7,000,000
At 6 months 25 dolls.	7,000,000
At 12 months 25 dolls.	7,000,000

7. The subscriptions of the United States to be paid in instalments, not extending beyond a period of 7 years; the first instalment to be paid at the time of subscribing, and the payments to be made, at the pleasure of government, either in gold or silver; or

In 6 per cent. stock, redeemable at the pleasure of the government; or

In treasury notes, not fundable, nor bearing interest nor payable at a particular time, but receivable in all payments to the bank, with a right on the part of the bank to re-issue the treasury notes so paid from time to time, until they are discharged by payments to the government.

8. The bank shall be at liberty to sell the stock portion of its capital, to an amount not exceeding in any one year; but if the sales are intended to be effected in the United States, notice thereof shall be given to the secretary of the treasury, that the commissioners of the sinking fund may, if they please, become the purchasers, at the market price, not exceeding par.

III. The government of the bank.

1. The bank shall be established at Philadelphia, with power to erect branches, or to employ state banks as branches elsewhere.

2. There shall be 25 directors for the bank at Philadelphia, and 18 for each of the branches, where branches are erected, with the usual description and number of officers.

3. The president of the United States, with the advice and consent of the senate, shall annually appoint five of the directors of the bank at Philadelphia.

4. The qualified stockholders shall annually elect 20 of the directors of the bank at Philadelphia, but a portion of the directors shall be changed at every annual election, upon the principle of rotation.

5. The directors of the bank at Philadelphia, shall annually, at their first meeting after their election, choose one of the five directors appointed by the president and senate of the United States to be president of the bank; and the president of the bank shall always be re-eligible if re-appointed.

6. The directors of the bank at Philadelphia, shall annually appoint 13 directors for each of the branches, where branches are erected, and shall transmit a list of the persons appointed to the secretary of the treasury.

7. The secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States shall annually designate from the list of the branch directors, the person to be president of the respective branches.

8. None but resident citizens of the United States shall be directors of the bank, or its branches.

9. The stockholders may vote for directors in person or by proxy: but no stockholder, who is not resident within the United States at the time of election shall vote by proxy; nor shall any one person vote as proxy a greater number of votes than he would be entitled to vote in his own right, according to a scale of voting; to be graduated by the number of shares, which the voters respectively hold.

10. The bank, and its several branches, or the state banks, employed as branches, shall furnish the officer at the head of the treasury department with statements of their officers, in such form, and at such period, as shall be required.

IV. The privileges and duties of the bank.

1. The bank shall enjoy the usual privileges, and be subject to the usual restrictions of a body corporate and politic, instituted for such purposes, and the forgery of its notes shall be made penal.

2. The notes of the bank shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, unless congress shall hereafter otherwise provide by law.

3. The bank, and its branches, and state banks, employed as branches, shall give the necessary aid and facility to the treasury for transferring the public funds from place to place, and for making payments to the public creditors; without charging commissions, or claiming allowances on account of differences of exchange, &c.

V. The organization and operation of the bank.

1. Subscriptions to be opened with as little delay as possible, and at as few places as shall be deemed just and convenient. The commissioners may be named in the act or appointed by the president.

2. The bank to be organized, and commence its operations in specie as soon as the sum of 1,400,000 dollars has been actually received from the subscriptions, in gold and silver.

3. The bank shall not at any time suspend its specie payments, unless the same shall be previously authorised by congress, if in session, or by the president of the United States, if congress be not in session. In the latter case, the suspension shall continue for six weeks after the meeting of congress, and no longer, unless authorised by law.

VI. The bonus for the charter of the bank.

The subscribers shall pay a premium to the government for its charter. Estimating the profits of the bank from the probable advance in the value of its stock, and the result of its business when in full operation, at 7 per cent. a bonus of 1,500,000 dollars, payable in equal instalments of two, three and four years after the bank commences its operations, might, under all circumstances, be considered as about 4 per cent. upon its capital, and would contribute a reasonable premium.

The bill received two readings by its title, and was referred to a committee of the whole.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill to carry into effect the commercial convention with Great Britain, and much debate, &c. being had thereon, an adjournment was had without a decision.

Tuesday, Jan. 9. Considerable business is in progress, which will be more particularly noticed hereafter.

Mr. Birdseye submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of commerce and manufactures be instructed to enquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law, all commercial intercourse between the citizens and subjects of any foreign power and any of the Indians within the territories of the United States.

This motion was opposed by Mr. King of Mass. (as well as the reporter could hear) on the ground that the Indians had been recognized by us as independent nations, whose commerce we had no right to regulate.

The motion was, however, agreed to by a large majority.

The house, according to the order of the day, resumed the consideration of the bill for carrying into effect the convention of commerce between the United States and Great Britain.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

The bill was advocated by Mr. Gholson, Mr. Randolph and Mr. Reynolds, and opposed by Mr. Hardin and Mr. Calhoun, in speeches of considerable length and interest.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, about 3 o'clock, and decided in the affirmative by a majority of about 20 votes.

Wednesday, Jan. 10. Mr. Pleasants, from the naval committee, reported a resolution directing the presentation to capt. Stewart, and the other officers of the Constitution, suitable medals, in testimony of the sense of congress of the merits of their exploit, in the capture of the British sloops of war Cyane and Levant; which was read and referred to a committee of the whole.

The engrossed bill to regulate the commerce of the United States according to the convention of commerce concluded with Great Britain on the 3d day of July last, was read the third time, and the question was stated "shall the bill pass?"

The passage of the bill was advocated by Mr. Easton, Mr. Tucker, and Mr. Cuthbert, and opposed by Mr. Pinkney; to whom Mr. Randolph replied.

During the discussion, the bill was received from the senate, which is noticed above.

Mr. Forey stated the reasons why he hoped, notwithstanding the receipt of the bill from the senate, that the bill now before the house would pass, as, according to his view, the senate had, by passing that bill, attempted to evade the question before the house.

The question was about to be put, when Mr. Stanford, having intimated his desire to speak on the question—

On motion, the house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 11.—Many petitions were presented and disposed of.

Mr. King, of N. C. submitted for consideration the following resolution, which lies on the table one day of course:

Resolved, That the rules of this house be so amended, that the commissioners of the navy board shall be admitted to seats within the hall of this house.

The bill from the senate concerning the convention between the United States and Great Britain ratified on the 23d day of December last, was taken up and read the first time.

The question being stated, "shall this bill pass?" After debate, it was resolved that it should be laid on the table.

The late debates, involving questions of high interest, as to the power and rights of the different branches of the government, have been very animated. It is probable we shall find ways and means to preserve some of the most important speeches.

The Chronicle.

Bad News.—It is stated that a Mexican gazette, of the 9th of November, gives an official statement of the defeat and capture of the patriot chieftain, Morelos, on the 4th of that month. Two pieces of cannon, many muskets and sabres, and all his booty and equipage, fell into the hands of the royalists, together with a considerable number of prisoners.

It is again reported that Carthagena has surrendered to the royalists. We trust, that like the many other former reports of the like nature, that it will prove a tory fabrication to prevent the forwarding of supplies to the brave garrison.

Emigration. Among the many great and useful men that daily arrive, or are expected to arrive, in the United States from maddened Europe, we hear of Chaptal, the famous chemist, and Lacapede, the celebrated naturalist. We bid them welcome.

Maryland Senator. It is not probable that a senator of the United States will be appointed by the legislature of this state at its present session. The senate, on Wednesday last, sent a message to the house of delegates, proposing to go into the election that day at 2 o'clock, but as upon "counting the noses" present it was found that the republicans would have a majority of one or two, owing to the absence, through indisposition, of two or three of the federal members, the house refused to have the joint ballot, 38 to 28. This affords the senate a precedent to refuse an invitation of the house, when the state of parties shall be otherwise, which will certainly be made use of.

Sugar. We learn from the colonies, that M. Dorian, a Frenchman, has made a brilliant fortune, by teaching the planters a new process more simple and profitable than any former one, for clarifying sugar cane syrup. His method consists in throwing into the copper, while the juice is in a state of ebullition, a certain quantity of the bark of the pyramidal elm, reduced to powder. So great has been the success of this process, that the sugar planters of Guadaloupe have given the inventor 100,000 francs, the planters of Martinique as much; and the English have purchased his secret for 400,000 francs.

Uniform mode of election.

The mean artifices and palpable frauds that have so frequently resulted from the want of a constitutional regulation as to the manner in which representatives to congress and electors of president and vice-president are chosen, ought long since to have excited every honest and reflecting politician to vigorous exertion to obtain a corrective, to secure to themselves and to the people at large, a real and absolute enjoyment of the right and influence of the elective franchise. Eight or nine years ago, I agitated this subject, and it has been more than once brought before congress, without success, and we jog on in the old way, "swindling and to swindle." The adoption of the excellent resolutions recently introduced into the house of representatives by Mr. Pickens, of North Carolina,* if ratified by the requisite number of states (as I feel certain that they would be, if submitted to the consideration of their several legislatures) might remove the evils complained of, and give to every minor section of the republic its due weight and effect in the government of the whole. Turn and twist these propositions as you please, there is no man who calculates upon carrying his point honestly that can object to them—for they bear equally and fairly upon every part and every party. The benefits that would arise from these amendments to the constitution are numerous and important, and they would do much to break down the clannish spirit that has always prevailed in several of the great states. "Brethren of the same principle," republican or federal, might thus meet together from the uttermost extremes of the union, and in free and friendly discussions as to the wants of those parts, the good of the whole would be better understood and promoted, and many heart-burnings be avoided. And then, the representatives or electors, coming more immediately from the people—selected and chosen by men personally acquainted with them, would not only be likely to be more competent to a faithful discharge of the high duties entrusted to them, but would also feel a greater degree of responsibility to act correctly. If it be otherwise, and matters are suffered to go on under the present vague and indefinite regulations, besides the moral evil and disregard of the voice of the people that prevails by the arbitrary rules laid down by managing legislators, constantly varying their mode as apparent policy requires, we shall have this result—state will be arrayed against state; and there will be no friendly intercourse or communion between the members of the several parts—each being elected by general tickets, or appointed in some other way to secure to the dominant party an exclusive vote on all occasions. Who can calculate the evils that will result from this? Who is willing to feed the jealousies that at present exist, and have their existence chiefly in the want of a more intimate knowledge of things as they really are? How much more conducive to the general harmony is it, that furious partizans on either side, should be scattered through the people, than be rallied at one point to make a centre for corruption! The getting up of the "infamous convention" is a remarkable case in point; had the high-toned folks of a single town been dispersed among even the people of the state in which it is situated, we should have escaped a mortifying disgrace. But the reason on this subject is too self-evident to employ my time in writing it down.

A late law of North Carolina provides for the election of president and vice-president by a general ticket, thus securing all the votes of that state to the republican candidates; and, in a little while, the same rule will be applied in most states (as it now is in several of them) to the election of members to congress. This is a natural consequence. The act of North Carolina, has been called "tyrannical and oppressive" by the minority in that state, and by those of the same political sentiment in others. But, before they find fault with it, they ought to look around them and see who begun or most stedfastly adhere to the principle of this matter; and to take care lest some of their friends do not go so far as to deprive the people altogether of the choice of electors—as will certainly be the case in Maryland, if the delegates from the counties continue to rule the state. We are governed by a minority, and that minority, in its legislative capacity, will take upon itself the appointment of persons for electors that a large majority of the freemen of the state would reject, if the choice depended upon a general ticket, as in North Carolina. These things are notorious.

But the legislature of North Carolina also brought forward the amendments to the constitution offered by Mr. Pickens. They did not pass the "objectionable" law because they thought it the most happy way to make a selection of electors, but as growing out of the necessity and right of things, as at present existing.

To do away all sorts of manœuvring, and give to every state, and every part of a state, and every party in the state, its full and legitimate influence in the high concerns of the government—to permit the people, with the least possible departure from the principle of the representative system to exercise their sovereign functions with effect—to allay state jealousies, by bringing together, in harmony, persons from all the states, discerning and mutually explaining the interests and desires of all—to consolidate and give energy to the union, while its parts are carefully guarded from encroachment and wrong—let the constitution be amended as required by these propositions, each state being divided into districts to elect one representative or one elector, and no more, with provisions to prevent arbitrary and unnecessary divisions of counties, and other frauds.

Cultivation of the Cane.

For several years after the close of the revolutionary war, in 1783, Cotton was imported into each of the United States, as a return cargo from the West.

*See last number, p. 345.

Indies and other foreign countries. In the year after the close of the war in 1815, a space of thirty-two years—we shall export and consume not less from 90 to 100 millions of pounds of cotton of domestic growth, worth from 25 to 30 millions of dollars.

Another revolution in commerce, not less astonishing than the preceding, is rapidly working its way; and sugar, molasses and rum, will soon be to the United States, what cotton now is. Louisiana will shortly supply more than our domestic wants require—and they are enormous, the luxury being so commonly indulged in. But only a small portion of this immensely valuable acquisition, fitted to the cultivation of the cane, is yet applied to the purpose; and I am told that there are lands belonging to the United States, destitute at this time of a solitary settler, so exceedingly well adapted to this luxurious product, that they will, of themselves, if duly appreciated and carefully managed, reimburse the whole cost of the state and territory, and pay the entire national debt, to boot! Plantations, calculated to raise the cane, are valued at from 3 to $500 per acre; and the cultivation of it is at this time, and for many years to come will be, to the American agriculturalist, more productive of gain than mines of gold. There is no body of men in the world that make money so rapidly as the sugar-planters of Louisiana—the duty on the foreign article is to them a profit equal almost to the original value of it in the West Indies.

But in Georgia, also, we have a grand resource.—It is no longer a matter of experiment whether the cane may be raised to advantage in this state. It is found that a very large district of country is adapted to its culture, and the sugar produced from it is of the very first quality, like that of Louisiana; and besides, as the lands are better cultivated, the climate will be improved. There seems no doubt, now, but that it will become a staple commodity; and the large quantity of labor that Georgia may immediately apply to it, will give it importance much sooner than may be expected.

A person might be looked upon as a sort of a madman who should say that, in 30 years hence, Europe will look to us for her great supply of sugar, &c.—We should regard him in the same manner that many were regarded who spoke thus of cotton 30 years ago. But I believe it will be the case, and I rejoice in the prospect; for every thing that tends to relieve my country of its dependence on others, is to me like the beams of the morning to the wearied traveller, who has wandered the night in search of a place of repose.

Letter to the Editor.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Ohio to the editor of the Weekly Register.

"I have been highly entertained with your letter to Cobbett. Your remarks upon the great influx of British goods, and the injury about to ensue to the tribe of shop-keepers, cut me to the quick. I had yielded to the project of tape-selling (in conjunction with a brother) and already feel conscious that I have let myself down not a little, in every respect. The prospect is really bad; but I chiefly regret that I should have descended from the dignified character of an independent American, to become the retailer of British gew-gaws. I shall get out of this predicament as soon as possible, even if it should be attended with loss."

The editor fears that the case of his correspondent is by no means singular. The rage for shop-keeping has prevailed to a very alarming extent, and its consequences will be fatal to thousands. The evil has been exceedingly provoked by the litters of banks that have sprung up in many parts of the country like mushrooms, and with little more substance than is possessed by that short-lived vegetable. The time must come, and seems close at hand, when a pressure will be felt in every part where those institutions abound, such as never before was experienced in America. If the approaching adversity shall teach us wisdom hereafter to check the issues of bank paper, and quiet the mania for banking establishments, perhaps the evil may have its corresponding good in future safety. During the war, the people, believing that the welfare of their country was connected with the suspension of specie payments by the banks, were content with a denial of it—but the time has nearly passed that this accommodating disposition can exist, and those institutions must make arrangements to recommence its issue, or be themselves torn to pieces. To do this they must get in much of the paper that they have so liberally distributed to the four corners of the United States; and then will the people call to mind the warning voice of governor Snyder, and esteem, as they ought, his noble exertions to secure his own state, at least, from the calamities that he saw would result from a wild system of banking.

Salaries

The following are the salaries of some of the principal officers in the government of the United States—

The president	$25,000
vice-president	5,000
chief justice	5,000
secretary of state	5,000
secretary of the treasury	5,000
secretary of war	4,500
secretary of the navy	4,500
attorney-general	3,000
comptroller of the treasury	3,500
treasurer	3,000
auditor of the treasury	3,000
register of the treasury	2,400
accountant of the war department	2,000
accountant of the navy department	2,000
postmaster-general	3,000
assistant postmaster general	1,700

Sixteen persons, receiving in all the sum of $57,600—equal to less than £13,000 sterling per annum, for filling and executing sixteen of the highest and most responsible offices in the republic!

There are, perhaps, thousands of individuals in the pay or support of the British government, who receive more than all these united; though the labor of an hundred such is not equal to that of one of them. And the salaries of the sixteen are incompetent to the support of one of the numerous scions of the "illustrious" house of the Guelphs, whose reputed forefather was a Dutchman, imported to fill an "usurped" throne—the "legitimate heir," in the mean time, being in exile, and depending on the bounty of foreigners for the bread on which he subsisted.

Far be it from me to wish to imitate the profligacy and profusion of the British, or any other despotic government—where the people being slaves, their masters suppose they may appropriate their earnings as they please. But my opinion is, that the salaries of our officers, in general, are a great deal too low. It is impossible for a man to live upon them, at Washington city, as a gentleman should live; for they are compelled to see much company, foreigners and others, and must keep up a certain stile in all the departments of their household, that runs away with large sums of money; and it is, therefore, indispensable that a person accepting one of the high offices, must either have a private fortune to apply to, or resort to speculations that he ought not to dabble with, to live decently. It should not be so. If a man of talents and respectability is expected to serve the public, he ought, at least, to be subsisted by it; and an increase of 50 per cent. on the present salaries would hardly be equivalent to the increased expences of their families and establishments—arising, as well from the higher prices of all the necessaries of life, as from the greater demands made upon their courtesy and hospitality by the accumulating population of the country, requiring the presence of more and more of the people at the seat of government, for various purposes.

Five thousand dollars seems a great sum. And so it may be to a man, who can live as he pleases.—Yet there are tens of thousands of shop-keepers and mechanics who make more than this per annum.—I do not mean clear money, for they, as well as the secretaries, &c. have to subsist their families out of it, pay house rent, &c. &c. But the man of private life has this advantage—he may live private, if he likes it or his situation demands it: but it is not so with public men—they must see company, they must entertain them on the best things to eat and to drink, cost what they may, and for this, they must keep many servants, &c. There is no way of avoiding it, unless by resigning all pretensions to what may be considered common decency.

The present moment, perhaps, is not the proper time to raise the salaries of these officers—let a year or two elapse, until we can get our finances a little better arranged and adjusted; but this appears to me very certain, that they ought to be raised, and that they must be raised, if we expect such men to accept of them as are fitted to perform their duties, and will perform them faithfully, without an eye to any thing else whereby to obtain a livelihood for themselves and their families.

The British Treaty.

FROM THE NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE.

Whilst this subject was under consideration in the senate, there were several points on which information was required from the treasury department, by the committee on foreign relations, as being intimately connected with the merits and bearing of the treaty. Not having room to publish the documents on the subject at length, we must endeavor to generalize them.

1. As to the quantity of cotton exported to the British dominions; in Europe, during the years of our commercial prosperity (on which article, be it borne in mind, a large discriminating duty was paid in Great Britain) it appeared that the quantity exported to those dominions, including England, Scotland, Ireland, Man and Berwick, was

From do. 1814 to do. 1815	44,973,255 lbs.

The last line, though nominally a year, of course, only embraced the time from the 17th February to the 30th September, during which six months, the export was enormous.

As to the tonnage of the United States, employed in foreign, coasting and fishing trades, it appeared there were employed in the Year.	Foreign Trade	Coasting.	Fishing.

1803, -	922,298	284,363	59,445
1806, -	1,044,005	286,909	66,367
1807, -	1,116,241	285,090	75,744

3. As to the exportations from the United States to the West India islands, it appeared there was exported to the following amount, in the years ending 30th September, 1807-'15:

British West Indies,	in 1807.	in 1815.
Domestic,	5,322,276	1,571,490
Foreign,	630,361	20,979
All other W. I. Islands,
Domestic,	9,025,497	7,204,993
Foreign,	16,004,300	1,263,555

4. As to the value of the goods imported in American and foreign vessels from the Cape of Good Hope, and places beyond the same, the duties thereon, from which an idea of the amount and value of the trade may be formed, were reported as follows:

In 1805, :	:	:	3,370,055
1807, :	:	:	3,980,686

No estimate given of the last year's duties could afford any criterion of the trade, and none therefore is given.

5. As to the duties on importations from the W. India Islands, it appeared that they were—

From	in 1805.	in 1806.	in 1807.
Br. W. Indies	1,864,119	2,360,665	1,949,679
Other W. Indies	7,257,525	7,731,855	8,666,526

There was also reported to the senate an abstract of "duties of customs paid in Great Britain in 1807 and 1815," distinguishing between the importation from foreign countries and from British colonies, and in British or foreign ships; whereby it clearly appears that the United States have gained to the merchants very greatly by the treaty, and of course have so far obtained an advantage to our own over foreign navigation.

Legislature of Indiana.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the Legislative Council
and of the House of Representatives.

The period of the meeting of the legislature of the territory has once more arrived; and it is with the most heartfelt satisfaction that I now congratulate you, that since your last meeting a bloody war has been terminated by an honorable peace; the blessings of which have been diffused and felt throughout our beloved country. We cannot be too grateful to that Providence, in whose hands are the destinies of nations, that he has blessed our efforts in a just and arduous struggle with a powerful and ambitious enemy, and finally crowned them with the most glorious success. This event has furnished a new era in our history, from which the most flattering presages may be drawn. It has taught us confidence in ourselves, and demonstrated the efficiency of a free government in war as well as in peace. These political blessings which are of a nature so interesting and important, were not obtained but at the expence of blood and treasure, and individual privation. These, however, are the natural concomitants of war, and should be cheerfully submitted to, in order to secure great national objects. In no section of the union is there more cause for rejoicing at the restoration of peace, than in this territory. A cruel and blood-thirsty enemy was kept der on our frontier, and whose mode of warfare is the indiscriminate murder of the infant, the aged, and the helpless part of the community, have agreed to bury the tomahawk, and once more live with us in the bands of friendship. From this event has flowed, and is still flowing, the most lasting benefit to our country. Our emigration which is rapidly populating our fertile lands, in a little time will enable us to be admitted into the political family of the union, as an independent state. Permit me to recommend to the legislature, the propriety as well justice of imposing as moderate taxes on the emigrants to this territory, as may be compatible to the public interest. Most of them have moved from a great distance, at a considerable expence. They have to encounter many difficulties in opening their farms for cultivation, before they can derive a support, much more a profit from them; and consequently their ability will be lessened, from contributing largely for a short time to the public exigencies. These circumstances are not unknown to you, gentlemen, and I make no doubt when you take up the subject of taxation, you will give them that consideration which their importance merits. The present seems to be a favorable time to turn your attention to the promotion of education, and the state of roads and highways. Both of these subjects have been already acted on. By revising them, a knowledge of their practical operation may demonstrate the necessity of making alterations and improvements that will be extensively useful.

A review of the territorial laws are highly necessary, and should be taken up as early in the session as possible. There has not been for some time any of the acts of 1808 or 1810 to distribute to justices of the peace, and others who are entitled to them. To free from their detached and deranged situation, the laws have become complicated and difficult to be searched out and properly understood. Every mode of prudence recommends an amendment to the militia system, so as to render it free from any unnecessary delay in its operation, and to secure by adequate punishments prompt obedience to such requisitions as emergencies may from time to time require.

I cannot close this communication, without expressing my confidence in a wise and honorable result to your deliberations, and assurances of the faithful zeal with which my co-operating duties will be discharged, invoking, at the same time, the blessings of Heaven on our beloved country.

THO. POSEY.

Jeffersonville, 1st, Dec. 1815.

Indiana Memorial.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled. The memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, assembled at the town of Corydon, in the year 1815, in behalf of their constituents, respectfully sheweth—

That whereas the ordinance of congress for the government of this territory has provided "That whenever there shall be sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, this territory shall be admitted into the union on an equal footing with the original states;" and whereas by a census taken by the authority of the Legislature of this territory, it appears from the returns that the number of free white inhabitants exceeds sixty thousand—we therefore pray the honorable senate and house of representatives, in congress assembled, to order an election, to be conducted agreeably to the existing laws of this territory, to be held in the several counties of this territory on the first Monday of May, 1816, for representatives to meet in convention, at the seat of government of this territory, the — day of — 1816, who when assembled, shall determine by a majority of the votes of all the members elected, whether it will be expedient, or inexpedient to go into a state government; and if it be determined expedient, the convention thus assembled shall have the power to form a constitution and frame of government; or if it be deemed inexpedient, to provide for the election of representatives to meet in convention, at some future period, to form a constitution. And whereas the people of this territory have made great sacrifices, by settling on the frontiers, where they have been exposed to dangers and hardships of almost every description, by which means the lands of the United States have been greatly increased in value, we feel confident that congress will be disposed to grant us seven per cent. on all monies received at any of the United States' land offices, from the 1st day of April, 1816, for lands already sold or hereafter to be sold, lying in this territory; such per centage to be at the disposal of this government, in such way as may be judged most conducive to the general welfare. It is expected by us that the general government will be disposed to confirm to us her grant of township No. 2, south of range 11, west of the second principal meridian, granted to the Indiana territory for the use of an academy; also, the reserved section 16, in that portion of the territory where the Indian title has already been extinguished, as well as that which may be hereafter purchased of the Indians, to be at the disposal of the future state for the use of schools; and it is further requested and expected; that all coal mines and salt licks which may be reserved by the United States, (with a sufficiency of land to work them to effect) will be granted to the future state, as well where the Indian title is relinquished as where it is not, as soon as said relinquishment is obtained by the United States. Furthermore, as it is conceived by us, that the promotion of useful knowledge is the best guarantee to our civil institutions, and as congress must know something of the difficulties of raising money in new countries for the use of universities, we think we do ourselves but justice in asking a reserve of one entire township, for the support of a college, to be located at some suitable place on the United States' lands in this territory. And whereas in the counties of Knox, Gibson and Clark, in said territory, a great quantity of the lands in said counties are claimed by private individuals, and confirmed to them by various laws of congress, which lands are so located that those counties will be deprived of the benefits from the 16th section, reserved by the laws of congress for the use of schools; it is therefore expected that congress will reserve an equivalent in lands for the use of schools in said counties, in proportion to the number of the 16th section now the property of individuals in said counties. As it deemed good policy that every state should have its seat of government as nearly central as the local situation of the country will permit, and as such site proper for the permanent seat is not at this time at the disposal of this territory or the general government, it is expected that congress will, whenever the Indian title shall be extinguished, grant us a township of six miles square, to be selected by such persons as the future state may appoint.

And whereas congress will receive the most correct information from this body to enable them to proportion the number of representatives to the convention in the different counties, we recommend the following, as proportioned to the census of each county, according to their present boundaries, to wit:

Wayne	4	Switzerland	1	Washington	5
Franklin	5	Jefferson	3	Harrison	4
Dearborn	3	Clark	5	Knox	5
Gibson	4	Posey	1	Warrick	1
Perry	1

And whereas the inhabitants of this territory are principally composed of emigrants from every part of the union, and as various in their customs and sentiments as in their persons. we think it prudent at this time to express to the general government our attachment to the fundamental principles of legislation, prescribed by congress in their ordinance for the government of this territory, particularly as respects personal freedom and involuntary servitude, and hope that that they may be continued as the basis of the constitution.

DENNIS PENNINGTON,

Speaker of the house of representatives

DAVID ROBB,

President of the legislative council.

Mississippi Territory.

Report of the committee of the house of representatives to whom was referred, on the 6th inst. the memorial of the legislature of the Mississippi territory, praying for admission into the union, as an independent state.

The committee to whom were referred, on the 6th instant, the memorial of the legislative council and house of representatives of the Mississippi territory, praying for the admission of said territory into the union as a state; and, on the 14th inst. the petitions of sundry inhabitants east of Pearl river in the same territory, praying that provision may be made for taking a census of its citizens previous to such admission, respectfully submit the following report:

By the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the state of Georgia, it is provided, "That the territory thus ceded, (now Mississippi territory) shall form a state, and be admitted as such into the union, as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, or at an earlier period, if congress shall think it expedient, on the same conditions and restrictions, with the same privileges, and in the same manner, as is provided in the ordinance of congress, of the 13th day of July, 1787, for the government of the western territory of the United States, which ordinance shall, in all its parts, extend to the territory contained in the present act of cession, that article only excepted which forbids slavery."

The memorialists, after stating the number of persons taken under the last general census, which was forty thousand three hundred and fifty-two of all descriptions, and adverting to the accession of population produced by the annexation of a part of West Florida, and by subsequent emigrations, conclude, that the territory contained at that time (December, 1814) the number required by the agreement referred to above, to entitle it to admission on an equal footing with the original states.—As this, however, was a matter of conjecture and uncertainty, they solicit admission as an act of courtesy on the part of the United States.

Your committee possess no means of forming any thing like a satisfactory estimate of the present population of the territory in question; but they conceive that, unless it be the determination of congress to defer its admission until it can be claimed in strict conformity to the compact with Georgia, there is no good reason for a further delay on the score of a deficiency of numbers, as such deficiency, if now questionable, will not probably much longer exist. Without taking into consideration the recent settlers, who are subject to the late proclamation under the "act to prevent settlement being made," &c. the presumption is not unreasonable that, if any considerable part of the lands obtained from the Creeks, is prepared for a legal settlement within the time contemplated, the territory will contain more than the number required, before it can be finally erected into a state.

It is known to your committee that the consent of Georgia to a division of this territory, has been asked and obtained, and should it be divided before it is admitted, the admission of either part would, from a want of numbers, be subject to additional objection and further delay.

But doubts may be entertained, whether the territory can, with strict propriety, be divided, without the consent of its inhabitants, as well as that of Georgia and of the United States. Although the people of the territory had no agency in the agreement above quoted, they were the object of it, and as such, became a third party to it, and vested by it of a right which is explicitly defined. This agreement provides "that the territory thus ceded, shall form a state, (not one or more states) and shall be admitted as such into the union, as soon as it shall contain 60,000 free inhabitants." If, then, admission shall be deferred, in consequence of division, the expectation of the inhabitants will be disappointed, and their right impaired. It is chiefly to avoid such a result that your committee have declined recommending a division of the territory, which otherwise might be expedient to lessen the inconveniences which, with or without division, the local government will, for a long time, at least, have to sustain.

In relation to the simple question of admission, as presented by the memorialists, precedents are not wanting, either to encourage their application, or to grant their request. The state of Ohio was admitted before it possessed the number which the ordinance required, and Louisiana did not come in as to time or numbers, in virtue of a strict and insuperable claim. It is not improbable that the Mississippi territory may contain, at this time, a greater population than either of those states did when they were admitted; and it is believed, that its state of political minority and probation, has been of longer duration than that of any of the adopted states.—If, then, after fifteen years of restraint, the people of this country should evince even an impatient desire for enlargement, it is but just to ascribe it to that sense of independence which is common to the nation, and which should be rather encouraged than depressed. It is a policy worthy of a government, which is constituted and maintained by the public will, to foster, throughout the union, those feelings which give energy to the national character, and to extend to every portion of it those rights which conduce to the general good. Nor could a period more propitious to these ends be selected than the present, when all American citizens have new cause to approve of their principles, to confide in their institutions, and to be proud of their name.

So far, your committee have considered this subject, as though an immediate admission of the terterritory were desired by all the inhabitants; but they are not prepared to say that such is the fact.—Whilst it is true that such admission has been repeatedly solicited, for a succession of years; it is also true that about four years ago, a small minority of the representative branch of the territorial legislature protested against it; and that about a year thereafter, a considerable number of the people themselves petitioned that all proceedings in congress, on the subject, might be postponed. It was on these two occasions, only, as your committee believe, that any indisposition to a state government has been expressed to a national legislature, by any of the people of the territory, or of their representatives in their behalf. Nor is it understood or believed that the reluctance manifested by a portion of those people, arose from a want of a due and equal appreciation of the rights and advantages of an independent state. The causes of opposition, so far as any opposition has been shown, seem to have been, in part, an unwillingness to incur additional expense in supporting a state government, whilst under a peculiar pressure from the war; but chiefly, an apprehension that a state government, with its inseparable appendage, a federal district court, would be immediately followed by a great number of expensive and dangerous, if not ruinous law suits for lands, which would grow out of (what are called) the Yazoo and British claims: The war however, is now at an end, and the Yazoo claims may be considered as quieted; but the British claims still exist, and constitute the subject of several petitions now before congress, on which it is not the province of your committee to speak.

The petitions of sundry inhabitants east of Pearl river, in the same territory, which also have been referred to your committee, as having relation to the question which has been considered, state that the eastern parts of said territory have not an equal share of representation with the western, in the territorial legislature, suggest an apprehension that such inequality may continue under a state government—and pray that provision may be made for taking a census of the people of the territory, for the purpose of securing to all a representation according to numbers and equal rights. If the interposition of congress be necessary to effect what the petitioners have principally in view, namely, a fair representation in the convention which will be elected to form a constitution, some general provision to this end will properly belong to the act authorizing the convention to be chosen; and should it, nevertheless, afterwards appear, to the satisfaction of congress, that any part of the territory has not had its due proportion of representation in such convention, they will, no doubt, use the corrective which they possess, in rejecting the constitution which may be formed.

Upon a full view of the whole subject which has been referred to the consideration of your committee, they are of opinion, that it is expedient to admit the Mississippi territory into the union as prayed for by the memorialists, and have prepared a bill for this purpose, which they ask leave to report,

The Ways and Means.

Report of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the House of Representatives, to whom was committed so much of the President's Message as relates to revenue.

January 9, 1816.—Read and committed to a committee of the whole house.]

The committee of ways and means, to whom have been committed that part of the president's message which relates to the revenue, and the annual report of the secretary of the treasury, excepting that part which relates to the establishment of a bank, ask leave to explain the general views which have induced them to submit to the house the propositions with which they shall conclude their report:

"The arrangement of the finances with a view to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent peace establishment," has been the first subject after providing for the deficiency in the appropriations of 1815, which has engaged the attention of the committee. Whilst they recognize, with unmixed satisfaction, "that improvement in the condition of the public revenue, which will allow an immediate alleviation of the burthens imposed by the necessities of the war," they well know that such an alleviation can only be expected and wished to an extent "which shall leave to the government the means of maintaining its faith inviolate, and of procuring successfully the measures of a liberal" and provident policy.

In forming an opinion upon the expenditures of a permanent peace establishment, they have supposed it right that their attention should be directed, not only to the resources of the United States, but to the condition of other powers. In the perplexed system of European policy, the United States can have no disposition to interpose; but their conduct must necessarily be affected by views connected with the military or financial resources of those states with which their relations are most interesting. It is impossible not to see that Europe is more military than ever, and that, accustomed by twenty years of war to exertions that were once thought impracticable, her governments have acquired a power which makes preparation more difficult and more necessary, on the part of every state exposed to the chance of their hostility. It must be doubtful what precise increase of expenditure these considerations of foreign policy or views of internal improvement may induce congress eventually to authorize; but even the measures now before them appear to require a considerable addition to the estimates of the annual peace expenditure.

The only preparation against the dangers of foreign aggression, which it falls within the duties of the committee of ways and means to recommend, is that of a revenue; which, in supplying the wants of the government, shall not burthen unnecessarily the industry of the citizen; which shall be capable of repairing, by an expansion of the powers of some of its parts, the injuries which war may inflict in others; and above all, shall be disencumbered from debt as soon as the resources of the country and the conditions of its contracts will permit. Public debts have indeed sometimes been considered as giving stability and order to a state, but the committee can never believe that a government which secures every civil and political right to the great body of the people, can want that security which would be afforded by the distribution of any amount of annual interest upon its debt, which to be received by the few must be paid by the many. It may be true, that a public debt only makes a different distribution of the income of society, but it pays the stockholder what should be reserved for supporting the seaman and soldier. That government indeed does well, which, when forced into war, brings into the contest every resource which credit or revenue can furnish; but it neglects one of its first duties, when it allows the season of peace to pass away without an adequate provision for pe-moving every incumbrance upon its effective revenue. The committee accordingly consider it as an indispensable requisite in any arrangement of revenue and expenditure in peace, that it shall provide for the rapid extinguishment of the public debt.

To obtain this object, a considerable revenue will be required. In selecting the taxes which should compose it, the duties upon imported articles may be expected to furnish the principal supply. Cheap and easy in their collection, paid like all indirect taxes, when it is convenient to pay them, they will be found, under a system of prudent moderation, to discourage no branch of national industry. Duties, indeed, either upon importation or exportation, seem to be the natural resource of countries thinly peopled; which, exporting a large amount of their agricultural productions, receive in return the manufactures of older states. The distance too, of the states from which our importations are made, renders it more difficult to evade the payment of duties here than in countries which are separated from active and enterprising neighbors by a river or a conventional line. But as our agriculture obtains markets at home, as wealth spreads itself over inland countries, where commerce can but imperfectly follow, our imports as well as our exports, must bear a continually lessening proportion to the wealth of the country.

And even now, while the principal source of ordinary revenue in peace must be furnished by the customs, it is probable that they could not be continued or increased to an amount which the interest and reimbursement of our debt and the provisions for our security require, without increasing too far the temptation to illicit importation. The objections too, to an entire reliance upon them, have been too fully developed by recent experience to allow the committee to recommend that they should constitute the whole income of the country. The liberal provision which they are capable of making in peace, disappears in the moment when war requires larger contributions. The government which is left at such a time to explore new systems of internal taxation, to discover and draw into the public service the men who are capable of filling the different departments of the revenue, is reduced to a condition in which the zeal and bravery and resources of the nation can produce their natural effects but imperfectly. The committee therefore concur fully with the secretary of the treasury in the opinion which he has expressed, "that the establishment of a revenue system, which shall not be exclusively dependent upon the supplies of foreign commerce, appears, at this juncture, to claim particular attention."

As a result of these general views, the committee, with reference to the house, recommend the adoption of the plan of revenue contained in the report of the secretary of the treasury, with the exception of that part of it which proposes to continue the additional duties upon postage, and to repeal the additional duties on licences to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise imposed by the act of December, 1814. The communication of intelligence between the different parts of the country, it appears to the committee to be the just policy of our government to facilitate and encourage; and although it might have been right to exact a revenue from it, under circumstances which made it necessary to apply every resource to the defence of the state, the present situation of the treasury may well allow of its repeal. The duties on licences to retailers admit, in the opinion of the committee, of a modification, which, by proportioning the price of the license in some degree to the business of the retailer, shall render them as productive as the new rates, and less oppressive than the old ones. But as such modification could only apply to licences for 1817, the committee propose to make it the subject of a future report.

The permanent laws now in force may be expected, after the expiration of temporary duties, to produce a nett annual revenue of $25,278,840.

The direct tax, a nett amount of	3,600,000
The sale of public lands,	1,000,000
Licences to distillers, gross amount,	1,200,000
Carriages,	175,000
Licences to retailers,	900,000
Auctions,	400,000
	2,675,000	2,514,500 n amt.
Duties on furniture and watches,	300,000
On manufactures,	1,311,000
Excise on distilled spirits,	2,500,000
	4,111,000	3,864,340 n amt.
Postage,	300,000
Customs,	12,000,000
		25,278,840

Such is the estimate of the annual revenue which by law is declared to be pledged "to provide for the payment of the expences of government, for the punctual payment of the public debt, and for creating an adequate sinking fund." If the recommendation contained in the report of the secretary with the modifications proposed by the committee, shall be carried into effect, there will be deducted from this revenue of $25,278,840

The nett amount of duties on furniture and watches, on manufactures and distilled spirits	3,864,340
The postage duty,	300,000
And from the nett product of the land tax	2,900,000
	7,064,340

But there will be added to the revenue:

By the additional duty on stills,	1,200,000
The duty on stamps,	400,000
On refined sugar,	150,000
On salt,	500,000

Gross amount,	2,250,000
Nett amount,	2,115,000
By an addition to the customs equal to the product of an average addition of 42 per ct. to the rates of permanent duty,	5,040,000
	7,155,000

Making the excess of revenue added, above that deducted, 90,660

And the annual revenue, 25,369,500
In the report of the secretary of the treasury, which has been referred to the committee—

The amount of the annual civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses is estimated at $1,800,000
 The annual military expenses, at 5,112,159
 The annual naval expense, at 2,716,510
 The interest on the funded debt, at about 6,150,000

To this estimate of annual expenditure might be added the amount of about $1,350,000, appropriated to the payment of the principal of the public debt; which, with the $6,156,000 applicable to the payment of the interest, constitutes the sinking fund of $8,000,000. But perhaps an easier view of the subject may be afforded by stating separately the whole sum which it is proposed to apply to the payment of the principal of the public debt, exclusively of the interest.

If the annual revenue, under the law proposed, be $25,369,500, and the ordinary annual expense be $15,778,669, there will be a balance of $9,590,831 dollars, which may be applied, as congress shall direct, to national defence, to internal improvement, and to the extinguishment of the public debt. The considerations which have been already adverted to as enjoining the policy of providing for the extinguishment of the public debt as soon as the resources of the country and the conditions of its contracts will permit, induce the committee to propose that to that object may be annually appropriated seven millions, after the year 1816; which, added to the sum appropriated to the payment of interest, will form a sinking fund of $13,150,000, and extinguish the public debt in less than twelve years. This appropriation would still leave an excess of annual revenue above the estimates of ordinary expenditure furnished by the secretary of the treasury of upwards of two millions and a half, to be applied to any other branch of the public service.

The committee have confined their observations to the receipts and expenditures of a permanent peace establishment. The modification of the plan of the secretary of the treasury which they have proposed, will produce too small an effect upon the receipts of 1816 to require a distinct exposition of them, and the deficiency in the receipts of 1816 (which is suggested in the treasury report,) cannot disturb the calculations which have been submitted of the receipts and expenditures of succeeding years, since the estimated deficiency is less than seven millions, and the outstanding revenue on the 1st of January, 1817, will be about twenty millions. If, however, the demands upon the treasury in 1817, in consequence of congress assuming the payment of expenses incurred during war which it has not yet sanctioned, or from any other cause shall be increased beyond the present estimates or beyond an amount for which the unappropriated revenue may provide, the sinking fund may be charged for the year 1817, with the payment of the treasury notes which may be issued under the laws now in force. In preventing an addition of new funded debt, it will perform its office as usefully as in extinguishing the old debt.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force until the 30th day of June next, and until an act shall be passed establishing a new tariff of duties, the act entitled "an act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandize, imported from any foreign port or place, and for other purposes," passed on the 1st July, 1812.
2. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act entitled "an act laying a duty on imported salt; granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" passed on the 29th July, 1813.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act entitled "an act laying duties on sugar refined within the United States;" passed on the 24th July, 1813.
4. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act entitled "an act laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies; on notes, bonds, and obligations discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies; and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions;" passed on the 2d of August, 1813—and also the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 10th day of December, 1814.
5. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal, from the day of next, so much of the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by duties on sales at auction, and on licenses to retail wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize, and for increasing the rates of postage," passed on the 23d of December, 1814, as imposes additional duties on postage.
6. Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th January, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied for the year 1816, and succeeding years, to three millions; and also so to amend the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government, and maintaining the public credit by laying a direct tax upon the District of Columbia," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied therein, annually, to 9999 20-100.
7. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties or spirits distilled within the United States and territories thereof, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors," passed on the 21st of December, 1814, excepting only the 16th, 18th 19th and 24th sections thereof, from and after the 1st day of April next, and from the same day to add 100 per cent. to the amount of the duty which all stills now subject to duty are liable to pay.
8. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal, from and after the 18th day of April next, the act entitled "an act to provide addition revenues for defying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares and merchandise, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 18th of January, 1815, and also the act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on gold, silver and plated ware, and jewelry, and paste work, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 18th of January, 1815, from the same day.
9. Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture, and on gold and silver watches," passed on the 18th of January, 1815.

10. Resolved, That it expedient so to amend the rates of duties upon imported articles, after the 30th of June next, as that they shall be estimated to produce an amount equal to that which would be produced by an average addition of 42 per cent. to the permanent rates of duties.

11. Resolved, That the deficiency arising from the reduction or abolition of any of the duties heretofore pledged by law for the support of the government, for the payment of the public debt, and the establishment of a sinking fund, shall be supplied by appropriating to those objects, a sufficient amount from the product of the taxes or duties proposed to be continued or increased.

12. Resolved, That it is expedient that from and after the year 1816, an addition shall be made to the sum of 8,000,000 of dollars, now annually appropriated for the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt, so as to make the whole sum to be appropriated annually to that purpose, 13,500,000 dollars.

Treasury Estimates for 1816.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of the treasury to the speaker of the house of representatives :

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 2, 1816.

SIR—I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the house of representatives, an estimate of the appropriations proposed for the service of the year 1816, amounting in the whole, to the sum of nineteen millions nine hundred and fifteen thousand four hundred and thirty-one dollars and forty-five cents. There having been already appropriated, by the act of the 21st of December last, the sum of nine millions eight hundred and eighty-five thousand three hundred and seventy-two dollars, for certain military expenses, there will be left the sum of ten millions and thirty thousand and fifty-nine dollars forty-five cents, under the following heads, viz :

For the civil list,	901,612 34
For miscellaneous expenses,	573,071 11
For the expenses of intercourse with foreign nations,	261,000 00
For the military establishment, including the Indian department,	14,541,677
From which, deducting the amount appropriated by the act of the 21st Dec. 1815,	9,885,372
There is left the sum of	4,656,305 00
For the naval establishment, including the marine corps,	3,638,071 00
	10,039,050 45

The funds out of which the appropriations for the year 1816 may be discharged, are the following :

1. The sum of 600,000 dollars, annually reserved by the act of the 4th of August, 1790, out of the duties of customs, towards the expenses of government.

2. The proceeds of the stamp duties and the duty on sugar refined within the United States.

3. The surplus which may remain of the customs, the direct tax, and the internal duties, (other than those on refined sugar and on stamps) after satisfying the payments for which they are pledged and appropriated.

4. The proceeds of such loans as may be made under the unexecuted authority, contained in the acts of the 14th of March, 1812; the 24th of March and 15th November, 1814; and the 3d March, 1815; and of the issues of treasury notes, under the unexecuted authority contained in the act of the 24th of February, 1815.

5. Any other unappropriated monies which may come into the treasury during the year 1816.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

The honorable the speaker of the house of representatives.

Canadian Volunteers.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled. The memorial of Abraham Markle, Gideon Frisbie, and their associates,* respectively sheweth:—

That your memorialists, at the commencement of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, were inhabitants of Upper Canada, in the British dominions, whither they had previously migrated from the United States. That at an early period of the contest they were called upon to take up arms against their former countrymen and brethren, who composed the army of the United States: That this call they were bound to obey, while they continued to enjoy the protection of, and to acknowledge allegiance to the government of Great Britain: That their early prejudice—their native feelings and affections for the soil and the clime that gave them birth, finally determined them to dissolve their connection with their adopted government: That inspired by this determination, general Hull's proclamation was the welcome signal for some, and the subsequent invasion by general Dearborn for others, of your memorialists to join the American standard: That in consequence of this their devotion to the cause of the United States, their families, which were left in the enemy's territory, were long exposed to the most humiliating privations and distresses, and were finally driven out of the province: That the property of your memorialists was confiscated by the British government, leaving them destitute of all support but that which they derived from their pay in the service of the United States; and some of your memorialists possessed large and ample estates, with all the means of enjoyment that could render life happy and desirable: That the termination of the war threw them out of service and employment, many of them being entirely destitute of the means of subsistence, save their industry and enterprise: That since the termination of the war, they have had and still have to encounter many embarrassments arising out of the peculiarity of their situation—a situation more easily felt than described.

In this state of things, what remains for your memorialists, but to throw themselves upon the justice and magnanimity of the United States, in congress assembled? This they have determined to do; in full confidence that their claims are too just to be rejected; and that they will find an advocate in the breast of every member; especially when the in-

The "Canadian volunteers," headed by the gallant col. Wilcocks, who was killed in one of our battles on the Niagara, in all of which he and his hardy band participated to the very cannon's mouth. We trust that the representatives of a grateful people will reward their valor, and indemnify their sufferings, as far as in their power lies.

Inducements held out to your memorialists by the proclamation of general Hull are recollected—and how powerfully such inducements were calculated to seize upon the feelings of native Americans, who, though they had changed their government, could not for that reason stifle the voice of nature, and steel their hearts to their ties of consanguinity, and the irresistible impulse which the love of country never fails to produce.

Your memorialists pray, therefore, that in consideration of their suffering and services in your cause, the necessary evidence of which will be laid before your honorable body, that your honorable body would grant them a tract of land, in the Indiana territory, lately purchased of the Indians by general Harrison, on the part of the United States, on which to settle for the remainder of their lives; the grant to be to each applicant in proportion to his losses.

Your memorialists are aware that with superficial observers, their conduct in abandoning their adopted for their native country, in the late contest, may wear the appearance of bad faith. But from every age, both in ancient and modern history, examples may be derived to sanction their preference: And without aiming to bias the decision of the representatives of a free and independent people, they feel emboldened to say, that if the loyalists in the American revolution were munificently rewarded by the crown of Great Britain, for aiding a wicked attempt to enslave their native country; your memorialists may well claim remuneration from that country for attempting, at the sacrifice of all their property and enjoyments in a foreign land, to extend the empire of its free and benevolent institutions, and promote its prosperity and glory.

The Mint Establishment.

Report of the Director to the President of the United States.

MINT OF THE U. STATES, JAN. 1, 1816.

SIR—I have the honor, at this time, of laying before you, a report of the operations of the mint, during the last year.

From the statement of the treasurer, herewith transmitted, it will appear, that during that period there have been struck at the mint—

In gold coins, 635 pieces, amounting to 3,175 dollars:

In silver coins, 69,232 pieces, amounting to 17,308 dollars, making in the whole 69,867 pieces, amounting to 20,483 dollars.

The high price of gold and silver bullion, for some time past, in the current paper money of the country, has prevented, and as long as this shall continue to be the case, must necessarily prevent deposits of these metals being made for coinage, to any considerable amount. But a fresh supply of copper having lately been received at the mint, we have again resumed the coinage of cents; and it is believed that we shall, in the course of the year, should no failure in the expected supply of copper take place, be fully able to coin fifty tons weight, amounting to nearly 47,000 dollars; and that with a regular supply of copper, which can readily be procured on terms highly advantageous to government, we can continue to coin fifty tons per annum, as long as it may be judged expedient.

The circulation of these copper coins, and of those heretofore issued, from the mint, (amounting to 251,646 dollars) and which be still nearly all in the country, would, it is presumed, soon supply, in a great measure, the place of the small silver coins, which have now almost totally disappeared.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the greatest respect and esteem, your most obedient servant,

R. PATTERSON.

JAMES MADISON,

President of the United States.

Legislature of Virginia.

December 29, 1814. The speaker laid before the house the following communication from the governor:

COUNCIL CHAMBER, Dec. 30, 1815.

Fellow citizens of the house of delegates,

In compliance with your resolution of the 11th inst. I have the honor to transmit the enclosed report from the auditor. It will be observed, that this account only includes money actually paid; the unsettled accounts will be added as soon as they are adjusted. The supplies of munitions of war furnished by the state, are not charged by the auditor but are carried into the account with the United States. The interest paid by the state upon the money borrowed and applied to the prosecution of the war, is not included in the enclosed statement; it will be charged, and I have no doubt will be reimbursed by the United States.

[The accompanying statement shews, that since the commencement of the last war, Virginia has borrowed $1,756,200, of which $730,000 has been extinguished—leaving 976,200 still unpaid—of this 220,000 is to be reimbursed to the Farmers' Bank, out of the first monies received into the treasury, in the mean time, to be at 7 per cent. interest—the balance of the debt is not reimbursable, but after long periods, viz: 350,000 (to the Virginia Bank at 7 per cent.) on the 29th March, 1829—400,000 (to the Farmer's Bank at 7 per cent) on 1st May 1827—and 6,200 (to the Literary Fund, at 8 per cent) 14th Feb. 1830.]

Legislature of South Carolina.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives,

FELLOW CITIZENS,—The circumstances which affect our beloved country, and those portions of the society of man with which our commercial interest must closely connect us, are so greatly changed since your last session, that our nation, then selected by a powerful and enraged enemy, as the object of vengeance and punishment, now finds itself, after a great and successful struggle, enjoying the only desirable situation of all that great community of states. The influences of an honorable peace pervade our whole country: the expences, or ravages of a cruel and frightful war oppress those who were then either careless of our fate or solicitous of our ruin. The ministers of England, finding its immense and victorious armies disposable by the peace of Paris, and estimating our strength as they would that of a power of the old world, by the number of our army, ordered, confident of success, the conflagration of our cities, the spoils of our land, and without doubt expected, as sanguinely as they wished the overthrow of our government; yet the republic stands erect under the laurels of a glorious war, and encircled with a character, now become valuable to us, diffuses happiness within, and presents on our immense borders, for the purposes of defence, all the stability and firmness of the mountain adamant. The distinguished valor and good conduct of the army, the wonderful successful resistance of the militia on land, the brilliant and continued series of victories on the ocean, above all, the termination of hostilities, at the precise moment most honorable and advantageous, establishing and building upon our happy and free institutions, prostrating equally the hopes of the open enemy and the secret traitor, all make us the favored people of God, and command our most devout gratitude.

This development of our resources, under circumstances which threatened their destruction, has given so much importance to our national character abroad, as justifies the hope of security against a repetition of similar wrongs and injuries, as those which induced the war, and in that light alone, gives inestimable importance to its successes. The brave men who have bled—the widows and orphans of those who have died in such a conflict, ought not to be disappointed of their country's bounty—such as belong to the state of South Carolina, I present, not to your justice, but to your generosity.

Such acts of the last session as depended on the executive for execution, were immediately after its close commenced; those which were not arrested by the termination of hostilities, have been completed.

A system for recruiting the brigade of state troops was early devised, inspectors appointed and advances made to them for the recruiting service, the balances of which have been all paid into the treasury. The service of the brigade was offered to the United States, and accepted by the president.

A consultation was held with major-general Thomas Pinckney, commanding the United States sixth military district, in relation to the most advantageous points to be fortified for the defence of our maritime frontier; these were reconnoitred by the executive, in person, and on such as were found to embrace the advantages expected, substituting others for those which did not, works were either begun, or preparations made for them, which would have, as far as practicable, secured the objects of the legislature, within a very limited period, and at a cost much under the appropriations made; this last circumstance however, is to be wholly attributed to the meritorious and patriotic dispositions which influenced the citizens within the neighborhood of those works—a gratuitous contribution of labour, more than sufficient for their completion, was made by them—disbursements of the funds appropriated, were therefore necessary only for engineers and munitions.

It affords the highest gratification to recollect what were the dispositions, not only of those neighborhoods, but of all the citizens of this state, with whom the executive had occasion to be engaged, during that period which threatened so eminently to try the souls of men. The measures which were secretly prepared, or in train, for the defence of the state, depended much, for execution, on the disposition of the citizens; for although the physical force necessary was at his control, the means of subsistence, without arbitrary execution, were not. It is now believed no evil would have resulted from such a circumstance before the legislature could have been convened, for such were the zeal and determination every where to defend the state—the zealous and patriotic—the sober minded and virtuous—all the citizens with whom he communicated on the subject, offered to throw open their barns and store-houses for the maintenance of the forces, and pledged themselves to support the most energetic measures that should be adopted.

The exertions made by the citizens of Charleston and its vicinity, for the defence of that place, were of the first order. The proof of this is to be seen in the substantial works completed, at and near it. The preservation of such monuments of faithfulness to the government and love to the country, is greatly to be desired, if only for example, and cannot fail to engage your attention. Such a people, so maintaining the measures of war, need no exhortations to the correct observance of the relations of peace.

Of the appropriation voted for arms and munitions, a small part only has been expended. The contracts which were made, prior to the close of the war, for articles chargeable on that fund, were not interfered with; much the greatest amount of these are not perishable—those about which we were only in treaty, were immediately given up. Although a much larger number of muskets and bayonets ought to be in the hands of the militia than are, the circumstances which induced such liberal grants of money, for these objects, ceasing to operate, it was considered proper, that those funds should not be expended under the altered state of things, but remain in the treasury, subject to such an application as the legislature might make. Whether these funds ought now to be appropriated for the same objects, or applied for others, in relief of the citizen from the temporary heavy contributions induced by the war, is with you to determine.

[A paragraph or two of a local nature is here omitted.]

A variety of expences have been incurred and paid by the state, during the late war, which, of right, ought to be discharged by the United States. State property, also, to a considerable amount, has been injured, or destroyed, in the service of the United States. Such arms and equipments as our laws require the militia should be furnished with, and which had been issued to them, while in the service of the United States, were ordered to be received into our arsenals, although injured, and a critical account of the damage taken; such as were not required by law, but loaned to the officer of the United States, commanding within the state, were ordered not to be received, having been injured, on the presumption that the United States would return an equivalent in kind. The will of the legislature, when expressed, on these subjects, shall be attended to.

The situation of that portion of territory which lies within the chartered limits of the state, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, claims the interference of the legislature. The Indians, claiming these lands, have long since retired from them, and having ceased to guard them from intruders, fugitives from justice, and others, without even the pretence of right, are daily settling on them. The laws of the United States authorize the president to remove such intruders by force of arms, but this being neglected, the most serious inconvenience is likely to result, and which will not fail to be increased, in proportion as the time is prolonged, before those who have already settled shall be removed, and others prevented from like intrusion.

The law as declared and enforced (it has, without doubt, been correctly declared) on the subject of libel, calls for the immediate interposition of the legislature. If it may be questioned whether the circumstances of an American citizen and a British subject, can be so precisely similar, as to make that law expedient for the former, which governs the latter; how much more is to be doubted that the same principle which protects British rulers, advances the interest of a freeman of South-Carolina. However, the corruptions of an old government may warrant the doctrine, "the greater the truth the greater the libel," it is not therefore less at variance with our institutions, or abhorrent to our principles. Not merely the licentiousness of the press has been curbed, but its valuable freedom and vital spirit threatened.

Whether in a government of law any appeal from its sentence should be admitted, have been questioned by some of the most illustrious men who have preceded us. If the wisdom of the legislature shall decide that the power to pardon shall still be exercised, the mode, and by whom, is entitled to much consideration—so great a power should surely be exercised by more than one individual, while the best and worst passions of the human heart conspire to deceive him.

Among the variety of objects which require your care and watchfulness, there are none which present themselves with more certain proofs of usefulness, than the literary institution at this place, and the free-school establishment throughout the state. The importance of the former every year presses itself on you; and is already so evident a conductor to mutual confidence and affection, between the different parts of the state, its prosperity cannot be guarded with too much anxiety. The latter is only less gratifying in its progress, because there is less experience in its management; it must continue as it has lately proved, a blessing to thousands—with its experience will increase the improvement of the system and the administration of it. Whether it be expedient to vest in the commissioners, the power to put to school poor children without the consent of such parents as are as unwilling as they are unable to educate them—also to select from such as they may educate, a certain number, distinguished by their endowment and superiority of intellect, as fit subjects for a course of collegiate study, is submitted for your consideration. The success of these objects of legislative munificence is a powerful incentive to the commencement of others. The state of our roads, bridges, and inland navigation, justly press on the attention of the constituted authorities. That which has been already done to accelerate the march of the human mind, has enlarged the sphere for the operation of moral principles within the state, and exalted its character without; an exertion of the same liberality, for the improvement of these last, will not only more than compensate your constituents for the disbursements that may be made on them, by the economy of transportation, but will establish for yourselves, in a career of usefulness, a virtuous and imperishable fame.

The unexpected revolutions which restored a Bourbon and a Bonaparte to the throne of France, and the yet more portentous last restoration of Louis XVIIIth, have opened a great and awful era for the contemplation of statesmen. If in these mighty struggles of the old world, our rights shall remain respected, we shall be no otherwise affected, than as our indignation may be excited, by the injustice and tyranny that have and may develop themselves, to interfere with the internal concerns of an independent nation, by attempts to force on it a particular ruler; or our sympathies enlisted by the noble struggle that must ensue, of a brave and intelligent people to resist the tyranny.

The events of a long series of years shew, that with the improvements in political science, and enlargement of the rights of the people, have increased the corruptions of arbitrary governments. Whether this process will be continued until in the course of things, the governments not founded on the rights of the people, will be dissolved by their own defects, and will be assimilated to ours, or, on their ultimate success in the present conflict, ours be degenerated to theirs, remains to be seen. While these are uncertain, the means best calculated to defend our rights and maintain our independence, are the legitimate objects of legislation. Into this consideration, the state of the militia must enter.—The events of the late war impress the most valuable instruction in relation, not only to its real worth and the degree of reliance to be placed in it, but also to the defects of its system. It will be indeed fortunate for succeeding generations if they who are most dependent on it, do not fail to give to it all the improvement of which it is susceptible. To this subject, concerning which a communication more in detail will be hereafter submitted, your earnest attention is invited, as one of the most important duties confided to you by the good people of this state.

DAVID R. WILLIAMS,

Columbia, 28th Nov. 1815.

Astonishing Modesty!

FROM BUENOS AYRES.

To the editors of the American.

Copy of a Memorial presented to his excellency, the Supreme Director of Buenos Ayres, on the 30th day of September 1815.

D.—, a native of the United States of America, and an adopted citizen of Buenos Ayres, begs leave to inform your excellency, that it is now two and a half years, in which nearly all the foreign correspondence entering the port of Buenos Ayres has been subject to the control of the British commanding officer, for the time being; and it is nearly as long a time that the citizens of the United States resident here have been basely robbed of their letters and newspapers, under the pretence, that a right for doing so was given by the war, in which the United States and Great Britain were engaged.

Many and repeated remonstrances against such acts were made to the late directors, Posadas and Alvear, by the consul and citizens of the U. States resident here, but to no purpose; and it was generally supposed, by those who remonstrated, that these great statesmen thought more of their personal security and convenience in this business, than of the honor and interest of the country they governed.

A peace has now taken place between the United States and Great Britain, and it is hoped that a general destruction of obnoxious correspondence may not be intended; yet, as it is still in the power of the British commanding officer to deprive any individual of his letters; and as your memorialists has the honor of being a citizen of this immortal town; and as such, to feel for its honor, its safety, and its happiness: he begs your excellency to take the subject of the introduction of correspondence from foreign countries into the most serious consideration, and to provide a remedy for the evils which exist.

As your excellency has but lately been called on by your fellow citizens to exercise the important duties of supreme director of the state, your memorialist takes the liberty of stating some facts which may be unknown to your excellency, viz.—All vessels coming into this port from foreign countries, are first boarded by a boat from the British frigate; and altho' the British nation is at peace with the whole world, a most rigid examination takes place, as to what cargo she brings, where from, who are the owners, to whom assigned, and a demand made for the correspondence! In short, the commander of the British frigate exercises as much power and authority within the jurisdiction of Buenos Ayres, as he would be entitled to exercise were this a British colony—nay more, for he would not dare touch an article of the correspondence if it were a British port. After possessing himself of the correspondence, the lieutenant commanding sends it on shore to the captain of the frigate, who inhabits a house only 300 yards distant from the palace of your excellency, and who, if at home, examines it, and distributes to his more intimate friends, their letters, sending the remainder to the British commercial subscription room, to be there called over to ascertain those that belong to subscribers; the next day, or at some future convenient time, those belonging to non-subscribers are sent to the post office. If the captain of the frigate is not at home when the letters arrive, they must remain in his office till his return.

While war existed between England and America, the managers of the British commercial subscription room acted as able tools of the naval commanders; spying out and collecting all American letters which they could find, and carrying them to their masters to be opened and destroyed. To effect which object fully, they refused to deliver double letters, even to subscribers, unless opened in their presence, to see if there were American letters enclosed.

For a naval officer to be disposed to know the contents of his enemies letters, is not to be wondered at; but for a British merchant established in Buenos Ayres to lend his aid and assistance to such officer, for the purpose of suppressing and wantonly destroying his neighbor's letters, because his neighbor was a native of a country with which his own happened to be at war, is an act so palpably base and mean, that, I presume, your excellency cannot consider your memorialist as captious, when he declares, that he is not willing that his correspondence should pass thro' such hands even in time of peace.

With the most profound respect, your memorialist subscribes himself your excellency's most obedient and most devoted servant.

☞ As our little navy seems to have nothing to do at present, and as some vessels must be kept in commission as schools of discipline, &c. we would respectfully propose that one of our frigates, the Macedonian for instance, should be sent to Rio del Plata to assist the British in the examination of the papers of American vessels. Some hints might thus be afforded that would save the Englishmen a deal of trouble.

CONGRESS.

SENATE

Wednesday, January 10. Mr. Brown presented the petition of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, for himself, and the officers and crew of the flotilla captured off the coast of Louisiana by the British fleet, at the time of their invasion of New-Orleans, praying compensation for the loss of clothing, &c. on that occasion, which was referred to the naval committee.

Thursday January 11. Mr. Horsey presented the petition of James Tilton, late surgeon-general of the army, praying certain allowances for rations, forage, quarters, postage, &c. and an annual benevolence that may sustain him above want and dependence, in consideration of his long and faithful public services. Referred.

Monday, January 15. Mr. Williams presented the petition of lieutenant colonel William Lawrence and others, forming the garrison of fort Bowyer, praying compensation for certain vessels belonging to the enemy of the United States, captured and destroyed by said garrison. Referred to the naval committee.

A bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading authorising the appointment of an admiral and two vice admirals.

The bill from the other house, to regulate commerce according to the convention of commerce with Great Britain, was read and passed to a second reading.

Tuesday, January 16. The bill for creating the office of admiral, in the navy, was read a third time, passed and sent to the House of representatives.

The bill for regulating the commerce between the United States and Great Britain, according to the convention of commerce, &c. was read a second time, and referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Wednesday, January 17. Mr. Tait, from the naval committee, reported a bill in favor of the officers and crew of the late sloop of war Argus, (to compensate them for the numerous captures in the British channel before she was taken). The bill received its first reading.

Mr. Bibb, from the committee of foreign relations, reported without amendment the bill from the house "for regulating the commerce between the United States and British territories according to the convention of commerce."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday January 12. After the usual presentation of petitions—

The resolution proposed yesterday by Mr. King of N. C. to admit the commissioners of the Navy Board to the privilege of seats within the bar of the house, was taken up and concurred in.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill for regulating the commerce of the United States according to the late convention with Great Britain.

The question still being on the passage of the bill—

The bill was opposed by Mr. Pickering and Mr. Hopkinson, and advocated by Mr. Taylor of N. Y. Mr. Wilde, Mr. Root and Mr. Sheffey, all at considerable length, and with the ability which has characterized this debate.

And the house adjourned.

Saturday, January 13. The following were the yeas and nays, on the question of the passage of the bill to regulate commerce in conformity to the convention of commerce with Great Britain.

YEAS.—Messrs. Abate, Alexander, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Birdsall, Birdseye, Blount, Brooks, Bryan, Burnside, Burwell, Caldwell, Cannon, Clarke of N. C. Clendenen, Clifton, Comstock, Condict, Conner, Crawford, Creighton, Cuthbert, D. &c.

lington, Desha, Forsythe, Griffin, Hahn, Hall, Hammond, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Hungerford, Ingham, Jackson, Johnson of Va., Johnson of Ky., Kerr of Va., King of Mass., Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean of Ky., McLean, of Ohio, Middleton, Murfree, Nelson of Va., Newton, Parris, Pickens, Piper, Pleasant, Powell, Randolph, Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Root, Ross, Savage, Shewck, Sharpe, Shepley, Smith of Va., Southard, Taul, Taylor of N. Y., Taylor of S. C., Telfair, Townsend, Tucker, Wallace, Wendover, Whiteside, Wilde, Wilkin, Williams, Willoughby, Thos. Wilson, Wm. Wilson, Yancy—86.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atherton, Baylies, Betts, Boss, Bradbury, Breckinridge, Brigham, Brown, Cady, Calhoun, Champion, Chappell, Chipman, Cilley, Clarke of Ky., Clayton, Culpepper, Davenport, Forney, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hardin, Herbert, Hopkinson, Huger, Hulbert, Jewett, Kent, King of N. C., Langdon, Law, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lyon, Marsh, Mason, McKee, Mills, Milnor, Moffitt, Moore, of S. C., Moseley, Nelson of Mass., Noyes, Oursby, Pickering, Pitkin, Reed, Rice, Ruggles, Sergeant, Smith of Penn., Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Strong, Taggart, Tallmadge, Thomas, Throop, Vose, Ward of N. Y., Wheaton, Wilcox, Woodward, Wright, Yates—71.

The bill was sent to the senate for concurrence.

Monday, Jan. 15. The house on motion of Mr. Lowndes, resolved itself into a committee of the whole. Mr. Nelson in the chair, on the report of the committee of ways and means on so much of the president's message and the annual treasury report as relates to the revenue.

The first resolution having been read, in the following words, viz:

Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force until the 30th day of June next, and until an act shall be passed establishing a new tariff of duties upon all goods, wares and merchandize, imported from any foreign port or place, and for other purposes," passed on 1st July, 1812.

Mr. Lowndes gave a general explanation of the views of the committee in regard to this resolution—referring, for the grounds of it to the instruction given to the secretary of the treasury to report a tariff of duties, and the implied intention of the congress to act on that subject at the present session.

After some opposition, the resolution was agreed to, without a division.

The second resolution, in the following words, being under consideration, viz:

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force "an act laying a duty on imported salt; granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries;" passed the 29th July, 1813.

This resolution was agreed to by a majority of more than three to one.

The third resolution, in the following words, was then read:

Resolved, That it is expedient to continue in force the act entitled "an act laying duties on sugar refined within the United States;" passed on the 24th July 1813.

This resolution was opposed by Mr. Huger; to whom Mr. Lowndes replied. The resolution was agreed to by a large majority.

The fourth resolution, for continuing the present stamp duties on bank notes, &c. came next under consideration.

Which, after some propositions to amend, &c. that were negatived, was agreed to by a large majority.

The fifth resolve, which proposes to abolish the additional duty on postage, was then taken up and agreed to by a large majority.

Mr. Lowndes suggested that the committee should rise and report these resolutions to the house, before acting on the remainder of the report. The resolutions already agreed to applied to laws which will expire on the 18th of February, and he wished them to be referred to the committee of ways and means, in order to report bills conformably thereto.

The motion for the committee to rise was agreed to; and the question was about to be put on concurring with the committee of the whole in their agreement to the first resolution, when

Mr. Randolph rose and commenced a speech in a rather desultory but pointed manner, on the general character of the report of the committee of ways and means, which he condemed. He had not spoken long, when the speaker intimated that he had digressed too far from the subject of debate.

An appeal was taken by Mr. Hanson from Mr. Speaker's decision on this point; which, after much acrimonious and some argumentative debate, was affirmed by the house, by a vote of 79 to 59.

Mr. Randolph resumed his discourse, which he concluded just before sun-set.

Mr. Goldsborough then moved to amend the said 1st resolution, by striking out all that part of it which refers to a "new tariff."

Whereupon, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 16.—Many petitions were received, from manufacturers, &c. among them was one of Jane A. Blakeley, of Boston, Mass. stating her fears for the loss of her husband, capt. Johnston Blakeley, of the United States ship of war Wasp, and praying that measures may be adopted for the support of herself and the daughter of the said capt. Blakeley.

Mr. Johnson, of K. from the military committee, reported a bill making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes; which was twice read and committed. [This bill places the widows and orphans of militia killed in the service, on the same footing, as to pensions, &c. as the regulars.]

Mr. Grosvenor also reported a bill "for the liquidation of certain claims, and for other purposes," (authorising the settlement of informal accounts of officers of the army, &c. by the accounting officer, on principles of equity.)—The bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. Lowndes, laid before the house a statement of the proceeds of certain internal duties, &c. from the commissioner of the revenue; which was referred to the committee of the whole, who have that subject under consideration.

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole on a part of the propositions of the committee of ways and means respecting the revenue.

The question before the house was (as on the adjournment yesterday) on an amendment moved by Mr. Goldsborough to the resolution proposing the continuance of the double duties until June next.—This amendment of Mr. Goldsborough proposed to strike out so much as proposes to continue the double duties until a new tariff shall be established by law.

Mr. Randolph moved to re-commit the report to a committee of the whole, on the ground that the report of a committee of a whole in part was unparliamentary; that he was by the decision of the speaker and of the house yesterday curtailed of his rights of debate by the restriction of the range of his observations; and that the discussion in committee of the whole authorized by the rules of the house on propositions relating to taxation, did not in fact take place. On this motion he required the yeas and nays.

After a few remarks from Mr. Ingham, denying the correctness of the first position of Mr. Randolph, and replies thereto by Mr. Stanford and Mr. Randolph, the question to recommit the report was decided in the negative. YEAS 59; NAYS 91.]

Mr. Wright, Mr. Huger and Mr. Grosvenor, spoke in favor of the amendment, and Mr. Taylor and Mr. Lowndes against it.

It was contended by the advocates of this amendment that to retain the clause referring to a new tariff, would introduce a looseness and vagueness in our laws, and produce an uncertainty as to the intentions of congress, which would be prejudicial as well to individual as to public interest. By the opponents of the amendment it was contended that the present phraseology would mislead the public mind and deceive interested individuals as to the views of Congress, which unquestionably favored the establishment of a new tariff; and would besides prejudice the public interest, in as much as a concurrence of circumstances, such as long discussion, clashing opinions on the details, &c. might protract the adoption of a new tariff of duties beyond the 30th of June, the time prescribed in this resolve for the expiration of the double duties.

Mr. Sargeant spoke at considerable length, and with much zeal in behalf of the manufacturers whose interests he evinced much anxiety to guard; but he said he should vote against the proposed amendment, because he was disposed to extend the limitation of time to January next.

Mr. Randolph supported the amendment also, and spoke generously at length on the subject of the report. He was opposed to the principles of the report of the committee of Ways and Means, because, as he endeavored to shew, they were wholly inconsistent with the principles of that republicanism which governed the proceedings of congress at the commencement of the administration of Thomas Jefferson, &c.

Mr. Sargeant and others, regarded the expression respecting the tariff as paving the way, if not absolutely providing for an indefinite continuation of the double duties.

The motion of Mr. Goldsborough was finally agreed to by a majority of about ten votes.

Mr. Sargeant then moved to strike out the thirtieth June, (the day to which the continuation of the double duties is limited in the resolve) and in lieu thereof to insert the first day of January next.

Mr. King was opposed to this motion; because, as he conceived, the national faith was pledged that the duties should expire on the 18th of next month.

Mr. Sargeant earnestly and at large supported his motion.

The motion was negatived, however, 77 to 56.

And the house then adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 17. The bill from the senate, authorizing the appointment of three admirals in the navy, was twice read and committed.

The house resumed the consideration of the five first propositions of the committee of ways and means respecting the revenue.

The first resolution for continuing in force the double duties on imports and tonnage until the 30th day of June next, being still under consideration—

Mr. Maclay moved a reconsideration of yesterday's vote; whereby the house refused to strike out of said resolve the 30th June, and insert 1st January.

The house having agreed to reconsider the said question, 66 to 53—

The question again presented itself, to strike out the thirtieth day of June, and insert the first day of January, so as to prolong the double duties to the latter day.

On this question the whole ground of debate occupied yesterday and the preceding day, was travelled over. The advocates of this motion maintained that its adoption was necessary to secure the manufacturers from loss and almost ruin, as well as to enable the merchants to lay their course intelligently in the business of the approaching season. On the other hand, it was contended by some that the extension of these duties would be an unnecessary and grievous tax on the consumers for the benefit of the manufacturers and the convenience of the merchants; and, by other gentlemen, the ground was taken, that the faith of the government being pledged to discontinue the duties at the end of one year after the expiration of the war, it would, of course, be more unjust to protract their cessation to a more distant day, than to that already proposed in the resolve.

Many topics, not directly applicable to the subject, were brought into the question, and complained of by some of the gentlemen who mingled in debate, who said, that the interests of manufacturers did not belong to this question, nor, perhaps, the interests of the merchants; that it was a question of national policy, which ought to stand on its own merits; and some of those who spoke and voted against the extension to January, did so on the ground that such a course would be equally adverse to the interests of the manufacturer and merchant, as to those of the community generally.

The gentlemen who spoke on the affirmative side of this question, were Messrs. Sargeant and Burnside; and those on the negative, Messrs. Lowndes, Ross, Grosvenor, Pitkin, King, Wright, Gaston, Mills, Pickering and Randolph.

The question on this motion was at length decided, late in the day, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Betts, Birdseye, Blount, Brooks, Bryan, Burnside, Cannon, Clarendon, Clifton, Conner, Crighton, Darlington, Decks, Hahn, Hawes, Heister, Henderson, Hopkinson, Ingham, Johnson, Ky. Kerr, Va. Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McLean, K. McLean, O. Miller, Nelson, Va. Newton, Piper, Powell, Reynolds, Root, Sargeant, Strong, Paul, Taylor, N. Y. Thomas, Throop, Wallace, Ward, N. Y. Wendover, Whiteside, Williams, Thos. Wilson, Wm. Wilson, &c.—47.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adgate, Alexander, Atherton, Baer, Baker, Barbour, Bassett, Bateman, Baylies, Bennett, Boss, Bradbury, Breckinridge, Brigham, Burwell, Cadiz, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chapin, Chipman, Cilley, Clark, N. C. Clark, Ky. Clayton, Comstock, Condit, Cooper, Crawford, Culpepper, Cuthbert, Davenport, Foreney, Forsyth, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hammond, Hanson, Hardin, Herbert, Huger, Hangerford, Irwin, Pa. Jewett, Johnson, Va. Kent, King, Mas. King, N. C. Langdon, Law, La. Wis. Love, Lovett, Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyon, Marsh, McKee, Middleton, Mills, Moffit, Moore, S. C. Mosely, Murrefree, Nelson, Mas. Noyes, Ormsby, Parris, Pickens, Pickering, Pitkin, Pleasants, Randolph, Reed, Roane, Robertson, Ross, Rugles, Savage, Schenck, Sharpe, Sheffield, Smith, Penn. Smith, Va. Stanford, Stewarts, Stuart, Sturges, Tallmadge, Taylor, S. C. Telfair, Townsend, Tucker, Vose, Ward, Mas. Wilcox, Wilde, Wilmoughby, Wright, Yancey, Yates—105.

So the motion to extend the continuation of the double duties to the first day of January, was negatived; and

The house adjourned, near sun set.

Thursday, Jan. 18.—The house resumed the consideration of the propositions of the committee of Ways and Means, which had been agreed to in committee of the whole.

The resolution for continuing the double duties on salt, occasioned some debate; but was agreed to by yeas and nays, by a vote of 90 to 43.

The bill for the relief of the widows and orphans of militia killed, or who have died of wounds received during the late war, was some time before a committee of the whole. The committee rose, and the bill was referred to a different committee.

CHRONICLE.

The following appointments have been recently made by the president of the United States, with the consent of the senate.

PETER B. FORTER, of New-York to be commis-tioner of the United States to carry into effect the 4th and 7th articles of the treaty of peace with Great Britain.

JOHN HOLMES, of Massachusetts, to be the commissioner of the United States under the 4th article of the treaty of peace with Great Britain.

WILLIAM PORTER, of Massachusetts, to be consul of the United States at Palermo.

Further—Some printers to the eastward have appointed Mr. R. G. Harper a senator of the United States from Maryland. There has been no appointment yet made by the legislature of the state, to whom, we suppose, it belongs.

A Dutch fleet consisting of three 74's, 3 frigates, 1 corvette, 6 transports and 1 Indiaman, with 6,000 troops on board, passed Madeira in November last, for Batavia, to take possession of the island of Java.

The destroyers of the East. There is reason to believe that the British have gained some important advantages over the Napoleons, and that a treaty of peace has been made. This, perhaps, seals the fate of the gallant mountaineers. A treaty of peace between the British and a native power in India, soon undermines the independence of the latter, and wears away its strength.

The 8th of January was observed at many places, with feasts and rejoicings, in honor of the victory at New-Orleans. It promises to become a political holiday.

THE PATRIOTS OF SOUTH AMERICA.—The republicans of South America have, perhaps, to contend with the most finished villains that ever served the vile cause of royalty. The tory priests and statesmen who manage for Ferdinand in the new world, believe any thing "legitimate" that may serve their master, and keep themselves in authority. But, I trust in Heaven, the sway of these men is nearly at a close. "The day-spring of liberty" has dawned: the veil of hypocrisy is rent, and the foolishness of royalty is manifest. The priesthood are about to be divested of their means to commit crime, and royalty to receive the contempt and hatred it deserves of this oppressed and abused people.—"Strength to the arm that strikes for freedom!"—Firmness to those who shall judge the perpetrators of murders like those unfolded below:

St. Thomas, Nov. 23.—We have been politely favored with a translation of the 3d bulletin published in a Carthagena Gazette of the 27th August, mentioning the following atrocious occurrence:

Lt. Col. Don Juan Salvador Narvaez, commanding the republican division on the low river Magdalena, among other things, informs the government of the following occurrence, the most atrocious to human kind: The European Spaniard, Joseph Carbonero, employed for more than 28 years in the military hospitals, married in the country, and with three children, cut his own throat in Sabina Large, declaring before he died, that he had poisoned more than 400 soldiers, all Americans, in the hospital of Tarbaco and Baranco, by mixing the medicines administered to them with arsenic. This horrible deed of Carbonero, tortured his own conscience to such a pitch, that it caused him to deprive himself of his existence.

Total defeat of the army of the Mexican Insurgents, headed by their first ringleader, Morello.

This monster is at last in the hands of the royal troops. His career of blood and devastation is at an end. His crimes will soon be expiated on the scaffold, an awful lesson to his followers, whom the same fate attends if they continue tearing the heart of their country, misled by the ambition of a gang of seditioners, who have the impudence to call themselves Patriots. The following letter announces the event:

Sir—I just received the flattering account, by col. Don Manuel de la Concha, that Morello's army has been lately defeated near this place; himself and another of the first ringleaders, called Morales, taken, together with all his artillery, arms, ammunition, and a rich booty. The number of killed and prisoners is very considerable: among the first are reckoned the ringleaders Sesma, Lobats, and many others. This glorious and important victory obtained by the measures I had previously concerted, and by the bravery of the troops I have the honor to command, their steadiness during the action, and the fortitude with which they have braved every danger and fatigue, will not fail, I hope, to be rewarded by his majesty with the generosity that deserves their zeal and patriotism. I recommend very particularly to your excellency the distinguished merit of lieut. Don Matias Carrasco, who had the glory to pursue, overtake, and bring safe to his commander, the monster Morello.

God preserve your excellency's life many years. Atango del Rio, November 6th, 1815.

The Manufacturing Interest, in the United States, has arrived at a most important crisis. On the proceedings of the present session of congress, it is expected, will mainly depend the resolution of the momentous question, whether our manufactories shall go on and increase, and be extended to the general wants of the country, or dwindle into nothing, through a sacrifice to a time-serving policy—a policy, that regards the present moment and pays no respect to the future.

It has been the practice of every enlightened nation, and especially of Great Britain, (in which, though there is much to condemn, there is a great deal to approve) whose resources have confounded the calculations of the wise and astonished the world, to give a decided, active and unequivocal preference to the product of the labor of its own people. This is rightful and reasonable, as well as natural. An enlarged mind will easily apprehend that the mere naked cost of a specified commodity, though partially affecting the pocket of an individual, may have no bearing whatever on a general state of things; the price of one article balancing the price of another, and bringing the whole to a level. If, by a refusal to receive foreign articles, for instance, the price of a yard of cotton cloth be advanced two or three cents, will it be said, that the labor employed on that cloth may not have its equivalent to the farmer in the increased value of his grain, by furnishing, for so much of it, a new market at home? Great Britain is so sensible of these operations, that she forbids the consumption of some of the most valuable manufactures of her own colonies, within her European dominions. And, it is believed, that every other European government has, more or less, acted upon principles to produce the same effect.

There are several articles manufactured in the United States that would do as well to ship to England, as any we receive from her answer here, if admitted on equal terms. But England will not receive these at all—because she gives to the labor of her subjects every advantage. Well knowing that in the industry and wealth of individuals, lies her resource in time of need. This appears to be sound policy. Other powers have done the same for many years. In fact, it is the universal practice of nations.

A variety of circumstances—the British orders in council and the French decrees—our self-restrictions on trade—and, finally, the late war, gave a new direction to wealth and industry in the United States. Manufactories grew up as if by magic—and they promised fair, in due season, to supply the chief part of our wants—thus releasing us of our dependence on foreigners and quieting their intrigues—and raising up an American interest to supercede the servility and devotion of those who deal in foreign goods to foreign interests. These establishments have made wonderful progress towards perfection; but they have not yet arrived at a degree of strength competent to meet, on equal grounds, the more wealthy and older institutions of Europe. They must be protected and assisted for a while by the government—which owes to the exertion of its people what a good mother owes to her child. There certainly is not much profit in raising children—a woman might assuredly earn more money if, instead of nursing her infant and nourishing it as she ought, she were to cast it on the ground and apply herself to labor. But what would we think of a calculation like this? For, altho' the mother may have no affection for her child, she owes a duty to the society in which she lives to rear it with care. It belongs to the state, and is to be added to the national strength. I consider that the manufacturers of the United States stand to the government in the precise relation of an infant to its mother—if they are cherished, they will repay, in the future peace and prosperity of the country, all that is done for them.

The capital invested in manufacturing establishments, within these last six or eight years, may be estimated at 100 millions of dollars—not taking into view those properly called family manufactories. I have before me a statement respecting those for cotton, by which it appears that we have not less than 567,000 spindles at work, or nearly ready to go into operation; these spindles consume 100,000 bales of cotton, of 300lbs weight, or 30 millions of pounds per annum, producing about 90 millions of yards of cloth, at 30 cents per yard, worth 27 millions of dollars. The persons employed to produce this cloth are estimated at 100,000, about one tenth of whom only are able bodied males, capable of earning a livelihood by ordinary labor; and the capital invested in the whole is about 40 millions of dollars.

Really, these things are worthy of deep consideration and reflection; they are of a nature to demand the fostering care of the government, and ought to receive it. England, no doubt, will do all that she can, fairly or clandestinely, in any shape and every shape, to destroy our manufacturing establishments, and ruin all who have embarked their capital in them. It remains to be seen how far a congress of the United States will assist her in bringing about so great a desideratum—an object of more real importance to her than was the downfall of the hated and feared Napoleon Bonaparte. When our manufactories acquire that perfection that necessarily follows an absolute establishment, we can and will fabricate woolen and cotton goods cheaper than she possibly can do. The very tythes and taxes paid there being a good profit here. But we must creep before we can walk. Protect the manufactures for the present, and in a little time, they will protect themselves and us.

Proposed National Bank.

Letter from the secretary of the treasury to the chairman of the committee on that part of the president's message, which relates to an uniform national currency; enclosing an outline of a plan for a national bank, accompanied with some explanation of the principles upon which the system is founded.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, 24th Dec. 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 23d instant, informing me that the committee on so much of the president's message as relates to the national currency, had determined that a national bank is the most certain means of restoring to the nation a specie circulation; and had directed you to obtain the opinion of this department on the following points:

- 1st. The amount and composition of the capital of the bank.
- 2d. The government of the bank.
- 3d. The privileges and duties of the bank.
- 4th. The organization and operation of the bank.
- 5th. The bonus to be required for the charter of the bank.
- 6th. The measures which may aid the bank in commencing and maintaining its operations in specie.

It affords much satisfaction to find, that the policy of establishing a national bank has received the sanction of the committee; and the decision in this respect, renders it unnecessary to enter into a comparative examination of the superior advantages of such an institution, for the attainment of the objects contemplated by the legislature. Referring, therefore, to the outline of a national bank, which is subjoined to this letter, as the result of an attentive consideration bestowed upon the subjects of your enquiry, I proceed, with deference and respect, to offer some explanation of the principles upon which the system is founded.

1. It is proposed, that, under a charter for twenty years, the capital of the national bank shall amount to $35,000,000 of dollars; that congress shall retain the power to raise it to 50,000,000 of dollars, and that it shall consist, three-fourths of public stock, and one-fourth of gold and silver.

1st. With respect to the amount of the capital.—The services to be performed by the capital of the bank, are important, various, and extensive. They will be required through a period, almost as long as is usually assigned to a generation. They will be required for the accommodation of the government, in the collection and distribution of its revenue; as well as for the uses of commerce, agriculture, manufactures, and the arts, throughout the Union. They will be required to restore and maintain the national currency. And, in short, they will be required, under every change of circumstances, in a season of war, as well as in the season of peace, for the circulation of the national wealth; which augments with a rapidity beyond the reach of ordinary calculation.

In the performance of these national services, the local and incidental co-operation of the state banks may undoubtedly be expected; but it is the object of the present measure, to create an independent, though not a discordant, institution; and while the government is granting a monopoly for 20 years, it would seem to be improvident and dangerous, to rely upon gratuitous or casual aids for the enjoyment of those benefits, which can be effectually secured by positive stipulation.

Nor is it believed, that any public inconvenience can possibly arise, from the proposed amount of the capital of the bank, with its augmentable quality. The amount may indeed, be a clog upon the profits of the institution; but it can never be employed for any injurious purpose (not even for the purpose of discount accommodation beyond the fair demand,) without an abuse of trust, which cannot, in candor, be anticipated; or which, if anticipated, may be made an object of penal responsibility.

The competition which exists at present among the state banks will, it is true, be extended to the national bank; but competition does not imply hostility. The commercial interests and the personal associations of the stockholders, will generally be the same, in the state banks, and in the national bank. The directors of both institutions will naturally be taken from the same class of citizens. And experience has shown not only the policy, but the existence of those sympathies, by which the intercourse of a national bank and the state banks has been, and always ought to be, regulated for their common credit and security.—At the present crisis, it will be peculiarly incumbent upon the national bank, as well as the treasury, to conciliate the state banks, to confide to them, liberally, a participation in the deposits of public revenue; and to encourage them in every reasonable effort, to resume the payment of their notes in coin. But, independent of these considerations, it is to be recollected, that when portions of the capital of the national bank shall be transferred to its branches, the amount invested in each branch, will not, probably, exceed the amount of the capital of any of the principal state banks; and will certainly be less than the amount of the combined capital of the state banks, operating in any of the principal commercial cities. The whole number of the banking establishments in the United States may be stated at 260; and the aggregate amount of their capitals may be estimated at $85,000,000; but the services of the national bank are also required in every state and territory, and the capital proposed is $35,000,000, of which only one-fourth part will consist of gold and silver.

2d. With respect to the composition of the capital of the bank. There does not prevail much diversity of opinion, upon the proposition to form a compound capital for the national bank, partly of public stock, and partly of coin. The proportions now suggested appear, also, to be free from any important objections. Under all the regulations of the charter, it is believed that the amount of gold and silver required will afford an adequate supply for commencing and continuing the payments of the bank in current coin; while the power which the bank will possess, to convert its stock portion of capital into bullion or coin, from time to time, is calculated to provide for any probable augmentation of the demand. This object being sufficiently secured, the capital of the bank is next to be employed, in perfect consistency with the general interests and safety of the institution, to raise the value of the public securities, by withdrawing almost one-fifth of the amount from the ordinary stock market. Nor will the bank be allowed to expose the public to the danger of a depreciation, by returning any part of the stock to the market, until it has been offered, at the current price, to the commissioners of the sinking fund; and it is not an inconsiderable advantage, in the growing state of the public revenue, that the stock subscribed to the capital of the bank, will become redeemable at the pleasure of the government.

The subscription to the capital of the bank is opened to every species of funded stock. The estimate that the revenues of 1816 and 1817, will enable the treasury to discharge the whole of the treasury note debt, furnishes the only reasons for omitting to authorize a subscription in that species of debt. Thus,

The old and the new 6 per cent. stocks are receivable at par.

The 7 per cent. stock upon a valuation referring to the 30th of September, 1816, is receivable at 106 51-100 dollars per cent.

The 3 per cent stock, which can only be redeemed for its nominal or certificate value, may be estimated, under all circumstances, to be worth about 62 per cent. when the 6 per cent. stock is at par; but as it is desirable to accomplish the redemption of this stock, upon equitable terms, it is made receivable at 65 per cent. the rate sanctioned by the government, and in part accepted by the stockholders, in the year 1837.

Of the instalments for paying the subscriptions, it is only necessary to observe, that they are regulated by a desire to reconcile an early commencement of the operations of the bank with the existing difficulties in the currency, and with the convenience of the subscribers. In one of the modes proposed for discharging the subscription of the government, it is particularly contemplated to aid the bank with a medium which cannot fail to alleviate the first pressure for payments in coin.

II. It is proposed, that the national bank shall be governed by twenty-five directors, and each of its branches by thirteen directors; that the president of the U. States, with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint five of the directors of the bank, one of whom shall be chosen as president of the bank by the board of directors; that the resident stockholders shall elect twenty of the directors of the national bank, who shall be resident citizens of the U. States; and that the national bank shall appoint the directors of each bank (being resident citizens of the United States) one of whom shall be designated by the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, to be president of the branch bank.

The participation of the president and senate of the United States in the appointment of directors, appears to be the only feature in the proposition for the government of the national bank which requires an explanatory remark.

Upon general principles, wherever a pecuniary interest is to be affected by the operations of a public institution, a representative authority ought to be recognized. The United States will be the proprietors of one-fifth of the capital of the bank, and in that proportion, upon general principles, they should be represented in the direction. But an apprehension has sometimes been expressed, lest the power of the government thus inserted into the administration of the affairs of the bank, should be employed eventually, to alienate the funds and destroy the credit of the institution. Whatever may have been the fate of banks in other countries, subject to forms of government essentially different, there can be no reasonable cause for the apprehension here. Independent of the obvious improbability of the attempt, the government of the United States cannot, by any legislative or executive act, impair the rights or multiply the obligations of a corporation constitutionally established, as long as the independence and integrity of the judicial power shall be maintained. Whatever accommodation the treasury may have occasion to ask from the bank, can only be asked under the licence of a law; and whatever accommodation shall be obtained, must be obtained from the voluntary assent of the directors, acting under the responsibility of their trust.

Nor can it be doubted that the department of the government, which is invested with the power of appointment to all the important offices of the state, is a proper department to exercise the power of appointment in relation to a national trust of incalculable magnitude. The national bank ought not to be regarded simply as a commercial bank.—It will not operate upon the funds of the stockholders alone, but much more upon the funds of the nation. Its conduct, good or bad, will not affect the corporate credit alone, but much more the credit and resources of the government. In fine, it is not an institution created for the purposes of commerce and profit alone, but much more for the purposes of national policy, as an auxiliary in the exercise of some of the highest powers of the government. Under such circumstances, the public interests cannot be too cautiously guarded, and the guards proposed can never be injurious to the commercial interests of the institution. The rights to inspect the general accounts of the bank may be employed to detect the evils of a mal-administration; but an interior agency in the direction of its affairs will best serve to prevent them.

III. It is proposed, that, in addition to the usual privileges of a corporation, the notes of the national bank shall be received in all payments to the United States, unless congress shall hereafter otherwise provide by law; and that in addition to the duties usually required from a corporation of this description, the national bank shall be empowered to receive, transfer and distribute, the public revenue, under the directions of the proper department.

The reservation of a legislative power on the subject of accepting the notes of the national bank in payments to the government, is the only new stipulation in the present proposition. It is designed not merely as one of the securities for the general conduct of the bank, but as the means of preserving entire the sovereign authority of congress relative to the coin and currency of the United States. Recent occurrences inculcate the expediency of such a reservation; but it may be confidently hoped that an occasion to enforce it will never arise.

It is not proposed to stipulate that the bank shall in any case be bound to make loans to the government; but, in that respect, whenever a loan is authorized by law, the government will act upon the ordinary footing of an applicant for pecuniary accommodation.

IV. It is proposed, that the organization of the national bank shall be effected with as little delay as possible; and that its operations shall commence and continue, upon the basis of payments in the current coin of the United States, with a qualified power under the authority of the government to suspend such payments.

The proposition, now submitted, necessarily implies an opinion that it is practicable to commence the operations of the national bank upon a circulation of gold and silver coin; and, in support of the opinion, a few remarks are respectfully offered to the consideration of the committee.

1. The actual receipts of the bank at the opening of the subscription, will amount to the sum of 8,400,000 dollars; of which the sum of 1,400,000 dollars will consist of gold and silver, and the sum of 7,000,000 of dollars will consist of public stock convertible by sale into gold and silver. But the actual receipts of the bank, at the expiration of six months from the opening of the subscriptions, will amount to the sum of 16,800,000 dollars; of which the sum of 2,800,000 dollars will be in gold and silver, and the sum of 14,000,000 dollars will be in public stock convertible by sale into gold and silver. To the fund thus possessed by the bank, the accumulations of the public revenue and the deposits of individuals, being added, there can be little doubt, from past experience and observation in reference to similar establishments, that a sufficient foundation will exist for a gradual and judicious issue of bank notes payable on demand in the current coin; unless, contrary to all probability, public confidence should be withheld from the institution; or, sinister combinations should be formed to defeat its operations; or the demands of an unfavorable balance of trade should press upon its metallic resources.

2. The public confidence cannot be withheld from the institution. The resources of the nation will be intimately connected with the resources of the bank. The notes of the bank are accredited in every payment to the government, and must become familiar in every pecuniary negotiation.—Unless, therefore, a state of things exist in which gold and silver only can command the public confidence, the national bank must command it. But the expression of the public sentiment does not, even at this period, leave the question exposed to difficulty and doubt; it is well known that the wealth of opulent and commercial nations requires for its circulation something more than a medium composed of the precious metals. The incompetency of the existing paper substitutes, to furnish a national currency, is also well known. Hence, throughout the United States, the public hope seems to rest, at this crisis, upon the establishment of a national bank; and every citizen, upon private or upon patriotic motives, will be prepared to support the institution.

3. Sinister combinations to defeat the operations of a national bank, ought not to be presumed, and need not be feared. It is true, that the influence of the state banks is extensively diffused; but the state banks and the patrons of the state banks, partake of the existing evils; they must be conscious of the inadequacy of state institutions to restore and maintain the national currency; they will perceive that there is sufficient space in the commercial sphere, for the movement of the state banks and the national bank, and, upon the whole, they will be ready to act upon the impulse of a common duty and a common interest. If, however, most unexpectedly, a different course should be pursued, the concurring powers of the national treasury and the national bank, will be sufficient to avert the danger.

4. The demand of an unfavorable balance of trade, appears to be much overrated. It is not practicable, at this time, to ascertain either the value of the goods imported since the peace, or the value of the property employed to pay for them.—But when it is considered that a great proportion of the importations arose from the investment of American funds previously in Europe, that a great proportion of the price has been paid by American exports; that a great proportion has been paid by remittances in American stocks; and that a great proportion remains upon credit, to be paid by gradual remittances of goods, as well as in coin—it cannot be justly concluded, that the balance of trade has hitherto materially affected the national stock of the precious metals. So far as an opportunity has occurred for observation, the demand for gold and silver to export, appears rather to have arisen from the expectation of obtaining a higher price in a part of Europe, and from the revival of commerce with the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, than from any necessity to provide for the payment of the recent importations of goods into the United States. The former of these causes will probably soon cease to operate; and the operation of the latter, may, if necessary, be restrained by law.

The proposition now under consideration, further provides for a suspension of the bank payments in coin upon any future emergency. This is merely a matter of precaution; but if the emergency should arise, it must be agreed on all hands that the power of suspension ought rather to be confided to the government, than to the directors of the institution.

V. It is proposed that a bonus be paid to the government by the subscribers to the national bank, in consideration of the emoluments to be derived from an exclusive charter, during a period of twenty years.

Independent of the bonus, here proposed to be exacted, there are undoubtedly many public advantages to be drawn from the establishment of the national bank; but these are generally of an incidental kind and (as in the case of the deposits and distribution of the revenue) may be regarded in the light of equivalents, not for the monopoly of the charter, but for the reciprocal advantages of a fiscal connexion with the public treasury.

The amount of the bonus should be in proportion to the value of the charter grant, or in other words, to the nett profits which the subscribers will probably make, in consequence of their incorporation. The average rate of the dividends of the state banks before the suspension of payments in coin, was about eight per cent. per annum. It appears by a report from this department to the house of representatives, dated the 3d of April, 1810, that the annual dividends of the late bank of the United States, averaged throughout the duration of its charter, the rate of 8 13-35 per cent. But under all the circumstances which will attend the establishment and operations of the proposed national bank, its enlarged capital, and the extended field of competition, it is not deemed reasonable, for the present purpose to rate the annual dividends for the institution higher than 7 per cent. upon its capital of 35,000,000 of dollars.

Allowing, therefore, two, three or four years for the payment of the bonus, a sum of 1,500,000 dollars would amount to about 4 per cent. upon the capital of the bank; and would constitute a just equivalent for the benefits of its charter.

VI. It is proposed that the measures suggested by the following considerations, be adopted, to aid the national bank in commencing and maintaining its operations upon the basis of payments in the current coin.

1. To restore the national currency of gold and silver, it is essential that the quantity of bank paper in circulation should be reduced; but this effort alone will be sufficient to effect the object. By reducing the amount of bank paper, its value must be proportionably increased; and as soon as the amount shall be contracted to the limits of a just proportion in the circulating medium of the country, the consequent revival of the uses for coin, in the business of exchange, will insure its re-appearance in abundance. The policy, the interest, and the honor of the state banks, will stimulate them to undertake and to prosecute this salutary work. But it will be proper to apprise them that after a specified day, the notes of such banks as have not resumed their payments in the current coin, will not be received in payments, either to the government or to the national bank.

2. The resumption of payments in current coin, at the state banks, will remove every obstacle to the commencement of similar payments at the national bank. The difficulty of commencing payments in coin is not, however, to be considered as equal to the difficulty of resuming them. The national bank, free from all engagements, will be able to regulate its issues of paper, with a view to the danger as well as to the demand, that may be found to exist. But in addition to the privileges granted by the charter, it will also be proper to apprise the state banks, that after the commencement of the operations of the national bank, the notes of such banks as do not agree to receive, re-issue and circulate, the notes of that institution, shall not be received in payments, either to the government or to the national bank.

3. The possibility that the national currency of coin may not be perfectly restored, at the time of organizing the bank, has induced the proposition, that the payment of the government subscription to the capital shall be made in treasury notes, which will be receivable in all payments to the government, and to the national bank, but which will not be demandable in coin. The principle of this proposition might perhaps be usefully extended, to authorise the national bank to issue notes of a similar character, for a limited period: and it will be proper further to apprise the state banks that the notes of such banks as do not agree to receive, re-issue, and circulate, these treasury notes, or national bank notes, shall not be received in payments, either to the government or to the national bank.

Internal Taxes.

Letter from the secretary of the treasury and commissioner of the revenue, to the chairman of the committee of ways and means, containing estimates of the probable amount of the internal duties which have accrued, and will accrue, in the year 1815.

Treasury Department, Dec. 26, 1815.

SIR—In answer to your letter, which was received on the 23d inst. I have the honor to subjoin an estimate of the probable amount of the internal duties accruing in the year 1815, as stated by the commissioners of the revenue.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. Wm. Lowndes,

Chairman of the committee of ways and means.

Estimate of the probable amount of the internal duties which will accrue for the year 1815.

On licenses for stills and boilers,	1,000,000
Distilled spirits,	2,500,000
Carriages,	175,000
Licenses to retailers,	900,000
Sales at auction,	850,000
Refined sugar,	50,000
Stamps	400,000
Furniture and watches,	300,000
Manufactured articles other than the foregoing,	874,000
	7,049,000

From these duties and the outstanding balances on the 31st December, 1814, it is computed that there will be received by the collectors during the year 1815, the amount of Computing the expences of collection at 6 per cent.

There will remain a nett revenue of Leaving a balance outstanding on the 31st December, 1815, of

In the estimate rendered on the 16th of December, 1814, it was computed that the whole accruing internal duties, including those contemplated in pending bills to be imposed for an entire year, after they should be in full operation, would amount to 10,379,000 dollars. The preceding estimate falls considerably short of this sum. This difference arises from the omission of duties on the postage of letters; from several of the new duties not being in operation during a considerable portion of 1815, some of the acts imposing them not having been passed as early as was contemplated; from the entire rejection of some, and radical changes in other of the proposed duties; from the modifications of several of the suggested provisions for their collection, and from the effects of peace. For instance, the duties on lotteries, and on horses, which it was calculated would produce 220,000 dollars, were not imposed; the proposed duty on leather was reduced one half, by which its estimated proceeds would be diminished 300,000 dollars; that on candles was so limited as to except candles of spermaceti and all tallow candles other than mould; while the duties on hats, paper, and playing cards were considerably diminished. In the case of carriages, the proposed rates of duty were not only greatly reduced, but provisions rejected that were viewed as necessary to its fair collection. But the greatest effect has probably ensued from the state of peace, by which the quantity of spirits distilled, as well as of various other dutiable objects of manufacture, has been considerably diminished, especially from the subtracted war demand for the former by the army, and generally from the apprehension of foreign competition."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT—

Revenue Office, January 13, 1816.

SIR—I have the honor, agreeably to your request, to make the following statements and estimates:

The duties on household furniture and gold and silver watches, according to lists received from eighty-nine districts, amount, on household furniture to 29,271 dollars, and on gold and silver watches to 90,352 dollars.

It may be estimated that the amounts of these duties, in all the districts of the United States, will be, on household furniture, 75,000 dollars, and on gold and silver watches, 225,000 dollars:

The duties on various goods, wares and merchandise manufactured in the United States, which have accrued to the 30th September last, so far as returns have been received, are,

On Iron	$25,767 81
Nails, brads and sprigs	46,602 53
Candles	456 43
Hats, caps, and bonnets,	69,690 13

Bank of Virginia.

From the Enquirer of January 16.

A NEW CASE—TO TRY.

A case has taken place in this city, which has excited much curiosity, and is calculated to produce much interest throughout the union.

Some time past, Mr. George Fisher, of this city, called upon the bank of Virginia for the payment of ten of its notes, of one hundred dollars each, in specie. The bank declined payment. Mr. F. wished at that time to sue for the same—but it seems there was no one at the bar who was willing to conduct the suit. In November last the subject was again taken up—and Mr. Fisher took out of the clerk's office of the superior court of law for this county, a summons against the president and directors of the bank of Virginia, on an action for ten notes of 100 dollars each. The bank did not appear at the rule-day on the 16th of the last month.

Mr. Fisher's counsel, upon this, took out a distringas, a process under the common law to reach a corporate body. The bank was apprised of this step, and took counsel upon it. Mr. Prosser, the sheriff of the county, waited upon the president, and informed him of his intention to serve the distringas on the 15 inst. being the day immediately before the rule-day. This day was selected, that the operation might fall upon the bank as lightly as possible. The president of the bank shewed him the opinion of his counsel; in which, we understand, it is advised, that upon a distringas the officer may take enough to cover the charges of the suit in the first instance, and double and treble and so on, after each rule-day, upon the bank's refusing to enter its appearance.

Yesterday, Mr. P. waited on the bank to serve the process, which was in the following style:

The commonwealth of Virginia to the sheriff of Henrico county, greeting.

WHEREAS George Fisher hath lately in our superior court of law for the said county, instituted a certain action of debt against the president, directors, & Co. of the bank of Virginia, and the defendants have been summoned to answer in the said action, as by your return, fully appears; yet the said defendants have hitherto neglected so to do, and as appears, manifestly contemn: Therefore, we command you that you distrain the said president, directors, & Co. by all their lands and chattels within your bailiwick, so that neither they nor any one through them may lay hands on the same until you shall receive from us another command thereupon, and that of the issues and profits thereof, you answer to us so that the said president, directors, & Co. appear at the clerk's office of our said superior court of law for Henrico county at the rules to be holden for the said court, on the 16th day of January next, to answer the said George Fisher of a plea that they render to him one hundred dollars, which they owe him and unjustly detain as he saith, and to the damage of the said George Fisher twenty dollars and to bear thereof judgment of their many defaults: and further to do and receive what our said court shall in this part consider—and have then there this writ.—Witness John Robinson, clerk of our said superior court, at Richmond, the 21st day of December, 1815, in the 40th year of our foundation.

J. ROBINSON

The sheriff was charged with ten copies of this process, corresponding with the number of suits.

Mr. Brockenbrough, the president, refused to obey the process peaceably. The sheriff then called on the by-standers as a posse comitatus, among others who were accidentally present, were Mr. John Marshal, Mr. P. V. Daniel, Mr. Poitiaux, Mr. S. Payne, &c. &c. The president tendered several engagements in gold to cover the costs—the sheriff refused to accept them—on which the president was led by the arm, without any further opposition, out of the door of the bank. The books were closed—the key of the vault was put into the hands of the cashier. Mr. Prosser closed the door of the bank and put the key into his pocket. The Farmers' Bank were so accommodating yesterday, as to take up all the checks, which were drawn on the Virginia Bank. It unfortunately happens by the way, that yesterday was the first day for paying out the last half year's dividends of the institution.

One fact more—The bank immediately took out a writ against Mr. Fisher for $10,000 dollars damages, which was served by Mr. Prosser—and the same process, it is understood, has gone forth against himself.

Whether the bank will or not make its appearance at the rules this day, and thus relieve itself from the distringas, which interrupts its proceedings, it is not for us to say—if it does, the great point of dispute may come to issue at the next spring term—If it does not, it is not competent for us to conjecture the course of proceeding.

On the point of law, we say nothing—But we are perfectly satisfied that the banks are under the clearest conviction that they cannot venture to resume their specie payments without a concert with the principal banks in the northern towns. Against this opinion, we have to-day given place to an ingenious essay from a "Merchant," written, we are satisfied, with no sort of bearing upon the pending prosecution. As Sir Roger de Coverley says, "much may be said on both sides."

Of the solvency of the Virginia Bank, not a shadow of doubt can possibly exist.

January 18.

The Bank of Virginia—Was shut on Tuesday—but is again open. In the course of that day, (being the first day of the rules.) Mr. Prosser returned the distringas into the clerk's office, with this endorsement:

"In pursuance of the within distringas to me directed, I have distrained the banking house of the said bank of Virginia, locked the door of the same, and have the key in my possession—being all the property known to me belonging to the said bank within my bailiwick—and no issues have accrued therefrom.

"T. H. PROSSER, S. H. C.

Jan. 15th, 1816.

In the course of the same day, notwithstanding, the bank executed some business up stairs, in the room usually set apart for the board of directors.—The cashier himself lives up stairs. It seems that the outer door, which leads into the passage, into which the stairs descend, had not been closed.

On Wednesday (yesterday) morning, the door from the passage into the bank, of which door Mr. Prosser had a key, was opened without any marks of violence and afterwards the front door of the bank. The officers resumed their avocations as usual. They have certainly the possession—they have got it without the leave of the officer, but by what means of hocus pocus it was obtained, whether by a charm or key, is not positively ascertained, however shrewdly suspected.

The bank has taken no steps at all to plead—not having entered its appearance at the rules. No step has been taken at the clerk's office by the other party in the course of yesterday. It is said, that the plaintiff has made propositions of a compromise, which have certainly not yet been accepted.

Ere we close this matter, we will state that Mr. Prosser did not give the key of the vault to the cashier, never having had it in his possession—but simply requested him to deposit his valuables, &c. in the vault and to keep the key of it, as the key to the outer door was sufficient for himself. The writ has never been served upon the sheriff—one was taken out, but from some cause or other has not been executed—one reason probably was, that it was found the right way to proceed against him was not by way of writ, but by summons.

This whole dispute is, in fact, between one individual and the bank of Virginia—it is for one thousand dollars, which is a mere pittance, compared with the resources of the bank—Mr. Fisher thinks himself entitled to specie—The bank, though as ably managed, and as really competent to meet its engagements as any bank in the union, is unwilling, because it thinks it expedient, while other institutions have locked vaults, to pay out its gold and silver at this time. It has zealously prepared for the resumption of specie payments—it is as willing, and will be as able to do it in a short time, as any other institution—but thinks it is its duty to act in concert with others!

It is in fact a sort of carte and tierce—a mere trial of skill. Mr. F. wishes to cut the bank short. The bank wishes a little time—time, not for itself, but to allow the other banks an opportunity of preparing to pay out specie—and thus to prevent those banks, or any others, from crippling its own treasured resources.

January 20.

The Bank—Again. No other legal step has been taken—no compromise yet between the plaintiff and the bank—some negotiations have taken place, but nothing definitive settled. We have nothing new to give on the subject.

Executive Appointments.

The following appointments, made by the PRESIDENT of the United States, during the recess of congress, have been recently confirmed by the SENATE, viz.

Foreign Articles.

Treaty between France and the allied powers, concluded at Paris, on the 20th of November, 1815.

Translated for the Commercial Advertiser.

In the name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity!

The allied powers having, by their united efforts, and by the success of their arms, preserved France and Europe from the destruction with which they were menaced by the last attempts of Napoleon Bonaparte, and by the revolutionary system reproduced in France in support of said attempts.

Participating with his most Christian majesty in a wish to consolidate, by the inviolable preservation of the royal authority, and the introduction of the constitutional charter to its full vigor, the order of things happily re-established in France, as well as to restore the relations of confidence and reciprocal good will between France and the surrounding nations, which the unhappy effects of the revolution and the spirit of conquest have so long interrupted.

Persuaded that this last object can only be accomplished by an arrangement adequate to insure just indemnity for the past, and a solid guarantee for the future—

Have taken into consideration, in concert with his majesty the king of France, the means of realizing this arrangement; and having acknowledged that the indemnity due to the powers can neither be wholly territorial or pecuniary, without interfering in some degree with the essential interests of France, and that it would be most expedient to combine the objects proposed, in order to avoid those two inconveniences, their imperial and royal majesties have adopted this basis for their actual negotiations; and being mutually convinced of the necessity of preserving, for a determinate period, in the frontier provinces of France, a certain number of allied troops, they have agreed to combine the different dispositions founded upon this basis, in a definitive treaty.

To this end, and for this purpose, his majesty the king of France and Navarre, of the one party, and his majesty the emperor of Austria, king of Hungary and Bohemia, for himself and his allies, of the other part, have named their plenipotentiaries, to discuss, to conclude, and sign the said definitive treaty, to wit:

ART. I. The frontiers of France shall remain as they were in 1790, with the exception of the modification of both parties, which are indicated in the present article.

1. On the frontiers of the north, the line of demarcation shall remain such as the treaty of Paris had fixed it until it reaches opposite to Quicrain; from thence it shall follow the ancient limits of the Belgic provinces, of the former bishoprick of Liege; and the duchy of Rouillon, such as it existed in 1790; leaving the enclosed territories of Philipville and Marienbourg, together with the places by that name, and the whole duchy of Bouillon, without the frontiers of France; from Villas near Orval on the confines of the department of Ardennes and the grand duchy of Luxembourg, as far as Palc, upon the causeway which leads from Thionville to Neves, the line shall remain such as it was designated by the treaty of Paris. From Palc it will pass by Launsdorf, Wallerish, Schardorf, Niedaveilling, Pellweila, all which places, with their liberties (franchises) shall remain to France, as far as Houve, and from thence shall follow the ancient boundaries of the country of Sanebruck, leaving Sanc Louis and the course of the Sana, with the places situated to the right of the line above designed, and their liberties without the limits of France. From the boundaries of Sanebruck the line of demarcation shall be the same which now separates from Germany the departments of the Moselle and the Lower Rhine, as far as Lautz, which shall hereafter be the frontiers until where it empties into the Rhine. The whole of the territory on the left bank of the Lautz, including Landau, shall compose part of Germany—nevertheless, the town of Weissenbourg, through which that river flows, shall remain entire to France with a small portion of territory on the left bank, not to exceed one thousand toises, and which will be more particularly determined by the commissioners who are to run the boundary line.

2. From the mouth of the Lautz, along the departments of the Lower and Upper Rhine, Doubs and Jura as far as the Canton du Vaud, the frontiers shall remain as they were fixed by the treaty of Paris. The bed or course of the Rhine shall form the demarcation between France and the states of Germany; but the right to the islands therein, such as the same shall hereafter be decided upon, on a new survey of the course of the said river, shall remain immutable, whatever changes the course of said rivers may undergo in the lapse of time. Commissioners shall be appointed on both sides by the high contracting parties within the term of three months, for the purpose of proceeding to the said survey. The one half of the bridge between Stratsbourg and Kehl shall belong to France, and the other half to the grand duchy of Baden.

3. To establish a direct communication between the canton of Geneva and Switzerland, the part of the country of Gex, bounded to the east by the lake Lemman, to the south by the territory of the canton of Geneva, to the north by the canton of Vaux, and to the west by the course of the Versoix, and by a line which includes the districts of Collex-Bozzay, and Meyrin; leaving the district of Perney to France, shall be ceded to the Helvetic confederacy, in order to be re-united to the canton of Geneva. The line of French custom-houses shall be placed to the west of Jura, so as to exclude the whole country of Gex without the line.

4. From the frontiers of the canton of Geneva as far as the Mediterranean, the line of demarcation shall be that which in 1790 separated France from Savoy and the county of Nice. The relations which the treaty of Paris of 1814 had established between France and the principality of Monaco shall cease forever; and the same relations shall continue between that principality and his majesty the king of Sardinia.

5. All the territories and districts included within the limits of the French territory, such as they have been determined by the present article, shall remain united to France.

6 The high contracting parties, within three months after the signing of the present treaty, shall appoint commissioners for the purpose of regulating whatever may have relation to the boundaries of counties on either side; and on the completion of their labors, maps shall be drawn, and boundary marks placed, to shew the respective limits.

ART. II. The places and districts which, according to the preceding articles shall no longer compose a part of the French territory, shall remain at the disposition of the allied powers, in the terms fixed by the 9th article of the military convention annexed to the present treaty; and his majesty the king of France, for himself, his heirs and successors, perpetually renounces the rights of sovereignty and property which he hath hitherto exercised over the aforesaid places and districts.

ART. III. The fortification of Huningen having been constantly an object of uneasiness to the town of Basle, the high contracting parties, in order to give to the Helvetic confederation a new proof of their good will and solicitude, have agreed between themselves to demolish the fortifications of Huningen; and the French government, from the same motives, stipulates, that they shall never be rebuilt, and not replaced by other fortifications at a distance less than three leagues from the town of Basle. The neutrality of Switzerland shall be extended to the territory which is to the north of a line to be drawn from Ugine, including that city, to the south of the lake of Arancy, by Favorgé, as far as Locheraine, and from thence to the lake of Brouget and the Rhone, in the same manner that it was extended to the provinces of Chablais and Faucigny, by the 92d article of the final act of the congress of Vienna.

ART. IV. The pecuniary indemnity to be furnished by France to the allied powers is fixed at the sum of seven hundred millions of francs. The mode, terms, and guarantee of the payment of said sum shall be regulated by a particular convention, which shall have the same force and validity as if it were formally inserted in the present treaty.

ART. V. The state of disquiet and fermentation to which France, after so many violent shocks, and more especially since the last catastrophe, notwithstanding the paternal intentions of the king, and the advantages assured by the constitutional charter to all classes of her subjects, must necessarily be subjected, requiring for the security of the neighboring states, measures of precaution and temporary guarantees, the occupation, for a certain time, of the military positions along the frontiers of France, by a corps of the allied troops, has been judged indispensable; under the express reservation that such occupancy shall in no wise tend to prejudice the sovereignty of his most Christian majesty, nor the state of possession, such as it is recognized and confirmed by the present treaty. The number of those troops shall not exceed 150,000 men. The commander in chief of this army to be appointed by the allied powers. The corps of the army shall occupy the places of Conde, Valenciennes, Bouchain, Cambra, Le Quesnoy, Maubeuge, Landrecy, Avronnes, Rocroy, Givet and Charlemont, Mezieres, Sedan, Montmedy, Thionville, Lougwy, Bitché and the tete du point of fort Louis, France having to furnish subsistence for the army destined to this service, every thing that has relation thereto will be regulated by a particular convention. This convention, which shall be of the same force and validity as if it were verbally inserted in the present treaty, will, in like manner, regulate the relations of the army of occupation with the civil and military authorities of the country. The maximum of the duration of such military occupancy, is fixed at five years. It may terminate before that time, if at the expiration of three years, the allied sovereigns, in concert with his majesty the king of France, after having mutually examined the situation, the reciprocal interests and the progress which the re-establishment of civil order shall have made in France, shall unite in acknowledging that the motives which led them to the adoption of these measures have ceased to exist. But whatever may be the result of their deliberations all the places and positions occupied by the allied troops, shall, at the expiration of the term of five years, be evacuated without any further delay, and restored to his most Christian majesty, his heirs and successors.

ART. VI. The foreign troops, exclusive of those which shall compose a part of the army of occupation, shall evacuate the French territory within the period fixed by the 9th article of the military convention annexed to the present treaty.

ART. VII. In all countries where the sovereignty is transferred, either by virtue of the present treaty, or of arrangements that are to be made in consequence thereof, the inhabitants, natives as well as strangers, of what condition and nation soever they may be, shall be allowed the space of six years, to be computed from the exchange of the ratifications hereof, to dispose of their property, if they see fit, and remove to such country as they may choose.

ART. VIII. All the dispositions of the treaty of Paris, of the 30th of May, 1814, relative to countries ceded by this treaty; shall equally apply to the different territories and districts ceded by this treaty.

ART. IX. The high contracting parties having taken into consideration the different claims arising from the non-execution of the 19th article of the treaty of May 30, 1814, as well as the additional articles to said treaty, signed between Great Britain and France; desiring to render more efficacious the dispositions contained in the said articles, and having for that purpose determined by two separate conventions the measures to be executed by both powers for the complete execution of the aforementioned articles, the two conventions such as annexed to the present treaty shall have the same force and validity as if the same were herein inserted verbatim.

ART. X. All prisoners made during hostilities, as well as all hostages that have been given or detained, shall be restored with the shortest possible delay, together with all prisoners made anterior to the treaty of the 30th of May, 1814, and which have not yet been restored.

ART. XI. The treaty of Paris of the 30th of May, 1814, and the last act of the congress of Vienna of the 9th of June, 1815, are confirmed and shall be maintained in all their parts, which have not been modified by the present treaty.

ART. XII. The recent treaty, with the conventions hereunto annexed, shall be ratified in a single act, and the ratifications thereof exchanged within two months, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and hereunto affixed the seal of their arms.

Done at Paris the 20th of November, in the year of grace, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE.

The high contracting powers, sincerely desirous of carrying into effect the measures which were the subject of their deliberations in the congress of Vienna, relative to the complete and universal abolition in the traffic of the negroes of Africa; and having already in their several states interdicted their colonies and subjects from any part whatever therein, engage anew to unite their efforts in order to ensure the final success of the principles which they have proclaimed in the declaration of the 4th February, 1815, and to concert without loss of time, by their ministers at London and Paris, on the most efficacious measures to procure the complete and definitive abolition of a commerce as odious as it is highly reprobated by the laws of religion and of nature. The present additional article shall have the same force and validity as if it were inserted verbatim in the treaty of this day.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed these presents, and have hereunto affixed the seals of their arms.

Signed, &c.

On the same day, in the same place, and at the same moment, the same treaty, together with the conventions and articles thereunto annexed, was signed between France and Great Britain, France and Prussia, France and Russia.

The duke of Richelieu, president of the council, on submitting the treaty between France and the allies to the two houses, made a long and doleful speech to reconcile the people to the necessities that imposed it upon the king's ministers—stating, also, that higher demands had been made on the part of the allies and withdrawn.

The duke of Richelieu has declared to the two houses that the treaty between France and the allied powers did not contain any secret article.

The Jesuits.—The emperor of Austria, as prince of Venice, has forbidden the re-establishment of the Jesuits in his dominions.

Venetian navy.—The emperor of Austria, as prince of Venice, having espoused the sea, after the manner of the ancient doges, it is stated will give immediate orders for the restoration of the Venetian navy, on an enlarged scale.

The French chamber of deputies, elected, if the word may be used, a little after the manner of the rotten boroughs in England, appears entirely devoted to the king: of the peers' devotion there is no danger—nor of the priests. France is uneasy and very unsettled, if we may judge from the few facts that reaches us, such as the appointment of special commissaries and the like—but the slavery of the press is such that we know little else than what the king's ministers will that the people should know.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

Session of the 27th Nov.—secret session until noon.

The president, charged with addressing to his majesty in the name of the chamber, their thanks for the communication of the treaty of peace, communicated the speech which he had made to the king and the answer of his majesty. The following are the two documents:

"Sire, your faithful subjects of the house of deputies, thank you for not having despaired of the safety of the state. They feel that your magnanimous virtues have spared our country from the greatest evils. The house, sire, partakes of your profound grief; but encouraged by your royal resignation, it resumes strength for so many trials. Its unalterable confidence in your majesty; its love for your sacred person, and the union of Frenchmen, to whom it will furnish an example, will alleviate the weight of the sacrifices which are imposed upon us. Faithful to the word of the king, France, with the Divine aid, will show to the world at what price she knows how to guard the faith of treaties."

His majesty replied—

"King of any other country, I should have lost all hope; but the king of France can never despair of Frenchmen. Let them but be united, and our misfortunes will be repaired."

After hearing this reply, the house rose spontaneously, and made the house resound with the cry of Vive le Roi! Vive le Roi!

The Jews of Germany have appointed dictes, charged with claiming on their behalf, from Diet, which is about opening at Frankfort, equality of rights with the other citizens.

Thirty thousand persons are said to be confined the French prisons, "being suspected of being suspicious!" Wellington is the high constable. Many accounts lead us to expect a new explosion.—Could Bonaparte land again in France, even alone, there would be a smart race between Louis and his keeper, with all his army of "Waterloo men," to get out of the country. France seems ripening for a reaction, to expel the foreigners who lord it over the kingdom. The allies appear aware of this, but cannot always guard against it. What happened at Madrid some years ago, may be re-transacted at Paris. If Wellington's army be killed off, will the English call it a "glorious revolution," as they did the massacre of the French at Madrid?

A letter from Bordeaux states that every letter examined by the agents of the government at the post-office. It estimates that France will be "depleted" of property and effects of all kinds to the value of $400,000,000—a "legitimate" sum! And says—

"The royal catholics and the protestants of the south, particularly about Nismes, are at open war. The former have driven the latter out of their church at Nismes, butchering a number of them and assassinating the general Legarde, who was a worthy man and a faithful friend to the true interests of his country. We Americans feel ourselves very uncomfortable, detested by the royalists throughout France, but particularly in this truly English city.

A London paper of the 25th of November, after speaking of marshal Ney's trial, says, "of the other reputed conspirators, it is said that Fouche and Boult will be brought to trial."

Lanjuinais, it is said, means to absent himself during the trial of Ney.

London, Nov. 25. There has been, we understand, a vast influx of suspicious foreigners, and some dangerous characters, from the continent, within the last few days; but we have the satisfaction to assure the public, that the utmost vigilance to discover and remove them, prevails at the home department.

Sum.

The French general Clausel is at New-York.

By our latest advices from France, marshal Ney was under trial before the house of peers. Many witnesses had been examined. Opinion as to his acquittal or condemnation is various.

CONGRESS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, January 19.—After the presentation of several petitions—

Mr. Root, in offering a motion on this subject, said, that the want of a national circulating medium had been a topic of much complaint. This subject had been referred to a committee, and that committee had reported a bill for establishing a national bank as the means of producing the desired uniformity in the national currency, as regarded the circulation and exchange between different sections of the nation. But the evil of the absence of small change, Mr. R. said, was as generally felt by all classes of the community, as the difficulty of remittance of large sums. For a premium you can any where get from a broker such large money as will circulate; but not so with the small change that is in circulation, which, such as it is, will scarcely pass a stone's throw from the place where one receives it, and will scarcely be accepted by the servants at the taverns. How was this evil to be remedied? By the act establishing the Mint, congress had enacted, that the copper coin should be of a weight below what was the real value of the metal in bolts, bars, or sheets.

The copper coin originally weighed eleven pennyweights; by a subsequent act of congress in 1792, it was ordered that the cent should weigh 208 grains, or 8 dwt. 16 gr. By a subsequent act the president was authorized to reduce the weight of the cent, by proclamation, whenever he should think fit, two pennyweights. Such a proclamation never had been issued, Mr. R. believed, and the weight of the cent therefore remained 8 dwt. 16 grs. A pound avoirdupois, therefore, contained thirty-three cents and six and a half mills; whilst copper had frequently been much higher, and during the war double as much per pound—the price, however, being now reduced, was probably about par with cents. Owing to the high price of copper, the coinage of copper coin at the Mint had ceased for some time. It now appeared from the report of the director of the Mint, that the Mint was about to re-commence the coinage of copper, of which it was estimated they could turn out about fifty tons in the course of a year. These coins, Mr. R. said, would, according to law, be distributed among the respective states, according to their population; they would be distributed in quantities, in casks, and there retained for sale as an article of merchandize, until the price of copper should be so much higher than the value of the cents, as shall afford a sufficient profit on the sale of them, for the purpose of being melted up for sheets, bolts, or stills, &c. Mr. R. said he presumed the director of the Mint was mistaken in supposing the cents already coined remained in the United States, unless in the form of bolts, &c. The copper coin of the United States had never been made a legal tender, because, being worth more generally than the nominal value, people were glad enough to take them. There never had been any punishment enacted for counterfeiting it, because, for the same reason, there was no motive for the offence. If the weight should be diminished, however, both these measures might become necessary. He therefore moved—

"That the weight of the copper coin ought to be reduced to four pennyweights the cent.

"That the copper coin of the United States ought to be made a legal tender to the amount of one dollar.

"That provision ought to be made by law for the punishment of counterfeiting the copper coin of the United States."

On motion of Mr. Culhoun, these propositions were referred to a select committee.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the report of the committee on the rules and orders of the house.

As usual, this report, in its various details, gave rise to much debate, and especially on the subject of the rule for the previous question, which was brought before the house by a motion of Mr. Stanford to strike it out, or so to vary it as to deprive it wholly of its present character.

This motion Mr. Stanford supported by a number of remarks, and a full expression of his aversion to the rule. He was followed by Mr. Randolph at some length, on the same side of the question.—To both these gentlemen Mr. Clay (the speaker) replied in favor of the rule, as to the right and expediency of it. Mr. Gaston followed in a speech of great length against the rule.

On this subject there was as much eloquence displayed as any question calls forth, though the subject is in a great degree technical, and so far not interesting to the people generally. In debating it, however, it is placed by those opposed to it on the footing of an actual curtailment of their representative privilege, and therefore a violation of their rights. To which its friends reply, that the right to pass the rule is unquestioned, and that its expediency and even necessity to the operations of the house, are alike demonstrable by argument, and proven by the practice under our government.

The committee rose without coming to any decision on the question.

SATURDAY, JAN. 20.

The house, on motion of Mr. Lowndes, again resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the remainder of the report of the committee of ways and means, embracing sundry propositions in respect to the revenue, Mr. Nelson, of Va. presiding over the sitting.

The resolve first in order, having been read in the following words:

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expences of government, and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the United States, and to provide for assessing and collecting the same," passed on the 9th January, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied for the year 1816, and succeeding years, to three millions; and also, so to amend the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expences of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a direct tax upon the district of Columbia," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, as to reduce the direct tax to be levied therein, annually, to 9999 20-100.

Mr. Lowndes made a speech, as long as his delicate health would allow, in defence of the general principles of his report, and in reply to certain reflections cast upon it a few days ago by Mr. Randolph.

Mr. Randolph rejoined in a speech of about half an hour's length, principally in defence of himself, in regard to certain inferences drawn by Mr. L. in regard to Mr. R's opinion on financial questions.

These speeches were both too long for present publication, and on too important a subject to justify abbreviation.

The question being about to be put on the first resolution—

Mr. Clay said he approved of the general system contained in this report, and with some modifications, should give it his support; but, he thought it was susceptible of amendment. He thought the amount of the land tax too high for the ordinary season of peace. It was not necessary to go into an enquiry as this moment, whether the land does not eventually pay all taxes, in whatever shape levied or collected; but he laid down the general principle, that, in time of peace, we should look to foreign importations as the chief source of revenue, and in war, when they are cut off, that it was time enough to draw deeply on our internal resources. Mr. C. said, he thought we ought to reduce the land tax still lower than proposed, and also some other of the taxes which appeared most burthensome in their nature; retaining enough to keep the system of internal taxation so organized, as that an addition to the existing taxes only would be necessary to produce immediately such an accession of revenue as should make it adequate to the necessities of the country. Mr. C's plan was, to make up for his proposed decrease of the direct tax, by an increase of the duties on imports. He wished to reduce the direct tax to two millions, or to a million and a half; and when that proposition was decided on, he was desirous of proposing another, that the tax should be limited to one year, so as to make it a tax from year to year, instead of a tax without limitation.

Mr. Hardin desired to strike out the whole amount proposed, so as to leave the sum blank; which blank he should be opposed to filling at all. He was opposed to any direct tax for the purpose of expensive military and naval establishments; and said he should offer, some day next week, if no other member would, a motion that the army establishment be reduced.

Mr. Clay so varied his motion, to accommodate his colleague, as to move to strike out the sum entirely, and leave in the resolution a blank, to be filled as the house should think proper.

Mr. Randolph was opposed to the motion to reduce the direct tax. Although opposed to any part of the system, he preferred the direct tax to the excise, because, every man then knew and felt what he had to pay. He was in favor of making the direct tax an annual bill, as proposed by the speaker, but expressed his surprise at the speaker's opinion that in peace we should rely on the imposts for revenue, and in war an internal taxation, &c.

Mr. Desha spoke in favor of a repeal of the direct tax, and in support of it, urged some arguments not distinctly heard by the reporter.

Mr. Clay made a few remarks in reply to Mr. Randolph and Mr. Hardin, and went on to remark—it had been said, that this was a time of profound peace. It was true, we were happily at peace with all the world; but who knew how long it would be our good fortune to remain so? What was the present state of our relations to old Spain? Who could now say with certainty, how far it might be proper to aid the people of South America in regard to the establishment of their independence? He did not know how other people thought on these subjects, but they made a serious impression on his mind. We have recently heard, said he, and I believe the information came from the minister himself, that a demand has been made by the minister of the Spanish government for the surrender of a part of the soil of the country; he meant that part of the country formerly known by the name of West Florida, which lies west of the Perdido, and part of which is now incorporated in the state of Louisiana. Mr. C. said he would not speak, in the terms in which he might be authorized to speak, of the impudence of such a demand; but he considered it indicative of the general disposition of the government which that minister represented. Besides, he asked, was the state of Europe settled? Every one had heard of the proceedings of the congress of European potentates at Vienna; we have heard, too, that their ideas of legitimate government were carried to an extent destructive of every principle of liberty; we have seen these doctrines applied to create and overthrow dynasties, at will. Do we know, said he, whether we shall escape their influence? Do we not know, though no such intention may exist at present, we shall, by adopting that policy which recommends a reduction of the army and navy, invite their attention to our weakness? Mr. C. said he was for preserving the system of internal revenue, on a reduced scale.—He wanted to see Europe settled; to see the relations between this country and Spain placed on a footing which would insure tranquility on our borders. Until he saw these things, he was not for exhausting the purse of the country of the funds necessary to enable it to vindicate its rights at home—or, if necessary, to aid in the cause of liberty in South America.

Mr. McKee said he was in favor of leaving the resolution blank as to the amount of direct tax. He perfectly concurred with his colleague, (Mr. Hardin) that unless a disposition should be manifested in congress, different from any thing indicated either by the proceedings of this body, or by conversations out of the house, he should be opposed to filling the blank at all. Let me, said he, ask the speaker (Mr. Clay) whether we would have dared in 1812 to have laid a direct tax of three millions of dollars, or any tax at all, for the purpose of supporting the peace establishment we now have? When particular circumstances in 1812 demanded an increase of our army, and of the resources necessary to support it, what was the course which the national legislature resorted to, to render those measures palatable? Did we not say, those measures should exist only during war? Did we not say that within one year after the return of peace, the nation should be relieved from taxation? Now that peace was restored, ideal dangers were to be conjured up, to justify the maintenance of large establishments—and where was the government, that could not at any time conjure up reasons such as these? Against the doctrines which his colleague (Mr. Clay) had expressed, and no doubt candidly and honestly entertained, Mr. McKee said he as sincerely and candidly entered his protest, as he (Mr. C.) had against the opinions of his colleague (Mr. Hardin.) The doctrines of this report, Mr. McKee said, occupied the very ground which was taken in Great Britain a century ago, and would certainly produce the same effects here as they had done there, if like causes produce like effects. Shew me the nation, said he, with large expenditures of money, large taxes to support it, and I will shew you a people who have no substantial freedom, whose liberty is a mere phantom, and has no substance in it. Would any one say that the liberties of the people of Great Britain were not as well secured as they were a century ago? Their rights exist with the same guarantees; they have the freedom of press and of speech: why then do we say, and truly say, the people of Great Britain are the subjects of an unrelenting tyranny? Because they are oppressed by a system of taxation taking from the mouth of labor its bread, and depressing the industry of the country. Like causes would produce like effects in this country. Were gentlemen not now hunting up causes of alarm as motives for maintaining these expensive establishments? Had any individual in the house proposed to reduce the national expenditure? He had expected the financial committee would have begun its operations by proposing to lop off some of those excrescences which have grown out of the necessity of the times. There is not a tax on the statute book for which, Mr. McKee said, he did not vote; but he did so to meet the occasion which demanded them. He did not vote for taxes or for military establishments at those times, to saddle the American people with them for ever. They had now answered the occasion for which it was said they were created, and he was for repealing them; though he agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, if any internal tax was to be retained, it ought to be the land tax. It was a preferable tax, because it comes home so the feelings of the poor and the rich—every man feels it—it does not slip unnoticed through society. But, if it were continued, with other taxes, unless better reasons were assigned for them than had been, Mr. McKee said he was much mistaken if gentlemen would not soon hear of it in a manner infinitely more authoritative than any argument he could urge.

Mr. Randolph moved that the committee should rise; because, he said, a fact had fallen from the speaker (Mr. Clay) which would have much weight on the proceedings of the house when it came properly before them. According to the genius of this government, none of its ministers had seats on the floor of this house, and consequently those members become the medium of communicating its sentiments who stand high in the confidence of the executive—Who should stand high in its confidence if the speaker of this house did not?—and he had made a declaration, with a view to influence the vote of the house on a money bill too, involving matter of deep and high import. Mr. R. said he did not wish that the opinion and influence of the speaker should have that effect on the deliberations of this house which it ought not to have in case the negotiation—if there were one pending—between us and Spain, should be in a better state than that of which the gentleman had spoken. If such were the relations between us and Spain as he had represented, Mr. R. said it might have, and perhaps he might say, ought to have, considerable weight on the great questions now pending. For his part, however, Mr. R. said he, like the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. McKee) could not be frightened with the raw-head and bloody-bones of old Spain. He believed that general Andrew Jackson and the Tennessee militia would give a good account of all the Spaniards who will ever shew themselves west of the Perdido, and their red brethren the Creeks, the Choctaws and Seminoles, to boot. He—[Here Mr. Clay rose to explain, and Mr. Randolph gave way for the purpose.] Mr. Clay said that, when up before, he had not said or intimated, nor did he intend to be understood, as communicating any fact which the executive was in possession of in relation to the views of Spain. He had no conversation with any member of the administration on the subject. He alluded to a rumor, equally he presumed in the possession of the gentleman from Virginia as of himself—he had heard it as coming from the minister himself at a public entertainment. Mr. Clay denied that he had any relation with the executive, the cabinet, or any of its members, other than any other member of the house had or might have. He had not now, nor ever had, any other relation. Whilst up, if the gentleman would permit, he would make a single remark on a part of the gentleman's argument. The gentleman had shewn, by the latter part of his remarks, that this motion was wholly unnecessary—for, though the gentleman had commenced by saying that a fact had been communicated which would have an important bearing on the question before the house, he had ended by saying that, if the fact were true, he would trust to general Jackson and the Tennessee militia to drive all intruders from the soil in that quarter. Mr. C. said he believed the bravery, the heroism of those citizens would be a safe reliance; but he was disposed, if necessary, to afford them auxiliary aid, &c. without drawing too largely on their patriotism.

Mr. Randolph resumed the floor. Although the fact communicated by the honorable speaker to this house might not have come from any member of the cabinet, nothing could be more natural than for Mr. R. to suppose it might; for he said, when he was intimate with the members of the cabinet, he had been let into their secrets, and perhaps too deeply into them. Although this rumor which had come, as the honorable speaker had told them, from the Spanish minister, might not have any influence on his vote, he doubted whether it would not have considerable influence on the votes of other gentlemen. It was not logical—in the fashionable phrase it was a non sequitur; to say, that because the rumor did not affect him, it might not affect the opinions of others: for perhaps the honorable speaker will allow, said Mr. R. that I am impregnable to arguments of such a nature. With respect to this rumor, Mr. R. said he was at the first of it. He never had had any communication with any minister, domestic or foreign, but at his instance; he never had nor ever would he. He was now, he repeated, at the first of this rumor. Stated as this rumor had been, was it no cause why the committee should rise? He thought it was—he knew that the speaker had not intimated that he had obtained his information from this or that source; that Mr. R. said, was an inference of his own—but, as far as language can convey ideas, he was both deaf and stupid if the speaker had not intimated that the state of our relations with Spain, combined with the reported demand of the Spanish minister, would influence his opinion on the subject before the house. As for South America, Mr. R. said, he was not going a tilting for the liberties of the people of Spanish America—they came not to our aid—let us mind our own business; let not our people be taxed for the liberties of the people of Spanish America.

Above all, Mr. R. said, he did not mean to pour out the blood and treasure of his constituents for the sake of the people of Carraccas, and Mexico. In fact he did not want to go on in the track of Aaron Burr and Jonathan Dayton—he did not want any of the territories in that region by conquest, purchase or voluntary cession. If they established an independent government, he would maintain with these people, as with all other nations, the relations of peace and amity. This struggle for liberty in South America, Mr. R. said, would turn out in the end something like the French liberty, a detestable despotism. You cannot make liberty, he said, out of Spanish matter—you might as well try to build a seventy-four out of pine saplings. What ideas, he asked, had the Spaniards of rational liberty; of the trial by jury; of the right of habeas corpus; of the slow process by which this house moves and acts? None—no, said he, none—expediency, necessity, the previous question, the inquisition—these were among the engines belonging to their ideas of government. The honorable speaker, Mr. R. said, had told the house on a late occasion, that he saw instances of this or that in the British house of commons: the honorable gentleman had been sent on a late occasion by our government to Europe—he had been near the field of Waterloo—Mr. R. said he was afraid, the gentleman had caught the infection; that he had snuffed the carnage—and when a man once catches that infection, like that of ambition or avarice, whether taken in the natural way, or by inoculation, the consequences are permanent. What, said Mr. R. increase our standing army in time of peace on the suggestion that we are to go on a crusade in South America? Do I not understand the gentleman? [The speaker here intimated a negative to this question.] I am sorry I do not, said Mr. R. I labor under two great misfortunes—one is, that I can never understand the honorable speaker—the other is, that he can never understand me—on such terms an argument cannot be maintained between us—therefore, for his share, Mr. R. said, he should put an end to it.

Mr. Clay then rose, and said, that he did not know how the gentlemen could possibly have understood him as desiring to augment the army at this time, or as desiring to undertake a crusade to South America. [Mr. R. intimated across the house, that he had inferred his views, and not quoted his language.] Mr. C. said as the question was for the committee to rise, he was precluded from going into the general argument, which he deferred till a proper opportunity.

Mr. Calhoun was in favor of the motion for the committee to rise; because, he said, this was a question involving momentous considerations. On the ways and means depended every measure of the government. On the decisions of the questions now before the committee, depended the question whether a liberal and enlightened policy should characterize the measures of the government. Gentlemen ought therefore to proceed with caution. If gentlemen were of opinion that our navy ought not to be gradually improved; that preparation ought not to be made during peace for preventing or meeting war; that internal improvements should not be prosecuted—if these were their sentiments, they were right in desiring to abolish all taxes. If they thought otherwise, it was absurd, it was preposterous to say, that we should not lay taxes on the people. Mr. C. said gentlemen ought not to give into the contracted idea, that taxes were so much money taken from the people; properly applied, the money proceeding from taxes, was money put out to the best possible interest for the people. He wished, he said, to see the nation free from external danger and internal difficulty. With such views, he could not see the expediency of abolishing the system of finance established with so much labor and difficulty. It was a subject which ought to be approached seriously and deliberately. The broad question was now before the house, whether this government should act on an enlarged policy; whether it would avail itself of the experience of the last war; whether it would be benefitted by the mass of knowledge acquired within the few last years; or whether we should go on in the old imbecile mode, contributing by our measures nothing to the honor, nothing to the reputation of the country. Such would not be his course. He believed this great people, daily acquiring character and strength, would excite the jealousy of foreign powers. He had no hostility to the power to which he had particular reference; but he had a friendship for his own country. He thought it due to the wisdom of its councils, and to its security, that it should be well prepared against possible assaults from abroad. If danger should come, we shall then be able to meet it. If it never come, we shall derive sufficient consolation from a knowledge of our security. In this view of the magnitude of this topic, and to give gentlemen on every side an opportunity of speaking on the question which is now opened, which is to decide whether we are to travel downward, or to raise the nation to that elevation to which it ought to aspire, he should vote for the committee's rising.

Mr. Clay intimated, that, under similar considerations, he also should vote for the committee to rise.

Mr. Lowndes expressed his wish that the committee should not rise; and Mr. Sargeant spoke in favor of its rising in order to obtain some official information which he deemed necessary to a correct decision of the question before the house.

Mr. Johnson, of Ky. spoke strongly against the committee's rising, on account of the great time already consumed in debate on other topics, the rapid progress of the session, and the multitude of topics demanding the attention of the house, &c. which required that less time should be consumed in debate.

Mr. Hardin said he wished also to express his sennadian refugees, who joined the American army during the late war with Great Britain; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. Robertson offered for consideration a resolution to this effect:

Resolved, That the president of the United States, be requested to lay before this house such information as he may possess, which he may not think it improper to communicate, relative to the demands said to have been made by the government of Spain for the cession of a part of Louisiana.

Mr. R. said he felt it his duty to make this motion, in consequence of the reports with which papers, in various parts of the nation, teemed, in respect to this subject. If it was a topic highly interesting to the people of the United States generally, it was particularly so to the people of the state which he represented, (Louisiana.) They had been sufficiently annoyed and vexed for the last fifteen years, by frequent changes and rumors of changes of their form of government; and whether this report were true or not, it was proper that the minds of his constituents should be quieted in regard to it. The immense distance at which they were situated from the seat of government would make them more anxious to know the truth on this head; and he should feel that he neglected their interests if he failed to make the effort which he had done, to remove all doubts from their minds on the subject.

The motion was agreed to without debate and without a division; and Messrs. Robertson and Clayton appointed a committee to lay the same before the president.

The engrossed bill to continue in force the acts therein mentioned, (the act laying a duty on bank notes and notes discounted, and the bill laying a duty on sugar refined within the United States) was read a third time. The question on the passage of the bill was decided as follows, Mr. Randolph having required the yeas thereon, in order, as he said, to record his vote against it:

For the bill	103
Against it	43

The engrossed bill to reduce the duties on postage to their old rates, was read a third time and passed.

The house then again resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Nelson in the chair, on the remainder of the report of the committee of ways and means.

The question before the house, on the last adjournment, and which now recurs, was, on a motion of Mr. Clay to strike out three millions, the amount of the direct tax proposed to be levied annually on the United States—

Mr. Clay, considering the decision of the house yesterday, in regard to a proposed increase of the duties on imports, as decisive against his object, which was to substitute for a part of the proposed direct tax, a small additional duty on imports, calculated to produce the same amount, withdrew his motion.

He then moved to amend the resolve respecting the direct tax, so as to limit it to one year, with a view to place it annually under the control of this house.

This motion was agreed to by a large majority.

Mr. Hardin then moved to amend the resolve, so as to declare it expedient to repeal the direct tax laws altogether, except so much as is necessary to enforce the collection of the tax already due.

In support of this motion he made a speech of about an hour in length.

Mr. Conner then spoke about half an hour in opposition to the motion; and

At the suggestion of Mr. Randolph the committee rose and reported progress, and

The house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 25. A letter was received from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the motion of Mr. Atherton the other day, a statement of the amount of valuation of lands, buildings, slaves, &c. in each district within the United States.

The house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the report of the committee of the whole house in regard to the revenue.

The resolution respecting the direct tax being under consideration, together with Mr. Hardin's motion to declare it expedient to repeal the said tax—

Mr. Randolph rose and spoke on the subject nearly four hours. He had not concluded, when, being requested to give way for the purpose, the committee rose, on motion of Mr. Ross. Mr. Randolph is opposed to the direct tax, and to the system of internal taxation generally.

When the committee rose, the house adjourned.

SENATE.

Friday, January 19. The consideration of the bill to regulate the commerce between the U. States and the territories of Great Britain, according to the convention of commerce, &c. was resumed.

After some further debate, the question of its passage to a third reading was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Condit, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Taylor Varnum, Wilson—10.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, N. H. Talbot, Tait, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Wells, Williams—21.

So the bill was rejected.

[On the foregoing, the National Intelligencer has the following remarks:

"It cannot but be disagreeable to the public to perceive that a collision of opinion has arisen between the senate and house of representatives, on the subject of their respective powers; the senate having rejected the bill from the house of representatives, for carrying the treaty of commerce with Great Britain into effect. Our regrets on this occasion, are, however, greatly alleviated by the knowledge, that this difference proceeds from no division of sentiment in regard to the treaty itself; not a single member of either house having expressed an inclination to throw any impediment in the way of giving to its stipulations the most complete effect. The question is one entirely constitutional in its nature; and the difference of opinion confined to the question, whether legislation be or be not necessary to give the treaty effect.

If this be a question not yet adjudicated under the great national charter, it is fortunate that it has presented itself on an occasion, where no party feelings nor motives of expediency can be supposed to influence the decision of it, and every circumstance favors the exercise of the unbiassed judgment of both branches of congress on the question."

The senate did not set on Saturday.

The details under the congress head, highly interesting, making much more than was expected, has excluded the Chronicle articles prepared for this paper.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

SUPPLEMENTARY TO NO. 22, OF VOLUME THE NINTH.

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, NO. 29, SOUTH CALVERT-STREET, AT $5 PER ANNUM.

Editors of newspapers friendly to the WEEKLY REGISTER, are politely requested to give the article that immediately follows two or three insertions, inviting the attention of their readers to it by a short editorial paragraph, in such terms as they think it deserves. The favor will be duly appreciated.

Niles' Weekly Register.

This work has been published at Baltimore since the first of September 1811—and, consequently, takes in a period of the most interesting events which have occurred at home or abroad—presenting to its possessor a greater quantity of documents and facts belonging to the history of America and Europe, than ever before was compressed into one work—and, as to things past, a body of matter that never can be supplied by any other publication.

It is printed on a sheet of fine super-royal paper, in octavo—paged and calculated for binding, with a complete index for every volume. Each volume (taking in the gratuitous supplements) contains about 450 pages, and there are two volumes per annum, for five dollars, payable in advance. Advertisements of all sorts are excluded; and its capacious pages, and small, but good, type, gets in more matter than has before issued from the press in book-form, sheet for sheet, in any country.

To those who have seen and examined the WEEKLY REGISTER, any description of its plan is deemed superfluous. Its merits or demerits are seen on the slightest inspection. And, while, with an honest pride, the editor observes that many of the most distinguished characters in the United States, with some in Europe and South America, have, with the most flattering encomiums upon him, decidedly approved of its plan and execution,* there are also many that he feels confident would be glad to

*I am decidedly opposed to the system of puffing. But, perhaps, in some cases it may be an act of self-justice for a man to speak of himself—in the language of others. I have received, indeed, a liberal share of compliment, as well as patronage. But the following, from the hero of Erie, received at the moment I was writing the paragraph to which this note belongs, seems so happily to support what is advanced as to the properties of the work, that I venture to publish it—assured that he will pardon the promulgation of what was meant only for myself, if he shall believe it can prove beneficial to me. The com. had very recently purchased a set of the work.

Extract of a letter from Commodore O. H. Perry, to the Editor of the Weekly Register, dated U. S. ship Java, Newport, January, 1816.

"Permit me, sir, to offer you my congratulations on the success of your labors, which have given to your countrymen an authentic record of events, in an amusing shape, at a most interesting period of our history. I trust that this work will continue to receive that support which it has so richly earned.

"Accept, sir, the assurance of my respect, and believe me to be, your obedient servant, receive the work, who have yet only distantly heard of it, if they have heard of it all: to such, the following brief outline of its contents is respectfully offered:

THE REGISTER CONTAINS:

1. ALL the important public documents and papers of the United States,—civil, military, or miscellaneous—with a complete history of the proceedings of congress,—and, occasionally, the speeches of members at length.

2. Most of the important documents and papers of the several states, with notices of the proceedings of their legislatures, on all generally interesting occasions.

3. A great body of foreign documents and papers, with a history of foreign events, sufficient to keep up an intimate knowledge of what is passing in other parts of the world.

4. Notices of the history, geography and present state and condition of men and things, foreign, and domestic—with a particular view to the latter, illustrated by numerous laborious tables compiled for the work, and original essays and remarks.

5. Biographical sketches of distinguished individuals, especially of men eminent for their services to the United States.

6. Many of the important laws of the United States, and reports of important law cases, of interest to the people at large.

7. A great number of original articles on politics, statistics, manufactures, &c. &c. with exhibitions of the resources of states, &c.—their industry and natural advantages, and the like—on a broad and comprehensive scale. In politics, it is proper to observe, that party questions are excluded, and that nothing is inserted with electioneering or local views, while personal character is never assailed. The cast of the paper is certainly republican—not in the meaning of the term as applied to a class of politicians in the United States, but on the principle of the constitution thereof; and is decidedly and actively opposed to the principle of monarchy and its friends. The advantages of our system of government are duly appreciated, and the horrors and hypocrisies of despotism exposed; that we may love and cleave to the republic as the ark of our safety and happiness.

8. Essays and facts in almost every department of the sciences—with some amusing articles, and a record of events, under the head of the "Chronicle," as they occur.

However extensive the range thus stated may appear, it is, perhaps, considerably within the scope of the work. The editor thinks he ventures nothing when he says, that, in the whole, it affords the most perfect co-temporaneous view of men and things that ever was published—being compiled with the most persevering and unwearied attention to preserve every thing that may be useful or interesting. And its contents are as well calculated for one part of the union as another—nothing local being introduced. It is without doubt, the cheapest periodical work that ever was printed.

The REGISTER, is transmitted by mail, very securely packed, to any part of the United States, and missing numbers are gratuitously supplied.

Supplement to Vol. IX.

It is with sincere regret the editor states his belief that a supplement to the 9th or present volume of the WEEKLY REGISTER, is indispensably necessary to that perfection it is so earnestly desired this work should have. Gentlemen may esteem the honesty of the declaration as they please—but the editor can say, that his ambition to give value to this publication is only a shade different from the object of subsisting himself and his family by it—and that the proposed supplement is not offered with a view to pecuniary advantages—for, as has been before stated, the profits on such extra-sheets have not yet repaid the labor and expence bestowed upon them. The busy times through which we have past, require it. A season of peace will settle us down into a state that will prevent a further necessity for a procedure of the kind, and the editor truly hopes that this may be the last time that he shall feel it due to the reputation and character, and the utility of the WEEKLY REGISTER to publish a supplement, at an extra charge.

Notice is therefore given to subscribers, that a supplement of twelve sheets, to cost one dollar, will issue for the 9th, or present, volume of the WEEKLY REGISTER, as soon after the close of the volume as possible. Gentlemen wishing to possess it, will have the opportunity of ordering it when, in March next, they pay up the current year's subscription; and those who have already paid in advance, will please to intimate their desire to have it, as soon as convenient.

The supplement will contain, among many things "too tedious to mention"—such principal laws of the United States as may be passed by the present session of congress, at the time it is published;—a considerable quantity of neglected public documents and papers, of various descriptions; narrations of past events, at home and abroad; a mass of foreign state papers, &c. with a journal kept at Paris during the late momentous events there, by a distinguished American, first published in the Richmond Enquirer, worth, of itself, the whole charge; many biographical sketches, with a body of miscellaneous, curious and interesting, in every department, in which will be included a number of the best political pieces which the late war gave rise to. All which will be collected with the most sedulous attention, and the grand object of acquiring all possible information for his work, as a book of reference, in the most judicious manner, to the people of the United States, of every rank and condition.

Legislature of Pennsylvania.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

At no period of our existence as a nation has our character stood so deservedly high and our prospects been so bright as at present. Single handed we have waged a glorious war against a nation of all others most able and willing to cripple our commerce, annihilate our navy, and dry up the sources of our independence and happiness. An honorable peace has brought with it an abundant commerce, which will enable our government to meet all demands and provide for all probable future wants.—The navy, which in our contest with Great Britain was the first and the last portion of public force which covered itself with glory, and the nation as with a shield, has, within a few months, carried our fame into other nations, and conquered another enemy. After liberating our captive fellow-citizens, it dictated the terms of peace. The Barbarian pirates, that for centuries have plundered and extorted tribute from all Europe, have been humbled by the youngest nation of the earth. The crescent of the east has been eclipsed by the rising star of the west, and we should be more or less than men, if these repeated gallant achievements of our countrymen at home and abroad, did not make us proud of the name of Americans; a pride which it is honorable to cherish, and which I trust will be cherished, until every man who is entitled to the appellation will feel so much of its dignity as to make it a respectable passport throughout the world.

Since the meeting of the last legislature, events the most important, extraordinary and unexpected, have agitated and convulsed Europe. An individual, attended by a body guard, confiding in the affection of the people and the devotion of the army, landed on the shores of France. His name, the herald of his glory, was hailed with acclamations; he rode as in a triumphal car to the capital; not an arm nor a voice was raised against him, and he was in a few days seated on the throne which a Bourbon had hastily abdicated. The sovereigns of Europe combined against the man whom a nation had welcomed. They poured their armies upon France like a mighty torrent, and a single but sanguinary battle decided the fate of that kingdom, and hurled from his throne that man whose genius and talents had caused kings and empires to forget their hatred and unite against this mighty one as the common enemy of all. The allied armies entered France, and compelled her to drink deep of the cup of which she had made others taste. France, the first and most faithful ally of the United States, is devastated and dismembered by foreign arms, while those of her own children, instead of being turned against the invaders, are employed in destroying each other. United, they would have stemmed the tide of invasion and turned back the waters of bitterness upon those who are now consuming their means of subsistence, violating the dearest objects of their love, and turning them from their homes, hungry and houseless. As human beings we must feel for our fellow men, nor can we help feeling acutely for the sorrows and sufferings of those who stood firmly with us in our day of adversity, who with their arms assisted to raise, and with their blood to cement, the glorious temple which we raised to independence. Shall those awful dispensations of Divine Providence pass before us without our being deeply impressed with the baleful consequences of being a divided people? We must unite upon national ground; we must cherish a national spirit and become an united people against all foreign foes; or (which God forbid) the day may come when we, like the people of France, in sack-cloth and ashes may weep over the ruins of our unhappy and dismembered country. The page of history is full of the most impressive lessons, but if any one truth be more repeatedly or impressively illustrated, it is the necessity of union amongst the people.—Let us be wise, and profit by the experience of ages. In our late war we had too much of contention, too much of division, but, Heaven be praised, with all our embarrassments and all our drawbacks, a just and glorious war has been terminated by an honorable peace. Long may the peace continue; long may the nation repose in honor and safety on the laurels with which our faithful militia, our brave army, and gallant navy have profusely strewed the land, the ocean and the lakes. The best way to preserve peace, is to be prepared for war. We live in an eventful age, and duty requires prudent preparations to meet those dangers which jealousy, hatred and envy may engender. The late war has done more to secure the permanence of our republican institutions and to establish for us a character abroad, than its most zealous advocates and most sanguine friends could have hoped. It has shewn us our strength and our weaknesses, and we owe it to ourselves, our posterity and mankind, to profit by the knowledge thus acquired.

During the late war the soil of this commonwealth was never trodden by an hostile foot, yet it had at one time a greater number of militia and volunteers in the service of the United States than were at any time in the field from any other state in the union. Our militia and volunteers were actually engaged with the enemy in Canada, on Lake Erie, at Baltimore and elsewhere, and stood ready to repel him from the states of New-York and New-Jersey. These are proud facts for Pennsylvania, and I could not deny myself the gratification of placing them, without comment, before our fellow-citizens; not, however, without cherishing the hope that they may stimulate to such legislative proceedings as shall make the militia the best and safest, as it must always be the surest, instrument for the support of national independence, and the preservation of internal tranquility.

Experience has shewn the futility of the idea of converting every man into a soldier. An efficient defence must in my judgment be sought in a select militia. Such a body, always organized, disciplined and well appointed, can on any emergency be promptly brought into the field; and so long as freedom is appreciated and patriotism inherited from a brave ancestry, we shall never want abundant materials to form such a force. To attain this desirable object, it would seem only necessary to add and foster the spirit that animates our youth, by granting immunities to those who shall enrol themselves in select corps to serve such a period as may be fixed by law, holding forth to him who honorably discharges his duty, future exemption from service, a liberal remuneration for the uniform and accoutrements furnished by him, and for the time he shall have spent in acquiring the art of war. It is well observed, in the farewell address of the great and good Washington; that "timely disbursements to prepare for danger, frequently prevent greater disbursements to repel it." The whole male population between certain ages might be held in reserve, enrolled and mustered perhaps once a year. The quantity of labor which would be performed by this latter body on those days now spent in attempting to teach them the military art, would be in value equal to the expense which ought to be incurred in organizing and equipping a very considerable body of select militia. I cannot dismiss this subject without declaring my conviction that the late war has manifested the patience under privations, the military ardor, and innate courage of our fellow-citizens. In the south, where difference of language, of habit, and even of national prejudices, tended to disunite and distract, yet all were, through delicate attentions, sagacity, firmness and super-eminent qualifications of one of the first heroes of the age, made subservient to the general weal, sources of the most honorable emulation, and causes of the most glorious triumph.

The reports of the brigade-inspectors made agreeably to law, of the arms, ammunition, military stores and camp equipments, in their respective brigades, exhibit much valuable property, some of it in such a state as to impress the legislature with the necessity of collecting it into depots where it can receive the attention necessary to preserve it from destruction. I would suggest that an arsenal for such purposes be built at the seat of government, and another some where near Lake Erie. Of the rifle, so destructive to an enemy in the hands of our hardy woodsmen, there are few the property of the state. I would recommend the purchase of some, and an increase also of field ordnance.

The loan also of $300,000, directed by a law of the last legislature, to enable the United States to pay the Pennsylvania militia and volunteers who had been in service the last campaign, was effected as soon as practicable. Unfortunately the sum was not sufficient to pay all who were entitled, and congress not having made any appropriation of monies for the payment of militia, some remain unpaid even at this late period. If any thing should prevent congress from promptly attending to this subject, I would recommend an additional loan to enable government to pay those meritorious citizens who are yet unpaid. Legislative exposition is required of the law giving additional pay out of the state treasury, to our militia while in the service of the United States. It is doubted whether the provision of the law extends to and embraces the cases of those of our militia who had been ordered into the service, but who were arrested on their march by the order of the secretary at war before they arrived at the place of rendezvous.

A declaratory law appears necessary to prevent in certain cases a deprivation of the elective franchise. The letter of the constitution does not, as is found in practice, secure that invaluable right to all those who are believed to be within the spirit of its guarantee. It is submitted to your consideration whether, under legislative provisions, the qualifications necessary to exercise the right of suffrage may not be more clearly defined and better secured, than if all cases of doubt are left to the decision of irresponsible officers, whose decisions on similar points are as dissimilar, as are the feelings, prejudices or opinions of the different individuals who constitute the various election tribunals throughout the state.

Relieved from the various and complicated duties incident to a state of war, the legislature will turn more of their attention to the cultivation of the arts of peace and the amelioration of such of our laws as may be found to have any unsound analogy to the severity of European policy. First in order, and first in the interest of humanity, stands a completely revised penal code. The materials in the report of the attorney-general, and reports and bills of late legislatures on this subject, will, it is hoped, be found so ample as greatly to lighten the labor of graduating a scale of crimes and proportionate punishments. A system of criminal jurisprudence which shall, as far as human laws can, shield persons and property against outrage or injustice, and yet be tempered with mercy and mildness, is, I am confident expected by the christian and philanthropist. In the contemplated system, it is hoped, will be introduced ample provision for the suppression of vice. In addition to what on this subject is mentioned in a communication I had the honor to make to a former legislature, dated December 10th, 1813, to which I beg leave to refer, permit me to suggest the propriety of preventing, as well the demoralizing practice of holding unauthorized fairs, and of so regulating those that are authorised, as to prevent their being scenes of dissipation and vice, rather than marts for the purpose of sale and barter, as the preventing also the violation of the law against lotteries. Its penalties are openly evaded, under the specious name of "distribution of property;" by this ingenious device, swindling is practised to an enormous amount. It would in a great measure prevent or at least tend to lessen the evils of drunkenness, if the property of habitual drunkards were placed in the hands of trustees, without whose consent debts subsequently contracted by any such mentally diseased person, should by law be irrecoverable.

Frequent and serious reflection has confirmed the suggestions made in the communication above alluded to, that the results of forfeited recognizances in cases of personal wrong, ought of right to be applied to remunerate the parties injured; also as to the modification of the sums to be paid for tavern licences: provision to be made to prevent the too frequent setting aside the verdicts of juries (now become more necessary, when new trials are ordered for reasons having no bearing upon the merits of the matter in controversy:) respecting larcenies committed without the state: the inefficiency of the writ of habeas corpus: the frequent applications for pardon, and the want of a court of revision in capital cases. I beg leave to introduce to your notice also, that it frequently occurs in counties where the sitting of the court of quarter sessions is limited to four days, that criminals cannot be sentenced, because a verdict of guilty is not found within that period. Imprisonment to the next term is the consequence, costs are incurred and the escape of the criminal hazarded. For remedy, I would recommend a continuance of that court during the week in which it commenced, and a continuance so much longer as may be necessary to completely end by verdict and judgment any cause commenced during said week. As it frequently happens that persons accused of the higher grade of offences are not arrested and secured in time, so that a precept can issue for holding at the next session a court of oyer and terminer, I would propose that at a court of quarter sessions, the president being present, a court of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery may be opened and held, though no precept for that purpose may have been previously issued. I would propose, also, that seduction be punished as a criminal offence. The law by which persons wrongfully accused of crimes and misdemeanors are compelled to pay the costs of their own witnesses, is oppressive and dissimilar to the usage in other cases. It ought to be provided, that where the return of ignoramus is made by a grand jury, or where on trial a verdict of not guilty is rendered, and the prosecutor is ordered to pay costs, the juries shall respectively determine, whether the defendant's costs shall be paid by the prosecutor or by himself. If an indictment for a nuisance in a public road or highway is on trial not sustained, it ought for obvious reasons to be provided, that the prosecutor shall not be liable for costs, unless there be evident malice and want of probable cause.

The object in the contemplation of a late legislature, in having reported by the judges of the supreme court, such parts of the English statute law as are in force in this state, is confidently anticipated from the present general assembly.

No sufficient reason presents itself to my mind, why the trial of issues in fact is imposed on the judges of the supreme court: so much time is thereby consumed, as makes it impossible for them to hold the courts of error twice a year. I would suggest a provision for the trial and disposal otherwise of such causes, and an injunction that the supreme court be held twice a year in each of the several districts of the state. That an allowance by a judge must be had before a writ of error or of certiorari can issue, proves often derogatory to personal liberty. Those writs, because the judge who allows them has no discretion, might with safety be sued out from the supreme court and courts of common pleas respectively, without such allowance, and the affidavits required on those issuing from the latter court, might be taken before the prothonotary or before a justice of the peace. Arbitrators, it would seem, agreeably to a decision of the supreme court, cannot non-suit a plaintiff. Should they not possess this power, so that they may not be required to try a cause where there is no evidence? Powers co-extensive with those of the supreme court to reverse arbitration proceedings, ought to be vested in the courts of common pleas, which now seem to be denied to the latter. Under the arbitration law of 1810, the plaintiff appealing gives bail for the money; but the defendant, who generally is under the temptation to appeal for delay, is only required to enter special bail. This requires correction. The defendant should certainly not appeal with greater facility than the plaintiff. The sureties of sheriffs are now exonerated at the end of two years after the office expires, a period too short for the development of the various transactions incident in many counties to that office. I would recommend that sheriff's bonds hereafter to be taken, as respects their sureties, should be of force for five years after the expiration of the office. The ambiguity in the 20th section of a law, passed 24th of February 1729—30, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the province of Pennsylvania," declaring who shall not be elected sheriff, has created much difficulty. I would recommend the repeal of that section, and the enactment of a law amply guarding the citizen against oppression by the officer, and defining clearly incompatibilities. Sheriffs omitting to return judicial writs at or before the day they are returnable, ought to be personally responsible, unless it happened from some unavoidable cause.

The people are frequently subject to laws for months before they are promulgated.—This is much complained of and ought to be remedied, by directing that laws of a general nature, taking effect within six months after their passage, shall be published in newspapers. Decisions by courts of law which regard acts of assembly, should be represented to the legislature; and uniformity of decision on similar points would more generally prevail throughout the state, if written decisions and all others of importance made and pronounced by courts, were reported and published. These subjects being for the most part intimately connected with the administration of justice, criminal and civil, will, I feel assured, engage your serious consideration.

The subject of manufactures, from full experience during the restrictive system and the war, is now so well understood as respects the practicability of advantageously carrying them on, as to the kind of goods which may be made and the quality and durability of the articles which have had a fair experiment amongst us, that it is deemed unnecessary to urge arguments in their support. The general government, fully aware of the importance of the subject, will it is confidently hoped, follow the dictates of political wisdom, and protect our manufacturers against injurious foreign competition or combination: a contrary course would protract the long and anxiously sought real independence of our country, and again impose on us a dependence almost colonial.—So far as individual state means can aid national measures for the promotion of this and other desirable objects, we may confidently pledge the co-operation of faithful Pennsylvania, who we anticipate will soon take a conspicuous and permanent rank amongst manufacturing nations.

At no time since the existence of our government, was the utility and value of inland navigation more clearly evinced than during the late war. The embarrassments, disappointments and losses to the government and citizens, consequent from the want of that mode of intercourse and transportation, for warlike as well as commercial purposes, have been so manifest, that further excitement than a reference to the example and projects of our sister states and other nations is deemed to be useless. It may, however, be proper to add, that notwithstanding appropriations of near a million of dollars of the public treasure during a short period, and the extraordinary expences of the state during the war, our resources are unimpaired, and, united with individual wealth and enterprise, are equal to the accomplishment of any practicable water communication. I presume again to invite your attention to those two highly important objects: the connection of the waters of the Chesapeake and the Delaware, and those of the Susquehanna and the Schuylkill.

On the subject of education, I regret to say, that of the many seminaries throughout the state which have been aided by grants from the legislature, few have gone into operation on a liberal scale, and those are unprosperous for the want of sufficient funds. This state of things is probably owing to a too general diffusion of individual support and public bounty; and such would not have been the result, if endowments by the legislature had been more consonant to the constitution which directs that "the arts and sciences shall be promoted in one or more seminaries of learning." While on this subject I feel it a duty to say, that from various considerations and local causes, the injunction, that schools be established throughout the state in such manner that the poor may be taught gratis has not been carried into effect, to the extent nor in the liberal spirit of that instrument.

It is with high gratification I refer the legislature to the auditor general's exposition of the financial concerns of the commonwealth. So abundant has been our revenue, that of the debt of 300,000 dollars, contracted under an act passed the 25th of February 1814, to pay expenses incident to the war, there remains unextinguished but 45,000 dollars. This balance could now be paid, but will not be received before it is due agreeably to the contract. And we have a well grounded hope soon to extinguish the loan to the state of the other 300,000 dollars first above alluded to, without embarrassing the treasury, and of meeting also in due time any unapplied for appropriations, as well as any probable reasonable expenditure for the further improvement of the state, which the prevailing spirit of liberal policy can dictate to a wise and prudent legislature.

For proof of how little the just and necessary war in which the nation has been engaged has obstructed the channels of wealth, and for evidence of the continued happiness and general prosperity of the state Pennsylvania exultingly look to the many and lately erected monuments of public spirit, amongst which are seen, bridges over the Delaware and Schuylkill, and four over the bold and rapid Susquehanna. Three of them completed within three years from the commencement of the work, and the fourth at the seat of government rapidly progressing. A bridge is also building at Berwick over the N. E. branch of the Susquehanna. A turnpike road from Philadelphia by way of Reading to Sunbury, is extending itself towards Erie, dividing the state into two nearly equal triangles. Another turnpike road from Philadelphia by way of Lancaster, is progressing along the southern boundary of the state towards Pittsburg, a place which bids fair to be the great manufacturing mart of western America. A general spirit of public and private liberality observable in every section of the state—an unparalleled progress of arts and manufactures—vast and valuable agricultural improvements, abundant harvests and consequent increase of wealth—these indisputable and unerring indications of a prosperous community, are amongst the blessings which copiously flow from a rational government administered by the people's agents for the people's good. May we continue duly to appreciate those inestimable principles of religious, civil and political liberty, and to be duly grateful for the favors lavished upon us by him, who is the giver of all good.

I am persuaded that your sound judgments and pure motives, aided by local knowledge and a concentration of public opinion from every part of the state, will readily discern and promptly adopt those plans which will best promote the happiness and well being of the commonwealth; and I promise a cheerful co-operation in all measures tending to a judicious regulation of our finances, the equal distribution of justice, the promotion of useful knowledge, and generally an inculcation and fostering of all the virtues which constitute the strength and can alone secure permanence to governments, founded as are our state and national constitutions on the equal rights of man.

SIMON SNYDER:

Harrisburg, Dec. 8, 1815.

Legislature of Ohio, GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives.*

I congratulate you on the happy change of circumstances, which has taken place since the adjournment of the last general assembly. It has pleased the Almighty Sovereign of the universe, to restore peace, with all its blessings, to our beloved country.

When we retrospect and consider, that we were engaged, single handed, in a war with one of the most powerful nations on earth; that the war was waged by that nation with the most vindictive fury; that certain portions of the union, to say the least, were lukewarm in the prosecution of the war; that our liberties and independence were menaced; and in a word, every thing dear to us jeopardized—with what gratitude should we offer the most sincere thanks to Almighty God, for the restoration of this happy state of things which we now enjoy.

The brave men who defended the country in its perils and difficulties, who taught an invading foe, that freemen know how to defend their rights, have a claim to our grateful acknowledgments.

The good people of Ohio may retrospect with pleasure. They have throughout the struggle, been faithful to themselves and to their country. They have with fidelity discharged their duty to the nation.

Blessed with peace, and already from the fruitfulness of our soil, with an abundance of every thing calculated to make life comfortable, let us not forget the Almighty and Bountiful Giver of every good gift.

Selected by your fellow citizens for the most important purposes, it belongs to you gentlemen, to set an example of piety and gratitude to God, and industry and moral rectitude in the discharge of the highly important duties committed to you. Your example will have the most salutary effect. You have the most wide and extended field, gentlemen, for the exercise of your talents. You govern and direct, under Providence, the destinies of a sovereign and independent state—one among the most flourishing of a great republic.

And now that we have peace and leisure to review the past and avail ourselves of the lessons experience taught us, which must be fresh in the minds of every one, it becomes the sacred duty of those to whom the people have committed the management of every thing dear to them, to use their best exertions to promote the welfare and happiness of the state—to develop its resources, which are truly great, and call them into action—to provide for future exigencies by the establishment of funds, which may be resorted to in times of difficulty and necessity, and for the education and morals of the rising and future generations, are duties, whilst they are highly important, I am persuaded, will be highly pleasing to you.

It is to be regretted, that the legislature is so restricted by the constitution as to be unable to make any material change in our judiciary system. I have no doubt, but it will in a few years, become absolutely necessary to resort to a convention, to alter this part of the constitution, so as to give more extensive powers to the legislature: indeed, with an increased population and the addition of the new counties which the limits of the state will justify, the present constitutional provision on this subject cannot, without great difficulties, be carried into effect. Experience has proved that the present system is both expensive and inconvenient. Whether any advantage will result from the addition of a fourth judge to the supreme court is doubtful.

I recommend this subject to your consideration, and under any change which may take place, cannot but believe, the legislature will see the propriety of increasing the salaries of the judges of the supreme and circuit courts.

When we consider the continual intercourse absolutely necessary for the comfort and convenience of society, the great importance of good roads which may facilitate this intercourse, must be apparent to the most superficial observer. The present system for improving our roads is in my view of it defective. The limitation is too great both as to personal labor and taxes. These are not well applied, nor is there the proper responsibility.

The law limits personal labor on the public roads to two days in each year, and the tax to an amount not exceeding the county tax. Both should be increased, when the necessity of the case may require it. The supervisors are the friends and neighbors of those called out to work on the road, are elected by them, and when called out it too often happens, that, either from fear of offending or other causes, the time is spent in idleness, or the little labor bestowed misapplied, and if not misapplied, falls short of what the roads require. It is true, the law provides for inflicting a sufficient penalty on the supervisors who fail to do their duty; but from the causes abovementioned, no one will take the proper steps to punish delinquents. Thus our roads are neglected, and become almost impassable, to the great injury of the passengers and the public at large. The act gives to the supervisor no authority to cut timber for the repair of the roads; this power under proper restrictions, is necessary.

The allowance per day as a commutation of labor in the place of tax, is too small. I recommend to the legislature a revision of the act entitled "An act for opening and regulating roads and highways," and that there be appointed by the court of common pleas, supervisors on all the principal roads, at fixed periods of time at which they shall be reviewed by three freeholders to be appointed by the court, whose report shall govern the court, as to proceedings against the road supervisors. I recommend an increase of both personal labor and taxes, where necessity requires it. Impressed as I am, it becomes my duty to recommend to the legislature a change in the manner of appropriating the fund arising on the sale of public lands, applicable to making and improving public roads within the state.

The distribution of this fund among the counties, I am induced to believe is productive of few, if any, salutary consequences to the public, except the circulation of the amount distributed, whilst it is attended with many of a pernicious nature. The money goes into the hands of a road commissioner, who is not under sufficient responsibility for its application, and expends it with little or no advantage to the public; for, even if he is faithful, the sum is so small as to produce no valuable effect.

The people, making large calculations on this fund, work on the roads with reluctance; and this is not all; its equal distribution has become the subject of electioneering intrigue.

I am persuaded that it is only necessary to bring to the notice of the legislature the evils resulting from the practice heretofore on this subject, to ensure a remedy, and a more beneficial result to the people of the state.

Of this fund, $172,925 have already been appropriated by the general assembly of Ohio, at different times. I feel confident that it has not left such permanent improvements in our roads as we ought to expect from the expenditure of so large a sum; and I regret that instead of expending any part of it as has been done, the legislature did not vest the amount as it was received in some profitable stock, the interest on which might also have been invested in like stock, until a capital would have accumulated, the interest on which would have enabled the legislature in a short time, with the aid of companies, to have made permanent and durable the principal and most useful roads in the state. It might be shewn, that if this fund had been applied as has been mentioned, for the last ten years, the annual interest on it, at this time, might be made to exceed the present receipts from the United States and appropriation by the legislature. I have taken this view of the application of this fund, to shew the legislature what may be done with it in future if rightly applied. If we examine the results likely to be produced by the congress of the United States, from the application of a less fund on the national road, commencing at Cumberland, in Maryland, and leading towards Ohio, it will be found the views taken are perfectly correct.

It is deeply to be regretted, that legislators, like individuals, are too apt to act upon the apparently pressing expedient of the moment. We know it is not wise in individuals to do so, even for their short lives, much less so for a legislature, which has the power of governing for succeeding generations. If those who have gone before us had been governed by expediency, and such a course had been adopted by those who first emigrated to this continent, to say nothing of those to whom, under Providence, we are indebted for the liberty and happiness we enjoy, may we not imagine that our situation would have been widely different?

We should emulate the example left us, and constantly use the best means of extending to future generations the blessings we enjoy, with all the additions in our power. I recommend to the consideration of the legislature, should they still deem it best to expend annually the amount received from the United States, the propriety in future of appropriating this fund exclusively to the construction and repair of such roads as may be considered by them the most important and useful, passing throughout the state; and that the same persons appointed as supervisors of roads have the application of the money in aid of county funds and labor, who shall be under proper responsibility to construct the roads, and such bridges as are necessary, in the most substantial and permanent manner.—There is good reason to believe, the improvements generally attempted to be made on our roads, are so slight as to make it necessary to repeat the attempt annually, which is a great loss of time and labor, as well as the cause of great inconvenience to the community at large.

It is certainly the province of the general government to adopt such regulations, for national defence and security, as to it shall appear best calculated to promote the general welfare and perpetuate the union, liberties and happiness of the nation. Much, however, is to be done by the state governments. They are the pillars on which this beautiful fabric, the "world's last hope," rests, and so long as each performs its part faithfully, the whole will remain firm and unshaken. The war which has just closed, affords abundant proof of the truth of this remark. In such of the states as co-operated with the national government, in the prosecution of the war, the enemy was every where repulsed, with scarcely a single exception; on the other hand, where they did not, a different result was produced. May we not hope that in future wars, (for we cannot expect, however desirable, to avoid them) that past experience will create a happy bond of union, from which, under Providence, the best effects will be produced.

It is very desirable, indeed, that the general government should adopt one general effective system for the discipline and government of the militia of the whole nation, which would enable it to command promptly, in times of necessity, the force necessary for defence; and, at the same time, ensure such a state of discipline, as to give confidence and the best prospects of success.

Until this is done, this duty devolves on the state governments. Your predecessors, gentlemen, have made repeated attempts to perfect a system for the government and discipline of the militia of this state; yet, from a variety of causes, our militia seem not to be under such government and discipline as we ought to expect, or the safety of the country requires. All military government, in the nature of things is despotic—it is unavoidable—one head must direct, and the whole corps, as one hand, must act to produce any valuable effect, whether in time of war or in peace, when discipline is to be taught. Without strict subordination and punctuality, no good result can be produced—and to attempt to infuse into a military code, all the principles which govern in civil life, is to do nothing towards promoting military discipline. I am aware that enjoying civil liberty in its fullest extent as we do, it becomes difficult to inculcate such opinions, or practice on such principles, yet I am convinced, under a well regulated militia system, with officers who will do their duty, much is to be done with men who know how necessary it is to be prepared to defend the precious rights and liberties they enjoy. The officers first in rank, should be the first to set an example of punctuality in the performance of their duties, and to excite in their respective military corps, that military order, without which nothing is to be done effectually.

From the short time the act entitled 'An act for organizing and disciplining the militia,' has been in force, little opportunity has offered to decide on its practical effects. It is, however, in my view of it, somewhat defective, and from the best reflections I have been able to give the subject, its greatest defect is, the want of such provisions as will insure its faithful execution on the part of those on whom the most important duty devolves. There are other causes which cannot be overlooked: performing, as we do, with our own hands, the labor necessary to settling a wilderness, the duties, under such circumstances absolutely necessary to provide for the support of a family, leave too little time to become perfectly acquainted with military tactics, which require much practice, and has become an intricate science of itself.

We possess, however, this great advantage—there is scarcely a man in the nation, who does not know how to use fire arms.

Under these circumstances, to provide arms with the necessary munitions of war and camp equipage, so that when wanted, they may be had without delay, is of the highest importance to the state. It cannot be forgotten, that, during the late war, the citizens of Ohio who marched to defend their country, too often were weeks without a tent to protect them from the inclemencies of the weather, or a kettle to prepare their food.

The inevitable result of such a state of things, has been and always will be, disease and death.—Having seen no reason to change my opinion on this subject, I must renew to you, gentlemen, the recommendation made to the last legislature, in my message of Dec. 20th, 1814, to provide in such manner and at such places as may be deemed most expedient, such quantities of arms, ammunition and camp equipage, as may be deemed sufficient to meet the emergency.

Every means within the power of the executive, have been used under the "act directing the collection and repairs of public arms and accoutrements," to effect the objects thereof; but the act of itself is so defective, as to make it of very little use. From the best information obtained on this subject, a great portion of the arms, the property of this state, have been delivered over to the regular troops in the service of the United States. No appropriation was made at the last session, for either the repairs or transportation of such arms as might be collected. It is expected that such arrangements can be made with the United States as will put the state in possession of the arms which properly belong to it. In a subsequent communication I will lay before you further information on this subject.

Blessed by Providence, as the good people of Ohio are, with a soil and climate producing in abundance every thing calculated to make life comfortable, even the poorest class of our fellow-citizens with few exceptions, have been able to support themselves without being a public charge.

As the country becomes more thickly inhabited, and articles of necessity higher in price, we must expect more will be thrown on the poor list. I have examined with much care and reflection the 'Act for the relief of the poor,' and am convinced that whilst it is a very expensive system, its provisions are not calculated to ensure that humane treatment to the wretched, which a grateful sense of the abundant blessings we enjoy, requires at our hands. The overseers of the poor are authorized to contract for the support of the poor, with those who will take them on the most reasonable terms. A profit is contemplated by the contractor, and most probably at the expence of a being already rendered miserable by disease and infirmity, who, if he complies, will either not be attended to, or fare the worse for it.

The difficulties too, in obtaining that immediate support absolutely necessary, are made so great, as to deter an application. It is true, it appears just, that every district of country should support the poor which properly belongs to it. Yet, however correct this may appear in theory, circumstances often occur, which render a strict adherence to the act, if not impracticable, inhumane. The act provides, that where a poor person cannot make it appear that he or she is entitled to a residence within this state, such poor person is to be removed beyond the limits of this state. I recommend to the consideration of the legislature, the propriety of a revision of the present system, so as to make the whole country chargeable with the poor within its limits, and that there be purchased in each county, a tract of land in some suitable situation, not exceeding 200 acres, for the use of the poor, on which such buildings shall be erected as to provide for their comfort, the whole to be under such regulations and management as the legislature may direct.

At present, there are very few poor in the state; many of the counties having none. Should such a system be adopted, the land which might now be purchased at a low price, would rise in value, and in the mean time be put in a state of cultivation, the profits from which would most probably support the poor of the county.

Many of the poor received into such an asylum, would be able to do something towards their own support, and at the same time be more comfortable and less expensive to the community.

Such has been the result from the experience of the neighboring states, which have changed from our system to the one now recommended to your consideration.

The "act for the inspection of certain articles therein enumerated," will claim your attention—it is seldom carried into effect: I am satisfied a well regulated system of inspection will be highly beneficial to the state.

There are many other important subjects, which merit your notice, during your session, and coming, as you do, gentlemen, from every part of the state, you bring with you the information, the talents, and patriotism which will enable you to provide for every portion of our fellow-citizens.

All the aid which it may be in my power to afford you, in the discharge of the highly responsible duties you have to perform, will be given with the most sincere pleasure.

Accept my sincere wishes, that it may please the Ruler of the universe to bless the result of your deliberations, so as to promote the best interests of your constituents, and to extend the true principles of religion, morality and knowledge, so necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind.

T. WORTHINGTON.

Chillicothe, Dec. 5, 1815.

On the 8th of January the Pennsylvania delegates in congress, at Washington City, gave a dinner to Decatur, Stewart, and Biddle—Mr. Roberts in the chair. The toasts were American—among them were the following.

The militia of the United States—In peace and in war the safeguard of liberty.

The Navy—Led by heroism and conducted by humanity, it has conquered a wreath of imperishable glory.

The Army—Distinguished for its gallantry, it has done honor to the American name.

The union of the states—The rock of our political and social happiness.

The state of Pennsylvania—May she always unite simplicity of manners with the firmness of virtue and energy of patriotism.

By the president. The nation—May it continue to exert that energy which in war obtained it respect abroad and peace at home, in developing the immense resources of prosperity and happiness within its reach.

By Com. Decatur. The state of Pennsylvania—powerful and patriotic.

By Capt. Stewart. The foreign and domestic enemies of the United States—May their machinations be restrained within just limits by Constitutional and Cannon Law.

By Capt. Biddle. The local distinctions of our country—May they be remembered only for the purposes of social mirth and festivity.

After Com. Decatur, Capt. Stewart, and Capt. Biddle had retired—

By the president. Our gallant guests, Com. Decatur, Capt. Stewart, and Capt. Biddle.

By Major Barker. The new discovery in Astronomy lately made in the Mediterranean, which takes the government of the tide from the moon and gives it to the stars.

By Dr. Darlington. The "Striped Bunting,"—May it be the universal and only passport exhibited by American seamen.

By Mr. Glasgow. Gen. Jackson—The accomplished officer and distinguished hero.

By Capt. Mulloreny. The ocean—May those who arrogate to themselves its surface, be transfixed to John Bull's Guerriere, and like crabs and crawfish crawl the bottom to Java.

Law! It is stated in a Philadelphia paper, that the court for that city and county was then in the sixth week of its session, and engaged in trying the sixth cause—and that the expences during that time, besides room rent, fire wood, &c. had amounted to $2124 90, or 354 15 for each cause! The public, perhaps, would have profited, by paying the amounts claimed. But they have got on pretty well—we have heard of a court where, for three weeks, no business at all was done but to call and dismiss the jury. It is "glorious" that judges are infallible—and that, like sapient kings "they cannot do a wrong."

Many complaints have recently been preferred on account of the irregularity with which the WEEKLY REGISTER is received, especially in Virginia and to the southward, generally. We have only to say for ourselves that we have reached the ne plus ultra in our endeavors to secure the certainty and regularity of its arrival, and can do nothing more. The fault lies in the negligence of post-masters in many instances, and, possibly, in overburthened mails in others—things not easily remedied, even by the head of the post-office department. But something ought to be done.

To the eastward our papers generally get on regularly, but they sometimes fail. On Wednesday last we received, by the same mail, Boston papers of the 30th December and 27th of January.

The REGISTER is packed with the utmost regularity, and as certainly leaves the office in this city for its destination.

☞ In the approbation of those we desire to please—a remuneration is expected for the extra labor and exertion bestowed upon the present number of the WEEKLY REGISTER. We have been furnished with an invaluable table exhibiting the battles on the land, as a companion for that lately published under the head of “War on the ocean.” It shall be inserted as soon as we can make it convenient.

Approaching the close of the volume, many valuable articles of a miscellaneous character must be postponed to afford room for the insertion of documents, &c. that properly belong to its period.

The editor's attention has been directed to a very rude attack made upon him by an eastern lawyer, who writes for an annual stipend, as his employers direct. As he would not understand the language of a gentleman or an American—this is the only notice that I can take of the hireling, did I think him worth it—which I do not.

Agriculture, Manufactures, &c.

COMMUNICATED FOR THE WEEKLY REGISTER.

STATEMENTS and remarks, addressed to Thomas Newton, chairman of the committee of commerce and manufactures, on the subject of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. By Isaac Briggs.

With great diffidence, I solicit the attention and indulgence of the chairman of this committee—of all its members—and, generally, of the present respectable audience.

The gentlemen who have preceded me in addressing you, have stood forth the champions of manufactures. I have always been—I still am, the zealous advocate and friend of agriculture. In that character I now present myself before you. You have heard, in favor of manufactures, strong logic and the graces of elocution. I am intimidated—I lament that agriculture, beyond all question the highest and noblest aim of the industry and ingenuity of our happy country, should have so feeble an advocate. “I am no orator, as Brutus is—I am a plain, blunt man—who speak right on, and tell you those things which you yourselves do know.”

VOL. IX.

I shall, notwithstanding, endeavor, by a few simple facts and statements, to exhibit:

Firstly, What would be the consequences to agriculture, of keeping her servants and handmaids in Europe and Asia, and paying their wages there:

And secondly, What would, to her, be the consequences of bringing home her servants and handmaids, of taking them into her own family, and paying their wages here.

In order to have a correct view of the wants of the United States in provisions and clothing for any particular period of time, we must compare, with the amount of population of a given time, the ascertained amount of our wants for the same time. Our population and wants will advance in the same ratio, while we preserve the same simplicity of manners. Our wants have been supplied from two sources, domestic and foreign. The domestic source, consisting of agriculture and family industry, is much the largest. From the foreign source we supply, by importation, what we may call our surplus wants, with clothing, sugar, tea, coffee, spices, &c.

From the amount of population ascertained by the census of 1790, by that of 1800, and by that of 1810, I find, on strict mathematical principles, that our population increases annually in the ratio of 3,052 for every hundred thousand, or somewhat more than 3 per cent. per annum. Our surplus wants will increase in the same ratio of course.

In the year 1804 our whole population was six millions of souls. In the same year (as appears from treasury reports) there were imported into the United States, articles of foreign growth and fabric amounting in value to 80 millions of dollars. Of this amount the value of 36 millions was re-exported, leaving the value of 44 millions of dollars, the amount consumed in the United States, averaging, on the whole population, 7½ dollars per head! 30 millions, out of the 44, was for clothing, averaging five dollars per head, for that item alone.

Let us, on these data, carry our views forward for a few years: In the year 1804, our surplus wants were for clothing 30 millions of dollars, for other articles 14 millions, total 44 millions of dollars; and our population 6 millions of souls.

In the year.	Our population will be.	Our surplus wants will be
		For clothing.	For other articles.	Total.
		Dolls.	Dolls.	Dolls.
1816	8,671,023	43,355,115	20,232,387	63,587,502

1821	10,077,476	50,387,380	23,514,111	73,901,491

The amount of duties paid to government, in the year 1804, on the 44 millions consumed in the country, was 13,220,000 dollars, and exceeds the rate of 30 per cent. Merchants' profits and other charges were certainly not less than 15 per cent. additional. Hence, instead of 44 millions, the actual cost to the consumers was 63,800,000 dollars; and in the year

1816, calculating on the permanent duties alone, would, instead of 63,587,502 dollars, be actually

Having taken a view of our wants, and examined the ratio in which they must advance, let us investigate the powers of our industry to supply those wants, and the ratio in which those powers may advance—what circumstances will probably retard, and what accelerate their progress:

It appears, by reports from the treasury department, that there was exported from the United States, in the year 1803 a surplus of domestic produce amounting in value to 42 millions of dollars; and in the year 1807, amounting in value to 49 millions of dollars. A comparison of the amounts of the exports of these two periods will afford us a ratio for the increase of the powers of labor to produce a surplus over the necessary domestic supply. Which ratio I find to be 54 per cent. per annum. The increase in the production of the single article, cotton, has been at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

Of the whole amount of surplus exported, 1-14 was the product of the fisheries; 11-14 were the products of agriculture; 1-28 was the product of manufactures, other than of cotton or wool, and 3-28 were the products of the forest—furs, skins, ashes, lumber, naval stores, &c.

From these elements, is formed the following condensed view of the classes and amounts of surplus produce, seeking a market, during the present and a few succeeding years.

In the year		Of the fisheries.		Of agriculture.		Of manufactures, other than of cotton or wool.		Of the forest, miscellaneous.		TOTAL.

There ought to be the following amount of surplus produce:

must exhibit the distribution of the surplus produce we exported in the year 1803, amounting in value to 42 millions of dollars, and then enquire into the probabilities of the present and future markets accessible to us. I assume, as an axiom, "that agriculture is emphatically the staff of political life—the only sure foundation of our prosperity, happiness and power, as a nation." This I mean to make the basis of all my reasoning on the subject. I present myself before you, my fellow-citizens, as an advocate for manufactures—not, however, exclusively so—I hope to earn, as still more appropriate, the title of "an advocate for agriculture." But agriculture must, in the nature of things, be governed by the market for its surplus productions; it must flourish when the demand of its market is steady and commensurate with its powers of supply, and languish when that demand is small and fluctuating.

In the year 1803 we exported to Britain and Ireland, and a market,	$12,000,000

British American possessions, including West-Indies,	7,333,548
British East-Indies,	16,452
	19,350,000

Italy, Trieste, Turkey, Barbary, Cape of Good Hope, China, &c.	1,000,000
West Indies, generally	2,400,000

When I consider the intelligence and political knowledge of those to whom I offer this statement, I cannot think it necessary to go into a course of reasoning to prove, what appears to me strongly and obviously probable, that the foreign demand for our surplus produce is not, nor will not be greater, in any one year, than the amount just stated—42 millions of dollars—probably less, in consequence of the stupendous changes wrought in the nations, formerly our customers, by twenty-five years of revolution and war.

If, then, I am correct in the opinion, that 42 millions of dollars, annually, will continue to be the maximum of foreign demand, while our capacities to produce a surplus will have advanced, in the year 1817, to 84 millions, double that amount, what would be the consequence of this state of things? Either a vast amount of surplus produce would lie dead upon our hands; or, by attempting to force a sale, we should reduce the price; in either case, the necessary stimulus being withdrawn, industry would languish. We must, per force, circumscribe the amount of our purchases of foreign articles within the limits of the amount of surplus produce which foreign nations will choose to buy of us, for we have no other means, than this surplus, of purchasing either merchandize or bullion, or of paying, for the support of government, the impost laid thereon. This afflictive picture might be extended; but I am persuaded it is needless—it might be shown that agriculture, leaning solely on the staff of foreign commerce, leans on "a broken reed, at best, but oft a spear, on whose sharp point peace bleeds and hope expires." A concealed weapon more fatal to national independence than the sword.

It will be observed that hitherto I have treated this subject, leaving factories, and double duties, and tariffs out of the question; and have endeavored to shew what would probably be our progress

If this course of things could continue regularly and steadily, the balance would, in the year 1823, and not before, be in our favor. But, in my opinion, it cannot exist; and were we to commence the career, it could not continue two years. In order to place in a clear point of view the considerations which have impressed on my mind this strong conviction, I without them. If they be not ultimately beneficial to national agriculture—not the agriculture of this or that particular section, but of the whole nation—I pray you reject them. Agriculture is, unquestionably, the great primary interest of the nation; manufactures and commerce are, in my opinion, its best auxiliaries. Agriculture is a noble plant; manufactures and commerce are the stimulus and the manure.

I shall now endeavor to exhibit what I believe would be the effects of such encouragement as would enable the cotton and woolen manufactures to sustain the severe pressure, and surmount the difficulties of the present extraordinary crisis; and it is believed that a protection equal in amount to the double duties, though somewhat modified in the scale, would, if not evaded, be sufficient.

It is pretty well ascertained, that if a reasonable encouragement be afforded, we may assume as a fair average of the whole of the present year, six hundred thousand spindles operating on cotton, requiring 60,000,000 of pounds, or 100,000 bales of the raw material, at 20 cents per pound, worth 6,000,000 of dollars, producing 90,000,000 of yards of cloth, at 30 cents per yard, worth 27,000,000 of dollars, and employing 100,000 persons, whose wages will amount to 21,000,000 of dollars. Without fear of exceeding the truth, we may estimate the woolen manufacture as follows: 2,250,000 fine woolled sheep, at five dolls. worth 11,250,000 dollars; yielding, at an average of 2lb. per fleece, 4,500,000 lb. of fine wool, worth, at 80 cents per lb. 3,600,000 dollars, and producing, at an average of 1½lb. per yard, 3,000,000 yards of broad and narrow cloth, worth, at an average of six dollars per yard, 18,000,000 of dollars, by the employment of 50,000 persons whose wages would be 14,400,000 dollars.

On a very moderate calculation, these establishments would advance to the equilibrium of national prosperity in the ratio of 25 per cent. per annum. Let us then enquire into the progressive effects on agriculture, on revenue, and to sum up the whole in one word, on national prosperity.

In the year		Agriculture is capable of producing a surplus equal to		Cotton.		Wool.		Provisions, equal to half the annual of wages.		Total increase of domestic market.		Balance for exportation
		DOLLS.
1816	80,000,000	6,000,000		3,600,000		18,200,000		27,800,000		52,200,000
1817	84,200,000	7,500,000		4,500,000		22,750,000		34,750,000		49,450,000
1818	88,600,000	9,375,000		5,625,000		28,437,500		43,437,500		57,183,000
1819	93,273,076	11,718,750		7,031,250		35,546,875		54,296,875		73,976,201
1820	98,169,913	14,648,437		8,789,063		44,433,594		67,871,094		90,298,819
1821	103,311,591	18,310,546		10,986,320		55,541,992		84,838,667		113,432,224

It is very probable, however, that agricultural enterprise and industry, feeling the vivifying influence of this extraordinary stimulus, would produce a greater amount of surplus than the preceding table gives; that as manufacturing establishments approach the point of equilibrium, their ratio of increase would be less; and that, therefore, the balance for exportation might not fall much below forty millions of dollars.

That agriculture flourishes in a supereminent degree—that its powers of production are greatly augmented—and that all the comforts of life are increased, not only in the immediate vicinity of, but for a considerable distance around, manufacturing establishments, is no longer mere theory—it is a broad fact which can be well attested in numerous districts, in the north-western parts of the state of New-York, in New-Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in the state of Delaware, in Maryland, and in the transmontane western country—Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

By recurring to my first table, it will be seen that I have stated the amount of our surplus wants for the present year, at 63,587,502 dollars—of this amount 43,355,115 were for clothing. Our manufacturing can supply 90,000,000 yds.

Cotton cloths at 30 cts. $27,000,000
Three million of yards woolen cloth at 6 dollars, 18,000,000

Leaving a balance of cotton and woolen goods for exportation worth $1,644,885, and reducing the balance of our surplus wants to $20,232,387 as will also appear by reference to my first table. I will state the probable effects of this course of things for a few succeeding years.

In the year		General surplus.		Manufactures of cotton and wool.		Total exportation.		Surplus wants.		Taxes.		Balance in cash.
		DOLLS.		DOLLS.		DOLLS.		DOLLS.		DOLLS.		DOLLS.
1816	52,200,000	1,614,885		53,844,885		20,232,387		500,000		8,612,498
1817	49,450,000	11,571,704		61,021,704		20,849,673		500,000		10,171,927
1818	45,183,000	12,470,643		57,653,643		21,486,199		500,000		17,967,446
1819	40,000,000	13,553,000		53,553,000		22,141,930		500,000		24,411,150
1820	40,000,000	15,800,000		55,800,000		22,817,718		500,000		35,183,282
1821	40,000,000	18,310,546		58,310,546		23,514,111		500,000		44,483,889

If the preceding statements be correct—and they will probably be found short of the fact—that they do not exceed it, I am convinced—and if the reasoning I have attempted, be sound and conclusive, what an important crisis is the present!—Pause—I entreat you—and consider it! We stand now on the mount-tain of strength—the slope is slippery, and the valley of humiliation lies below: “Facilis descensus Averni—sed revocare gradum; hoc opus—hic labor est.” If we suffer the present period to pass unimproved, we cannot hereafter recover the elevation from which we shall have fallen.

It remains now to present to your view a summary of the foregoing facts and observations, and to ask your further indulgence for a few concluding remarks.

SUMMARY.

It is a common maxim that agriculture pays all taxes; with a few exceptions, I admit its general truth. Even suppose it universally true—what are the means of payment?

The requisitions of government for the peace establishment are estimated at about the annual sum of $ 25,000,000

The surplus wants of our population are 63,587,502

The sum of these we must pay—if we can, 88,587,502

We have power to produce (at former prices) a surplus amounting in value to $80,000,000—but it is not probable we can find a foreign market for more than 50,000,000

It is therefore not worth more to us; (for factories having fallen, the domestic market furnished by them is out of the question;) leaving a balance, beyond our ability to pay, of 38,587,502

This annual balance would increase in a rapid and destructive ratio—but I think it must be obvious (as I have already said) that this course of things could not continue two years. The first effect would be, the little specie we have would depart from us, and would be soon followed by our credit and our independence.

Now let us see how our factories (if we support them) would prevent this fearful evil.

Requisitions of government, as before, $25,000,000

Surplus wants, 20,232,387

Wants to the amount of $43,355,115, being supplied by the factories.

The sum of these we must pay, $45,232,387

The domestic markets for our raw materials and provisions amount to $27,800,000

Foreign markets for surplus products 52,200,000

Ditto for manufactures 1,614,885

—53,844,885

A market is here found for the amount of $81,644,885

And our exports amount to 53,844,885

Yielding, in our favor, a balance to be returned in specie, $8,612,498

By the rapidly increasing powers of our manufacturing industry, and the invigorating stimulus thereby afforded to agriculture, (if the requisitions of government should not exceed $25,000,000, annually,) the result, in the year 1820, would probably be: Surplus produce (principally of agriculture) exported, 40,000,000

Manufactures of cotton & wool exported, 48,000,000

Amount imported for our surplus wants 22,817,718

Balance in our favour imported, 65,182,282

—88,000,000

Out of which balance we can cheerfully pay $35,000,000 taxes, and have remaining $40,182,282 to fertilize our country. Agriculture finds in that class of people who, without factories, would mostly be a dead weight on her hands, a market to the amount of $67,871,094, to which add 40,000,000, the amount of exports, and we have found markets for the value of 108,000,000 nearly, of surplus produce.

I have said nothing yet of the valuable population—the skilful artisans we should draw from Europe—“Sapientia verbum sat.”

But where shall we find a market for our manufactured cotton and woolen goods? I answer, in Mexico and South-America. This idea is not original with me; I am indebted for it to a friend. I am no advocate for an improper interference in the concerns of another nation; but I wish for the rational freedom of every portion of the human race. I think we ought to stand prepared to avail ourselves of a passing good, when it can be lawfully offered to our acceptance. We shall have a jealous and a watchful rival. A first possession will be a very strong point—those whom I address can understand me. From Mexico and South-America we want coffee, cochineal, dye-woods, mahogany, box-wood, lignum vitæ, raw hides, gold and silver, &c. But will not the strong dominion of prejudice, the slavery of mind, even more degrading than that of the body, under whose iron yoke these people groan, prevent their political freedom, and close the door of commerce against us? No—not long—though their march to liberty may not be so steady, nor their path so smooth, as humanity could wish, yet it will be progressive. “Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo.”

I would thus describe the body politic in a prosperous and happy nation:—Agriculture is the heart, the fountain of life, from which the blood proceeds, and to which it returns. Manufacture is the hands, the instruments of labor, ingenuity, and art, preparing food and raiment. Commerce is the feet, performing the necessary transportations and changes of place. And government is the head, the seat of intellect, which directs the whole with energy and wisdom.

To the chairman and committee of commerce and manufactures and to my fellow citizens generally, whom it may concern, the preceding statements and remarks are respectfully submitted, by their friend,

ISAAC BRIGGS.

Washington City, 1st month 25, 1816.

Our relations with Spain.

To the house of representatives of the United States

In compliance with the resolution of the 24th, I transmit two letters from the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Spain, to the secretary of state, with his answer.

JAMES MADISON.

January 26th, 1816.

Translation of a letter from the minister of Spain to the secretary of state, dated Washington, December 30, 1815.

SIR—The diplomatic relations between the king, my master, and the United States, being happily restored, and both governments being disposed, muusually to strengthen the ties of the most pure and perfect friendship, it is my duty to inform the president of whatever may contribute to so desirable an object; and remove the obstacles which may prevent it. On the important points on which this note must turn, I have written to you under other circumstances less favorable than the present. I will now confine myself to a plain and simple explanation of them.

The first of these points is: that the direct and official relations between Spain and the U. States, having been broken off since the year 1808, the affairs of both nations, as well as their respective frontiers, should now be placed in the same state and situation in which they were at that period; and that, in conformity to this principle, the part of West Florida, which the United States took possession of during the glorious insurrection of Spain, and have retained until this day, should be restored to his catholic majesty. This just and conciliatory measure, at the same time that it will convince the king, my master, of the purity and sincerity of the sentiments of the American government, and of their disposition to arrange and terminate amicably the several points of negotiation, will not, in the least, impair the right which it may believe it has to the whole, or a part of the territory occupied, since it will remain subject, exactly as it was before its occupation, to a frank and friendly discussion between the two governments.

The second point is as simple and obvious as the first, and I will treat of it with that confidence, with which I ought to be inspired by the indisputable justice of my importunity, the justification of the American government, and the importance of the affair.

It is known to you, and is universally public and notorious, that a facious band of insurgents and incendiaries, continue with impunity, in the province of Louisiana, and especially in New Orleans and Natchitoches, the uninterrupted system of raising and arming troops, to light the flame of revolution in the kingdom of New Spain, and to rob the pacific inhabitants of the dominions of the king, my master. The invasion of the internal provinces, the horrible assassinations committed in San Antonio de Bexar, and the names of the perfidious perpetrators of such unheard of crimes, have acquired the publicity, which great crimes always will acquire. All Louisiana has witnessed these armaments; the public enlistments (los enganchese publicos); the transportation of arms; the junction of the insurgents and their hostile and warlike march from the territory of this republic; against the possessions of a friendly and neighboring power; neither threats, nor the laws; nor the indignation of well disposed citizens, nor even the proclamation of the president of the first of September last, intended to restrain these highway robbers, have been sufficient to stop their nefarious plans. On the contrary, they prosecute them with the greatest ardor and rancor, more and more exasperated at seeing the glorious triumphs of the Spanish nation, the adhesion of his subjects to an adored monarch, and the approaching re-establishment of the relations between our respective nations. It is known to me, that they are now enlisting, in New Orleans, men for other expeditions, both by land and water, to invade again the dominions of his catholic majesty; under the direction of ringleaders Jose Alvarez de Toledo, and Jose Manuel de Herrera, who has just arrived at that city, with the appointment, as he says, of minister to the United States, from the self-styled American congress, who has delivered to Toledo, fifteen hundred commissions in blank, from that body of insurgents, that he may confer them on a like number of officers which he is recruiting in the territory of this union. I omit mentioning to you other innumerable acts of this kind, which prove the publicity of these armaments, and the impunity with which they continue. I will confine myself to stating to you, that the most common practice of nations, and the authority of the best writers on public law, would give a right to the king, my master, to require of this government, to deliver up these traitors, as incendiaries, enemies of all social order, and disturbers of the peace of his subjects; but, as the object of my sovereign is not to avenge himself of this banditti, but to shield his subjects against their barbarity, I confine myself to asking of you to obtain of the president orders for the prosecution of the principal persons concerned in this sedition, that is to say, Jose Alvarez de Toledo; Anaya Ortez; the self-styled minister, Manuel de Herrara; doctor Robinson, Humbert; majors Piere and Preire and their followers, that they may be punished with all the rigor which the laws prescribe in cases of this kind. That the troops which they have raised, may be disarmed and dispersed, and that the necessary measures be taken to prevent, in future, these evils, spirits from having an opportunity of pursuing their designs, and attempting to compromise the good intelligence which subsists between our respective governments. The president cannot but have seen with sensibility, as well the total want of effect of his proclamation, of the lenient measures which he had adopted against these criminals, who boast of recognizing no law, subordination or moral principle, as the protection and support which they have received, and do receive, from the authorities at New-Orleans, contrary to his express orders. His excellency, as he is encharged by this republic with watching over its security, and the observance of its treaties and laws, cannot but consider himself authorized to restrain the projects and hostile measures of a set of adventurers, who make war against a friendly power from the territory of this confederation, compromising its tranquility and high character, by availing himself of the means which the constitution, the laws, and his prudence offer to him for obliging these persons to abandon their designs, and to manifest to his catholic majesty the just indignation with which the U. States view the hostile plans, and the sedition of that band of incendiaries, I am certain that it cannot be concealed from the distinguished talents of the president and yourself, that the point of which I treat, is not one under the civil (or municipal) law, in which case my sovereign must have recourse to the ordinary tribunals; but that it is a manifest and flagrant violation of the most sacred laws which bind together nations mutually-perpetrated by the citizens, or residents of the union, of which the king, my master, gives information, with positive and notorious proofs, to the government under whose jurisdiction it has been executed, that they may give him competent satisfaction, with a knowledge of the act, by causing the delinquents to be punished as guilty of high treason against both governments.

The third and last point is reduced to this: that the president will be pleased to give the necessary orders to the collectors of the customs, not to admit into the ports of the United States, vessels under the insurrectionary flag of Carthagen, or the Mexican congress, of Buenos Ayres, or of the other places which have revolted against the authority of the king, my master, nor those coming from them.

That they should not permit them to land, or to sell in this country, the shameful proceeds of their piracy, or atrocities, and much less to equip themselves in these ports, as they do, for the purpose of going to sea, to destroy and to plunder the vessels which they may meet with under the Spanish flag. This tolerance, subversive of the most solemn stipulation in the treaties between Spain and the United States, and diametrically opposite to the general principles of public security and good faith, and to the laws of nations, produces the most melancholy effects on the interest and the property of the subjects of his catholic majesty. Certain it is, that neither Carthage, nor any other place in the Spanish dominions in this hemisphere, which has revolted, can be in communication with any power friendly to Spain, since either on its part, nor on that of any other government, has their independence been acknowledged; and it is, consequently, an offence against the dignity of the Spanish monarchy, and against the sovereignty of the king, my master, to admit vessels from such places manned and commanded by insurgents, and armed in the dominions of this confederacy; particularly as they are all pirates, who do not respect any flag, are justly considered the disgrace of the seas, and are execrated by all nations.

The three preceding points are of such established equity and justice, that it would be offensive to the delicacy of this government to suppose, that it could delay, under any pretext, to determine on them, in the manner I have proposed, and which I have an express order to request (solicitar) in the name of the king, my master. The prompt interposition of the president, that his majesty may be gratified, would be a new testimony of his friendly disposition towards Spain, as evident proof that he is determined to put an end to the incalculable extortions and injuries which Spain has suffered, for the space of seven years, from the gang of adventurers who have assailed her from the bosom of this republic; a means of fixing the frank and sincere system of good neighborhood which so much interests both states; and, finally, a sure preliminary to the removal of all the difficulties which may present themselves in the negotiations, which ought to terminate all the pending discussions between the two governments, and to fix forever between them a perpetual and solid friendship.

If, as I flatter myself, the president gives all the attention which is due to affairs of such transcendent importance, and yields to my solicitations, I can assure his excellency, and yourself, that there will be nothing which the king, my master, will not be disposed to do, to satisfy this republic, which may be compatible with his dignity and with the interests of his subjects.

I renew to you the assurances of my particular respect, and of my constant desire to please you, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

(Signed)

LUIS DE ONIS.

Hon. James Monroe, &c. &c.

Washington, Dec. 30th, 1815.

Translation which accompanied a note of the 2d January, 1816, from the Chevalier de Onis, to the secretary of state.

SIR—Since the last note I had the honor to address you, under the date of the 30th of December, I have received positive information that the expedition which the traitor Toledo was preparing in New Orleans, against the dominions of the king, my master, has been suspended until the arrival at that city of two bodies of troops, one thousand men from Kentucky, and three hundred from Tennessee, commanded by two American citizens, that were to be united in twenty-four days to the army of the insurgents. I abstain, sir, from offering to you any observations on a subject of such high importance, and so well established. I am well persuaded that his excellency the president will easily perceive that if the states of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana and Georgia, continue, as they do, allowing their citizens to commit hostilities against a friendly power, notwithstanding the orders he has issued for dispersing and disarming the gang of desperadoes, headed by Toledo, Humbert, Anaya, Bereardo, Suteirier, Istri, Doctor Robinson, majors Eurie and Preire, and their followers, the king, my master, will have reason to suspect, that if those meetings are not authorised by the government, they are at least tolerated. All the assurances I may give to my sovereign, of the friendly dispositions of his excellency the president, will not suffice, when compared with the evident proofs I had the honor to communicate to you in this and my former note; particularly when his majesty is well convinced of the resources and authority of the federal government, and the promptitude with which their orders are strictly observed in the whole union. I do not entertain any apprehension of the result of the expedition of these incendiaries. The European wars being terminated his majesty will be able to direct all his attention and his powerful armies, to stifle at once the growth of that insurrection; but the philanthropic heart of my sovereign, the humanity by which he is distinguished, and which constitutes the character of the Spanish nation, induce him to wish to re-establish order among the seduced, rather by mildness than by the force of arms, which cannot be effected without the effusion of the blood of his beloved subjects. This object cannot fail to be obtained as soon as the Mexican insurgents, and those of the internal provinces, cease to be furnished by the citizens of this republic, with arms, ammunition, and troops.

I shall never have the vain presumption to offer you, or the wise magistrate that is at the head of this administration, any observations on the consequences that might result against the interests of this republic by the independence of Spanish America. My wishes are only directed to equal you in moderation, and to re-establish, on the most firm and permanent basis, the relations between our governments. This sincere desire will, I hope, serve as an apology for me, while I take the liberty to present an hypothesis in this note.

I grant, for a moment, that all the Mexican empire erects itself into an independent state; that it adopts the wise constitution of this confederation; establishes a complete system of legislation; and, finally, that it enjoys all the blessings of liberty, in the same full extent as this republic. It is beyond question that the climate of Mexico is more temperate than that of the United States; the soil richer and more productive; the productions and fruits more abundant, rich, and of a superior quality; and that provisions, labor, wood, houses, clothing, &c. are in consequence of the mildness and regularity of the climates, much cheaper than in this country. If this event should take place, do you not think, sir, as I do, that so many alluring prospects, and so many evident advantages, will deprive this republic of the successive emigrations from Europe? and, what is more, of a very considerable part of the most useful and industrious inhabitants of this confederation, who would carry with them to Mexico their flour and saw-mills, machines, manufactures, their enterprising genius, in a word, their general instruction, and all the means that actually promote and vivify the commerce of these states? I flatter myself that this event will not happen; but I am fully convinced, that the consequences of this hypothesis can be demonstrated almost with a mathematical certainty; and that if the citizens of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Georgia, should reflect deeply on this subject, far from giving any aid to these vagabonds, greedy of the acquisition of gold, and regardless of the happiness of their country, they would unite themselves with the authorities of the king, my master, to punish that gang of perfidious traitors, that hide themselves in these states, with the criminal design of devastating their country. I hope, sir, you will have the goodness to overlook this digression, to which I have been carried by my warm desire of strengthening the most perfect friendship between the two nations, and to inform his excellency the president, that the orders I claim in his catholic majesty's name, directed to the trial and punishment of the ring-leaders of those armies, and to the prohibition of exporting arms, of any kind, from this country to the provinces, against my sovereign's authority, are of the greatest importance, and are supported by the existing treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, between Spain and the United States, especially the 16th article.

I expect, sir, your answer to these important points, and I have the honor to be, &c. &c. &c.

The secretary of state to the Chevalier de Onis, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his Catholic majesty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, JAN. 19, 1815.

SIR—I have had the honor to receive your letters of the 30th December, and 2d of January, and to submit them to the president.

You demand that your sovereign shall be put in possession of West Florida; that certain persons whom you have mentioned, shall be arrested and tried on the charge of promoting insurrection in the Spanish provinces, and exciting citizens of the United States to join in it; and thirdly, that the flags of Carthage, the Mexican congress, Buenos Ayres, and other revolting provinces, shall be excluded from the ports of the United States.

On the re-establishment of the diplomatic relations between the United States and Spain, it was hoped that your government would not have confined its attention to the objects in which Spain is alone interested, but have extended it to the injuries of which the United States have so long and so justly complained, with a view to such reparation as it might now be able to make. The subjects are, in their nature, intimately connected. In some important circumstances, indeed, it is impossible to separate them, since the exposition of the wrongs of the United States affords the proper answer, in those instances, to the complaints of Spain. It is my duty to bring these wrongs into view, that they may be duly considered and provided for, in case your government has, as I am bound to presume, invested you with adequate powers for the purpose.

At a period anterior to either of the circumstances mentioned in your letters, the United States had suffered great injury by the unlawful seizure and condemnation of their vessels in the ports of Spain. A treaty, providing an indemnity for those spoliation, was agreed to and signed by a minister duly authorised by each government, but its ratification, though negotiated and concluded in the presence of the Spanish government, was afterwards declined by it. At an anterior period, too, the deposit at New-Orleans, stipulated by the treaty of 1793, was suppressed. As the United States had done no injury to Spain, these acts, so hostile in their nature, and injurious in their effect, excited much surprise. It had been the uniform object of this government to make such arrangements with Spain, respecting the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the boundaries, as, securing to our citizens the full enjoyment of their rights, would place the peace and friendship of the two countries on a solid and durable basis. With this view it was sought to obtain of Spain, at a fair equivalent, the territory eastward of the Mississippi. Overtures to this effect were made to the Spanish government, and rejected. Being renewed, the minister of the United States was informed that Spain had ceded Louisiana to France, to whom he was referred for the acquisition of such territory, in that quarter, as he might be instructed to make. On the last very important event, the suppression of the deposit at New-Orleans, a special mission was instituted to France and Spain, the object of which was to avert, by amicable negotiation and arrangement, the calamities of war. Affairs had, more especially by this act of violence and hostility, reached a crisis, which precluded the idea of temporary palliatives. A comprehensive and permanent arrangement had become indispensable, of which, it was presumed, the governments of France and Spain would be equally sensible. The cession of Louisiana by France to the United States, was the immediate consequence of this mission, with such a description of its boundaries by the treaty, as, it was presumed, would leave no cause of controversy with Spain.

The mission had thus succeeded in a very important object, but there were others, of a similar character, which remained to be adjusted. The differences with Spain still existed, and to them was added, a circumstance of much interest proceeding from the acquisition of Louisiana, the unsettled boundaries of the province, which were now to be established with Spain. Under the influence of the same policy, the special mission was ordered, soon afterwards, to Madrid, to invite a negotiation, for the arrangement of all these important concerns. Spain still held territory eastward of the Perdido, which, by her cession of Louisiana, and its transfer to the United States, was separated from her other dominions, and lay, except on the side of the ocean, exclusively within our limits. The importance of this territory to Spain, in consequence of these events, in any view which might be taken of it, seemed to be much diminished, if not entirely lost, while in certain views, of which it was susceptible, it might prove highly injurious. There was danger that the continuance of a Spanish colony there, might produce jealousy and variance between the two nations. On the other hand, the United States had acquired territory westward of the Mississippi, adjoining the provinces of Spain, which, it was supposed, she might be desirous of obtaining. By mutual cessions of territory, in quarters most convenient to each other, and by forming an interval between their possessions, to remain vacant, the danger of collision might be avoided, and their good understanding more effectually preserved. By rendering justice likewise to the claims of the United States, their citizens would be contented, and their government be better enabled to control their conduct beyond their limits. Here then seemed to be a fair ground for amicable compromise between the parties. An opportunity was presented for terminating every difference, and securing their future harmony without loss or sacrifice, by either. On the result of this mission I need not enlarge. I shall remark only, that the friendly policy which produced it, was not reciprocated by your government; it was perhaps not felt; it was certainly disregarded. Every proposition of the American ministers, having these objects in view, was rejected, and none made a return by your government.

This conduct of your government, would have justified if it did not invite the most decisive measures on the part of the United States. The refusal to make reparation for preceding injuries or to surrender any portion of the territory, in the possession of Spain, to which they considered their title indisputable, or to accept fair and liberal propositions for the accommodation of these differences, or to make a proposition of any kind for the purpose, left the United States perfectly free, to pursue such course, as in their judgment a just regard to the honor, rights, and interests of the nation might dictate. In the condition of Spain, there was nothing to excite apprehension of the consequences, whatever might be the course decided on. Of this, the well known state of the peninsula, at the time, and since, and of the Spanish provinces in America, affords ample proof. The friendly policy which the United States have since pursued, is the more conspicuous, from the consideration, that your government has inflexibly maintained the unjust and hostile attitude which it then assumed, and has even added new injuries and insults to those of which I have already complained. I refer, in this latter remark, to the breaches of the neutrality of Spain, which her government permitted, if it did not authorize, by British troops, and British agents, in Florida, and through that province, with the Creeks and other Indian tribes, in the late war with Great Britain, to the great injury of the United States. It is under these circumstances that you have made the demands above recited, to which I will now proceed to give a more particular reply.

You require that Spain shall be put in possession of West Florida, as an act of justice, before a discussion of the right of the parties to it is entered on.

It is known to your government, that the United States claim by cession, at a fair equivalent, the province of Louisiana, as it was held by France prior to the treaty of 1763, extending from the river Perdido, on the eastern side of the Mississippi, to the Bravo, or Grande, on the western. To the whole territory, within those limits, the United States consider their right established by well known facts, and the fair interpretation of treaties. In a like spirit may the United States demand the surrender of all the territory above described, now in the occupancy of Spain, as a condition to the commencement of any negotiation for the adjustment of differences. When we consider how long your government has maintained what is deemed an unjust position; more especially, when we recollect that the injuries before received are still unredressed, and that others have been since rendered, there can be, it is presumed, but one opinion, as to the great moderation of this government, in acquiescing in it. But why restore this province to Spain, if it is the intention of your government, to make the title to it, in connection with other differences, a subject of amicable negotiation and arrangement? May not such negotiation be entered into, as well while it is in the occupancy of the United States, as if it were in that of Spain?

You demand next, that Mr. Toledo and others, whom you mention, charged with promoting revolt in the Spanish provinces and exciting citizens of the United States to join in it, shall be arrested and tried—their troops disarmed and dispersed.

You intimate that troops are levying in Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana and Georgia, for the invasion of the Spanish provinces, of whom one thousand are from Kentucky, and three hundred from Tennessee, to be commanded by American citizens, but you do not state at what points these men are collected, or by whom commanded; and as to the forces said to be raised in Louisiana and Georgia, your communication is still more indefinite. The information recently obtained by this department, from persons of high consideration, is of a very different character. It is stated that no men are collected, nor is there any evidence of an attempt or design to collect any in Kentucky, Tennessee or Georgia, for the purpose stated; and that the force said to be assembled under Mr. Toledo is very inconsiderable, and composed principally of Spaniards and Frenchmen. If any portion of it consists of citizens of the United States their conduct is unauthorised and illegal. This force is not within the settled parts of Louisiana, but in the wilderness, between the settlements of the United States and Spain, beyond the actual operation of our laws. I have to request, that you will have the goodness to state, at what points in Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia and Louisiana, any force is collected, the number in each instance, and by whom commanded. If such force is collected, or collecting, within the United States, for the purpose suggested, or other illegal purpose, it will be dispersed, and the parties prosecuted, according to law.

This government is under no obligation, nor has it the power, by any law or treaty, to surrender any inhabitant of Spain or the Spanish provinces, on the demand of the government of Spain; nor is any such inhabitant punishable by the laws of the United States for acts committed beyond their jurisdiction, the case of pirates alone excepted. This is a fundamental law of our system. It is not, however, confined to us. It is believed to be the law of all civilized nations, where not particularly varied by treaties.

In reply to your third demand, the exclusion of the flag of the revolting provinces, I have to observe, that in consequence of the unsettled state of many countries, and repeated changes of the ruling authority in each, there being at the same time, several competitors, and each party bearing its appropriate flag, the president thought it proper, some time past, to give orders to the collectors, not to make the flag of any vessel a criterion or condition of its admission into the ports of the U States. Having taken no part in the differences and convulsions which have disturbed those countries, it is consistent with the just principles, as it is with the interests of the United States, to receive the vessels of all countries into their ports, to whatever party belonging, and under whatever flag sailing, pirates excepted, requiring of them only the payment of the duties, and obedience to the laws while under their jurisdiction; without adverting to the question, whether they had committed any violation of the allegiance or laws obligatory on them in the countries to which they belonged either in assuming such flag, or in any other respect.

In the differences which have subsisted between Spain and her colonies, the United States have observed all proper respect to their friendly relations with Spain. They took no measures to indemnify themselves for losses and injuries; none to guard against the occupancy of the Spanish territory by the British forces in the late war, or to occupy the territory to which the United States consider their title good, except in the instance of West Florida, and in that instance under circumstances which made their interposition as much an act of accommodation to the Spanish authority there, as of security to themselves. They have also prohibited their citizens from taking any part in the war; and the inhabitants of the colonies, and other foreigners connected with them, from recruiting men in the United States for that purpose. The proclamations which have been issued by the governors of some of the states and territories, at the instance of the president, and the proclamation lately issued by the president himself, are not unknown to your government. This conduct, under such circumstances, and at such a time, is of a character too marked to be mistaken by the impartial world.

What will be the final result of the civil war, which prevails between Spain and the Spanish provinces in America, is beyond the reach of human foresight. It has already existed many years, and with various success, sometimes one party prevailing, and then the other. In some of the provinces, the success of the revolutionists appears to have given to their cause more stability than in others. All that your government had a right to claim of the United States, was, that they should not interfere in the contest, or promote, by any active service, the success of the revolution, admitting that they continued to overlook the injuries received from Spain, and remained at peace. This right was common to the colonists. With equal justice might they claim, that we would not interfere to their disadvantage: that our ports should remain open to both parties, as they were before the commencement of the struggle; that our laws regulating commerce with foreign nations should not be changed to their injury. On these principles the United States have acted.

So much I have thought proper to state respecting the relations existing between the United States and Spain. The restoration of the diplomatic intercourse between our governments, forms an epoch which cannot fail to be important to both nations. If it does not produce a result favorable to their future friendship and good understanding, to your government will the failure be imputable. The U. States have, at all times, been willing to settle their differences on just principles and conditions, and they still are. Of this I informed you in my letter of the 5th of May, as I likewise did Mr. Cevallos, in a letter of the 17th of July. It will be very satisfactory to the president, to find that your government entertains now the same disposition, and has given you full power to conclude a treaty for these purposes. I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your very obedient servant,

Linen Manufacture.

Part of a letter from a gentleman in Dublin to his friend in America, dated 30th August, 1815.

"I take an opportunity of informing you of an important improvement in the cleaning and whitening of flax without steeping, &c. and saving all the seed—By this simple improvement, flax is merely washed, well dried, the seed taken off, and beat until the bark and fibre are separated—It is then run through fluted rollers and scutched, which completely cleans the flax, leaving it of a straw color, which only requires the simple operation of soap and water to make it nearly white, with a fine silky appearance—The Linen Board has taken up this improvement and encourage its practice, and sanguine expectations are formed of its great public advantage.—Besides saving all the seed, the present tedious and disagreeable mode of steeping and bleaching by acids and alkalies, &c. are avoided, and the strength and color of the fabric wonderfully improved."

Samples of the flax, thus prepared, have been sent to this country, viz.

No. 1—The flossy specimen is the waste tow, which appears better than the old manufactured flax, and may be used for a variety of useful purposes.

No. 2—The flax cleaned in its natural color.

No. 3—The flax, after being washed with soap and water.

No. 4—A specimen of the thread.

Here follows a list of the machines necessary to save the seed, and to prepare the flax, or hemp, according to Mr. Lee's system, with the price of the machines in Dublin, viz.

Threshing machine 2*l*.; breaking do. 3*l*.; cleaning do. 3*l*.; refining do. 8*l*. 10*s*.

[N. B.—Mr. LeStrange, who made a great number of these machines for the Dublin society, and who can give full information of the process, is now in Baltimore, and may be heard of at Mr. Henry Jackson's.]

Receipts and Expenditures.

Letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting statements of the receipts and expenditures of the treasury of the United States, from the 3d of March, 1789, to the 31st of March, 1815; made in pursuance of a resolution of the house of representatives of the 20th inst.—January 26th, 1816.—Reud, and ordered to lie upon the table.

Treasury department, January 25, 1816.

SIR—In obedience to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 20th instant, I have the honor to lay before the house,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

REGISTER'S OFFICE, January 25th, 1816,

JOSEPH NOURSE:

M. Bellart spoke to prevent further delays.

The Chancellor. Defenders, you may use every argument, except such as the chamber has interdicted.

The Marshal. Since the chamber will not hear my motives (mes moyens) I forbid my advocates to add any thing; the chamber will judge me as they think proper.

The final requisition was then read.

The President addressing the accused—

Accused, have you any observations to make on the requisition?

The Marshal. Nothing at all, my lord.

The chancellor ordered the accused to retire, as well as the witnesses and the auditory.

Messenger Office, 1 o'clock A.M. Dec. 7.

From 5 o'clock the chamber remained in deliberation on the judgment, and at a quarter before 12 they decided by majority, that marshal Ney was guilty of high treason against the state, 131 voices condemned him to death, and 29 voted for banishment. The marshal was not present at the time the verdict was delivered. We had thought he could not have been shot, but it appears that there is a law that can shoot him, as has been proved by an able lawyer present.

The marshal is to be shot to-morrow (this day.)

Paris, Dec. 8. The following are the principal details subsequent to the judgment of marshal Ney. We decline offering any comments and merely state facts:

The marshal on entering his chamber at the time the court was deliberating on his sentence, appeared highly animated and supported by the strongest resolution. He embraced his counsel (M. Berryer) who said to the marshal, "You would have it so!"—"Well, my dear friend," answered the marshal,—"it is finished, we shall see each other in the other world." He then asked to dine, and eat with a great appetite; he noticed a knife lying on the table, which, on finding it attracted attention, and caused uneasiness in the persons appointed to guard him; do you think, said he, on looking at them, that I fear death, and instantly threw the knife far from him. After dinner, the marshal smoked a cigar, and then threw himself on the bed, where he slept quietly for two hours.

According to the terms of the process, the chevalier Caley read the sentence to the marshal, who asked for the consolation of religion, and expressed a desire to be assisted by M. Pierre, a relation of the cardinal of Bernis, and curate of St. Sulpice.—The inestimable ecclesiastic hastened to attend him; they passed the night together—the marshal still retained the same degree of fortitude and resignation to his fate which had actuated him throughout the whole of the proceedings.

At nine o'clock yesterday morning, the marshal was informed that all was ready for the execution of his sentence—he put on a blue coat and a round hat, and entered a hackney coach, brought for him from the place of St. Michel; the curate of St. Sulpice occupied the back seat of the coach with him—two officers of the gendarmery were in front—a great number of veterans, royal grenadiers, and gendarmes, accompanied the ceremony, which crossed the garden of the palace, and left it by the iron gate on the side of the Observatoire; on arriving at this gate, the ceremony turned to the left, and stopped at about fifty paces further, under the walls of the avenue of the Observatoire.

The marshal descended from the coach, advanced at quick pace about eight paces from the wall, and asked the officer at his side if that was the place chosen for his execution. On receiving an answer in the affirmative, the marshal turned and fronted the veterans who were to fire upon him; he took off his hat with his left hand, put his right on his heart, and said to the soldiers—"My comrades, fire at me." At that moment the officer gave the signal with his sword, and the marshal fell under their fire without moving. The body was placed on a litter, and remained exposed to the public view for a quarter of an hour; 3 balls entered his head. The venerable ecclesiastic who had attended the marshal at his last moments, remained during the execution near the coach, praying with great fervor. There were very few people present, on account of its being supposed that the execution would have taken place on the plain of Grenelle, where a great multitude had assembled.

Further particulars previous to the execution of the sentence upon marshal Ney.

At 4 o'clock he was in a sound sleep, from which he was aroused by the arrival of his wife and children, with madame Gamon, his sister-in-law. Madame Ney, on entering the chamber of her husband, fell senseless on the floor; the marshal, assisted by his guards, took her up, and after a long time remaining in that state, she began to recover;—tears and sobs succeeded. Madame Gamon fell at the marshal's feet in a similar state to her sister. The children stood silent, but did cry; the eldest is about 11 or 12 years of age. The marshal spoke for a long time with his wife and family—took a tender adieu of them, and madame Ney was carried away in a senseless state. Shortly afterwards, a veteran, who had served under the marshal many campaigns, and who was one of his guards—said, "I never expected death, marshal, without thinking of God."—The marshal stopped, looked at the man with attention, and answered—"You are right, send for my confessor." When all was ready, he would not enter the coach before the curate, saying—"Mount first, M. le curé, as I can go up quicker than you."

Marshal Ney was born at Sarre-louis, 10th January, 1769. He entered very young into service, and passed very rapidly through all the inferior grades to that of adjutant-general, which was conferred upon him by Kleber, in 1794. Never was soldier more brave—never a brave man more inconstant, more versatile. A general under the republic, a marshal of the empire; a member of the legion of honor; grand officer of the empire; prince of Moscow; duke d'Elcheuigen!

Bonaparte's arrival at St. Helena.—Government (says a London paper) have received dispatches from sir George Cockburn, from Saint Helena, dated the 25th of October—he had arrived there on the 15th. General Bonaparte is stated to be in good health and tolerable spirits. The persons of his suite are also well; but are reported in private letters to be heartily sick of their expedition. We understand he was in tolerable spirits during the whole of the voyage. But they were much damped when he was shewn the place of his future residence, on the top of the hill called Longwood, the usual residence of the lieutenant governor. He complained of its not being sufficiently large; but the real cause of his dislike was, probably, not the smallness of the house, but the position of it. It is so situated, that no person can either approach or leave it without being seen. The companions of his voyage were heartily tired of their expedition, and some of them, it is supposed, will soon entreat permission to return to Europe.

"Restoration." Religious orders were about to be re-established in Piedmont, similar to those which existed prior to the occupation of that country by the French.

Specie. A vessel has arrived at Cadiz from Lima with 3 millions of dollars—another vessel with a like sum was expected.

The calm of despotism. The abbe du Pradt has issued a new publication, entitled The Congress of Vienna; it is in the same style as the history of the embassy to Warsaw, and with reference to the present period, corresponds with the abbe Barucil's history of the Illumines, and the writings of Malet du Pau. The drift of it is to shew the danger which the world is exposed to, from the modern idea of representative government; the freedom of the press, and philosophy!!!

Drury-lane Theatre—London. The aggregate receipts of this theatre for 3 years, recently ended, was £222,906 16s. 9d.—the expences £242,493 17s. 6d. In the latter appears to be included the expence of rebuilding the house, which, it will be recollected, was destroyed by fire.

The last advices from Italy, speak of nothing but the great works which the English cause to be executed in Italy. They are fortifying the passages of the Levant—Sperzia and Cattaro—they retain possession of Caprea—they increase the works of Niareggio—they have fortified Genoa, and the last treaties have put them in possession of Corfu.

"The Society of Jesus," so called, has been re-organized at Rome. Zumiga is commissary-general for the re-establishment of the order in "both Spains."

"Restoration." Two vessels have lately arrived at the Havanna—one with 390, the other with 144 slaves from Africa. Preparations are making to pursue this trade with the greatest vigor.

Taxation. Mr. Andrews, an American merchant at Bordeaux, was taxed 6,208 francs as his share of the compensation-money to be paid to the Russians, Austrians, Prussians and English, for "delivering" France—and, it would appear, was compelled to pay it. Mr. Lee, our consul at Bordeaux, manfully remonstrated against it. The correspondence is interesting, and shall be inserted.

Ney. The gallant and accomplished Ney, has been sacrificed. It is to be feared that his fate will be the fate of every great man in France. Talents must be rooted up, before the tree of "legitimacy" can flourish there. Some particulars of his trial must lie over. He was most unfairly treated.

Arrests are exceedingly numerous in France.—There seems a determination in the allies, through the deputy king, to kill every man whose genius may disturb the "repose" of despotism. The battle of Waterloo (won by gold as history shall tell posterity) is yet to be consummated in the destruction of the heroes of France. Among those recently arrested or about to be tried, we observe the names of Soult, Delela, Lavallette, Drouet, Deceau, Vandamme, Massena.

There has been many heavy mercantile failures at Stockholm. The names of seven houses are given whose aggregate debts are about $3,400,000.

Kosciusko.

From M. H. M. Williams' Narrative of events in France.

A Polish regiment, forming part of the advanced guard of the Russian army, after expelling the French from Troyes, marched upon Fontainebleau. The troops were foraging in a neighboring village, and were about to commit disorders, which would have caused considerable loss to the proprietors without benefit to themselves; such as piercing the banks, or forcing the sluices of some fish ponds. While they were thus employed, and their officers looking on, they were astonished to hear the word of command, bidding them to cease, pronounced in their own language, by a person in the dress of the upper class of peasants; they ceased their attempt at further spoliation and drew near the stranger.—He represented to the troops the useless mischief they were about to commit, and ordered them to withdraw. The officers coming up, were lectured in their turn, and heard with the same astonishment the laws of predatory warfare explained to them—"When I had command in the army of which your regiment is a part, I punished very severely such acts as you seem to authorize by your presence; and it is not on those soldiers, but on you that punishment would have fallen." To be thus tutored by a French farmer, in their own language, in such circumstances, and in such terms, was almost past endurance. They beheld the peasants at the same time taking off their hats and surrounding the speaker, as if to protect him, in case of violence; whilst the oldest among their own soldiers, anxiously gazing on the features of the stranger, were seized with a kind of involuntary trembling. Conjured more peremptorily, though respectfully, to disclose his quality and his name, the peasant, drawing his hand across his eyes to wipe off a starting tear, exclaimed, with a half stifled voice, "I am Kosciusko!" The movement was electric. The soldiers threw down their arms, and, falling prostrate on the ground, according to the custom of their country, covered their heads with sand. It was the prostration of the heart. On Kosciusko's return to his house in the neighborhood of this scene, he found a Russian military post established to protect it. The emperor Alexander having learnt from M. de la Harpe, that Kosciusko resided in the country, ordered for him a guard of honor, and the country around his dwelling escaped all plunder and contributions. Kosciusko had withdrawn some years since from the guilty world of Bonaparte, to cultivate a little farm, rejecting every offer which was made him by Napoleon, who had learnt to appreciate his worth. Kosciusko knew him well. I called on him one day to bid him farewell, having read in the official paper of the morning his address to the Poles on the subject of recovering his freedom, being named to the command of the Polish army by Bonaparte. Kosciusko heard me with a smile at my credulity; but on my shewing him the address with his signature, he exclaimed, "This is all a forgery! Bonaparte knew me too well to insult me with any offer in this predatory expedition; he has adopted this mode, which I can neither answer nor resent, and which he attempts to color with the pretext of liberty. His notions and mine, respecting Poland, are at as great a distance as are our sentiments on every other subject."

CHRONICLE.

Latest from Mexico, and excellent, via New Orleans. The following interesting memorandum was also enclosed:

"Arrived at the Balize, Dec. 19, U. S. ketch Surprise, lieut. com. McKeever, from a cruise, having touched at Boquilla de Piedras. The patriots occupy the king's bridge leading to Vera Cruz, and had intercepted the royal convoy from Mexico. It was expected that an action would take place about the first of December."

The above (observes the New York editor) was handed to capt. Myrick by lieut. M'Keever.

This intelligence is a month later than the former accounts from the Mexican provinces, and does not comport with the story lately published, of the total defeat of the patriots in that quarter.

A beginning. The Union Bank of New York, proposes, after the 1st of this month, to pay specie for its notes, and for such deposits as have remained in their vaults since the 1st September, 1814.

Washington, Jan. 25. Mr. SERURIER, minister of France, has announced to the secretary of state that his mission had ceased, and presented Mr. ROTH as charge des affaires, to act ad interim, until the arrival of a successor. The secretary of state has, in consequence, presented Mr. Roth to the president, in the character of charge des affaires of is most christian majesty.

Milledgeville, (Geo.) Jan. 10. It appears by an article in the St. Stephen's paper, that the Seminole indians have destroyed the British fort at Appalahicola, and taken the negroes who occupied a small fort near that; and were on their way to Pensacola with a view of restoring to their rightful owners, those of them who had run away from the Spaniards, and the citizens on the frontier of the Mississippi territory.

Carthageva.—We have a variety of reports as to this place—some saying it has fallen and others that it has not. Slow to believe bad news, I think that the flag of the republic yet floats over the walls of that important place. On comparing all the dates and weighing the facts as stated, it appears to us that the latest accounts received have arrived at Baltimore—see "South America" below. The garri-son has no doubt suffered exceedingly by famine: but they had just received a large supply of provisions, and the falsity was probably put afloat by royalty, as a 'legitimate' engine to prevent other succors.

Specie.—It is stated that very considerable sums in specie have arrived at New Orleans from Liverpool, to purchase cotton. The precious metals, like every other article of commerce, must find their own level.

The Susquehanna, at Harrisburg, rose 9 feet, in four hours, on the morning of the 19th ult. The ice gave way with a tremendous explosion. Great damage has been done by the deluge.

Schuylkill bridge.—From a Philadelphia paper. It is with regret that we inform the public that the superstructure of the bridge at the falls of Schuylkill, fell down this morning about a quarter before 5 o'clock. It does not appear that there was any person on it at the time.

The chains were sufficiently strong—the cause to which the misfortune is attributed, appears to have been the great weight of snow on it, (being fifteen inches deep) together with the decayed state of one of the legs of the trussel on the down stream side.

We ascertained the actual weight of a cubic foot of snow, for the purpose—which made the whole weight on the two main arches, 63,750 lbs.

Exchange at New Orleans, Dec. 29. On Baltimore, 10 per cent dis.; on Philadelphia, 7 a 8 do.; on New-York 5 a 6½; on London, par; treasury notes, par; Spanish dollars, 6 per cent adv.

National Bank. The projected scheme for a national bank appears very exceptionable to many, on several grounds. Some doubt the constitutionality of the procedure—and many appear to fear the power of such an institution. And the bonus to be received, it is contended, is by no means commensurate with the great advantages that it will possess in receiving the public deposits, &c.

Salt Springs. A salt spring has been discovered near Mount Sterling, in Ken. so strong that salt will not dissolve in the water. It promises great advantages to the neighboring country.

South America. The following good news from South America, has been received by the schooner Stafford, arrived at Annapolis, from La Guayra:

"An English frigate arrived at La Guayra, a few days before the sailing of the Stafford, and brought accounts that the Spanish fleet at Santa Martha had been destroyed in a heavy gale—the army against Carthageva had abandoned the siege—one half of the island of Margueritta was in the hands of the patriots. Spanish vessels, on arriving at La Guayra, were put in requisition to transport troops to Margueritta, whilst Caraccas itself was threatened by the patriots, who were carrying on a predatory warfare in that province.

Martial Law. A New York paper says—"A British farmer in Upper Canada has recovered 5 or $600 damage and costs, from a commissary, for taking 100 bushels of wheat from him under martial law, during the late war, the judges and jurors unanimously deciding that martial law could not be declared, but subsequent to an act of the legislature authorizing it. The British government paid the loss for the commissary, who merely obeyed orders.

Frankfort, Ken. Jan. 1st, 1815.

EDITORS OF THE PALLADIUM. Gentlemen—Having seen my name mentioned once or twice in your paper, in relation to the office of vice-president, I deem it my duty to assure you, that I have no desire to fill that office. And, at this time of peace and tranquility in the United States, I could not be induced to accept of any station in the government.

You are at liberty to use this note as you judge proper. Respectfully, your most obedient,

ISAAC SHELBY.

Longevity. There are now living in one house in Poston, four persons, of the following ages: one of 101 years, two of 77 years each, and one of 67—making an average of 80 years each.

Maryland. Mr. Harper was elected a senator of the U. S. by the legislature of Maryland, on Saturday last—for Mr. Harper 45; Mr. J. T. Mason, 44. Gen. Smith has been elected a representative to congress by the people of Baltimore city and county, vice col. Moore, resigned—for general Smith 2515; col. Little 1069.

The revenue. The nett revenue from the imports accruing in 1815, is (as appears by a corrected report from the treasury of Jan. 20.) $28,348,898 80; exceeding the sum stated in the annual report by an amount of $3,348,837 02.

Marshal count Grouchy has made his escape from the "deliverers," and is safe in Baltimore, where he arrived on Monday last, in an English brig, via Annapolis, being incog.

CONGRESS. Nothing important has been transacted by either house of congress since our last report. The time of the house of representatives has been chiefly occupied in debates on the revenue bills, and of the senate in "executive business." As it so happens (through an excess of extra labor on the numerous tables in this number, to get them in in their proper places, occurring at a late period) that we cannot give the regular detail of proceedings this week, it is thought best to defer the journal until our next paper. The like cause has compelled us also to defer a considerable part of the "Chronicle."

Georgia Sugar.

Extract of a letter to a member of Congress—politely communicated for the WEEKLY REGISTER.

"The cultivation of the cane is rapidly extending with us. I have received some information on this interesting subject, which, I suppose, may be gratifying to you.

"Major Butler, on 85 acres, cultivated by 17 hands, produced 140,000 lbs. sugar, and 75 hhd. molasses.

John McQueen, Esq. planted 18 acres in cane—average product 20,000 canes per acre—5000 canes, the product of a quarter of an acre, yielded 600 gallons of juice, which boiled down, made 672lbs. sugar, and may lose 50lbs. in draining, leaving 632lbs. or 2488lbs. of sugar per acre."

Let us look at these products and see what they amount to, at the present prices for sugar and molasses.

140,000lbs. sugar, (worth on the spot) 17
cents	$23,800
75 hhd. molasses, at $80	6,000

Product of 85 acres and 17 hands, $29,800

18 acres at 2488lbs per acre —44,784lbs.
at 17 cents,	$7,613 28
5ay 23 hhd. molasses, at $80	1,840 00

Product of 18 acres and 5 or 6 hands, $9,453 28

$9,253 dollars, the product of 23 hands, is for each hand $1706. There is no gold mine equal to this.

But sugar and molasses may not hold their present prices—the duties will be reduced, and the cost of freight and charges lessened, by the continuance of peace. Good sugar, however, cannot easily be lower in the United States than 10 cents, the [old] duty included; and it is believed the West India planter cannot profitably furnish it here at so low a rate. And then the product of these crops, raised on 103 acres, by 23 hands (allowing the sugar at 10 cents per pound, and the molasses at $40 per hoghead), would be $21,978, or $213 per acre, and $961 per hand.

When we get to exporting sugar—when it becomes a staple article of our commerce like cotton, its value may depreciate equal to the duty that will probably be continued upon it, (2 1-2 cents per lb.) but still, it will be a most profitable crop.

Thus do the bounties of God to our country unfold themselves and point to independence.

Relations with Spain.

The correspondence between Don Onís and Mr. Monroe, is in the possession of our readers. The pretensions of Spain are as preposterous as the manner in which they are urged is contemptible. The chevalier's letters are beneath criticism, and it required no little courtesy to answer at all such a farrago of nonsense. The don, however, appears to be a "legitimate" representative of his wise and "adored master." The amount of the business is this—that Ferdinand holds the fairest portions of the earth in misery and chains, which would be happy except for his government—and, not content with requiring that we shall take no part in the contest for freedom against slavery, he would also wish a slice of our territory, to fix the wheels and racks of his accursed inquisitors upon! Moderate demands, most rationally urged!

Our right to the territory claimed is clear and indisputable—it as much belongs to the United States as the island of New-Orleans, settled by the convention held on the 8th of January, 1815, by gen. Jackson, on the part of the republic. But one grand mistake was committed about the Floridas—they ought to have been taken possession of by us.—They were lent to the British during the late contest, not for the purposes of fair, and open, and honorable warfare—but as a depot whence murder and massacre should issue upon the women and children of our frontier, and their neutral character was entirely lost by this subserviency to our enemy. What—shall a person establish himself on my borders, and make his house the asylum of assassins, and plead the sanctity of his right to possess it? Nay, nay—the law of God, of nature, and humanity, dictates his ejection and punishment. Yet there were some drivelling politicians—men of whom I would have expected better things, who stood ready to condemn Jackson's expedition to Pensacola, the seat of an enemy's force, concentrated to place the tomahawk and scolding knife in the hand of his ally, the savage!

An idea has gone forth that Great Britain may be at the bottom of this business, the Floridas being ceded to her. Time will unfold whether this is the case or not. But what does Great Britain want the Floridas for? Has she not already territory enough to satisfy an ambition short of that of Alexander the Great, who sighed for another world to conquer? An hundred millions of people in Asia, only, acknowledge her sceptre; and in every part of the habitable globe there are countries subject to her, who called Bonaparte ambitious! The Floridas offer no incense to the god she worships, except as a check upon the United States, for the commerce they afford is of no consequence—not equal to the expences to be incurred by the establishment that must be kept up to maintain the possession. The very act of receiving them, therefore, supposing even they were freely offered without any equivalent, would have in it a spirit of hostility that cannot be mistaken—which ought to be guarded against.

We cannot believe, however, that Great Britain is anxious for another war with the United States—yet, we fear she is so situated that she cannot support a peace establishment, and must quarrel with somebody. We, certainly, have no desire to quarrel with her, nor even with Spain; though a contest with the latter power alone, might rather be courted than feared by an aspiring people, anxious to build up and perfect a national character, and strengthen and enrich themselves: And besides, the cause of mankind might be subserved thereby, in aiding the emancipation of the most productive countries in the world, from the grasp of a perfidious ingrate and his blasphemous priests.

What is the real foundation of this procedure of the Spanish minister, supposing it authorised by his court, is not clearly understood. Perhaps, these claims are made to be before-hand with those that Mr. Living is specially charged to press upon the Spanish government, and this may be considered a pretty deep state trick at procrastination. Perhaps, the Floridas have been ceded to Great Britain, and are held as the seed of a new war when policy or necessity leads lord Castlereagh to make it, propelling Ferdinand, in the mean time, as his jackall. But, we would hope, he would gain as little in another contest as he did in the last; in which, instead of "crippling us for fifty years" as was magnanimously designed, he put us forward twenty. And the procedure would forever close the American market to British manufactures, and make us her rival in that of the world. Peace with us is her true policy as well as our own—and if she is really desirous to preserve it, there will be no difficulty between us; if otherwise, we cannot help it. But Spain must keep her mustachios within their proper boundaries—or the Philippine island, the most remote of her possessions, will become a resting place for the eagle.

It is not generally thought that an open rupture will grow out of our relations with Spain, at least for a considerable time to come. It would be proper, however, to be prepared for it. We would heartily rejoice if some diversion were made in favor of the patriots of the provinces; but we are not so situated as spontaneously to embark in their cause, though it is the cause of mankind. The state of the world is peculiar, and we may have enough to do to manage our own affairs, husbanding every resource, to meet any determination that may have been formed to destroy what yet remains of freedom to the human race as dangerous to the rights of kings.

RENUNCIATION.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Cevallos, secretary of state of his catholic majesty, to Mr. Pinckney, minister of the United States at Madrid.

"His majesty has thought proper to RENOUNCE his protest against the alienation of Louisiana by France, notwithstanding the solid motives on which that protest was founded; affording, in this way, a new proof of his benevolence and friendship for the United States.

(Signed) PEDRO CEVALLOS.
El Pardo, Feb. 10, 1814."

United Provinces of La Plata.

The editor of the REGISTER has been politely favored with the following very interesting particulars on the "state of the military forces engaged in defence of the United Provinces" of La Plata, by a gentleman of the first consideration in that delightful country, on whom the utmost reliance may be placed. The friends of freedom will, with great pleasure, observe the strength and disposition of the patriots—and conclude that the power of Spain is totally incompetent to reduce them again to her racks and wheels and monopolies—with tyranny and cruelty in every shape.—An old school-mate of the editor's observes, confidently, that they can, a Buenos-Ayres, give a good account of any 20,000 men that Europe can send against the republicans.

PRESENT STATE OF THE MILITARY FORCES OCCUPIED IN DEFENCE OF THE UNITED PROVINCES.
[Translated for the Weekly Register.]
BUENOS AYRES.

There are in this city 6000 veterans of artillery, infantry and cavalry. Recruits are constantly arriving to complete the 8000 which are destined by the government, as a corps of reserve, to oppose the threatened invasion of the Spaniards. The local militia of infantry in service are 6,000 well disciplined men, and possessing every good quality which can belong to them. The stand of arms (or armory) is abundantly provided by the continual remittance of fusils, made by the friends of our sacred cause. The manufactory of fusils, which made 20 daily, is suspended, that others may be introduced at more convenient prices. The militia cavalry are disciplining themselves with great diligence, and the Director reviews them every eight days. The quarters of all these forces are established 50 leagues in the interior, and a plan of defence has been adopted sufficient to resist all the power of our oppressors.

ORIENTAL BANDA.

There is not a man in this fertile province who has not taken up arms in its defence. The people are energetic, valiant and accustomed to scourge tyrants. The chief of the orientals is col. Don Jose Artigas, who is much beloved by those under his command. He has, at present, 4000 veterans usefully employed. They are determined to destroy every thing which cannot be defended. The Spaniards and Portuguese know the respect which they deserve. Artigas has established, 300 leagues in the interior, a village called Purification, in which are more than 600 European Spaniards, guarded by a competent garrison, in order to prevent the effects of their pernicious doctrines, as well as by way of reprisal for the Americans who were sacrificed by the Spanish commanders in every part of the colonies. This notice will be very convenient to the editor of the Havana Gazette.

PROVINCE OF PARAGUAY.

The force of this consists of 3000 veterans, and a great number of militia and cavalry. They have not shared in any of the honors of the war, but are well disposed to it; and to this end, and to aid the other provinces, they hold considerable property in reserve. It is commanded by don N. Francha, whose talents are highly spoken of.

PROVINCE OF CUYO.

Its force is 3000 fusiliers, and a numerous and choice militia and cavalry. They passed the Cordilleras in December, to reconquer Chili. Among these 3000 veterans is a regiment of Chilese cavalry, who united with Mendoza, in October 1814, and protected the emigration of 2000 persons of both sexes. The chief of the expedition is colonel-major D. Jose San Martin, who served several years in the Spanish army.

THE ARMY OF UPPER PERU,

After several victories over the royal army, has reconquered, in a little time, the territory between Jupis and Orurz. The strong positions which Peznela occupied in Cotagaita, had formed new chains for South America; but they only served to augment the glories of the legions of Rio del Plata, under the orders of the virtuous and valiant general don Jose Rondeau. The advance of his army are in Chayanta, and he is marching with his united forces to give the mortal blow to the despot, Abascal. Can Peznela, with 3000 persecuted, dispirited, mercenaries, resist 7000 victorious republicans, commanded by worthy chiefs? The desertion of the troops of Peznela is scandalous, and his limited resources place him in an unfortunate situation. Potosi gave Rondeau the means of paying his troops, and he hastened immediately to remit supplies of money to Buenos Ayres. The inhabitants of the towns that had been freed from oppression ran to join the soldiers of liberty. The supreme Director has recently sent col.-major D. N. French with 2000 choice veterans and 3000 fusces, to reinforce Rondeau. It is thought that Peznela intends to retreat through Cosco; but every province is in complete insurrection against the royalists. The chief of the Cusquena insurrection was a casique called Pomacagua, descended from the Incas, who held the rank of field-marshal from the king. Ramirez, general of division of the royal army, had the fortune to take him prisoner; and, that he might not disgrace the good qualities of a Spanish commander, he had his tongue bored with a hot iron, and destroyed him by the torture. The glories of this tyrant did not last long—for the division of Angulo forced him to a retreat in which he lost a great part of his troops. Then was Pomacagua avenged with the death of a number of European Spaniards, put to the sword by those who had grieved at his loss. One child of this unfortunate man has joined the party of his father, and follows up the work with enthusiasm. Angulo, and the famous Arenales, native of Catalonia, have already joined Rondeau with their respectable divisions, which have rendered many important services. Abascal cannot increase his miserable army, because the spirit of insurrection is spread through all the territory under his command. He was compelled to occupy Chili with 1590 of his most confidential men, and already many of those have passed over to Rondeau. In the year 1816, we may hope for a success which will secure our cause.

Since the popular commotions of April of this year, which concluded happily, all the people of the united provinces enjoy tranquility, and are occupied in raising forces for their defence, and in organizing their governments, which will be in conformity to those of the United States. Representatives are elected to compose a general congress, to whose decision all the people offer to submit. They will open their session in February or March. A declaration of independence appears indubitable.

CHILI.

This rising state yielded to the royal forces by an extraordinary event, on the 2d October, 1814.—The iniquity of certain strangers who, to the disgrace of this delightful country, were at the head of the government and of the troops, proposed to the enemy the most degrading and perfidious capitulation. When a remedy was proposed it was already too late. The enemy, under shelter of the capitulation, was considerably strengthened by a strong Spanish division, which had a little before arrived at Lima from the peninsula. Commodore Hillyar ought to blush at the active part which he took in the sacrifice of a million of inhabitants, who were fighting for liberty. After having obtained, by his bad faith, and by the criminal conduct of the governor of Valparaiso, the triumph of capturing the Essex, he presented himself in the capital with instructions from Abascal as a mediator in the capitulation which was proposed, for the purpose of giving time for the arrival of the reinforcement.—Hillyar succeeded in deceiving the weak Director of Chili, and other ignorant persons, without any other trouble than that of saying mass, and shewing himself to the army clothed in the robes of the nuns. [There is something else here about Hillyar which we cannot understand; it concludes with]—this hypocritical intruder created himself perpetual governor of Chili, and set sail when he had done all the mischief he could.

The present governor of Chili is colonel Osorio. All the forces under his command amount to 4000 men; half of which are natives of the country, and serve by compulsion. Osorio, like all the Spanish chiefs, has taken the side of oppression. The island of Juan Fernandez is the deposit of 500 patriots of the principal families. The contributions are insupportable, and the property of all the emigrants and prisoners is delivered up to the pillage of the band of scoundrels that form the royal army. The moment of vengeance approaches. The fields are already covered with numerous parties to oppose all who belong to the royal side. The emigrants crossed the Andes in December, with an imposing enthusiasm, under the protection of the Argentine legions. Emigrants are constantly arriving at Mendoza, begging protection from their cruel oppressors. Its re-conquest has been prevented by a little squadron of four ships under the orders of general Brown, so well disposed as to destroy the commerce of Lima, shut up its privateers, and secure them from the use of Osorio, if he should attempt to retreat. We hope that the approaching summer will complete the purification of this country.

Duties on Imports.

Letter from the secretary of the treasury to the chairman of the committee of ways and means, containing an estimate of the whole amount of the duties on merchandize imported, which accrued in the year 1815

Treasury Department, Jan. 20, 1816.

SIR—I have received your note, requesting a statement of the whole amount of bonds given for duties on importations which accrued in 1815. The portion of the duties on merchandize imported, for which no bonds are given, is probably not more than one per cent. of the whole amount, and cannot, without difficulty, be distinguished from that portion for which bonds are given. It is so small that I have not thought it necessary to make any separate estimate of it, and shall, therefore, give in answer to your note an estimate of the whole amount of duties on merchandize imported, which accrued in the year 1815.

The estimate contained in the annual report was made in the month of November, before returns for any part of the fourth quarter of the year, except from the smallest and most inconsiderable districts, had been received, and before the large importations of that quarter were known at the treasury to have taken place. At the present moment the returns from the larger districts, for the third quarter of the year, are not complete, and for the fourth quarter of the year are still more deficient. The great pressure of business in the custom houses has, doubtless, occasioned this unusual delay. The consequences is, that it is only for the first and second quarters of the year 1815, that a correct statement can be given. For the third quarter an estimate can be given nearly correct; but for the fourth quarter, it can be formed only by comparison with the preceding, the returns of bonds taken being deficient from some of the most considerable districts for the whole quarter, and from nearly all the most considerable districts for the two last months of the quarter.

After making this explanation, I have to state, that the amount of duties on merchandize imported during the first quarter of the year 1815, amounted to

And during the second quarter of the same year to

From the returns received, it is believed that the duties for the 3d quarter of the year will somewhat exceed those for the second. They are, therefore, estimated at

The returns for the fourth quarter are so imperfect as to afford little or no means of estimating the total amount. It is known generally that the importations, in the months of Nov. were large, and that in the months of Oct. and Dec. they were less considerable. It is supposed that for the whole quarter the duties will equal those of the 3d quarter, say

21,400,000

Estimated amount of duties on merchandize imported during the whole year,

The tonnage duties, light money, and duties on passports and clearances amounted, during the first and second quarters of the year 1815, to

During the third and fourth quarters, as fewer foreign vessels were employed in our commerce, these branches will be proportionably less productive and are estimated at

251,136 99
300,000

Gross proceeds of the customs, as estimated for the year 1815,

The drawbacks, bounties, allowances and expences of collection, are to be deducted from this sum in order to ascertain the nett amount which will be receivable into the treasury. The debentures for drawbacks issued during the first quarter of the year 1815, amounted to

And during the second quarter of that year, to

During that period the re-exportations were very small, compared with those which took place during the 3d and 4th quarters.

As the markets became glutted with foreign merchandise, the quantity sent abroad for better prices would naturally increase. It is believed that the drawback on the portions thus re-exported, during the 3d and 4th quarters of 1815, will amount to

The bounties and allowances actually payable during the year 1815, will be small, probably not exceeding

The expences of collection will be augmented by the cost of several revenue cutters, to replace those lost during the war. The whole amount may be estimated at

And will leave for the nett amount of the revenue of customs, accruing in the year 1815, the sum of

This exceeds the sum stated in the annual report, by an amount of $3,348,897 02; an excess produced by the extraordinary importations during the fourth quarter of the year, beyond what had been anticipated; and in relation to which it may not be improper to remark, that as those importations have surcharged the market with many articles, a proportionate diminution in the importation of those articles, and consequently of the duties upon which importations during the ensuing year, may be expected.

It ought also to be observed, that this excess will be wholly absorbed by the deficit, as stated in the annual report of the monies receivable into the treasury during the year 1816; and, indeed, will be insufficient to meet the whole of that deficit. But it will relieve the treasury from the necessity of borrowing money, or of issuing treasury notes, or of leaving treasury notes already issued in circulation, for making good that deficit to an extent equal to the sum of $3,348,897 02, above stated.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. Wm. Lowndes,
Chairman of the committee of ways and means.

Important Correspondence.

The following official letters passed between Mr LEE, our consul at Bordeaux, and the governor of the department of the Gironde. The principle contended for—not (it appears) by the present government of France, but by the creatures of that government—is at once so absurd and tyrannical, that when an American merchant, at Bordeaux, was told that “he was taxed for his faculties and his capital,” he replied to one of the chief assessors—“I owe you a tax on my house and patent for the personal protection your government affords me—this I have paid; but as to my faculties and capital, I am indebted for them to God and my country, and therefore owe you nothing for what you have not the power to give, protect or take away.”

It will be unnecessary to explain the cause or nature of this dispute; the perusal of Mr. LEE's letters will best develop the disposition of the Royal faction in France—the rights that are granted to American merchants; and, at the same time, furnish an able and handsome refutation of a plea, which is levelled both against justice and common sense.—Ed. Southern Pat.

“Bordeaux, Oct. 5, 1815.

The Prefect of Bordeaux, &c. &c.

M. LE COMTE—My countryman, Mr: Andrews, a resident merchant in this city, has been taxed on the roll for the military contribution of 100,000,000, the sum of 6,208 francs; against the injustice of which, he appeals to you, requesting me on transmitting to you the enclosed letter on this subject, to support his reclamation. But I find he has stated in so clear and pointed a manner, the illegality of this imposition, that he has left no room for me to make any additional observations thereon.—Having in this country no civil rights, no French commercial privileges whatever, he ought not by the laws and usages of nations, to be called upon to concur in any extraordinary war tax, for the support of a government, in which, from owing allegiance to his native state, he cannot, nor is not allowed to take the smallest share, and the charges of which the subjects of his majesty, are alone bound from duty and affection to sustain. I am, &c. &c.

(Signed)

SIR,—Mr. Gueyrieux, receiver of the North, certified the day before yesterday, to my countryman, Mr. Andrews, that unless he paid immediately the sum of six thousand two hundred and eight francs, for which he is avowedly taxed, according to his supposed faculty and capital on the roll of the war contribution of—hundred millions, he should send Garnisaires to his house—and yesterday the same receiver make known to Mr. Andrews, as you will perceive by the inclosed notification—that unless he paid the amount of this tax in three days from the date of the same, his furniture and effects should be seized and sold for the payment thereof.

This, sir, is rather an arbitrary proceeding. It is trifling with the rights and privileges of a native American citizen, established in France under the faith of former treaties, as a mere factor for his countrymen. It is a violation of the rights of hospitality, and cannot be justified upon any principle of the laws and usages of nations.

The ordinance of his majesty, of the 16th of August, on which this war contribution is founded; so far from justifying the assessors in taxing a citizen of the United States, established in France, for his supposed faculty and capital, exempts, in my opinion, every such citizen from the same. That ordinance is thus worded:—“Such is the state of things, that we have not a choice of means—and, therefore, we must adopt those which present the least inconvenience; and which at the same time, appear the best calculated to relieve those of our subjects who have suffered the most by calling on those who have felt in a lesser degree those evils, to come to their relief.”—And further on, full of confidence in the patriotism of the principal merchants, proprietors and capitalists, we wish to associate them to our solicitude for the relief of their “compatriots.”

Thus by the decree itself, it clearly appears, that his majesty has appealed to the patriotism of his subjects, to the French merchants proprietors, and capitalists, and not to American merchants and capitalists, which no doubt, was foreign from his intentions. This being the intent and meaning of the ordinance, it remains to be proved, before Mr. Andrews can be subjected to bear any part of this war contribution, further than the portion due on his house and his patent as a merchant, that he is a French subject. If he has been naturalized as such, if he enjoys all the civil rights of a Frenchman, let him pay for his supposed faculty and capital. But, as this is not the case, I pray, sir, you will order that all pursuits against him for this tax of 6208 francs, openly and avowedly laid on his faculty and capital, be suspended until a formal decision shall be had thereon from Paris.

I have the honor, &c. &c.

W. LEE,

To count Tournon, Prefect of the Depart't of Gironde.”

“Bordeaux, 23d Oct. 1815.

To Mr. LEE, consul of the United States.

SIR—I have the honor to answer the letter you wrote me on the 20th, in which you complain of the taxation of Mr. Andrews for the war contribution.

I have seen with astonishment that you consider as a violation of the rights of hospitality, an act of a government, who has never ceased to give to your compatriots high marks of protection. Such expressions can but tend to injure the relations between us, as for the interest of the two nations, as should they in future be found in your correspondence, it will be my duty to render an account thereof to my government.

Mr. Andrews has exercised for a long time the profession of a merchant in Bordeaux. He enjoys the protection of the government and the advantages of our commercial laws. He submitted as a merchant, to pay the personal tax imposed on that profession. How then can he ask to be exempted from the other public charges equally imposed on the same profession? Can he argue that his quality of a stranger exempts him from supporting these imposts, while he enjoys on the same line all the privileges which the government accords to its subjects?

It was not necessary that the king in his ordinance, should have distinctly comprised the strangers.

residing in his estates, to oblige those who are on the same footing as his subjects to partake of all public charges. I shall therefore not examine whether Mr. Andrews is naturalized a French subject or not; it is sufficient for me to know that he pays a patent; from that moment the committee have the right to tax him according to his presumed faculties.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

(Signed)

The Prefect TOURNON.

"Bordeaux, 25th Oct. 1815.

WILLIAM LEE, &c. to the Count TOURNON, prefect of the Department of the Gironde.

SIR—In answer to the letter you did me the honor to write me on the 23d, which I have but this moment received, I beg leave to observe, that so far from having accused his majesty's government, of violating the laws of hospitality towards my fellow-citizens; I have stated in the very letter of which you complained, that I did not think the royal ordinance, authorised the assessors to call on American citizens established in Bordeaux, for any part of this war contribution; other than that which they are in duty bound to pay on their real estates and patents as merchants.

His majesty, in that act, calls on his subjects, who have suffered the least by the distressing events which have of late passed before us, to come to the assistance of those of their compatriots, who, from their position, have felt the weight of those evils in a greater degree. Therefore, as Mr. Andrews cannot be placed on the footing of a French merchant, capitalist, or subject, I begged of you, sir, to suspend all pursuits against him, for the sum of 6,208 francs, (which, is the amount of the tax on his supposed faculty and capital) until a formal decision on his case, should be had from the proper authorities at Paris. Before this decision is known we must not consider him as taxed by virtue of a decree of his majesty, but simply by an act of the assessors, founded on a misconception or misapplication of the royal ordinance of the 16th of August.

That you have a right to tax Mr. Andrews for his real estate, the house in which he lives, and for his patent as a merchant, we do not question; we only contend that, you cannot tax him for his supposed faculty and capital towards these war contributions, with any more justice, than you can demand of him personal military services—and that for these reasons:

- 1st. He is not a French subject but an American citizen.
- 2d. He is an American and not a French capitalist, the bulk of his fortune, for which he is taxed, being deposited in his own country and not in France.
- 3d. He has no civil rights in France, not having the power to vote in any election, nor is he eligible to any office.
- 4th. He has no French commercial privileges, he cannot own a French ship, nor can he be elected to any commercial offices, and on all the business he transacts with his country, he pays your discriminating duties as well on his ships, as on their cargoes, and
- 5thly. That as an American citizen, settled in Bordeaux, as agent for American commercial houses, he cannot by the laws of his own country, take the smallest share directly or indirectly, in any war in which France is or may be engaged.

This being the actual position of Mr. Andrews, was from duty that I supported his reclamation, and I trust it will be seen, that although he enjoys the protection of this government, to a certain degree, he is far from partaking "all the advantages of the commercial laws of France," and that consequently he ought to be exempted from many of the charges to which French merchants are liable, with whom on the score of commercial and other privileges, he cannot be assimilated.

The laws of France draw a very distinct line between the subject and the foreigner, who inhabits the country, and thus points sufficiently clear, to the distinction which ought to be made between them, in the levying of all war contributions. All the real estates which the citizens of the United States hold in Bordeaux, for the convenience of their commerce, or otherwise, may be imposed in the same ratio as those of the natives. And their patents as merchants, are in the same manner, liable to augmentation, but when you touch or tax their supposed faculty and capital, you go farther than the laws of France, the law of nations, or even the royal ordinance on which you found this imposition, will justify.

Thus you will observe, sir, that the mode of apportioning and collecting this war contribution, in the case before us, involves a question of the highest interest to American citizens established in France, as well as to French subjects, established in the United States. I therefore hope, that you will have the goodness to present the same, with all its points and bearings, to the minister whose province it is to decide thereon, that we may know in future, on what footing the American merchant, established in Bordeaux, is to be considered by your administration, in relation to his own government, and to that of his majesty.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, &c. &c.

W. LEE."

MARSHAL MONCEY.

From the New-York Columbian. We are indebted to a correspondent for the very interesting translation below. Marshal Moncey's letter to Louis the XVIII. was written on the occasion of his refusing to preside in a court martial at the trial of marshal Ney. The reader will recollect that this refusal of marshal Moncey was treated as contumacy, and he was ordered to be imprisoned for three months:

Letter from Marshal Moncey, to Louis XVIII. on his refusal to sit on the court-martial, for the trial of marshal Ney.

SIRE—Will your majesty permit me to raise my feeble voice to you? Will it be permitted to one who has never deviated from the path of honor, to call the attention of his sovereign to the dangers that menace his person and his kingdom? Yes, sire, nothing less than the imminent dangers of the state, would allow me to express myself to you with the frankness which you ought to expect from all your faithful subjects, and especially from your marshals; from those who dared to uplift their voice, on the most difficult occasions, when the absolute will and blind ambition of a master were every thing, and the counsels of wisdom and prudence were nothing.

I believed, that after my letter of yesterday to the minister of war, he would have judged sufficient the reasons which I gave for refusing to sit in a court martial where I could not preside. I find myself mistaken, as he has transmitted me a positive order from your majesty on this subject.

Placed in the cruel dilemma of offending your majesty, or of disobeying the dictate of my conscience, it becomes my duty to explain myself to your majesty.

I enter not into the enquiry whether marshal Ney is guilty or innocent—Your justice, and the equity of his judges will answer it to posterity, which weighs in the same balance kings and their subjects. But the subject on which I cannot be silent, and on which I must speak distinctly to your majesty, is the critical position into which you are rushing. Alas! has not enough of French blood been shed? Are not our misfortunes sufficiently great? The humiliation of France—is it not pushed to the last extreme? And when it is necessary to rectify, to soften, to calm, it is then you are required to sign new proscriptions! Oh! sire, if those who direct your councils had only in view your good, they would tell you, that never did the scaffold make friends. Do they then believe that death is terrible for those who have so often braved it? Is it the allies who require of France ? But, sire, is there no danger for your person and your august dynasty from them? They entered the country as your allies, and what title do they merit from the people of Alsace, of Lorraine, and of the capital? They have demanded the price of their friendship; they have required securities from those they came to deliver—they have required the inhabitants of the countries they occupy, to deliver up their arms; and in two thirds of the kingdom there remains not even a single fowling piece. They have required that the French army should be disbanded; and there remains not a single man at his colors, not a single piece of cannon is harnessed—They have demanded the delivery of our fortresses, and if some of them still hold out, it is because their commandants cannot believe your majesty has ordered their surrender. So much condescension ought surely to have softened their passions—but, no! they wish to render your majesty odious to your subjects; they wish to guard against every possible danger, by striking off the heads of those soldiers and statesmen, whose names they cannot hear, without being reminded of their own humiliation.

Let, then, a French general be allowed to say, in the face of Europe, that if our armies have overrun the neighboring countries, they purchased their conquests with their valor and blood. Let your majesty consider—will the allies ever forgive their conquerors? It is their shame and humiliation which they wish to efface, and not to strengthen your throne, which is more shaken by their outrages than established by their vengeance! But when you have given up every thing, what can you refuse? If the fate of Poland is to be ours, what means of resistance have you left? Your armies? You have none! Your fortresses? they are in the power of the allies! Your marshals, your generals, your statesmen? their heads will have fallen! Will you then resort to the people—to that people so much humiliated, so much despised? Is it those who formed your councils?—The recollection of the month of March, 1815, must shew your majesty what you have to expect from their zeal and attachment. There remains then no other resource than a reliance upon the generosity of your allies and our enemies. Have you then forgotten that in order to gratify the man who occupied your throne, they refused you one after another, an asylum in their dominions? So completely had they recognized his legitimacy, that in their treaties with him they never thought of stipulating even an indemnity for you. Did not England herself negotiate with him? Would she not again have treated with him at Prague, had his pretensions been less extravagant? Did not the people of London drag the carriage of his minister, when you were not even permitted to appear at court? Was your restoration thought of, when they negotiated at Chateaux?

Had it not been for the hostile occupation of Bordeaux, and the loyalty manifested by the people of that city, a treaty would have been signed with Napoleon. Still more recently, at the congress of Vienna, was your majesty's minister able to obtain a guarantee for the integrity of our territory? Oh! sire, the man of Elba may have had correspondencies and intelligence in France; but who were they that went to seek for him? who told the English fleet to suffer him to pass? Has the admiral who was entrusted with the superintendence of the island, been prosecuted? Had not the king of Prussia 80,000 men near our frontiers who might have marched upon Paris, and reached it before Napoleon? Are not the Prussian cannon daily placed in battery before your palace, and pointed against your residence? And yet you can rely on the generosity of your allies! And yet, under such circumstances you require me to take my seat in a tribunal, where I shall, perhaps, figure in my turn, not as a judge, but as a prisoner at the bar? Did I not lead the French army in 1794 to the borders of the Rhine? Even now the poignards of those who struck Brune and *, and so many others, glitter before my eyes, and shall I, in my person, sanction a judicial murder? Ah no! while there remains to my unhappy country only a shadow of existence, shall I associate my name with that of her oppressors? No, sire! you, yourself, cannot but approve my resolution: What! shall 25 years of glorious labors be sullied in a single day? Shall my locks, bleached under the helmet, be only proofs of my shame? No, sire! it shall not be said that the elder of the marshals of France contributed to the misfortunes of his country. My life, my fortune, all that I possess or enjoy, is at the service of my king and country: but my honor is exclusively my own, and no human power can ravish it from me. If my name is to be the only heritage left to my children, at least let it not be disgraced!

Permit me to ask your majesty where were the accusers of marshal Ney, when he was on the field of battle? Did they follow his steps and accuse him during 25 years of perils and labors? And if Russia and the allies cannot pardon the conqueror of the Moskwa, can France forget the valiant hero of the Berezina? Sire, in the unfortunate retreat across that river, Ney saved the remains of the army—in that army I had relations and friends, and soldiers (who are the children of their chiefs) who had served under me; and shall I doom him to death who saved the lives of so many Frenchmen, to whom so many parents are indebted for their children, so many wives for their husbands? No, sire, if I cannot save my country and my own life, I will at least save my honor; and if I feel any regret, it is that I have lived too long, since I have survived the glory of my country. Reflect, sire! this is, perhaps, the last time that truth will reach your throne; it is both dangerous and unwise to push the brave to despair. Where is there, I will not say the marshal, but the man of honor, who is not compelled to regret not having sought death on the field of Waterloo? and perhaps, if the unfortunate Ney had done there what he had so often done before, he would not have been this day dragged before a court martial, and those who demand his death, would have been seeking his protection. Excuse, sire, the frankness of an old marshal, who has always kept clear of intrigues, has known only his country and his profession; he believes that the same voice which was raised against the invasion of Spain and the war with Russia, might also speak the language of truth to the best of kings, the father of his subjects. If frankness is a virtue, it is not, I am conscious, the most profitable of the virtues; since, although I am the eldest of the marshals, I am also the poorest.

I will not disguise the dangers in which the step I have taken may involve me, nor the disgrace it may draw down upon me from the vengeance of courtiers—but if I have been fortunate enough to enlighten your majesty as to your true interests, I shall consider myself as but too happy, whatever may be the consequences—and, if in descending to the tomb, I may say with one of your ancestors—all is lost, except honor—I shall die contented.

MONCEY, duc de Corneglian.

FRENCH LAW OF AMNESTY.

From the New-York Columbian.—A respected correspondent has made the following abstract of the Law of Amnesty, published in a late French paper.

The day after the execution of marshal Ney, the duke de Richelieu, president of the council, presented a bill extending an amnesty to all those who have taken any part whatever in the events preceding or following the return of Napoleon to France.

This amnesty is modified by three exceptions.

1st. The individuals who are put on their trial by the 1st article of the royal ordinance of the 24th July, 1814, are to be proceeded against conformably to the laws, and those who are absent are to be condemned as contumacious.

Of this number are the generals BERTRAND, CLAUSET, (who is now in New-York) DEBELLE, &c. It is remarkable the journals do not mention in this class the name of gen. DROUET, who was included in the 1st article of the ordinance. It is uncertain whether the ministers have yielded to public opinion which had been strongly expressed in his favor, or his name has been omitted by the printer through mistake.

2d. The second exception relates to the individuals designated in the 2d article of the same ordinance, and in whose cases the two houses of the legislature were to decide as to whom among them should be brought to trial, or banished with the privilege of selling their property.

The new law only pronounces against them a sentence of banishment, revocable at the pleasure of the king—nothing is said as to their being compelled to sell their property or losing their civil rights.

In this class are Carnot, the duke of Bassano, (Maret,) the duke of Dalmatia, (Soul,) count REGNAUD ST. JEAN D'ANGELY, (who is now in New-York) count Defermon, count Real, Arnault, member of the institute, and a celebrated dramatic writer, Bory de St. Vincent, &c.

3d. The third and last exception relates to those who are already prosecuted—(traduits et jugement.) This exception is very ambiguous, and may give rise to extensive persecutions.

The law banishes from France all the members of the Bonaparte family, as well as their relatives and connexions, including collaterals to the degree of uncles and nephews. Their property originating in donations or grants of the former government is confiscated, but their private property is secured to them, upon condition that it is sold within six months.

The duke of Richelieu preceded the reading of the bill with a speech which contains some moderate sentiments—after the bill was read, he added, with emotion—“Thus did Henry IV. grant an amnesty to his subjects who had fought against him, and France in order to form just conclusions respecting this interesting event, it is necessary to see the debates and the final decision of the legislature, and then to observe how far the men of influence who are so near the throne, will submit to a measure, which is to restrain passions difficult to soften and impossible to disarm.

The following is said to be the entire list of exceptions to the amnesty:—Lallemand, Drouet, d'Erion, Lefebvre, Desnouettes, Ameilh, Brayer, Gilly, Mouton, Duvernet, Grouchy, (now in Baltimore) Laborde, Clausel, (now in New-York,) Debelle, Bertrand, Cambroune, Lavallette, Revigo. These to be arrested and tried.

The following are ordered to quit France in two months, not to return without leave.—Soul, Alix, Exelmans, Bassano, Marbot, Felix, Lepelletier, Bonlay, (de la Meurthe) Mehee, Fresinet, Thi: beaudreau, Carnot, Vandamme, Lamarque, Lobau, Hatel, Pire, Barrere, Arnault, Pommercuil, Regnaud, Arrighi, Dejean, Garrau, Real, Bouvier, Dumolard, Merlin, Durbac, Dirat, Defermont, Bory St. Vincent, Felix, Desportes, Garnier, Mallinet, Mullin, Cluys, Courtin, Forbing, Janson, Lelorgue, Dideval.

Bonaparte's relations are all to leave France within a month under pain of death.

OCCUPATIONS AND MIRACLES OF KING FERDINAND VII. [Whether our readers shall laugh at the thumping falsehoods and silly stuff of the following, or weep for the depravity of human nature therein exhibited, they will agree in detesting the wretch that put it forth to the world.]

From the London Examiner, No. 375. March 5, 1815.—The occupations of king Ferdinand, during his captivity in France, were alluded to by Mr. Whitbread in parliament. We have been (says the Morning Chronicle) through the favor of a valuable correspondent, put in possession of the authentic document, setting forth the trials and miraculous works performed by Ferdinand, and we have been prevented only by the overflow of temporary matter, from making an extract for the improvement of our readers.

The document is a sermon preached by Don Blas de Ostolozza, chaplain major of his catholic majesty, and his confessor. The following is an extract.

“The king,” says he, rose at eight o'clock, heard mass, breakfasted, made afterwards a party at billiards, entered his closet to read his letters and some portion of holy writ, embroidered at the tambour till two o'clock, at which time he took a short airing in his carriage:—he dined on his return, made a short prayer, received his brothers or those who were admitted to pay their court to him at supper, and before going to bed recited with all his household the Litanies, which he toned himself.

“An agent of Napoleon, whose impious presence he was forced to endure, employed all means of seduction to draw the infant from his holy occupations. He brought a troop of female dancers from Paris, and even his own wife, to endeavor to charm the king; but I perceived, by certain signs, (adds the confessor, whose words we translate literally) that the breasts of these women, indecently exposed, were beginning to have a dangerous effect on the prince, who was ready to fall into the seventh deadly sin; I admonished him in time, and like the slave of Potiphar, Don Ferdinand escaped these new Sirens.

poverty of the chief altar of the parish of Valency, and at their being in the Chateau, a play house, while there was neither a chapel, nor an oratory, while the people were luxurious in their furniture and feasts, and miserable in the decoration of their temples. The king embroidered himself a beautiful robe of white silk, with gold palleets, and gold fringe, for the virgin. He had raised a superb altar, gilt, and he sometimes served himself the mass at the feet of the queen of angels. The queen of the angels was most sensible of those royal attentions and manifested to him her content by many signs—It happened in particular, that one night an ecclesiastic of the district being overcome with sleep in the church, the virgin appeared to him as coming out of the altar—she advanced towards the ecclesiastic, made several turns around him, to display the elegance of her toilette, and said to him, sighing, that her son received the vows of the king, in recompense of the fine robe that he had given her: that the Spanish princes would not remain long without being delivered, and that they must form an order of the holy sacrament, with which all the chevaliers should be armed for his defence.

"The priest much touched by this speech, awakened, and came to me to reveal the miraculous vision: I answered by assuring him that the holy virgin had already said as much to the king himself, who in thanking her had promised that on his return to Spain he would make her worship flourish over all the provinces subjected to his dominion."

BONAPARTE.—London, December 12—Extract from letters received from officers of his majesty's ship Northumberland.

"His majesty's ship Northumberland, Oct. 20, 1815.

"We arrived here on the 15th, after rather a pleasant, though long passage, of ten weeks; and general Bonaparte landed on the 16th in the evening, when it was quite dark; he was muffled up in a large surtout coat. A guard went before him to disperse the mob. You may judge of the state of his mind and spirits by what he did, and what he did not do, during the passage. He never came out of his cabin but in the evenings after dinner; he then, almost without exception, went and leant against the breech of the foremost gun on the weather-side of the quarter-deck, whence he never moved. Generals Bertrand and Lascases always came out with him, and with whom he ever continued in conversation, he appeared to take little notice of his other companions. His dress, upon these occasions, was invariably a green coat, with two plain epaulets, small clothes, with silk stockings, and pumps, with gold buckles. At the usual ceremony of passing the line, which we did on the 23d of September, general Bonaparte made a present to Old Neptune of one hundred Napoleons; the French generals and children gave him a double Napoleon each. The countess Bertrand is one of the most pleasant and agreeable women I ever conversed with. She said she wished we had missed the island; and I do not wonder at it; for if its boundless craggy rocks and lofty mountains strike the senses of a stranger, who can depart at pleasure, with a cold heart appalling effect, what must be the feelings of banished majesty! Nature seems to have formed it for security to its inhabitants. Had general Bonaparte ever entertained a hope of escape, when he came in sight of this place it must have been banished forever; the whole world beside, I should suppose, does not present such another spot."

"Northumberland, October 18.

"Bonaparte was very much pleased with the intelligence that a fleet was approaching our island, in which was Bonaparte! This news threw us all into great confusion. On Sunday the 15th, the Northumberland arrived here with the emperor and his suite. On Monday, his surgeon (an Englishman) called on me, and took me with him on board. I was introduced to general Bertrand and his lady, and the other passengers; after remaining a few minutes in the ward-room Bonaparte was announced to be on deck, when we all went up. I approached him and took off my hat; he did the same; he asked me if there was any good watchmaker in the place. I told him there was a very good one, a Mr. Solomons, who is also a very respectable merchant. He requested me to take his watches to him, as they were out of repair; one was a large gold repeater, the other a silver repeater, both musical; the latter, he says, he always had with him in his carriage."

NEY'S EXECUTION.—Paris, December 10.—The following are some further particulars respecting the last moments of marshal Ney: When the judgment was announced to him, he said, "it would have been more military to have said, you are to bite the dust." At the execution, he endeavored to protest against the iniquity of the sentence, and appealed to God and posterity. The officer commanding the veterans, attempting to give the word, appeared struck dumb. L'Espinou (the commander of the military division) then said, "officer, if you cannot command, I will;" the latter remaining silent, the marshal himself said, "soldiers, do your duty," upon which, the platoon ordered for the purpose fired at random; only five out of sixteen balls fired struck the marshal, who fell upon his knees and died instantly. The officer recovering himself, said, "there is still a platoon, let them shoot me also." The officer is put under arrest. Marshal Ney was yesterday buried at the cemetery of La Chaise. Madame Ney was accompanied to the Thuilleries by her four children and sister; she remained in the salon de la paix some time before the duc de Duras came to inform her that she could not be received by the king, and leading her down the grand staircase, acquainted her with the mournful execution; she fainted, and was with difficulty removed to her carriage, amidst the cries of her children and the lamentations of the spectators of this distressing scene. She had several times endeavored to see the duchess d'Angoulême, near to whose person she had been brought up when a child: the duchess, however, as well as the princes, constantly refused to see her.

Madame Auguie, madame Ney's mother, was in the service of Marie Antoinette, her grief at whose death was so severe, that in a moment of distraction she threw herself out of a window, and died upon the spot.

Paris, December 8.—This morning at half past six o'clock, the corpse of marshal Ney was carried to the burying of Mont Louis, in a country coach with a funeral procession. It was followed by a carriage in mourning, and many carriages of citizens. It had been previously enclosed in a leaden coffin, and then one of oak. During the night the nuns of the Foundling Hospital repeated prayers over the body, which had been deposited in that hospital.

EUROPEAN TREATIES.—Treaties have been entered into between the emperor of Russia, the emperor of Austria, the king of Prussia, and the king of Great Britain, the stipulations of which are very important.

1. The first article stipulates for preserving the integrity of the treaty entered into between the high contracting parties, and the present government of France.

2. They stipulate to preserve inviolable the treaty entered into at Paris last year, and likewise to confirm the one entered into with Louis, by which Napoleon Bonaparte and his family are forever excluded from the throne of France, to accomplish which, they engage to employ their whole united force, if necessary.

3d and 4th. The parties engage, if any of their forces, stationed on the frontiers of France, shall be either attacked or menaced, to place themselves on a war establishment, and each to furnish 60,000 men or more if necessary. The parties further engage, that, if the repose of France is again interrupted, and it becomes necessary to employ the whole of their forces, to reserve to themselves the right "to prescribe, by common consent, such conditions as shall hold out to Europe a sufficient guarantee against the recurrence of a similar calamity." In other words, the allies reserve to themselves a right to cut up, and to divide France among themselves, if she attempts to disturb the repose of Europe again.

6th and 7th.—The parties engage, that even after the period stipulated for the occupation of the French frontiers by their troops, (5 years) all the above engagements shall remain in full force, and the respective sovereigns agree to meet at fixed periods, either personally, or by their ministers, for the purpose of consulting and preserving the future repose of Europe.

This treaty is in all its branches important, and furnishes more assurances that France will not attempt the perpetration of her revolutionary system again, than the occupation of her frontiers by the armies of the allies.—Tel.

To his excellency the Duc de Richelieu.

The allied sovereigns having confided to marshal the duke of Wellington the command in chief of those of their troops, which, according to the 5th article of the treaty, concluded this day with France, are to remain in this country during a certain number of years, the undersigned ministers, &c. &c. think it their duty to give some explanation to his excellency the duke de Richelieu as to the nature and extent of the powers attached to this command.

Although chiefly guided with respect to this measure, by motives tending to the safety and welfare of their subjects; and being very far from having any intention of employing their troops in aid of the police, or of the internal administration of France, or in any manner that might compromise or interfere with the free exercise of the royal authority in this country, the allied sovereigns have, however, in consideration of the high interest which they take in supporting the power of legitimate sovereigns, promised to his most christian majesty to support him with their arms against every revolutionary convulsion which might tend to overthrow by force the order of things at present established, and to menace also again the general tranquility of Europe. They do not, however, dissemble, that in the variety of forms under which the revolutionary spirit might again manifest itself in France, doubts might arise as to the nature of the case which might call for the intervention of a foreign force: and feeling the difficulty of framing any instructions precisely applicable to each particular case, the allied sovereigns have thought it better to leave it to the tried prudence and discretion of the duke of Wellington, to decide when and how far it may be advisable to employ the troops under his orders, always supposing that he would not in any case so determine without having concerted his measures with the king of France, or without giving information as soon as possible to the allied sovereigns of the motives which may have induced him to come to such a determination. And, as in order to guide the duke of Wellington in the choice of his arrangements, it will be important that he should be correctly informed of the events which may occur in France, the ministers of the four allied courts accredited to his most christian majesty, have received orders to maintain a regular correspondence with the duke of Wellington, and to provide at the same time for an immediate one between the French government and the commander in chief of the allied troops, for the purpose of transmitting to the French government the communications which the duke of Wellington may have occasion to address to it, and of communicating to the marshal the suggestions or requisitions which the court of France may wish in future to make to him. The undersigned flatter themselves that the duke de Richelieu will readily recognize in these arrangements, the same character and the same principles which have been manifested in concerting and adapting the measures of the military occupation of a part of France. They carry with them also, on quitting this country, the consoling persuasion that, notwithstanding the elements of disorder which France may still contain, the effect of revolutionary events, a wise and paternal government proceeding in a proper manner to tranquilize and conciliate the minds of the people, and abstaining from every act, contrary to such a system, may not only succeed in maintaining the public tranquility, but also in re-establishing universal union and confidence, relieving likewise as much as the proceedings of the government can effect it, the allied powers from the painful necessity of having recourse to these measures, which, in case of any other convulsion, would be imperiously prescribed to them by the duty of providing for the safety of their own subjects, and the general tranquility of Europe, &c. The undersigned have the honor, &c.

METTERNICH,

HARDENBERG,
CAPO D'ISTRIA.

London Dec. 16.—The Flanders mail contains the following important intelligence, under the date of Rome, Nov. 21—"It is asserted that the ministers of the great powers have delivered to his eminence the cardinal secretary of state, the treaty of alliance relative to the war against the Barbary powers and that it has been ratified by all the sovereigns, in their quality of grand masters of the several religious and military orders in their dominions. By this act the powers engage not only to put an end to the white slave trade, which the African governments carry on with equal insolence and impunity; but in order to prevent the return of acts of violence which disgrace humanity, the powers also declare, that they will establish here the form of government which shall afford the best guarantee. The contingent of the troops for this new species of war will be the same and no one will be permitted under any pretence whatever, to keep up a greater number of troops than is fixed by the treaty. All the troops shall have the same uniform. His holiness the Pope, shall be at liberty to send a legate, but who shall not interfere in temporal matters.—This treaty, which consists of 131 articles, fixes, that all the Christians shall be set at liberty, and cannot make a part of the army destined to occupy the country. The Sublime Porte, it is said, remains neuter in this war, and will receive guarantees for its European possessions. One is astonished at knowing the treaty against the pirates, and not to know any thing of what has passed in the consistory where this affair has been treated.—It is certain that his holiness has not issued any bull on the subject of this new crusade. It is said that his holiness will give to the grand masters of the military orders a suit of armor and a banner.—The whole of the allied forces is fixed by treaty at 45,000 men. Several galleys have been at Ancona."

The court of Portugal persists in remaining at Brazil, and refuses to return to Europe. That court lately received a courier from Madrid with despatches, the contents of which had not transpired; but it is supposed that Spain requests the prince regent to declare war against the Independents; and that Ferdinand VII. has asked one of the daughters of the prince in marriage.

The discussions between our government and Ferdinand of Spain, which had grown pretty warm are now becoming more conciliatory; but the persecution of the patriots has not decreased. Ferdinand is about to impose a contribution of five millions sterling on all classes of people of Old Spain, excepting the clergy.

A great variety of scraps and interesting articles unavoidably postponed.

Legislature of New-Jersey.

Pursuant to adjournment, the legislature of New-Jersey met in this city on Wednesday last, the 10th instant.

The following interesting Message from his excellency governor Dickerson, was presented to both houses on Friday last.

Gentlemen of the Legislative Council, and Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,

The present prosperous and happy situation of our common country, under the blessings of Divine Providence, cannot fail to excite the most grateful sensations in the breast of every patriotic citizen.

After an arduous struggle with an enemy, abounding in wealth and all the means of making war—possessing armies truly formidable from their numbers and discipline, and a navy, which, till lately, was deemed invincible, we enjoy an honorable peace, obtained by the determined resolution and persevering exertions of our geneneral government, by the bravery of our army and militia, by the unparalleled gallantry, skill and enterprize of our little navy, and by the dignified firmness and address of our ministers at Ghent.

The prompt and efficient manner in which the Barbary powers have been chastised, sheds a new lustre over our flag; rescues our character from an ignominious badge, and adds to the security and value of our commerce.

Our situation is the more enviable, when contrasted with that of other nations of the earth.

A view of the wretched and exhausted state of the fairest portions of Europe, overrun, wasted and destroyed, by the contending armies of powerful and ambitious monarchs, should convince us of the inestimable value of our republican institutions, and induce us to regard with horror, and detestation every attempt to dissolve the bonds of our political union.

The humbled and degraded state of France, while it claims the tear of sympathy for suffering humanity, may teach us to avoid the evils which the people of that once happy country have brought upon themselves, and to thank Heaven that we are not in a situation to be delivered by emperors, or protected by kings.

The late war with Great Britain, although of short duration, will be attended by consequences of the utmost importance to the United States.

It has caused, if not a formal relinquishment, at least a cessation of those pretensions and practices which led to hostilities, and is followed by a treaty of commerce, which (it is hoped) may become the basis of a permanent peace.

It has inspired our citizens with a martial spirit, and given them a high military character, without which no commercial nation can be safe from insult, so long as large armies and navies are deemed necessary for the peace establishments of the maritime kingdoms of Europe.

It has secured to us the friendship of foreign nations, by shewing them that we can protect ourselves without their aid.

It has discovered to us the extent of our power and resources, which before had never been duly appreciated, by ourselves, our friends, or our enemies.

By forcing the capital formerly employed in commerce into new channels, it has led to the discovery of various means of wealth and prosperity, which would otherwise have remained unattempted, and has thus caused an important revolution in the occupations, views and pursuits of the people in every part of the United States.

It has proved the practicability and the expediency of supplying ourselves at home, with many articles hitherto imported from Europe and Asia.

It has produced an unanimous sentiment in favor of increasing our naval establishment as fast as our means will permit.

It has added to the confidence we justly repose in, a well disciplined militia, as our safe reliance for national defence; and,

It has taught us the necessity of being at all times prepared for war.

Although New-Jersey has not in the late contest, experienced the ravages of an invading foe, our militia have shewn the utmost alacrity, in performing all such duties as have been required of them; and many of our citizens, by the brilliancy of their achievements, have conferred the highest honors on the state. We may dwell with peculiar complacency upon the names of Pike, Lawrence, and Bainbridge. The two former have left a bright example for the imitation of future heroes; the latter still lives to wear his laurels and to defend his country's rights, whenever they shall be invaded.

The return of peace will probably render it expedient to revise some parts of our militia law; in doing this, it will be proper to consider, how far the officers and privates, who have served in the United States' army should be exempted from the performance of the ordinary militia duties.

It will be unnecessary to urge reasons in favor of an energetic militia-system; upon this subject, there is but little diversity of sentiment. Permit me, however, to recommend some further encouragement to uniformed corps.

The rapid improvements in artificial roads, particularly in the mountainous parts of the state, exceed the most sanguine expectations.—Those improvements have greatly facilitated the means of conveying the produce of the country to market, and have added much to the value of landed estates wherever they are established. By enhancing the value of taxable property they have increased the means of filling the state treasury, while they have taken nothing from it—No further legislative aid has been necessary, than to give a proper direction to the enterprise of our wealthy citizens.

I must beg leave to call your attention to a projected improvement of great national importance; I mean the construction of a canal, to connect the waters of the Delaware river, with those of the Raritan.

We have the most satisfactory evidence, that the expense of constructing such a canal on the most practicable route, would bear but a small proportion to the immense advantages to be derived from it. It would form an important link in that vast chain of internal navigation, which our country admits of, and which will, at some future period, afford us security in war, and an abundant source of wealth in peace, while it will form a permanent bond of union among the Atlantic states. All local considerations should yield, when put in competition with an object so highly interesting, not only to this state, but to the union at large.

Our infant manufactures will undoubtedly claim your earnest attention. On this subject, New-Jersey is deeply interested. Much of our capital already invested in manufacturing establishments must fail if left without protection, to struggle in a market, inundated with goods, of British manufacture.

The warehouses of the manufacturing towns of England, where goods have been accumulating for years past, are suddenly emptied upon us, with a profusion, that must eventually ruin many of the manufacturers in that country, as well as importers in this.

It may be said that our manufacturers might have foreseen, and ought to have been prepared to meet the circumstances which cause their present distress. They did anticipate a severe check to their business, upon the return of peace, but as the establishments made by them during the war, were such as our situation absolutely required at that time, and as they may eventually become of immense advantages to the country, if protected, the adventurers were justifiable in calculating upon a liberal support, as well from the general government, as from the legislatures of the several states.

England owes much of its present wealth to the legislative protection afforded to its manufacturers. As early as the reign of Edward the IV. the English parliament prohibited the importation of a great variety of articles of foreign manufacture into England and Wales; and this policy, under different modifications, they have wisely pursued ever since. A similar policy to a certain extent would undoubtedly be proper for the United States.

Although our manufacturers must depend chiefly upon the wisdom of congress for relief, yet I am confident they will receive from you such aid as the limited means of a state legislature can afford.

It is a pleasing reflection that as peace and prosperity return, party spirit subsides; political animosity yields to a general emulation to promote the public good; and if we preserve the harmony in our councils, which now happily prevails, we may reasonably hope to perform the duties imposed upon us, in a manner, honorable to ourselves, and satisfactory to those for whom we act.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

Trenton, Jan. 12, 1816.

Legislature of Massachusetts.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the senate, and gentlemen of the house of representatives:

I have received, since the close of your former session, by order of the secretary of state, twenty-eight boxes, containing the laws of the United States, for the use of this commonwealth; they are deposited in the office of the secretary, to be disposed of according to the directions of the legislature.

By a resolve of the 15th June, one of the members of the late board of war was authorized to complete and close the accounts of this commonwealth against the United States, in the office of that board, and file the same in the secretary's office. It appears by his letter, that the service was seasonably performed. This letter, together with the adjutant-general's annual return of the militia of the state, and the quarter-master-general's return of the ordnance and military stores belonging to this commonwealth, and of the arms and munitions of war which were loaned to several towns and individuals, and which have not been returned into the public arsenal, will be laid before you by the secretary. He will also deliver you a letter from the quarter-master-general, stating divers circumstances relating to his department, which will require your attention.

Within the last three years, more than one hundred acts of the general court have been passed, to incorporate persons for the purpose of carrying on manufactures of different kinds; in some of these, and other similar establishments, children are employed at an early age, before they have received the education which is usual in our English schools; and it may be expedient for the legislature to require, that effectual measures be taken for the instruction of such children. This would be no disadvantage to our new branches of manufacture, which, I have no doubt, you will be disposed to encourage, and which seem to be entitled to that protection which can be afforded to them only by the national legislature.

The careful education of youth is an object of the highest importance, as well to the government as to every individual; a due regard to it, is the most effectual method to prevent the commission of crimes and uphold order and just authority. At this period, when they are most susceptible of virtuous impressions, if they are left without cultivation or restraint, they will entail upon their country an endless series of mischiefs. But, if their minds are enlightened by education, as they advance in life, they will understand, and duly estimate their rights; they will be able to judge of the characters and motives of men, and distinguish between the honest zeal of patriotism, and the intemperate heat of party spirit; and will acquire such information as will enable them to exercise the rights and perform the duties of citizens, in a free government, with steadiness and discretion.

From the ease with which new regulations may be introduced, perhaps, we are in danger of treating the ancient forms and usages of the state with too little respect. The people, generally, have a peculiar attachment to those laws and customs which have been long established, and conform to them more from habitual regard, than through fear of punishment. Unnecessary additions to their number, or frequent alterations, would diminish their authority, and lay a foundation for a multitude of litigious suits. While, therefore, we encourage a spirit of genuine improvement, let us do justice to the usages which we and our fathers have approved, and guard against a temper of unceasing innovation; let us cherish those principles of government, and those systems of education, which have been derived to us from our ancestors, and especially the institutions which have a tendency to preserve in the minds of the people, that reverence for the Deity, without which neither public nor private virtue can subsist, nor the welfare of a community be secured.

A state of peace is highly favorable to the improvement and prosperity of the people, and affords the best security for the continuance of their freedom. Our remote situation from Europe might lead us to expect, that we should seldom be in danger of foreign war; but such expectations may prove delusive. In every country, some persons will be found of a restless temper, who are always dissatisfied with a state of tranquility; and there are many, who eagerly wish for a share in those numerous and lucrative offices and contracts which appertain to a state of war. These men may employ themselves in attempts to excite animosity in the minds of the people, against nations with whom we are at peace, and whose friendship is beneficial. Indeed, when the country is engaged in war, there may be some apology for adopting, in our publications, the language of boasting and irritation, with a view to recommend the measures of the government. But when war is at an end, if we persist in personal resentment, and endeavor to perpetuate a spirit of enmity against a people for whom our government professes friendship, we manifest a depraved and malevolent temper. Such conduct cannot proceed from any honorable motive; it is equally unjust and impolitic, and can only tend to transmit our odious passions to future times, and entail upon our children implacable hatred, and never ending hostility.

But there may be danger of war from a higher source. In almost every government, there is a party, even in the public councils, who wish to signalize their term of office by some splendid action, or some acquisition of territory, however useless it may be; they are anxious to provide for their numerous friends and dependents, by multiplying public offices, and augmenting the patronage of the government; and they are willing to extend its powers, which are always enlarged in a state of war, in proportion as the public taxes and the number of standing troops are increased. Besides, government, strengthened by a large military force, are then often tempted to assume powers which are wholly inconsistent with civil liberty. The people may also be involved in foreign wars, to suspend disputes or complaints which may arise at home; or to promote the success of one political party against the other; or, perhaps, from the mere impulse of prejudice or passion. But when a war spirit predominates, from whatever cause, there will soon be found some occasion for hostilities. Events frequently happen in the intercourse of nations, which furnish a specious pretence for designing men, to excite the passions of the people and dispose them to a rupture. They may affect great zeal for the interest of their own country, and proportional indignation against those powers, whose measures are supposed to obstruct it. In such cases, it will be hardly possible to avoid war, if, at the same time, the people are flattered with an ostentatious display of their resources, and hear nothing but what tends to excite their vanity, or inflame their resentment.

In the motives for making war, self-interest has often a controlling influence; under the pretence of regard to national honor, rulers are too frequently inclined to discover supposed insults and injuries, where none were intended. Instead of listening patiently to arguments in favor of peace, or reflecting how greatly they themselves may be deceived in appreciating their own motives and actions, they rashly declare war, and sacrifice many thousand lives, when, by a short delay, and a candid negotiation, the supposed injuries might have been fully explained or expiated.

Nor does our form of government afford us any assurance of uninterrupted peace. Republics of very limited extent, and surrounded by powerful nations, are chiefly attentive to their own safety—and have seldom an opportunity of indulging the spirit of conquest. But wherever that spirit prevails, whether in republics or monarchies, it is cruel, rapacious and insatiable. During the whole period of the Roman commonwealth, that people were almost constantly engaged in wars with the adjoining states; in most of their wars they were themselves the aggressors, and were ready to gratify their ambition and avarice, at the expence of neighboring nations, against whom they have had no reasonable ground of complaint.

In republics, ambition is the great source of crimes and misfortunes. It is frequently possessed by the favorites and pretended friends of the people; who, notwithstanding, when actuated by this impulse, lose their sentiments of justice and regard to the welfare of their country; and seem to have no sense of public calamities, unless they suffer themselves, or their family connections; or party influence are affected.

Although, as members of this government, we can have no immediate agency in producing wars, or preventing them; yet, so far as we have influence in choosing the officers of the national government, we may and ought to employ it, in selecting those who are distinguished for integrity, moderation and invariable attachment to the rights of the citizens and the public good. I hope the United States will be saved from the guilt of unjust and offensive wars; but we shall have little ground to flatter ourselves with the expectation of durable tranquility, until the rulers of the world are governed by disinterested motives, and the passions of avarice and ambition are controlled by a better spirit.

On this occasion, gentlemen, will you indulge me in a few remarks which relate chiefly to myself?

If we had been in a tranquil state during the last four years, I should not have been a candidate for any public office; but having been again called upon, I hoped to be capable of performing any service that might be assigned me, until our affairs should be in a more peaceful train, and the difficulty which embarrassed the government of the state should be diminished. That period is now arrived, and the infirmities of age make it necessary for me to retire, as soon as conveniently may be, from public business. Permit me, therefore, to say to you, gentlemen, and through you to our constituents, that I decline to be a candidate for the office of governor at the next election. I thank my fellow citizens for the many proofs they have given me of their confidence, and especially for their candor, in doing justice to the motives by which I was influenced in the course of the late war. I hope the people of this state will, in all future times, be united in sentiments of mutual good will; and may the Almighty, who protected our fathers, be the guide and defence of their children, in this, and every succeeding generation: CALLED STRONG.

January 16th, 1816.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.

January 25.—Mr. Bibb submitted the following motion for consideration:

"Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, two thirds of both houses concurring. That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the legislatures of the several states, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the states, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said constitution:

"The senators of the United States shall be chosen for three years." [This subject has not been discussed in the senate, but is made the order of the day for an early day.]

January 31.—The following was the vote on the passage of the bill for continuing in force the double duties to the 30th of June, &c. YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Brown, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Gailard, Howell, Hunter, Lacombe, Mason, N. H. Mason, Va. Morrow, Roberts, Roggles, Sanford, Talbot, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Williams, Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, Goldsborough, Horsey, Thompson, Tichenor—5.

The senate spent some time in discussion of the bill to authorise the payment for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service at the United States; when the bill was recommitted to the military committee.

Monday, Feb. 5.—Mr. Harper, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat.

Tuesday, Feb. 6.—The bill from the house to continue the duty on imported salt, passed to a third reading, 23 votes to 6.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, January 25 and Saturday, the 27th, were chiefly occupied by Mr. Randolph in a speech he commenced on Thursday—a considerable part of what he had to say being yet reserved for a future opportunity.

Monday, January 29.—Mr. King, of Mass. presented the petition of Jabez Mowry and others, citizens of the United States, stating that upon the capture of Eastport by the British forces during the late war, a number of bonds given by them to the United States to secure the duties on imported merchandise, fell into the hands of the British authorities, that suits have been commenced against some of them by the British government in Halifax and judgment decreed, that the cases are now pending before the higher courts in Great-Britain, &c. and that the suits have also been commenced against them by the authorities of the United States, and praying relief from these double prosecutions.

Mr. Ingham presented the petition of sundry manufacturers of woolen goods in the states of New-Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware, praying that the existing duties upon all woolen articles of foreign manufacture imported into the United States may be continued.

Mr. Ingham made a report respecting the letter from the postmaster general. The committee had had an interview with him—when he informed them that the reason for his appeal to congress was founded upon a report that some persons in the department had been in the custom of selling drafts on the deputy postmasters, and retaining the premiums for their personal emolument—which he desired might be investigated. The matter was referred to a select committee.

The house then again resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the revenue subject.

The question still under consideration was the proposition, by way of amendment, to repeal the direct tax.

Mr. Parris and Mr. McKee spoke in favor of this motion; Mr. Clay went at length in opposition to the motion, and Mr. Hopkinson in reply.

The speeches of the two latter gentlemen covered the whole field of the general policy, past and present, of the government.

When Mr. Hopkinson concluded, on the suggestion of Mr. Throop, the resolution respecting the direct tax was ordered to be laid on the table, and the house proceeded to consider the following resolution, as being more pressing in its nature:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal, from and after the 15th day of April next, the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on various goods, wares, and merchandise," manufactured within the United States," passed on the 18th January, 1815, and also the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on gold, silver, and plated ware, and jewelry, and paste work, manufactured within the United States," passed on the 27th of February, 1815, from the same day.

Mr. Desha moved to strike out so much of the resolve as proposed to repeal the duties on manufactures of jewelry, &c. which motion was however negatived, being opposed by Mr. Lowndes.

The resolution was finally agreed to, and referred to the committee of ways and means to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. Randolph (in consequence of what had fallen from Mr. Clay in debate) laid upon the table the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the military establishment of the United States." And the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 30.—Many petitions were presented—among them, several from manufacturers, praying protection.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, on the subject of the revenue.

The question being on the proposition to repeal the direct tax—Mr. Wright supplied the abolition of the direct tax, and in a speech of considerable length, delivered his opinions on public affairs generally.

Mr. A. W. of Mass. followed, also in support of the proposed amendment, and spoke at much length on our national concerns in reply to the advocates of the government.

When Mr. K. concluded, the committee rose, and the house adjourned.

[Wednesday, Jan. 31.—In the senate the bills from the other house to continue the double duties on imports, and also the duties on stamps and refined sugar, were finally passed. They now only require the signature of the president to become laws.]

In the house of representatives the day was occupied in debate on the revenue subject. Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Calhoun, spoke in favor of a continuation of the direct tax, and Mr. Ross against it. Mr. Randolph replied to Mr. Calhoun. On motion of Mr. Tucker, the committee then rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

A message was received from the president, transmitting a report of the secretary of state, and sundry documents, respecting the transactions at Dartmouth in April 1815. They were ordered to be printed.

The debate going on in the house appears to be highly interesting—involving all questions, past, present and future.]

Thursday, Feb. 1.—After the presentation of several petitions—the subject of the revenue was taken up. Mr. Tucker spoke against a repeal of the direct tax—Mr. Randolph occupied the rest of the day in several motions and speeches.

Friday, Feb. 2.—Some minor business being done, the house again went into committee of the whole on the revenue bills, the direct tax being still under consideration—after sometime spent thereon, the committee rose, &c.

The bill to repeal the duties on certain domestic manufactures being so amended as to give it immediate effect, was ordered to a third reading.

The blank in the bill for ordnance, fortifications, &c. was filled up with 1,650,000 dollars.

Saturday, Feb. 3.—The speaker laid before the house a letter from commodore Rodgers, soliciting the interference of congress in a suit between John Donnell and himself, for the loss of a schooner and her cargo, which loss is alleged to have taken place because she was stopped and examined by a squadron of ships commanded by the commodore during the late war.

The engrossed bill to repeal the duties on domestic manufactures, was read a third time and passed.

The house took up the report of the committee of the whole respecting the revenue. On the suggestion of Mr. Clay it was agreed, 19 to 16, to limit the duration of the direct tax to one year.

Mr. Hardin then renewed the motion, which he had made without success, in committee of the whole, to amend the resolution so as to declare it expedient to repeal immediately the direct tax, and thereon demanded the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on the motion to repeal the tax entirely, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Baer, Barbour, Baylies, Blount, Boss, Bradbury, Breckinridge, Brigham, Brown, Bryan, Cady, Cannon, Champion, Cilley, Clark, N. C. Cooper, Culpepper, Davenport, Goldsborough, Hale, Hardin, Hawes, H. ister, Henderson, Herbert, Hulbert, Hungerford, Jackson, Jewett, Kent, King, M. King, N. C. Langdon, Low, Lewis, Love, Lovett, Lyon, Mason, McCoy, McKee, Mills, Moore, S. C. Mosely, Noyes, Parris, Pitkin, Powell, Randolph, Reed, Rice, Ruggles, Sharp, Sheffey, Smith, Va. Stanford, Strawn, Strong, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tate, Paul, Thomas, Vose, Ward, M. Ward, N. Y. Wheaton, Wiley, Williams, Wright, Yates—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Baker, Bassett, Bateman, Brannett, Betts, Birdsal, Birdseye, Brooks, Burnside, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappin, Clark, Ky. Clendinning, Clonton, Comstock, Crawford, Creighton, Cutbush, Darlington, Desha, Fomey, Gaston, Glasgow, Gold, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hall, Hall, Hammond, Huger, Ingham, Irving, N. Y. Irwin, Pa. Johnson, Ky. Kerr, Va. Lowndes, Lumpkin, Lyle, Maclay, Mayrant, M. Lean, K. M. Lean, O. Middleton, Minor, Nelson, M. Nelson, Va. Newton, Ormsby, Pickens, Pickering, Piper, Pleasants, Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Roat, Ross, Sargant, Savage, Schenck, Smith, Pa. Southard, Taylor, N. Y. Telfair, Throop, Tucker, Wallace, Ward, N. J. Wendover, Whiteside, Wilde, Wilkin, Willoughby, Thos. Wilson, Wm. Wilson, Woodward, Yates—81.

Mr. Pickens then made a motion to amend the resolution for continuing a direct tax of three millions, so as to reduce the direct tax from three to two millions; but, before the question was taken, the house adjourned.

Mr. Pleasants, from the naval committee, made a report on the petition of capt. Charles Stewart, accompanied by a bill, rewarding the officers and crew of the Constitution frigate, for the capture of the British ship of war Levanant—Read and committed.

The motion to reduce the direct tax to two millions was negatived—after various motions, the further consideration of the subject was postponed.

The house then on motion of Mr. Forsyth, resolved itself into a committee of the whole, on the bill from the senate, concerning the commercial convention with Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth, the bill was amended from its declaratory form, by striking out the whole of the bill and inserting in lieu thereof, in the very terms, the bill which passed this house several days ago, and was rejected in the senate.

This motion Mr. Forsyth supported by a speech, in which he compared the merits of the two bills, and condemned the senate's bill as an interference with the judicial power, and also as an attempt to deprive this house of its just powers in relation to the origination of propositions affecting the public revenue.

The bill having been thus amended, was reported to the house; and the question being on the concurrence in the amendments made in committee—

Mr. Lyon delivered a speech of about an hour in length, against the bill and against the necessity of legislation on the subject; to whom Mr. Forsyth briefly replied.

The question on concurring in the amendments which go to substitute the bill which first passed this house, in lieu of the senate's bill, was then decided as follows:

For the amendments	81
Against them	70

And, thus amended, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Tuesday, February 6.—Sundry petitions were presented and referred; among which was, by Mr. Pinkney, the petition of sundry merchants and ship-owners in the city of Baltimore, praying compensation for damages sustained by the sinking of their vessels at the entrance of the harbor of Baltimore, to aid in the defence thereof when attacked by the British forces in September, 1815.

Mr. Johnson reported a bill for organizing the general staff, and making further provision for the organization of the army of the United States; which was twice read.

The house, on motion of Mr. King, resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by him yesterday.* He then withdrew his motion, and in lieu thereof laid on the table, for future consideration, the following:

Resolved, That the committee of foreign relations be instructed to enquire into the expediency of excluding from the ports of the United States, or of increasing the duties on all foreign vessels owned in, coming from, bound to, or touching at, any of the possessions of any nation of Europe in the West-Indies, and on the continent of America, from which the vessels of the United States are excluded, and of prohibiting or of increasing the duties on the importation in foreign vessels of any articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of such possessions.

This motion lies on the table.

The bill from the senate concerning the convention of commerce with Great Britain, as yesterday amended in this house, was read a third time and passed.

The house resumed the consideration of the proposition of the committee of ways and means to continue the direct tax of three millions another year.

Mr. Pickens' motion to reconsider the vote on the question of repealing said tax being under consideration—

Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Hanson, and Mr. Sargeant spoke at length against this motion, and Messrs. Stearns, Ahertson, Randolph and Pickens in favor of it—the debates turning on the merits of the proposed direct tax, on general principles, at the present conjuncture of our affairs. Mr. Tucker spoke briefly in explanation.

The question on the motion to reconsider, essentially the question to repeal the tax altogether, was decided as follows:

For the re-consideration	68
Against it	87

The resolution to continue the direct tax of three millions for one year, was then agreed to, and referred to the financial committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. Huger submitted a proposition to appoint a new committee, on the subject of public expenditures; which lies on the table one day of course.

The house then proceeded, in committee of the whole, to consider the next proposition of the committee of ways and means, viz. that which proposes the continuance of certain duties on distillation—when, on motion of Mr. Williams of N. C. who considered this question too important to be decided without discussion, the committee rose, reported progress; and

The house adjourned.

Wednesday, Feb. 7.—Mr. Pleasants, from the committee, reported amendments to the bill from the senate, authorising the appointment of admirals, the object of which are to create one vice-admiral and two rear-admirals, instead of one admiral and two vice-admirals—a mere change of denomination. The bill and amendments were referred to a committee of the whole.

The house resumed the consideration of Mr. King's motion, submitted yesterday. After considerable debate and much observation, it was agreed to.

The revenue bills were then taken up in committee of the whole. Some time being spent therein it rose without determining any thing decisively, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. Bassett, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of com. John Rodgers, of the navy, respecting a judgment obtained against him by John Donnell of Baltimore, for the value of a vessel detained by a frigate belonging to a squadron under the command of com. R. reported a resolution for his relief.

This resolution, after some conversation on the form of the report, it being contended that it should have been by bill instead of resolution, was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole. And the house adjourned.

Thursday, Feb. 8. The Speaker also laid before the house the annual report of the commissioner of the sinking fund.

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, on the revenue.

The proposition to amend the resolve respecting the whiskey tax, by reducing the proposed addition of 100 per cent. on the capacity of the still, to 50 per cent. was further debated at much length, supported by Messrs. Cannon, Taft, Throop, Ross, McKee, and Yancey, and opposed by Messrs. Robertson, Lowndes, Smith of Md. and Taylor of N. Y.—It was negatived by a very small majority.

Mr. McLean, of Ohio, then moved to amend the resolve so as to equalize the rate of a license to distil per week, month, &c. to the rate of the license per year; which motion was agreed to by a majority of 20 or 30 votes.

The main resolution (to repeal the duty on the quantity of spirits distilled, and to increase the duty on the capacity of the still 100 per cent.) was then agreed to.

The proposition to repeal the duty on household furniture was agreed to.

The remaining resolution was then taken up as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient so to amend the rates of duties upon imported articles, after the 30th of June next, as that they shall be estimated to produce an amount equal to that which would be produced by an average addition of 42 per cent. to the permanent rates of duties.

And agreed to without a division.

The committee then rose, and reported their proceedings to the house.

Mr. Lowndes, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill to carry into effect the proposition respecting the direct tax (adopted by the house the other day) which bill was twice read and committed.

And the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

ALGIERNS. Several letters have recently appeared from officers of our squadron in the Mediterranean. They generally state that the dey of Algiers is very much dissatisfied that the brig captured by com. Decatur has not been restored, as promised. He speaks of the favorableness of the treaty he granted, and that the restoration of the prizes was absolutely necessary to keep the people quiet. Some of these letters reflect pretty severely upon com. Decatur for leaving that sea before he had fulfilled his promise to the dey. The brig, it seems, was detained by the Spaniards, on the plea that she was taken within their waters. Com. Shaw was about to proceed himself to Carthage to demand an explanation as to this business—other accounts say that the brig had been given up by the Americans. Our squadron has fixed upon Port Mahon for winter quarters.

The Algerine fleet consists of 1 ship of 50 guns; 1 of 45; 1 of 44; 1 of 38; 1 of 36; 1 of 30; 1 of 22; 2 of 20, and a galley of 5—total 310 guns.

Com. Chauncey left Washington city on Wednesday last, to proceed with the Washington 74, for the Mediterranean.

The British have erected a fort on Drummond's Island, in the passage between lakes Huron and Superior, and about 45 miles from our fort at Mackinaw, on lake Huron.

New-York.—The legislature of this state is now in session. A history of the incipient proceedings of the assembly (as the house of representatives is called) is curious and interesting. The federalists in a body, on account of the absence of two of their members, refused to meet on the first day of the session, and so prevented the formation of a house, the other party not making a quorum; one republican has died since the election, and another has been compelled to go abroad for his health. This reduces the parties to 62 and 62, supposing all the rest present, and including however, on the republican side, one member, who, it is alleged, was not duly elected. On the 2d day of the session, the federalists came in, and a republican speaker and clerk were chosen—the first (Mr. Cruger) 61 to 60; the other (Mr. Clark) 62 to 59 and one blank. A great contest then arose to expel the person above alluded to instantur, without reference to a committee, &c. as usual, which was opposed, and so the thing rested in debating upon it at the date of our last accounts.

In justice, it is believed that Mr. Allen, from Ontario county, ought not to keep his seat—but the law (which has been applied, it seems, to another case by the other side, of very nearly the same nature) appears to justify him in it. Mr. Fellows, the claiming member, had 7 votes more than Mr. Allen, but the other produced a regular certificate of election, in consequence of some of the votes being returned for Hen. Fellows, instead of Henry Fellows, as it is said they were designed for; it being positively required that the names should be written in full. It is probable we shall notice this subject again. Governor Tompkins delivered his speech on the 2d instant. It is so much as recommends itself to every honest American, and shall be inserted.

The brig Macedonian, which sailed in company with the President frigate, has arrived at New York in 109 days from Canton, with a valuable cargo of teas, &c.

CARTHAGENA. We have the following distressing intelligence by an arrival at Baltimore on Thursday last. We are now compelled to believe that Carthagea may have fallen. But, by information the editor received, not long ago, direct from Santa Fe, he deems the report of the capture of this city improbable. It is about 700 miles in the interior, and at the time alluded to did not appear to have any enemy near it—the people being entirely devoted to the patriot cause, under a regular government.

From the Merchant's Coffee House Books. Baltimore, Feb. 8.—By the Coquette, from Santa Martha, we learn that, on the 10th of Jan. news arrived at Santa Martha of the capture of Santa Fe by the royalists, amounting to 6000—they were opposed by 2000 patriots. Since the capture of Carthagea, general Morillo has kept the insurgent flag flying as a decoy to vessels entering the port; in consequence of which 11 vessels had entered after the fall—7 of which were Americans and 4 British; Among the vessels named, were the schooner Swift, Hacket, of Baltimore, and a schooner under the command of captain Alameda, all hands were made prisoners, closely confined, and most barbarously treated, many Americans had died in consequence of their brutal usage. An English frigate had sailed for Carthagea to alleviate the sufferings of their countrymen.

The reported detention of the schr. Swift, Hacket, of this port, at Carthagea, must be grossly erroneous, as her destination was far south of it, and could not have been there without having been interrupted on her voyage.

SUPREME COURT. Washington, Feb. 7. The supreme court assembled in this city, pursuant to law, on Monday. All the judges of that most respectable body are present, viz. judges Marshal, Washington, Livingston, Johnson, Todd, Story and Dwight. Henry Wheaton, Esq. counsellor at law, of New York, was appointed reporter of its decisions.

Affairs in China.—It will be remembered, that we some time since stated, that a serious controversy had arisen between the vice-roy of Canton, and the English committee of supercargoes. The cause of the dispute, originated in the capture of an American schooner by his Britannic majesty's ship Doris, in the harbor of Whampoa. The vice roy complained of this act as a breach of neutrality; one irritating circumstance led on to another, until sir George Staunton, the representative of the company, attended by all the British subjects resident at Canton, had come to a determination to leave the place. This decided step it was thought had reconciled all animosity, and reinstated the harmony of commercial intercourse. But this expectation has proved unfounded. Subsequent intelligence has reached us, by which it appears, that an edict has been issued, which dismisses the Hong merchants from their employment, and appoints three or four successors in their stead. The edict goes on to express his imperial majesty's high displeasure at sir George Staunton, and is very severe on the English, declaring that they are allowed a residence in that quarter of the world, only by the clemency of his imperial majesty, and charges them with ingratitude.

It further recommends to the supercargoes, if displeased with the conduct of his imperial majesty to withdraw from his government.

Thus has the emperor of China, at last made himself in some sort, a party in our late controversy with England.

Balt Telegraph
Port of Cincinnati, Jan. 8.—Sailed for New-Orleans, barge Nonsuch, 100 tons; do. Cincinnati, 115 tons; do. —, 40 tons; do. Fox, 40 tons, laden with flour and pork; also, 10 or 12 flat boats, carrying from 3 to 400 barrels, with the same destination, have left Cincinnati within the last two months. We gladly repeat the grateful aspiration of the printer noticing these things, and say, "may prosperous voyages reward the labors of the enterprising owners!"

Prices at Cincinnati.—Flour, brisk at $5.50 per bl. Pork, 10 to 13; the same per cwt. 5; Wheat, in demand, 75 per bushel.

WHOLESALE PRICES. Pittsburg, Jan. 6. Orleans cotton 33 to 34 cents; do. sugar 25; lead 15; super. flour $5 per bbl. bar iron 210 per ton; castings 125; Am. blistered steel 17 cents per lb. &c. The above might be useful to lord Sheffield. "The western country never can become commercial," said he.

HARBOR-MASTER'S DEPARTMENT.—Charleston, 1st Jan. 1816. There have arrived at this port since the peace, say 23d February, 1815—

270 ships and barques
169 brigs
326 schooners
155 sloops, exclusive of state coasters
2 ketches
1 lugger

923 vessels—There are now in port 87 ships and barques, 37 brigs, 59 schooners, 39 sloops, 1 ketch, 1 lugger.

THOMAS PAINE,

Harbor Master.

Died.—On the 31st ultimo, at Kennet, 10 miles from the borough of Wilmington, Del. CHRISTIANA WEBB, in the 94th year of her age. She was the last of the 17 children of Daniel and Jane Hoopes. Her father and grand-father came from England with William Penn, in the year 1682.

Of those 17 children, eleven averaged upwards of 80 years. The aggregate ages of the whole was 1056 years. Remarkable as these circumstances are, they are, perhaps, not more so, than that throughout this long period, all of them had their dwellings, died, and lie interred within 20 miles of the late residence and burial place of their said ancestors.

President Madison.

To the editor of the National Advocate.

SIR—Should you accord in sentiment, as to the character here delineated, of our chief magistrate, Mr. MADISON, you will please give it a place in your paper.

CHARACTER OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"If he has any enemies, they are only such as are always weary of hearing of Aristides the just."

[CHESTERFIELD.]

Destined for the bar, the youth of Madison was consecrated to the laborious studies of that vocation. At the age of 22 years he commenced his career of public life, always occupying, with superior talents and fidelity, the most conspicuous places in the gift of his fellow-citizens. When a member of congress, the vigor of his mind, the wisdom of his views, and the force and facility of his elocution, gave him, for many years, a great ascendancy in that sanctuary of freedom. His style is chaste; his logic concise, cogent and impressive. He argues without acrimony—replies without anger—exhibiting firmness without obstinacy—moderation without weakness, and justice without severity.

Raised to the dignity of secretary of state by the sagacious Jefferson, he reconciled all parties by his precedent and enlightened patriotism. Called by a discerning and admiring people to the presidency, he so highly justified their honorable choice, that at the stated period they eagerly renewed their suffrages in his favor. Nothing can be more wise, more righteous than his administration. His policy is as frank and as faithful as his character, disdaining and shunning all state craft, all the subtleties and wiles of diplomacy. At once cautious and sincere, he does not feel obliged to say all he thinks, though he would scorn to utter what he does not think—nor is his language ambiguous. A stranger to intrigue, he knows nothing of deceit and artifice, but to guard against them. His views are great; his promises sacred; his intentions pure, and the inflexible integrity of his mind, is equalled only by the noble virtues of his heart. Such is the public man.

In the intercourse of private life, his native candor, warm and generous feelings, liberal and elevated sentiments, captivate and secure the affection and veneration of all who are so fortunate as to approach and know him. Laborious and indefatigable, simple in his manners, in his taste and in his dress, he may be said to resemble, in these, and in many other particulars, the sages of antiquity.

He has now reached his fifty-seventh year; but wearied by habitual vigilance the lineaments of his face have contracted a cast of reflection and severity, which gives him the appearance of a more advanced age. It is only in those moments of relaxation, when, by an effort, he disengages himself from the arduous duties of his exalted station, that his stern brow dilates, his physiognomy becomes animated, and the estimable traits of his social character beam upon us, invigorating and enlivening us to such a degree, by the variety of his knowledge, the lustre of his wit, and the point of his anecdote, that we are astonished to find this great statesman and wise administrator endowed with as much affability and vivacity in private circles, as dignity and serenity in public life.

This is our Sachem, an illustrious successor of the immortal WASHINGTON. The glorious events of his administration will form a distinguished epoch in the page of American history; from his completing, and consolidating, with his firm and powerful hand, the edifice raised by his predecessors.

The National Advocate is now publishing a sketch of the public life of Mr. Monroe. If it be concluded in time for our next number, it shall be inserted.

Legislature of New-York.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the Assembly,

In meeting the Legislature for the first time since the termination of the war with Great Britain, allow me to congratulate you on that event, and on the negotiation of an honorable, and I trust, a permanent peace. Sensible of its blessings, we ought to ascribe its attainment to the direction of that Providence, under whose auspices we have been protected through the perils and embarrassments of war.

It is with the proudest sensations we can recur to the character and incidents of the late war—to the unwearied valor and firmness which marked the progress of our arms through every vicissitude of peril and discomfiture, which courted every exposure and braved every danger, and which, in its termination has, in an eminent degree, contributed as well to strengthen our confidence in the efficacy and stability of our political institutions, as to elevate our national character abroad.

It has been matter of much speculation, whether our government, in its organization, was well calculated for a state of war; and it had been apprehended, wanting the consolidated energies of a monarchy, its powers would act without concentration, and of course without effect. The glorious contest has, however, established the fallacy of the objection, and the perfection of its system. It has presented, with some triumph, to the world, the refutation of an opinion which denied to republics a capacity to resist the assaults of exterior hostility; and it has practically shewn, that a free nation, not only destitute of the system, the science and experience which give perfection to military operations, but deprived even of the signal benefits resulting from unanimity, has been able to resist with success, the most desperate effort of an enemy inured to war, and possessing all the advantages of veteran force and experienced generals.

In becoming a belligerent, the government of the United States consulted alone the respect she owed herself, and assumed an attitude demanded by her wrongs, her honor, and a regard to her permanent prosperity, which made war necessary to the accomplishment of a peace, which should again restore, upon an equitable basis, the long disturbed relations of amity and commerce. But among the events growing out of the late war, we cannot too much appreciate the elevation of the American character, and the pleasing contrast with periods anterior to its declaration. Remote from the collisions of Europe, her political influence in the scale of nations was scarcely felt; but the spirit with which she resisted the novel and unauthorised pretensions of disguised hostility,—the firmness with which she maintained a sanguinary and perilous contest,—and the moderation she has shewn, after the causes of the war had, by subsequent events, been essentially removed, in the arrangement of a peace emanating principally from her valor and resources,—have given her a rank in the convention of nations, which cannot fail effectually to guarantee the continuance of her pacific relations. Amidst these considerations, let not those who have achieved these great objects, under the most adverse fortunes, be forgotten. Let them not retire at once the objects of the respect and ingratitude of their country. I cannot but cherish the hope, that their sacrifices and their sufferings will early command the attention of the national legislature.

The decision with which the subsequent war with Algiers has been conducted, has given a new proof, as well of the wisdom and firmness of those to whom the public functions of government have been entrusted, as of the necessity of that description of maritime defence, so peculiarly adapted to the commercial character of our country. In this achievement, is to be found another instance of the high courage and conduct, which, on every occasion, have distinguished the gallant commander of that portion of our naval force, and his brave associates.

In estimating the blessings of peace, we cannot be too strongly reminded of the necessity of preparing for every vicissitude. Our growing commercial character, the jealousies excited by our free form of government, the recent brilliant achievements of our army and navy, our improvements both in the arts of peace and war, and our enterprise and resolution, render this country an object of inquietude and apprehension to those nations, whose commercial pursuits and influence must unavoidably come in collision with those of the United States. I cannot therefore too strongly enforce on those who are selected as the guardians of the public safety, the indispensable necessity of providing, against future and contingent danger, the means of prompt and vigorous resistance. To say that the general government is alone entrusted by the constitution, with the power and means of providing for general defence, is to deny the application of those ordinary precautions which self-respect and self-defence, impose on each state. With it, we participate equally, in the responsibility of guarding and defending our territory, and with hers, we ought to unite our efforts for a general defence.

I cannot pass over this occasion, without again calling the attention of the legislature to the propriety of a new organization of the militia, a power competent from its resources to fulfil the high destination of being the bulwark of the state. Recent events have confirmed that opinion, by practical illustration: when under competent commanders, the militia have been led through privation, fatigue and peril, to the accomplishment of many of the most important military operations. On former occasions, some of the defects of the existing militia laws have been presented to the legislature, and endeavors have been made to shew that they are incompetent to the objects contemplated, and in time of war operate unequally. I cannot forbear urging, that no period can be better adapted for the revision of our military code than during the present tranquil state of the country. Our exposure to attack, and the difficulty of commanding our resources when assailed, present strong inducements for a co-operation with the United States, in giving form and effect to that system of defence which, in the opinions of the framers of the constitution, was calculated for most of the emergencies of the nation.

The difficulties and expenses which attended the transportation of public stores to frontier posts during the late war, have demonstrated the necessity of a legislative intervention, to encourage the establishment of good roads from the Hudson to the St. Lawrence, and to lakes Erie, Ontario and Champlain. And on this subject allow me to remark, that neither the convenience of turnpike companies, nor the security of the public from imposition, are promoted by conferring upon the executive the power of appointing commissioners to lay out roads, inspectors to examine them, or of issuing licences to erect gates. This power would be more advisedly reposed in the first Judges of counties, or in some other responsible and accessible officer, with the right to appeal from their decision.

It will rest with the legislature, whether the prospect of connecting the waters of the Hudson with those of the western lakes and of Champlain, is not sufficiently important to demand the appropriation of some part of the revenues of the state to its accomplishment, without imposing too great a burthen upon our consistents. The first route being an object common with the states of the west, we may rely on their zealous co-operation in any judicious plan that can perfect the water communication in that direction. As it relates to the connecting the waters of the Hudson with those of lake Champlain, we may with equal confidence count on the spirited exertions of the patriotic and enterprising state of Vermont.

Among the objects that will necessarily invite the attention of the legislature, the situation of the manufacturing interests of the country ought not to be disregarded. The early effort they made to render their country independent of foreign supplies, not a little facilitated the operations of the late war. A neglect, by government, of their interests, cannot but restrain, in the event of future hostilities, the direction that patriotism and enterprise would otherwise give to a great proportion of the capital of the country. It is a proposition too plain to require any observation to enforce it, that no nation can be really and substantially independent, which relies on any other for its essential supplies of clothing. The maintenance of our manufactures is, in my view, of deep interest to the present and future prosperity of our country, and I confidently recommend them to your patronage and protection.

In the course of last year, two persons, convicted of arson, have been pardoned, on the condition of submitting to imprisonment in the state prison for life at hard labor. As the constitution invests the executive with the power of remitting sentences for all crimes except treason and murder, and as the laws authorise the insertion of conditions in the pardons to be granted, I can entertain no doubt of the propriety or expediency, in some cases, of commutating the punishment of death for perpetual imprisonment by conditional pardons. This subject may, however, require some legislative provision, in relation to the powers and duties of the inspectors and keepers of the state prison. The judges of the supreme court, equally with myself, regret that the crowded state of the present prison has of late made it indispensably necessary to extend the list of recommendations for pardons to a greater number than would otherwise have been deemed proper. They therefore suggest, in which I most respectfully concur, that the prison be enlarged, or that a new establishment be erected in the northern or western part of the state, which will have for one of its important effects, the reduction of a portion of the present heavy expenses incident to transportation of convicts from remote counties of the state.

The evidence and documents on which I have resorted, for the consideration of the legislature, the sentence of Thomas Burk, lately convicted of murder in New-York, will accompany a special communication.

Your superior wisdom, gentlemen, will suggest the variety of other subjects which ought to receive the attention of the legislature. I have only therefore to add, that, in the discharge of the important trust confided to us, to inculcate on our citizens the magnanimous sentiment, that in peace they should become the friends of those to whom they were enemies in war, to divest ourselves of that spirit of party which has heretofore jeopardized the best interests of the country, and which, if persisted in, may ultimately involve us in those deplorable scenes by which modern Europe has been convulsed and almost desolated, are duties of the highest obligation. In every object connected with those duties, or which may respect the honor or welfare of this state, you may be assured of the utmost support on my part. DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

British Manufactures.

The following article deserves attention—as demonstrating the value which England sets upon her manufactures, the greatest source of her greatness; and evincing a solicitude to keep America in a state of dependence, without factories and without current coin.—Columbian.

From Nicholson & Co's new Price Current, London, Dec. 5. It is truly gratifying, when we are about to enter into an extended competition with foreign countries in every branch of trade, that our manufactures are in the most flourishing situation. The cotton manufactures in this country are brought to the highest perfection; for some months past, the manufacturers have not been able to supply the demand, though it is calculated (and by reports of the import it is nearly ascertained) that 8000 bags of the raw material are manufactured weekly.—Formerly it was stated, that France and other nations of the continent, would rival us in cotton goods, on account of the cheapness of labor, &c.; we always questioned it, and the fabrics that were brought in an indirect manner during the continental system, were very inferior, and much higher in price; latterly, during the late peace, at the fairs of Germany, Leipzig, &c. considerable parcels of coarse goods traveled forward, certainly improved in texture, but still greatly inferior to British; in the better descriptions and fine, we are entirely without rivalry. America, during the late war, was stated to have generally improved in cotton goods; they are still inferior; we import the raw material from the United States; manufacture and sell the fabric cheaper in their own country, than the American manufacturer can afford to do, notwithstanding all the great expenses attending the transport, &c. The conclusion is very clear. We believe our unrivalled machinery is generally admitted to be the cause of the great superiority; and America, though an improving and enterprising nation, yet it is a new country, and its policy rather to cultivate the soil and extend her population, the cultivators of cotton, tobacco, &c. getting immediate and quick returns. Manufactures belong to an old and rich country, requiring very extended capitals, and many years must elapse before it can be brought to any perfection. In consequence, it has been found that the emigrants from Manchester, &c. some time ago, in place of paying attention to manufacture, very shortly after their arrival in the United States, turned their attention to other employments.

The Birmingham and Sheffield wares are without competition, there is no rivalry in any foreign country. The manufactures of woollen are greatly extended, and are now a valuable export, particularly to America. The potteries of Staffordshire are without precedent in extent; it is true, the colors of the China ware, and some manufactures in Germany, still excel the Staffordshire, yet the imitation is so admirably executed, that few would know the difference betwixt the China and most improved of the potteries of England. Presents of the latter have lately been transmitted to China, no doubt the most beautiful specimens of our manufacture, and for the purpose that the Chinese, who are admirable at imitation, may introduce the landscape into their finer ware.

What we have mentioned of the flourishing situation of our manufactures, must be guarded with the consideration that the chief demand is for exportation; the home consumption, which is always the best and most beneficial, has been considerably affected by the present distressed situation of the agriculturist.

To the extended manufactures of the country, we are likely to add one of the greatest importance, and if it succeeds, of which at present the best informed in the country are very sanguine, it will outstrip the staple manufacture in France, to which country it has always been supposed exclusively to belong. The manufacture we allude to, is that for which parliament passed an act to excuse a Mr. Lee from giving into the patent office a specification of his invention for the preparation of hemp and flax without steeping; which not only rots the raw material, but wastes it, and destroys the finer parts most fit for the purposes of manufacture. The exemption from the standing law in favor of Mr. Lee, was done in order to prevent foreign nations from availing themselves of this invention, which they would have seized upon the moment his specification had been made public. The measure was a wise one; and every friend to his country will applaud it, especially when it is considered, that the machinery which supercedes the steeping of the hemp and flax is of so simple a nature, that a very few pounds will furnish it; and the article produced from the flax, beautiful beyond description. Several of the most intelligent of our manufacturers at Manchester have inspected the raw material, when made ready for spinning by the new process, both in its native color, and when simply washed with soap and water. By the usual method of preparation, by half-rotting the vegetable in water the dark color is fixed so firmly, that only a violent chemical process, and the application of acid and corrosive preparations, can dislodge it; but the simple application of soap and water to flax prepared in the new method, will not only discharge the color, but leave the staple so beautiful, so silver-like a white, that nothing but the finest bleached silk can any way rival it.

With such an article for ingenuity to exercise itself on, most important results may be anticipated.

A full and fair examination of the merits of the invention took place in January last, before the trustees of the linen and hempen manufactures of Ireland, when it appeared to that board, that it was most important: that, besides furnishing a more beautiful material, it was infinitely stronger as well as very much more in quantity, than when prepared by the common method; and that the seed, which is totally destroyed by steeping, is preserved by the inventor to the cultivator. The board voted premiums to Mr. Lee, of two pounds to every breaking or cleansing machine, and fifty shillings for every refining machine, which may be made ready for work in Ireland.

The new machine invented will spin the flax much finer than it is possible to spin cotton, and it will not be matter of surprise, if another species of piece goods should not only be manufactured, but owing to the number of mechanics ready trained to fine work, if linens, such as will even surpass the countries of France, should very soon become a leading article in the trade of the country.

American Wool.

The following letter will be found interesting to the dealers in wool.

Liverpool, November 24.

SIR—We had the pleasure of writing to you on the 22d inst. and we now address you to communicate the result of the enquiries we have continued to make on the subject of Merino wool. As they have been presented with great care, and with the assistance of intelligent friends extensively engaged in the wool trade, we send you the result with the greater confidence; and you may regard, the suggestions offered to you in the following remarks, as the sentiments of the principal dealers and manufacturers in those districts where the wool trade is principally carried on. With regard to the course to be pursued in order to bring the wool into the most proper state for manufacture or sale, we should recommend that it be well washed on the sheep's back, previous to shearing; the sheep should then be put on some clean ground, free from sand, and shorn in three days after washing, provided the weather be fine and dry; if delayed longer, too much nature (as the manufacturers term it) will again rise into the wool, which would have a bad effect if it came to be close packed; and the effect would be still more injurious if the fleece were shorn with the water in it. After shearing the fleece, the dirt should be carefully picked off; the heavy dirty locks should also be cut off, washed in warm water, and shipped in a separate package.

We have but little doubt, but that by judicious management of the American farmers, wool may be made to answer well as a regular importation, and the soft silky handle which the American Wool seems to possess, operates materially in its favor.—We have lately had four packages of wool sent us, which we have had exhibited extensively to the dealers and manufacturers in Yorkshire. No. 1 contained 2 fleeces full blooded merino, washed, though but indifferently on the sheep's back just before shearing; this is valued in Yorkshire at 3s. 5d. per lb. No. 2 contained 2 fleeces full blood, unwashed, very heavy and dirty; these are valued at 2s. a 2s. 3d. per lb. No. 3 contained 2 fleeces three-fourths blood, well washed on the back; of these, which were of very different qualities, the one was worth 2s. 3d. and the other 3s. per lb. No.

4 contained 2 fleeces three-fourths blood, unwashed; these were valued the one at 2s, and the other at 2s. 3d. per lb. and were considerably lighter than those in No. 1, though not equal in quality.

Hoping these particulars may be useful to you, we are, very respectfully, your assured friends, RATHBONE, HODGSON, & CO.

Gen Wilkinson.

[On the 15th of April last, we inserted the article to which the following is designed as a reply—perhaps written by the accused himself. It has been delayed longer than we wished, but justice requires its insertion even at this late period, as we rather inadvertently admitted the charges against him. As to the merits of either party—we have nothing to say.—ED. REG.]

Strictures on general Wilkinson's defence.

FROM THE ALBANY ARGUS.

The Troy Post and Albany Register,* have given what they call Extracts from the Defence of General Wilkinson. The object of this premature and irregular publication, if genuine, is, no doubt, to propitiate public opinion—to surprise it into some degree of sympathy, for a persecuted man, and thus prepare it for two events, which might be thought extraordinary, and, perhaps, lamentable, viz. The general's acquittal by the court, and continuance in office by the government. In this view of the subject, justice to the public calls for a few remarks on this production. They shall be made with brevity and freedom, but without bitterness, of which, indeed, we feel none.

The story of the general's wrongs, given by the Post and the Register, is to be found in the following sentences:

"But my case is, perhaps, without an example: that of a minister of high standing and splendid talents, seducing an officer from an honorable command and the fairest prospects of fame, to put him on the execution of an impracticable project, without competent means; and because of its failure, to save himself from public odium, he descends to tricks, stratagems and perfidies, to cast the blame he has incurred from his own shoulders upon those of the officer he had deceived; and this officer a man with whom he had been associated in the most interesting scenes of the revolutionary war; the friend of his juvenile days, to whom he professed to be bound by the sacred ties of personal confidence and attachment.

"The artifices of my accuser prevailed; he deprived me of my sword in the dawn of the campaign, threw me out of the path of glory, and the injury is irreparable. The troops formed and disciplined in hardships, and sufferings and perils, under my orders, when fitted for action and prepared to meet the enemy, were destined to gather laurels to decorate the brows of more fortunate men."

It is readily admitted, that if this statement be true, the general has been scurvily treated: has much cause for complaint and strong ground for apology for both bad temper and bad language; but with all the writer's dislike for "high coloring," this is mere coloring, and as absolute a fiction from beginning to end, as ever was offered to a court, or imposed upon the public. Let us analyze the fable:

*Copied into the Weekly Register, April 15, 1815.

†Our readers will recollect that the general was acquitted.—ED. REG.

1st. He was seduced from an honorable command, &c.

There is in this passage a self-accusation, which wins by its affected modesty, but which those who are in the secret of the general's removal from New Orleans, (the command to which he alludes) is not a little ridiculous. According to this statement, the choice was in himself to go, or to stay—to march, or not to march; to gather laurels on the banks of the Mississippi, or cypress on those of the St. Lawrence; and, that had he but resisted the seducer somewhat longer, or more stoutly, he might now have been staggering under the load of honors which decorate the brow, without impairing the faculties, of general Jackson. Cobwebs like this, mere snares for public feeling and opinion, must be brushed away, and the truth, however unpalatable, be told. Let the general hear it with the firmness of a man, and cease to attribute to the intrigues of a secretary, an act founded on the precautionary policy of a government. New Orleans was deemed the key of the south-western country—it was not believed to be safe in the general's keeping, and an order for his removal was accordingly given by the highest authority known to the laws and the constitution. For the correctness of this statement, we appeal to the present secretary of war, (Mr. Crawford) to his quondam colleague, Mr. Tait—to Mr. Clay of Kentucky, and lastly, to Messieurs Brown and Fromentin, senators of the United States from Louisiana. These gentlemen have too much honor to deny their agency in producing this order, and too much wisdom to regret its consequences to their section of the union. Whatever, therefore, of suavity, the secretary put into his letter of recal, and which is denominated deception and seduction, was mere bien seance, or, in technical language, which the general may not have entirely forgotten, a little gilding to a very nauseous pill.

2d. In recalling gen. W. from the southern, and assigning him to service on the northern frontier, he was not put (as the defence states) upon the execution of any project more impracticable than that of travelling the intermediate distance and reporting himself to general Dearborn. It was not contemplated that he should do more than command a division of the army under that officer, and if afterwards he became the commanding general, he became such fortuitously and in consequence of Dearborn's illness. So far, therefore, as the defence connects his removal from the south, with his command in the north, it is incorrect and unfounded in fact.

That there is a period within which a general has a right to make objections to any plan of campaign he may be employed to execute, is not denied—nor will it be doubted that there is also a period within which this right ceases. Without waiting, however, to settle the exact boundaries between the two, we are willing to give to the former an extension that will leave nothing to cavil, and instead of confining it (as is usual) to any act of adoption, on the part of the general, we admit that from the beginning to the end—from the commencement to the failure of an expedition, a general has a right, provided the facts warrant the assertion, to say to his government—"Your project is impracticable, from its own nature, or it becomes so from want of means to accomplish it. I hasten to tell you this, and to claim protection against the consequences of your own errors or negligence, or both, which otherwise might be imputed to me." If we apply this rule, favorable as it is, to the present case, how stands the credit of the general's recent declaration? that he "had been put on the execution of an impracticable project with incompetent means." The nonsense of the position as it stands, does not escape us, but verbal criticism is below our notice; besides that, it is not the wisdom of the defence that is now in question, but its fairness and its truth. We ask then, whether from the beginning to the end, from the commencement to the failure of the campaign, general Wilkinson made a single objection to the practicability of the plan, on the ground either of its own character, or that of the means given by the government to execute it? Far otherwise. So far from objecting to it on any ground, he embraced it cordially and set out to execute it. On the 20th of August, he arrived at Sacket's Harbor, and on the 21st, in an official letter to the war department, says "My machinery is in motion, and I have strong hopes of giving the chain to sir George, which will lead directly to the object of first importance." Again—"I am endeavoring to lead sir George to the west end of the lake, but whether I succeed in this attempt or not, should our men and means answer report, and Heaven favor me, I will be in possession of Kingston, or below, on the 26th proximo." Five days after the date of this letter, he assembled a council of war, composed of major-general Lewis, commodore Chauncey, general Brown and general Swartwout. He submitted to them a statement of his force, present and expected; the most correct information he could get, with regard to that of the enemy and the plan of campaign which had been given him. Under a full consideration of the subject, this council decided unanimously—

1st. Against awaiting the issue of a naval combat on the lake:

2d. Against concentrating our force at Fort George.

3d. Against an attack on Kingston, and

4th. In favor of a movement down the St. Lawrence and against Montreal—and in this decision the general united.

Writing to the secretary of war on the 26th of August, 1813, the general says, "If the means can be mustered, they will ensure the end."

We shall presently see to what they referred. In a subsequent letter of the 28th of October, he says, "all our hopes have been nearly blasted, but thanks to the same Providence which placed us in jeopardy, we are surmounting our difficulties, and God willing, I shall pass Prescott on the 1st or 2d proximo, if some unforeseen obstacle does not present to forbid me. Once passed Prescott, and our bayonets and sabres shall remove all impediments."

In the exposition of his forces made to the council of war, as suggested above, he states that "the whole present and effective force of the army of this district (No. 9) may be estimated at seven thousand four hundred combatants, exclusive of the navy department, but it is expected that by the recovery of the sick and the junction of recruits, it will be augmented to nine thousand, exclusive of militia, (on which no solid reliance can be placed,) by the 20th September." Nine thousand men then was the maximum of his calculations, and a force competent, in his judgment, and in that of the council of war, to accomplish the service assigned to them. Whatever, therefore, was the augmentation of his actual force beyond this, was an excess, neither requested, required, nor expected by him. By the report of the adjutant general, made at French Mills on the 1st day of December, 1813, it appears,

What the aggregate of the army brought down the St. Lawrence, and then there, was	8,143 men.
2 regts. of cavalry detached to Utica (say)	400
Killed in the battle of the 11th of November	102
Total	8,645
Hampton's division not included,	4,000

Making the whole destined to the attack of Montreal 12,645 men. or three thousand more than was expected.

That the means of transportation were sufficient, is proved by the fact, that the army was transported; and that subsistence was not wanting, is established by the general's own letter of the 16th of November, 1813, in which he says, "I acquiesced in these opinions (to retire from Canada) not from the shortness of the stock of provisions, (which had been reduced by the acts of God,) because that of our meat had been increased five days and our bread had been reduced only two days, and because we could, in case of extremity, have lived upon the enemy."

Here then is the most distinct, positive and abundant testimony, furnished by general Wilkinson himself, that (throughout the campaign) in his opinion, there was no impracticability in the project he was employed to execute, nor in the provision made by government for its execution. But we do not stop here. We go on to shew, that the general, who would now impute the failure of the expedition, to impracticable plans and incompetent means, has frequently, solemnly and officially, attributed this failure to another and very different cause.

In his journal of the expedition, (in which he gives to the government and the public a detailed account of all his movements,) he says, (under date of the 12th of Nov.) "The flotilla sailed early this morning and passed down the saut without discovering either the boats or troops of the enemy, and arrived in the course of the forenoon at Bazehari's, where the commanding general received a letter from major-general Hampton, by the hands of colonel Atkinson, his inspector-general, which blasted all his hopes and destroyed every prospect of the campaign. A council of war was called upon the receipt of this communication, which was submitted to their consideration, whereupon the council determined, that the conduct of general Hampton in refusing to join his division to the troops descending the St. Lawrence to carry an attack against Montreal, rendered it expedient to leave the left bank of the St. Lawrence and to remove the troops to French Mills on Salmon river," &c. To the army, he assigns the same reason for the failure in his general order of the 15th November, 1813. "The troops are to embark without loss of time, yet are not to be hurried in leaving the Canadian shore, from whence the commander in chief is compelled to retire by the extraordinary, unaccomplished, and it appears, unwarrantable conduct of major general Hampton, in refusing to join this army with a division of four thousand men under his command."

In a letter of the same date (15th Nov.) to the government, he says, "it is a fact for which I am authorised to pledge myself on the most confidential authority, that on the 4th of the present month, the British garrison of Montreal consisted solely of four hundred marines and two hundred sailors, which had been sent up from Quebec. What a glorious, golden opportunity has been lost by the caprice of major general Hampton?" Again: In another letter of the 17th of November, he says, "After what has passed between us, you can perhaps conceive my amazement and chagrin at the conduct of general Hampton. The game was in view, and had he performed the junction directed, would have been ours in eight or ten days. But he chose to recede in order to co-operate, and my dawning hopes and the hopes and honor of the army were blasted."

We will but add two other extracts from the letters of general Wilkinson on this subject. "With respect," he says, "to the unfortunate issue of the campaign, I disclaim the shadow of blame, because I know I have done my duty and more than my duty, and so do those with whom I have acted. To general Hampton's outrage of every principle of subordination and discipline may be ascribed the failure of the expedition." "I will not charge this man (general Hampton) with traitorous designs, but I apprehend in any other government, that a military officer who defeated the object of a campaign by disobedience of orders, &c. would incur heavy penalties." These extracts are taken from letters dated, the one on the 24th Nov. and the other on the 8th of December, 1813.

We leave to the patrons and defenders of general Wilkinson to reconcile these statements with his more recent declaration, that "he had been put upon the execution of an impracticable project, with incompetent means," and to all honest enquirers, the reflections growing out of the palpable contradiction between the two. If the latter be true, what a series of deceptions has he practiced upon his council of war—upon his army—upon the government, and upon the public at large! and above all, how profligate the attack on major general Hampton! If the former be true, how flagitious is his recent conduct in attempting to fasten upon the government those censures, which he has so often and so solemnly attempted to fix upon others!

3d. We now approach his last and great complaint—his arrestation and trial;—that he had been deprived of his sword in the dawn of the campaign;—thrown out of the path of glory, and that the soldiers, formed and disciplined, and fitted for action, and prepared to meet the enemy by him, were destined to follow and exalt the fortunes of other leaders!!!

Could the voice of the army be heard on this subject, we suspect that their complaints would not be found to be very loud, nor their grief very pungent. The general was certainly a great administrator of hardships and sufferings, and on one occasion, if we mistake not, found a solace for even disgrace and disaster, in the self-confidence, reciprocal trust, harmony and attachment which these potent causes, (according to his theory) naturally and abundantly produce. In what other way he prepared his men for action, we have yet to learn. Certain we are that his successor in command, did not think very favorably of the state of preparation in which he found the right division of the army, in April or May last—and that the archives of the war department, if consulted, will furnish details on this head not at all calculated to exalt the general's vanity. But this by the way—

"The artifices of my accuser," says the defence, "prevailed, and he deprived me of my sword." In plain English—he suspended the general from command, and put him upon trial by a court martial.

The reader will find before we part, that this mighty charge is but Mount Atlas in labor, and that if there was any very deep artifice in the case, the general was at the bottom of it. On the 17th of Nov. 1813, anticipating the censure that awaited him, he wrote to the secretary of war as follows: "Should, therefore, a question be made in relation to my conduct, I expect from your friendship and demand of your justice that I may be immediately called forward, and allowed an opportunity to vindicate my military character." On the 20th of March following, he renewed this request in strong terms. "The slanderous attacks," he says, "against my character, and the foul misrepresentations of my conduct, on the last campaign, which I have observed in the public prints, must be my apology for requesting from you a general court martial, with as little delay as possible, to investigate any charges which may have been alleged against me."

Such was the general's conduct on this occasion. Let us now see what was that of the secretary. It certainly required neither tricks, nor stratagems, nor perfidies, on his part, to bring about what the general himself so earnestly wished and eagerly demanded; and if such things were practised, it must have been from a mere love of the game, and not because they were either useful or necessary.

On the 19th of February, 1814, the secretary reported to the president, that "he had some time before received a communication, of which the paper enclosed and marked A, was an extract—that sensible of the delicacy of military reputation, he was in no haste to act upon it, nor even officially to submit it to his (the president's) inspection; that the reason for that hesitancy was now removed; that he had in two instances followed the references made in the communication, and that in both, the truth of the principal charge (drunkenness) had been confirmed; that a sense of duty compelled him to propose, that gen. Wilkinson be relieved from the command of the army and district, and that a court of enquiry be instituted, as speedily as possible, for the purpose of examining and deciding, whether his conduct had, or had not been censurable during the last campaign? and that this course had also been indicated by the general's wishes, expressed in his letter of the 17th Nov. 1813."

Agreeably to the preceding report, an order was taken for relieving the general, and for instituting a court of enquiry, composed of gen. Izzard, gen. McArthur, and col. King, notice of which reached general Wilkinson about the 12th April. On that day he wrote to the secretary, stating objections to general Izzard, because, though of the same grade, he was junior in rank;—to general McArthur, because he was not qualified to judge of military conduct, and to colonel King, because he had been, when a subaltern and boy, under his command. It was not deemed either just, or decorous, to sustain objections to the court, unfounded alike in military usage and in common sense; but in conformity to the general's wishes, the court of enquiry was changed into a court martial of the smallest legal number, and generals Gaines and Ripley added to the former to make up the deficiency. The result of the business was, that general Wilkinson, notwithstanding his extreme sensibility to news-paper censure, and his anxiety to be permitted to vindicate his character and conduct, declined being tried by a court of five members, unless wholly composed of general officers. The court, not being so composed (col. King being a member) was dissolved. The general was now left to choose between Philadelphia, Baltimore or Annapolis, as a place of residence, but disliking any restriction on his loco-motive faculties, the articles of war, on that point, were dispensed with in his favor.

Where then, we ask, are the evidences of tricks and artifices to be found in these transactions?—

Where a single trace of an oppressive or even rigorous policy with regard to general Wilkinson? Do they not present rather a series of concessions on the part of government, to the humors, caprice and views of that officer? Will it be said, that neither his own repeated requests for investigation, nor the complaints of the public, long and loud against him—nor the suggestions of three general officers who had served under him, of the most flagrant misconduct on his part, were to be regarded? and that in despite of all these circumstances, he should have been left in command to gain other victories like that at Williamsburg, or to repeat the lesson "of command and obedience," exhibited at La Cole Mill, and which (though defeated at the head of his army with the loss of 100 men, by 400 Canadian militia) was, according to his very curious and singular estimate, "worth a whole year's drill of empty parades?"

Interesting Scraps.

By frequent postponements, a very considerable body of interesting and important scraps and articles, foreign and domestic, has accumulated. In preparation to close the volume, they are now chiefly inserted.

VIRGINIA BANKS. The presidents of the two incorporated banks in Virginia (the Bank of Virginia and the Farmers' Bank) in letters addressed to the chairman of a committee of the legislature appointed to examine the state of the banks, represent, generally, the prosperity of their institutions, and that, as these banks were among the last to suspend their specie payments, they will also be among the first to resume them. They deprecate, however, the precipitating of specie payments until the resumption shall be pretty generally agreed upon, on account of the large balances due them by other banks.

The house of delegates rejected (109 to 62) the proposition to charter a number of new banks in the commonwealth of Virginia.

PENNSYLVANIA BANKS. Through the politeness of the editor's friends at Harrisburg, he has received a variety of interesting papers relating to the present state and condition of the banks in that commonwealth. The whole is too long for insertion, and we have not leisure at present to make out an abstract. Three of the Philadelphia banks, over which the legislature has a control, as well as several of what may be called the old banks in the interior, appear to be really in a better state than they were in 1813, comparing the notes out, &c. with the specie on hand, and their means of redeeming them. The following statement may serve to show the present condition of three of the Philadelphia banks:

	Bank of Pennsylv- ania.	Bank of Philad- elphia.	Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank.
Capital stock,	dolls. 2,000,000	1,800,000	1,250,000

The banks are also indebted to other banks considerable sums, but have loans to the state of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia, and other credits that will probably about balance this description of debts.

Internal Revenue.—The Edinburgh reviewers (says the Enquirer) are the ablest politicians in Europe. What they say, ought always to be listened to with respect. In speaking several years past, of the abolition of direct or internal taxes in regard to our country, they urge, in this case,

"The revenue of the country must be entirely drawn from the fluctuating source of commerce; a dependence is placed on the very winds and waves; and in case of a war, this resource must be in a great measure cut off, and it will then be necessary to resort to those very direct taxes."

What was prophecy, is now fact. And it becomes us to profit by the warning, which we have ourselves received.

Buffalo, like a Phoenix, has risen from its ashes, and appears to be a place of great life and activity. The Niagara Journal (an excellent paper printed there) of the 30th ult. contains 70 advertisements, some of them very extensive, occupying more than three pages of a super-royal sheet.

Lake steam-boats.—Repeated experiments, which have been made in this country and Europe, appear to have established in the minds of intelligent persons, acquainted with steam navigation, a confidence that steam-boats properly constructed can navigate the ocean in safety, even in the most tempestuous weather. If this fact is established, it follows of course, that they can be used on the lakes with great certainty of success. Messrs. Porter, Barton & Co. we are happy to learn, are so well satisfied of this fact, that they have concluded to build, the next season, a steam vessel of one hundred tons burthen, which is to run on the Niagara river, and between this place and Detroit. If the experiment proves fortunate, and we have no doubt but that it will, the navigation of lake Erie will, in a few years, be in a great degree effected by vessels of this description. We already flatter ourselves, that at no distant period, the communication between Buffalo and Detroit will be as regular and almost as expeditious, as it now is between Albany and New-York.

An annual cattle show and fair is hereafter to be held at Brighton, Middlesex, Massachusetts, much on the plan of the useful and well-known establishment at Pittsfield, that has several times been noticed in the REGISTER.

Small-pox.—There were 23 victims to this dreadful disease in New-York, for the week ending on the 3d instant.

CURIOSITIES.—From a late London paper.—By the fast sailing brig Rolla, which has arrived at Liverpool from New-York in 20 days, have been received files of newspapers and private communications, containing intelligence of considerable interest. The Americans are using every exertion to place their navy on a most formidable footing. Not a vessel arrives at New-York from this country without her crew being immediately seduced into the American service!! The bounty given to deserters from the British naval service is 40 dollars, and their pay is 12 dollars monthly. Of the crew of the Rolla, consisting of fifteen prime seamen, eight entered on board of the American frigate Java, the day after her arrival at New-York, and the other eight entered on board an American merchantman. Captain M'Ewen of the Rolla, complained against these deserters, through the medium of Mr. Moore, the English vice-consul in New-York, but so far from obtaining redress from the American government, captain M'Ewen, was fined four hundred dollars for unlawfully imprisoning American citizens. It appears that the seamen in question had been secretly provided with certificates of American citizenship at the moment of quitting the Rolla.

Nothing can exceed the zeal and politeness displayed by Mr. Moore, in supporting the claims of his countrymen in America; but we fear his powers are not sufficiently extensive, as the Americans are able to baffle all his exertions, and actually set his authority at defiance.

The Americans, besides the Java now fitting out at New-York, as above mentioned, have the Franklin, of 74 guns, (but actually carrying one hundred and twenty guns!) nearly ready for sea. They lately sold a fine forty-four gun frigate to Christophe, the black king of St. Domingo; this ship is called the General Brown, and is supposed equal to a sixty gun ship, in point of weight of metal!!

[Some persons may condemn us for inserting the above, which has nothing like a truth in the whole of it—but it is well to see what the enemy is at! I have always, however, expected that our 74's would grow into 120 or 200 gun ships—in the British papers.]

We learn (says the Rhode-Island American) that captain John Orde Creighton is appointed captain of the Washington 74, commanded by com. Chauncey. The Washington is destined for the Mediterranean.

Newport, Jan. 17.—On the morning of the 10th instant, an express came from Brenton's neck, with information that a vessel had been stranded on the reef, and that several men were seen on part of the wreck, driving at the mercy of the wind and waves. An arrangement was immediately adopted to rescue them, if possible, from their perilous situation. Some of our citizens proceeded on to the sea shore.

Oliver H. Perry, esq. commander of the United States frigate Java, now in our harbor, being at his house, was called upon to aid in the effort—his manner of entering, with all his soul, into the melancholy business, was peculiarly impressive—his feeling heart realized the critical situation of those unfortunate men whose lives were at stake. Notwithstanding the severity of the weather and the high wind, he, without ceremony, stepped on board of his barge, and said to his men, "come, my boys, we are going to the relief of ship-wrecked seamen;" as he addressed them, their animated countenances expressed that intrepid determination to brave every danger the arduous duty indicated. They then rowed with great rapidity to the reef, distant about five miles. The vessel proved to be the schr. Eliza, captain Charles Gorton, from Havana, and owned by S. T. Northum, merchant, of this town. She was dashed into a thousand pieces, cargo entirely lost. Fortunately the eleven men on the quarter deck, that had separated from the wreck, were, with the assistance offered, landed in safety, which may be considered a miraculous preservation of their lives.

THE BRITISH AND INDIANS.—Copy of a letter from the commanding officer at Fort Wayne, on the Miami of the lakes, to a member of congress, dated Fort Wayne, 8th January, 1816.—Permit me, sir, to acquaint you with a communication just made to me by a Miami Indian, a branch of the White Loon's family, who has always expressed the greatest friendship to me, and of whose fidelity to our government, (as far as a savage mind can possess that sentiment) I have not the least doubt.

He says the British have sent out runners among all the tribes to the north and west, inviting the war chiefs, with their young and most active warriors only, to come with as little delay as possible to Malden; that they have a large quantity of goods there, which they keep in reserve for that class only, whenever they shall arrive, and be seen to take a strong hold of the tomahawk, as they have been known to do. My informant, who calls me his uncle, states that he himself has received the invitation three days since, with many other Miami chiefs, several of whom have resolved to go to Malden merely to see and hear the British father; but, for himself, he is satisfied to remain at home.

For several days past great numbers of Putawatimies and others, have passed here on their way to Malden.

What their intentions are, is yet doubtful, but my informant assures, that it is his opinion a war will break out early in the spring.

In haste, as the express is now waiting for this letter, I am, &c.

DANIEL CURTIS.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT. The legislature of Virginia has turned its attention in an efficient manner to the subject of internal improvement. A law has been passed creating a fund "to be denominated 'the fund for internal improvement,' and to be applied exclusively to the purpose of rendering navigable and uniting (by canals) the principal rivers, and of more intimately connecting, by public highways, the different parts of the commonwealth." The fund is to consist of all the stock held by the state in bank and turnpike and navigation companies, together with such dividends as may accrue thereon, and such bonus or premiums as may be hereafter received, for privileges granted to banks. The care of this fund is vested in a corporate body to be styled "the president and directors of the board of control," to be composed of the governor (president ex officio)—twelve directors, to consist of the treasurer, attorney-general of the state, and ten citizens, three of whom shall reside westward of the Alleghany mountain, two between the Alleghany and the Blue Ridge, three between the Blue Ridge and the head of tide water, and two between that line and the sea-coast. No application of the fund is to be made, except by special authority of law. What is the amount of this fund, or how productive, we are not apprized. The present amount is believed, however, to be not far from a million of dollars; and may be hoped to produce very valuable benefits not only to Virginia, but to the union.—Nat. Intel.

ALGIERS.—The editors of the National Intelligencer, on publishing the letters from the Mediterranean, noticed in our last, says:

"We understand from the best authority, that commodore Decatur's engagement with Algiers went no further than to return the vessels in the state in which they then were, to such officer as might be designated by the dey to receive them—the ship and the brig were thus restored, the red flag hoisted, and receipts taken from the Algerine officer for them. The frigate proceeded to Algiers; the brig was detained by the Spanish government, on the plea that she was captured within the jurisdiction of the Spanish territory. Should any question hereafter arise upon this subject, it must be between Spain and Algiers; and we are free to confess that we do not feel any very deep interest in what way they settle it."

A naval force however, will be kept in the Mediterranean, "sufficient to keep alive those favorable impressions awakened by the appearance of the first squadron."

Free Schools.—It appears by a report to the legislature of South-Carolina, that the system of free schools has wonderfully succeeded. The returns from many districts were very pleasing—they had accounts of 3642 children educating at the charge of the state, and the whole number was supposed to exceed 4000. This is delightful.

Charleston, January 25.—On Friday last, William Linen was brought to the bar of the court of sessions; a jury was impanelled, and after a patient hearing of evidence, &c. they brought in a verdict, pronouncing him to be sane. In consequence of this verdict, he was, on Tuesday last, arraigned for the murder of Dr. David Ramsay, after occupying the attention of the court and another jury, for two days, at 10 o'clock, last evening, the jury returned their verdict of not guilty; acquitting him on the ground of insanity. He was immediately remanded to gaol, on an indictment preferred against him by Henry Bailey, esq. On the verdict being read, he thanked the jury for their lenity—but thought they had not done him justice!

CARTHAGENA.—It is now resolved to a certainty that this important place has fallen into the hands of the Spaniards, by famine. On taking possession of the city, it is said the royalists murdered nearly 12000 persons of all ages, without regard to sex, though they found in the houses the bodies of 2500 persons who had perished for want during the siege! Sixty of the leading men have been sent to Spain—some few made their escape, among whom is general Bolivar, who, with his suite, has arrived at Port-au-prince, via Aux Cayes. After the fall of the place the royalists kept the patriot flag flying, and thereby decoyed several vessels, 10 or 12 American and 4 or 5 British. The crews of these (2 or 3 of which are from Baltimore) were made prisoners of, and, as well as the crews of some other vessels which the dons presumed to suppose were destined for Carthagena, treated with that perfect disregard of humanity that as much distinguishes the Spaniards of the present day, in their efforts to re-conquer South America, as that cruelty of their ancestors, in its original subjugation, which has consigned them to the execration of ages. Many of those persons have already died of base usage, and it is probable that few will escape the cool and slow murder of the legitimates. Many have perished by inches; suffering all the characteristics of cruelty that distinguished the Jersey prison ship, off New-York, during the revolutionary war. Among those who survived, at a late date, was captain Alameda, of Baltimore, famous for his late exploits in the Kemp privateer. The British had taken measures to relieve their own people—the Junon frigate having sailed for that purpose.

It is stated that flour was sold during the siege at $200 per bbl. and that the whole number of persons who died of famine was 4,700! The defence appears to have been as obstinate as any recorded in history. Will Spain subdue a people like this? No—every inch of country must be won by losses that will exhaust the Peninsula. God forbid, that the inquisition shall ever again rear its bloody banner in these countries, which man has done so much to desolate and destroy!

Carthage is exceedingly important as being the principal, if not the only sea-port, on the Atlantic side, by which the republic of New Grenada can receive such supplies as it needs, to fight the battles of freedom, successfully. But we have reason to hope there is a large stock of the munitions of war in the interior.

Tobacco.—A crop of tobacco is said to have sold recently at Lynchburg, for $40 per hundred! If any man had predicted this a few years ago —

The Small Pox is making great ravages in New-York and Philadelphia, &c. It is strange that the people have not yet learnt wisdom to use the means that Providence has so bountifully given us to restrain, if not extinguish, this dreadful malady.

American captives.—The brig Commerce, of Hartford, Connecticut, was cast away on the coast of Africa, off Cape Bajador, on the 28th August last. The crew were saved to be made prisoners of by the Moors, who carried them across the great desert Zahara. They have made known their sufferings to their countrymen on the Mediterranean coasts, and appear about to be released for a ransom of 920 and 2 double barrelled guns for the whole. The Moors who committed this outrage, we believe, only pay a nominal respect to the emperor of Morocco.

Courage and Skill.—A vessel, apparently a Spanish sloop of war, lately attacked an American merchantman, (the schooner Murray, of New-York) in the Mediterranean, and after firing upon her upwards of half an hour, within speaking distance, hauled off! If the schooner had had only one gun, the don might have paid for his rashness. The Murray's rigging was considerably cut.

The Virgin carried off.—An image of the Virgin Mary, valued at 80 or $90,000, had been brought to St. Domingo from Carthage, in a schooner belonging to New-York. It was taken as security for payment of a cargo of provisions carried into Carthage by that vessel.

Wolf hunt.—A large she wolf was lately run down and taken by a party of gentlemen in West Nottingham, Chester county; she is said to be nearly three feet in height, and measuring upwards of six feet from the nose to the tip of the tail.—Phil. paper.

Commerce of Savannah.—There are now [Jan. 22] in the port of Savannah, 49 ships; 41 brigs; 20 schooners and 19 sloops; there are also lying at Tybee, bound up, 18 sail, mostly square rigged, making in the whole 147 sail; the largest number at one time for twenty years past.

Prodigality. It is estimated that one man's speeches in congress, (who is constantly complaining of abridgments of the freedom of debate!) will cost the United States at least $70,000, for the present session.

Longevity.—Died recently, in Jefferson county, Virginia, John Wright, aged 107 years.

Captain Moffit, of the famous Rattlesnake privateer, has been publicly entertained by the "Old Hob," at Philadelphia. The toasts drank were excellent.

The Commissioners of the Navy have given notice that they will receive proposals for supplies of cannon, ball, muskets, pikes, copper sheets and spikes, lead, anchors, kentledge, hemp American, gunpowder, &c. &c. &c.

A living Camelion is exhibiting at the Boston Museum.

President Petion has purchased an elegant vessel, built at New-York, by certain shipwrights there on private account, for $220,000. She carries 40 guns and 300 men, and is cruising against "his majesty" king Henry.

VENEZUELA. Col. Macaulay, a Virginian, was of the number of those who, at various times, have fallen into the hands of the royal forces in Venezuela and perished by the executioner; for the war in these provinces has been a war of extermination. A writer in the National Intelligencer, speaking of the barbarities of Montes, a royal chief, thus notices his death—

"This brave American, the idol of the people of Venezuela and New-Grenada, when led out among others to execution, advanced before them, and addressing his brethren in misfortune, said to them, 'Let me be the first to receive death, in order to shew my fellow-patriots how a republican can die!'" It was thus that the gallant Macaulay met his fate.

Non ille pro charis amicis
Aut patria timidus perire."

New Banks. Petitions will be presented to the legislature of New-York, at its present session, for the establishment of 13 new banks, to have, jointly, a capital of $13,300,000.

Lead ore. Specimens of a very rich lead ore have been discovered by capt. Foulk, in his rambles, near the cantonment of our troops at Rock river.

Season in West-Florida. A West-Florida paper gives the following animated description of the present season of that place: "Since our residence in Louisiana, we do not recollect to have seen so fine a season as this has been since the first of September last. It is now the 21st day of December, and we have not yet had a frost that would kill the cotton plant, nor materially injure the sugar cane. Our gardens are yet green; roses and wild jessamines blooming, and lillies springing; indeed, all nature presents more of a vernal than a winter aspect."

COTTON. The average import of cotton into Liverpool, for eight years—1808 to 1815 inclusive, appears to have been 188,762 packages—greatest in 1810, 320,688; least in 1813, 143,000 packages. Stock on hand, Jan. 1811, estimated at 138,000; December 1815, 60 to 65,000 packages. The weekly out goings are estimated at about 4000 packages, in good trade.

Prize money. A late London paper observes—"It must strike foreigners with astonishment to see, in the London Gazette, that the admiral and commander's share of prize money for the capture of Java, amounted to £109,981 14s. 1½d. each; while that of the eighth class of British seamen is only £4 14s. 7½d.

Brazil. The prince regent of Brazil having interfered in the dispute between the whigs and tovies of the provinces of La Plata, and aided the latter—the former, having reduced the other to submission, appear to have attacked “his royal highness,” and to have laid within his own government the seeds of a revolution that may throw him back to Europe again. The province of Rio Janeiro is said to be in a state of revolt—an army of Buenos Ayrean patriots backing the people. Troops were sending from Portugal to support the royal cause. “Legitimacy” is a plant that will not flourish in the new world.

Irish freedom of the press! John Magee, printer, for publishing certain animadversions on the conduct of the duke of Richmond to the Catholics, was imprisoned in July 1813, and held in durance until some time in November last—on the day of his release he commenced a new term of imprisonment for publishing the resolutions of a meeting of Catholics at Kilkenny, though the names of the chairman, secretary, &c. were given! By the time this period is out, some new offence will have occurred, and “ermin’d judges” will incarcerate him again, but let the Irish “rejoice”—the Guelphs’ reign.

A Vienna paragraph of Nov. 20, mentions that a number of papers have been seized in the hands of an English physician, among which was a correspondence between madame Murat and the princess of Wales—madame Murat has been ordered to Prague, and large sums of money in her possession have been seized.

The Seven Islands. Late London papers contain the treaty between England and Russia, by which Corfu, Cephalonia,, Zante, Maura, Ithaca, Cevigo, and Paxo, are erected into a free and independent state, and placed under the immediate and exclusive protection of Great Britain. A London paper says, on this subject, “Thanks to the ability of our negotiators for this great acquisition.”

A Paris paper of Nov. 27, says that six lieutenant generals and 18 mareschaux de camp have been sent to the Abbey—and that papers found in the house of general Bellaird threw great light on some treasonable plans lately formed, &c.

A London paper says—We learn that fifty cases of presents have arrived in England, on their way to St. Helena, from the emperor of Russia to the ex-emperor of France.

BERNADOTTE. A “restoration” is mentioned below that will please many men. Whatever Bonaparte was—good or bad, Bernadotte owed every thing to him, and ungratefully abandoned him at his greatest need :

A pamphlet (observes a London paper) has been recently published in Paris, the object of which is to recommend the ejection of the present king and crown prince of Sweden and the restoration of Gustavus Adolphus. The Morning Chronicle states, on the authority of what is called “a source of high respectability,” that the congress of Vienna had decreed the restoration of the deposed king, and that this decision has been subsequently confirmed by the assembly of the great powers at Paris.

British Stocks, December 15. Three per cent consols 62 1-8—do. reduced 60. Omnium 15.

The prince regent has issued a Hanoverian decree, enjoining his subjects to arrest the persons, if found in Hanover, condemned by the French law of amnesty, and allowing those banished by that law to pass through his dominions, if furnished with regular passports.

The duke of Richelieu declined voting on the trial of marshal Ney, alleging that “time might acquit the marshal,” as it had done justice to himself, who was twice condemned by the French revolutionary tribunals. Four other peers refused to vote, and fourteen voted against the condemnation of Ney.”

In the French chamber of peers, (says the Columbian) on the 15th December, count Ferrand made a report in favor of the project of a law relative to prevotal courts; which after debate was adopted by 120 out of 131 voters—this law gives discretionary power to execute the will of the ruling party, by a summary process! “This law” said a member, “gives a death blow to the institution of jury; impresses on French legislation a retrograde march; disannuls the dearest franchises of the citizen; impairs the majesty of the throne by a rigour which is neither in the intentions nor interests of the monarch.”

Marshal Soult, who was under surveillance, was to be brought to trial. The same is reported of Massena.

It is stated that the emperor of Russia has ordered all the Russian troops out of Poland. This is really a “deliverance.”

Marshal Moncey.—We published the eloquent appeal of this venerable soldier to the king of France, in our last. We think there are few that can read it with indifference. It has much energy of expression, with not a little of the “sublime and beautiful.” How emphatic is the regret he expresses, that “he has lived too long, since he has survived the glory of his country!”

Macdonald, the son of a Scotchman who adhered to the “legitimate” prince Charles, called by the usurping Guelphs the “pretender,” it is said intends to visit the country of his ancestors.

Royalty! The following sentiments were recently expressed by the first judge of the royal court of Paris, M. Sequier. What blessed effects must follow a general acquiescence in them!

“All authority proceeds from God, and it is not given to the people to dispose of it.

“In vain pride protests; it must yield to the law from on high, which after all our faults is still very mild.

“Our ancestors, who guarded their franchises, and cherished their liberty, wiser than we, recognized that our kings reign by the grace of God and not by the constitutions.

“Legitimate hereditary sovereignty guarantees the repose of contemporaries, and of posterity; usurped authority, ephemeral in its nature, disturbs social order, and serves as a punishment to the people.

“The monarch, image of the Divinity, does not less represent this subject, than a father represents his children.

“The supremacy of both constitutes the essentially natural state. Every other political form is a derogation from the general rule, and contains a principle of return to the primordial disorder.”

Maurice Margarot, accused of sedition several years ago, and sentenced to transportation to Botany bay for fourteen years, lately died in London, at the age of 70.

The prince regent of England is said to have purchased Bonaparte’s carriage captured at Waterloo, for 3000 guineas.

English militia are passing to Ireland, and Irish militia transferring to England. Divide and command.

SPAIN. Every account from Spain represents the country as in an unsettled state. The Spaniards having enjoyed some little liberty under the Cortes, and hoping great things from the fool they fought so gallantly for, are extremely depressed and uneasy. Their most illustrious men are in dungeons or banished, and terror is the order of the day. The monks rule, and misery follows all that they do.—Wretched Spain—but if the people choose to ‘adore’ a thing without one ray of gratitude or reason—one particle of honesty or discretion, so be it. If they have cause to 'rejoice' that a creature so senseless and so base, is "restored"—much good may it do them!

What a burlesque it is on common sense to suppose that so perfect an idiot as Ferdinand, or so finished a madman as George, can have a "divine right" to govern millions of rational men!

"We have received a variety of accounts from Spain, by the Corumna Packet, indicative only of the rapid growth of despotism and degradation, blended with the silent murmurs of an oppressed people, fully sensible of their wrongs. The new court instituted by Ferdinand to try the liberales proceeds apace. Ruiz Padron, the clergyman who made so brilliant and solid a speech in the late Cortes in favor of the abolition of the inquisition, has been, on this account, condemned to perpetual imprisonment; Martinez de la Rosa, also a member of the late Cortes, to ten years hard labor, and Lopez, generally called El Caja de Malaga, to the same for four years; but, as a special favor, he has been allowed to commute his punishment for a sum of money."—London M. Chron.

Denmark, it is said, has laid claim to participate in the spoliation of France, for the maintenance of certain French troops in 1808.

Liberty. Even British—good, loyal British newspapers, are forbidden in Spain—it is a sin against the "hol'g office," infamously so called, to read them. The few miserable gazettes that are published, are under the immediate charge of the priests and knaves that surround the throne.

In several parts of France the people are compelled to shut up their houses at 10 o'clock at night. At Grenoble, it is forbidden to go out after that hour without a light. This is "delivrance."

"Delivered" Saxony, Poland, Genoa, &c. mourn their lost power. What can they do? The "legitimate" congress of Vienna has decided annihilation to all that oppose them.

Gold. It has been intimated that prince Mettelnich received no less than four millions for his many services in the court of the emperor of Austria.—This metal is more powerful than lead or steel.—Prussian bullets or bayonets would not have routed Bonaparte at Waterloo, had not the way to victory been purchased before the fight began, though the obstinate valor of the French went very near to break the bargain.

French proscription. Our letters from Paris, says the London Morning Chronicle, grows every day more and more gloomy. In the chamber of deputies a secret committee was formed, in which it was actually proposed:

1. To condemn to death all the persons who had voted for the death of Louis XVI.
2. To transport all those who had accepted places under the usurpation; and
3. To banish from France all who had taken the oath to the constitution of May last.

These measures, if carried into execution, would have made one million five hundred thousand persons! This, though proposed by some of the most exalted heads, was thought a little too extensive; and by amendments, the propositions have been softened down so as to take in only about a million of human victims!

Murat's letter to his Wife.—Rome, Dec. 26. The following letter, which Murat is stated to have written to his wife on the day of his execution, is in circulation here and at Naples. We do not however, venture to decide on its authenticity, as several internal and external marks render it doubtful.

"My Dear Caroline—My last hour is come; in a few moments I shall have ceased to live—You will have no husband, and my children no father more. Think on me; do not curse my memory; I die innocent. My life is stained by no unjust sentence.

"Farewell my Letitia—Farewell, my Lucien—Farewell, my Louisa!—Shew yourselves constantly worthy of me. I leave you without estates and kingdom, among my numerous enemies. Remain always united; shew yourselves superior to misfortune; and think more on what you are than on what you were. God bless you! Never curse my memory. Recollect that the bitterest pain that I feel in my last moments is that of dying far from my children. Receive my paternal blessing, my tears, and my tender embraces. Never forget your unhappy father."

Old bank notes.—After a lapse of 91 years, two bank of England notes, value 50£ each, were, on Thursday last sent into the bank of England by an eminent banker, dated in the year 1724. They were found in a box belonging to an old farmer, lately deceased, in the west of England.

LONDON, Dec. 9.—The Dutch letters say, the departure of the prince of Orange for St. Petersburg, has given rise to much interesting speculation on the future union of Russian interests with those of the Netherlands, and the consequent decline of British influence in the latter quarter.

An article from Turin gives a most distressing account of the attack made by the Tunisian pirates at St. Antiocho. It reflects additional disgrace upon the maritime powers of Europe for suffering with impunity these lawless violations of the common rights of society.

London, December 10. There has lately been a warm dispute between the duke de Berri and Marmont; Oudinot was present. It is said to have originated in some expressions used by the duke, to Marmont; who took an opportunity, firmly, but respectfully, to warn his royal highness against persisting in that species of language, and manners, which were by no means adapted to conciliate the public attachment and respect.

From the London Times of Dec. 15.—It is proposed to banish from France Soult, Alix, Exclémans, Lamarque, Vandamme, and one or two other generals, besides some celebrated non-military revolutionists. Most of the former, we understand, are going to the United States of America, and what measures they may there devise against our interest in that hemisphere, it behoves our government well to consider. The hatred of Soult, in particular, against every thing English, is unbounded, and he is, beyond dispute the most skilful of the French generals. Would it not be a prudent step on our part to demand that these gentry should not be permitted to go to America? There are plenty of wholesome, airy islands in the Mediterranean, where they might live quite as comfortably as Savary and Lallemand at Malta, or as Bonaparte and his associates at St. Helena. Any safe retirement of that kind would be better than hearing of them in a twelvemonth hence, at the head of an American army, invading Canada! ["Queer enough!"]

Altona, (Den.) Dec. 10. A merchant vessel arrived at Kiel, a few days since which was formerly destined to transport Napoleon to America.—A French captain who had married a young woman belonging to Holstein, had conceived the project of saving him, when he was at Rochefort. To this effect he had quitted some casks on the inside, in which he could easily conceal Bonaparte, Savary and Bertrand. He had on board, all the provisions necessary for such a voyage, destined in appearance for Kiel; he was to sail, after having gained the high seas, directly for New York. The impatience, or rather the fear of Bonaparte, which made him surrender himself to the English, frustrated this plan. On the return of this vessel to Kiel, the casks were shown, which were to have received the fugitives and their aids-de-camp.

Capture of the Syren.

To the Editor of the National Advocate.

NEW-YORK, FEB. 7, 1816.—SIR.—James Eike, second lieutenant on board of the British ship of war Cumberland, has, as appears by the London Times of the 22d October last, contradicted a statement made by me, relative to the treatment of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig of war Syren while prisoners.

The statement, so far as regards the treatment of the American officers and men while on board the Medway, at Simon Town and at the Cape, remains uncontradicted by the officers of the Medway. I might content myself by publishing the certificates of the Syren's officers, but must indulge in the remark, that I am astonished that not one among the Medway's officers could be found of sufficient courage to second lieutenant Eike in his refutation, and especially too, when particularly invited by one of his majesty's officers. This act of cruelty towards a brother British officer can only be accounted for by me, thus: that no one individual dare to contradict the facts stated by me, because his brother officers would know that he thereby subscribed to an untruth, and that each must have suspected the secret indignation of the Cumberland's officers towards Eike, for subscribing to that which their honor forbid them from doing.

Lieutenant Eike conceives it his duty to refute the statement, because, as he says, captain Baker was absent. If captain Baker was absent from London, can lieutenant Eike induce even the people of London to believe that captain Baker could write at no other place?

No, sir, you may rely, his absence from London was not the cause of his non-appearance. Captain Baker has a better cause than that, although his treatment direct and permitted to the American officers and men, was base in the extreme; yet captain Baker would not be willing to subscribe to a refutation that every officer and man on board his ship knew to be false. Captain Baker left that duty to be performed by his second lieutenant.

Lieutenant Eike has assigned no reason why Mr. Ingraham, first lieutenant of the Cumberland, has not denied my statement, and I will assign one for him. Mr. Ingraham is an honorable man, and a gentleman—had he been the commanding officer, no cause of complaint would have existed.

Although every circumstance stated by me in my note to captain Evans, is true and notorious to every officer and man, both American and British, on board those ships, yet lieutenant Eike's denial does not surprise me; for the man who is so depraved as to treat prisoners in the manner the Americans were treated by him and others on board the Medway and Cumberland, or who would permit such treatment, is the fit instrument to pervert truth.

You will please to publish herewith the certificates of lieuts. German and Gordon, and that of Thomas Waine, esq. purser in the U. S. navy.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

Sacket's Harbor, Jan. 29, 1816.

This is to certify, that I was on board the late U. S. brig Syren when she was captured by the British ship of war Medway, and that the statement of the infamous treatment we received, as made by you, and addressed to captain Evans, bearing date 24th Aug. 1815, is correct.

SIR—I do certify that I was on board the late U. S. brig Syren at the time of her capture by the British ship Medway, of 74 guns, and every individual experienced the treatment as described by Lt. Nicholson in a letter addressed to captain Evans, of the U. S. navy, bearing date the 24th Aug. 1815, and that the said statement is not the least exaggerated, but, on the contrary, falls short of giving a full statement of the infamous treatment we received. I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obed't serv't,

Dear Sir—In answer to your note of the 26th inst. I have no hesitation in saying, that your statement respecting the treatment of the crew of the late U. S. brig Syren, after capture, by the British ship Medway, 74, is perfectly correct. I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obed't serv't, THO'S WAINE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.

February 5.—Mr. Varnum, from a select committee, reported a bill authorising the working of copper mines on Lake Superior, and for other purposes; which passed to a second reading.

Mr. Sanford introduced a bill, leave being given, concerning certain cuts in New-York, which passed to a second reading.

Mr. Morrow, from the committee on so much of the president's message as relates to roads and canals, reported the following bill, making appropriation for the construction of roads and canals;—which was passed to a second reading:—

Be it enacted, &c. That the annual sum of ——— dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated for the purpose of constituting a fund, for making artificial roads, and opening canals; which annual sum shall be set apart, and invariably pledged as a fund for the purposes aforesaid, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever; and the same shall be placed, and held under the special charge and direction of the secretary of the treasury, for the time being: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent congress from suspending this appropriation during a state of war with any foreign power, in which the United States may be engaged.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever congress shall, by law, authorise a subscription to be made for shares of the stock of any company incorporated, for making artificial roads or canals, and a subscription conformable thereto shall have been made on behalf of the United States, all monies which shall become due according to the provisions or such acts, on the shares of stock held by the United States, shall be paid out of the aforesaid fund.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all dividends or profits which shall accrue from the shares of stock held by the United States, shall be received by the said secretary, and shall by him be paid into the said fund, and become part thereof.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said secretary, to make to congress, at each session, a report on the state of the said fund, with the expenditures and receipts, together with the state of the work on all roads and canals, in the construction of which the United States have become concerned, in the manner aforesaid.

Mr. Morrow, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorise the secretary of the treasury to subscribe for shares in the Chesapeake and Delaware canal stock; which passed to a second reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue in force the act laying a duty on imported salt, &c. and on the question whether the bill should be read a third time, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:—

YEAS—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Brown, Campbell, Chace, Condit, Gaillard, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Leacock, Mason, N. H. Mason, Va. Morrow, Ruggles, Sanford, Talbot, Tait, Taylor, Wells, Williams, Wilson—23.

NAVY.—Messrs. Goldsborough, Macon, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Varnum—6.

February 7.—Mr. Daggett presented the petition of Horatio Alden & Co. of Connecticut, praying compensation for a number of vessels destroyed by the enemy at Pettipaug, &c. in April, 1814. Referred.

Mr. Campbell, from the committee on finance and an uniform national currency, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby directed to ascertain, and cause to be laid before the senate, a statement exhibiting the actual condition of the several incorporated banks within the District of Columbia, on the first day of January, 1816, specifying the actual and authorised amount of their capital stock, the amount of specie, and the amount of the bills or notes of other banks, in their vaults; the amount of debts due to, and of notes or bills in circulation of each bank.

The bill from the house to continue in force the act laying a duty on imported salt, was read a third time and passed.

The bill concerning certain courts in the state of New-York, was ordered to a third reading.

The bill authorising the opening and working certain copper mines near Lake Superior, was read the second time.

The bill authorising the secretary of the treasury to subscribe for shares in the Chesapeake and Delaware canal stock, was read the second time.

The bill further providing for the library of congress, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The amendments of the house to the senate's bill concerning the convention of commerce with Great Britain, were referred, on motion of Mr. Bibb, to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Goldsborough submitted the following motion for consideration—

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to lay before the senate, copies of all the correspondence he may have had with the prize agent, the navy agent at N. York, and other persons, relative to the ship Cyane, captured by the United States frigate Constitution; and that he furnish copies of certificates of the valuation of the different prizes brought into the United States by the ships of war, and taken into the service of the United States; with a statement of their actual force when captured.

February 8.—The resolution submitted by Mr. Goldsborough yesterday, was to-day considered and passed.

Mr. Varnum submitted the following motion for consideration—

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred that part of the president's message which relates to finance, and an uniform national currency, be instructed to enquire into the expediency of confining the payment of all taxes and other monies due to the United States, to specie, treasury notes, and the notes of such banks as are in the practice of redeeming their notes with specie.

The bills further providing for the library of congress, and the bill respecting certain courts in New-York, were severally read the third time and passed.

The bill providing for the payment of property lost, captured or destroyed during the late war, was some time under the consideration of the senate, and then postponed to Monday next.

Mr. Bibb, from the committee on foreign relations, reported the bill respecting the commercial convention, with the amendments thereto, made by the house, without amendment.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Campbell, respecting the banks of the District of Columbia, was taken up and passed.

February 9.—The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reward the officers and crew of the late U. S. brig Argus (for services prior to her capture by the late enemy)—and, on motion of Mr. Tait, the bill was postponed to the first Monday in July next (equivalent to rejection).

For postponement.—Messrs. Bibb, Gaillard, King, Loeck, Macon, Mason, N. H. Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Talbot, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Williams, Wilson—18.

Against postponement.—Messrs. Barry, Brown, Chace, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Harper, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, N. H. Sanford, Talbot, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner—17.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the amendments of the house of representatives to the bill concerning the convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and his Britannic majesty.

Considerable debate took place on the subject; various modifications were suggested to the amendments, by those who were not disposed to refuse to legislate at all on the subject.

A motion was made by Mr. King to postpone the further consideration of the amendments and the bill indefinitely. After debate, the question on the motion was decided as follows:

For the postponement (or rejection).—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, N. H. Sanford, Talbot, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner—17.

Against it.—Messrs. Barry, Bibb, Campbell, Condit, Dana, Harper, Loeck, Macon, Mason, of Va. Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Tait, Taylor, Varnum, Wells, Williams, Wilson—18.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed. The senate adjourned to Monday.

February 12.—The senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the house of representatives to the bill concerning the convention of commerce between the United States and Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. Bibb, to agree to the first amendment, viz. to strike out the words, "and declared," from the existing clause of the bill, so as to make the bill active instead of declaratory; the question was decided as follows:

For the amendment.—Messrs. Bibb, Campbell, Condit, Dana, Lacock, Macon, Mason, of Va. Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Tait, Taylor, Varnum, Williams, Wilson—18.

Against it.—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Harper, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, of N. H. Talbot, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Wells—19.

The amendment was negatived.

On motion by Mr. Bibb, to agree to the remainder of the amendments, viz. to strike out the whole of the senate's bill, and insert in lieu thereof the original bill of the house of representatives, there were

For this amendment.—Messrs. Bibb, Campbell, Condit, Loeck, Macon, Mason, of Va. Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Varnum, Wilson—11.

Against it.—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Brown, Chace, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Harper, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, of N. H. Talbot, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Tichenor, Turner, Wells, Williams—23.

So the senate disagreed to all the amendments of the house of representatives—[and the two houses are fully at issue on this important subject.]

February 13.—The senate were principally engaged on the bill to pay for property lost, captured or destroyed during the late war; respecting which there is much diversity of opinion.

The president communicated to the senate a report from the secretary of the treasury, on the subject of a general tariff of duties on imports.

Mr. Tait, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill for the relief of lieutenant Col. Wm. Lawrence, and the garrison of Fort Bowyer, in 1811; which was passed to a second reading.

Mr. Campbell laid before the senate the resolutions of the legislature of Tennessee, rejecting the amendments to the constitution of the United States, proposed by Massachusetts and Connecticut.

Mr. Barbour, from the military committee, made a report on the memorial of the Kentucky legislature, relative to provision for the widows and orphans of militia who died in service, &c. The report stated facts only, and embraced no opinion on the subject, and was ordered to lie on the table.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to authorise the payment for property in the service of the United States which was lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy in the late war—considerable discussion took place, but no decision was had.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Feb. 9. Mr. Ward, of Mass. submitted for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That all duties, imposts and excises laid by congress ought not only to be laid uniformly throughout the United States, agreeably to the provision in the constitution, but ought to be collected in all parts of the United States in the same currency, or in currencies equivalent in value.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be instructed to receive, alone, in payment of duties, imposts and excises and debts due to the United States, gold, silver and copper coin, treasury notes, and the notes of such banks as pay specie for their bills, excepting in cases in which it is otherwise provided by law.

Mr. Ward briefly assigned his reasons for offering these propositions, which will be found concisely and clearly stated in the first of the above resolutions.

Mr. Smith, of Md. rose to speak—but, on motion of Mr. Tucker, the resolutions were laid on the table for the present.

Mr. Randolph submitted for consideration his promised motion for an enquiry into the constitutionality of the appointment of general Porter, which after a long debate, was modified and agreed to in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire whether the appointment to, and acceptance by the hon. Peter B. Porter, late a member of this house, from the state of New-York, of the office of commissioner under the late treaty at Ghent, is in contravention of the constitution of the United States.

[The resolution was discussed at considerable length—but it was finally agreed to raise a committee for the purposes mentioned.]

The house then resumed the consideration in the committee of the whole on the remaining propositions of the committee of ways and means.

The proposition respecting the duty on distillation (to repeal the duty on the quantity of spirits distilled, and to add 100 per cent to the present tax on the capacity of the still) first came up.

Various propositions at amendment, &c. were made. But an adjournment was had without deciding upon the main question.

Saturday, Feb. 10. On motion of Mr. Root,

Resolved, That the committee on the copper coin be instructed to enquire into the expediency of increasing the alloy, or reducing the weight of the small silver coins of the United States.

The house then resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of ways and means, being the seventh resolution thereof, as amended by the committee of the whole house, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of the government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on spirits distilled within the United States and the territories thereof, and by amending the act laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, passed on the 21st of December, 1811, excepting only the 6th, 13th, 19th and 24th sections thereof, from and after the first day of April next, and from the same day to add 50 per cent to the amount of the duty which all stills now subject to duty are liable to pay; and that the act imposing duties on licenses to distillers be so amended that licenses granted for periods of time less than a year, shall be paid for in proportion to the time for which they are granted.

On the adoption of this resolution the question was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, without further debate, as follows:

For the resolution	105
Against it	37

The house then proceeded to the consideration of the ninth resolution reported by the committee of ways and means, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal the act entitled "an act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying duties on household furniture and gold and silver watches," passed on the 18th of January, 1815.

Mr. Jackson, of Va. moved to amend the resolution so as to make it read as follows: "Resolved, That it is expedient to continue the act laying duties on household furniture and gold and silver watches; and so to amend the said act as to insure the faithful execution thereof, and to guard against its violation, by specifying the articles liable to taxation and the amount to be levied on each article, or by requesting a valuation to be made by the owner on oath."

Mr. Jackson supported his proposition by a pretty general examination of the subject, and it produced considerable debate. The repeal of the tax was chiefly supported on its failure to produce the expected revenue, its whole product amounting only to 75,000 dollars.

The question on the motion to amend was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Baker, Barbour, Bateman, Bennett, Blount, Brooks, Bryan, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Clark, N. C. Clark, Ky. Comstock, Condit, Crawford, Darlington, Desha, Edwards, Goodwyn, Griffin, Hall, Hardin, Hawes, Henderson, Huger, Hungerford, Irwin, Pa. Jackson, Johnson, Ky. Kerr, Va. King, N. C. Love, Lumpkin, Lyle, Lyon, Maclay, Mayrant, McCoy, McKee, McLean, K. Nelson, Va. Ormsby, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Powell, Roane, Robertson, Ross, Sharp, Smith, Va. Southard, Saul, Taylor, S. C. Telfair, Thomas, Tucker, Ward, N. Y. Williams, Willoughby, Wright, Yancey, 84.

NAYS.—Messrs. Archer, Atherton, Baer, Bassett, Baylies, Betts, Boss, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brighten, Brown, Burside, Cady, Champion, Chappell, Ciley, Clayton, Clendennen, Comer, Cooper, Creighton, Culp, Cuyler, Cuthbert, Davenport, Forney, Forsythe, Gaston, Gold, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hahn, Hale, Hammond, Hanson, Hopkinson, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving, N. Y. Jewett, Kent, King, Mass. Langdon, Law, Lewis, Lovell, Lowndes, Mason, Middleton, Mills, Milnor, Moore, S. C. Mosely, Nelson, Mass. Newton, Noyes, Parra, Pickering, Pitkin, Randolph, Reed, Rice, Root, Ruggles, Sargeant, Savage, Schenck, Sheffey, Smith, Pa. Smith, Md. Stanford, Stearns, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Taylor, N. Y. Throop, Vose, Ward, Ms. Ward, N. J. Webster, Wendover, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilde, Wilkin, Thos. Wilson, Wm. Wilson, Woodward, Yates—90.

The report of the select committee of a resolution for the relief of commodore Rodgers, was then taken up in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Monday, Feb. 12.—On motion of Mr. Cady of N. Y. the secretary of the treasury was directed to report to this house, what additions, if any, have been made to the funded public debt and to the floating public debt, since the 30th day of September last.

The resolution expressive of the sense of congress of the gallantry of captain James Biddle, the officers and crew of the Hornet; and a similar resolution respecting captain Charles Stewart, and the officers and crew of the Constitution, for their last victory, passed through a committee of the whole, and were severally ordered, nem. con. to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill for rewarding the officers and crew of the Hornet for the capture and destruction of the British sloop of war Penguin, passed through a committee of the whole. The blank was filled with $25,000, being the amount allowed in former cases; and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. [Both these were passed next day, nem. con.]

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Condit in the chair, on the bill for the relief of certain refugees from the British provinces during the late war.

Several papers were read respecting their merits and services, among which was a very strong testimony to their merits, &c. from gen. Porter, lately a member of this house.

This bill gave rise to a rather animated debate, in which the claim of the petitioners to indemnity or compensation was sustained by Mr. Throop, Mr. Yates, Mr. Wright, Mr. Gold, and Mr. Johnson of Ky.; and opposed by Messrs. Hulbert, Webster and Brooks.

This case has been fully presented to our readers in the shape of the petition of the committee on behalf of these sufferers. Their claim is precisely of a character, as the reporter understands it, with that for which ample provision was made at the close of the revolutionary war. They were natives of this country, and, on the breaking out of the war, preferred ranging themselves under the banners of their native country, than that to which, for purposes of business, they had assumed a temporary allegiance.

The opponents of the bill (which proposes to compensate the claimants' losses by donations of land) oppose it as rewarding treachery, as poisoning the fountains of morality, and use those general expressions of dislike, and even detestation, which such a bill is likely to call forth from those who view it in so odious a light.

The bill was not decided on; but, on motion of Mr. Johnson, laid on the table.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of another bill, making further provision for the widows and orphans of those who fell in the late war.

The house were occupied on this subject till the usual hour of adjournment.

Tuesday, Feb. 13.—Mr. Caldwell presented to the house a resolution adopted by the legislature of Ohio, instructing their senators and representatives to use their endeavors to obtain the passage of an act by congress, providing for the organization, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.

Mr. Newton, from the committee of commerce and manufactures, made a detailed report, which shall be published hereafter.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill for reducing the direct tax on the United States to three millions, and to continue the same one year.

Mr. Burwell moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the house whether discriminating duties are, at this time, levied in ports of the United States, on British vessels arriving from the West Indies, and laden with West India produce.

Which, after some remarks from Mr. Burwell and Mr. Bradbury, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Forsyth,

Resolved, That the naval committee be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making provision for those American seamen who were wounded, and for the widows and families of those who were killed at Dartmoor prison, in the 6th of April, 1815.

The engrossed bill to reduce the amount of the direct tax upon the United States and the district of Columbia, for the year 1816; the engrossed bill making appropriations for ordnance, ordnance stores &c. were severally read the third time and passed—the last mentioned by yeas and nays, 107 to 46.

The house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Condit in the chair, on the bill to provide for the widows and orphans of the officers, non-commissioned officers and privates who have been killed in battle, died in the service or of wounds received while in the service of the United States, during the late war.

The remainder of the day was spent in discussing various amendments to the details of the bill.

Several motions at amendment were made and negatived. The bill was finally ordered to a third reading—106 to 46.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for ordnance stores for the year 1816.

The question being on agreeing with the committee of the whole to fill up the blank for this purpose, with $1,063,024.

The letter from the secretary of war gives the following estimate (with details) of the appropriation he deems necessary for the year.

For the United States' armory at Springfield	165,793 37 1-2
For do. at Harper's Ferry	172,054 87 1-2
For erecting and completing arsenals, depots, &c. as specified	457,765 50
For timber to be seasoned	75,000
For coal, steel, iron, materials, &c.	79,000
For amount of existing contracts for articles to be delivered in 1816, viz.
Gun-powder,	93,000
Cannon and shot, shells, &c.	111,000
Muskets and rifles	89,000
Transportation of ordnance, &c.	22,000

It was on the one hand contended, the amount of appropriation proposed was extravagant, under present circumstances entirely too large, and calculated unnecessarily to burthen the people without adequate object. On the other hand, the advocates of the appropriation pointed to the items of the report, and supported the policy of authorising the proposed expenditure on general principles of forecast and providence.

The question on concurring with the committee was decided in the affirmative. Yeas 93. Nays 48.

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

The message of the senate rejecting the amendments of this house to their bill concerning the convention of commerce, &c. was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. Forsyth, the house determined to insist on its amendments, and to ask a conference thereon with the senate.

Thursday, Feb. 15.—Several petitions were received, and reports of different committees on business of a private nature made.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Condit in the chair, on the bill making further provision for military services during the late war.

A motion made yesterday by Mr. Cannon, to strike out the 3d section of the bill, which provides a bounty of land to the deranged officers of the late army, still under consideration.

This motion produced a discussion which occupied nearly the remainder of the day. Those gentlemen who supported the motion, and opposed the grant of land to the disbanded officers, were Messrs. Cannon, Comstock, Taul, Ross, Easton, McKee and Williams. Those who were adverse to the motion, and in favor of awarding the bounty proposed by this bill, were Messrs. Johnson of Ky. Smith of Md. Jackson of Va. and Wilde.

The motion to strike out the section was finally agreed to—Yeas 74, nays 60.

On motion of Mr. Desha, the 2d section of the bill was so amended as to confine the land bounty to those soldiers, above 45 and under 18 years of age, who enlisted "for five years or during the war."

On motion of Mr. Jackson of Va. a new section was added to the bill for the purpose of guarding, as far as possible, the bounty from falling into the hands of speculators, by prohibiting the transfer of right thereto, until after the patent has issued.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The speaker laid before the house two letters from the secretary of the treasury, one enclosing a statement of exports for the year 1815; and the other a statement, in pursuance of a resolution of this house, of the value of lands, slaves, &c. in the United States, assessed under the direct tax. Both the letters and reports were ordered to be printed; and—the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

Massachusetts. The republicans have nominated Samuel Dexter, and the federalists John Brooks, as their candidates for governor of that state, at the ensuing election. It is supposed the contest will be a very hard one.

New-Hampshire. Mr. Plumer is the republican, and Mr. Shaeffe the federal candidate for governor of New-Hampshire. It is confidently expected that the former will be chosen.

Pennsylvania legislature. A bill has been introduced into the house of representatives of Pennsylvania to amend the act regulating elections, &c.—which has a provision to extend the right of suffrage to every freeman, "without regard to complexion," being qualified in other respects.

New York legislature. A republican council of appointment was elected by the casting vote of the speaker, on the 5th inst. On the 6th, the petition of Henry Fellows, claiming the seat of Peter Allen, was referred to the committee of privileges and elections, (appointed same day) who reported next day in favor of the petition, in which the house concurred—and Mr. Fellows was admitted to his seat.

Spanish minister. A report has prevailed that don Onis left Washington in a terrible passion—which, like many other reports, appears to have no foundation. It is true that he has gone on a visit to Philadelphia—and that's all.

Gen. Wilkinson. The legislature of Maryland, at their late session, almost unanimously passed a resolution granting to major-general James Wilkinson (lately of the army of the United States) in consideration of his revolutionary services, the half pay of a colonel of dragoons for life. This is said to be as high a pension as was ever granted by the legislature.

The new Tariff.—There was yesterday (says the National Intelligencer of the 14th inst.) laid before both houses, by the secretary of the treasury, a plan of a new Tariff of duties on imports. This is the document which the secretary was directed, at the last session, to prepare and report to congress, and which has been looked for with considerable interest. We shall take an early opportunity to place the substance of it before our readers.

Captain Stewart is appointed to the command of the Franklin, 74, now preparing in Philadelphia.

of our work closes herewith. The title page and table of contents will be forwarded, as usual; and the extra SUPPLEMENT (of 12 sheets, to cost $1) be transmitted to such as shall have ordered it, in about or less than three weeks.

To those of his patrons who have already paid the present year's subscription, (and he feelingly acknowledges there are many such) the editor respectfully tenders his hearty and sincere thanks.—Those who have not yet done it, will please to observe, that the proper period for this very important duty, on their part, has arrived; and, it is confidently hoped that, with the least possible delay, they will remit their money, or make payment, as heretofore, for which purpose all the accounts are duly prepared. On settling these, an opportunity will present itself for ordering the supplement to the 9th vol. by paying the cost of it. Such as have closed their bills for the year, will please to inform the editor of their wish to have it, through the customary channels.

The considerate will be good enough to recollect, that the living principle of a work like this does not consist so much in the quantity of its subscribers as in their quality. It is by general punctuality, only, that the REGISTER can prosper. The editor feels conscious that it is worth five dollars a year—at least, he has spared no labor or expence, within his means, to make it so. Such as are of this opinion, will not deteriorate the value of the work by holding back their dues; and, in the neglect, cause, perhaps, as much vexation and loss of time as the profit made is worth—which is very frequently the case as to individuals. The payment of the fifth year is now due; and all will agree that once in five years there ought to be an entire squaring off.

There are not many—perhaps no one—that has a just idea of the numerous difficulties encountered in the management of this work. The editor's mind is too much expanded for the room he has to occupy, or his judgment, as to what may be useful or interesting, is greatly deficient—and hence it is that he is in continual distress to make his selections and prepare his matter—the pressure of which has long been so great and so various. But he has kept his eye single to this object—that, while he endeavored to keep up a present interest, he was most zealous to record and preserve such things as would wear—or, like sound wine, improve by age, and obtain a body and consistence pleasing to all.—And he has the testimony of many of the best men in the republic that he has measurably succeeded.

The present state of this establishment is flattering. What has been built up with so much labor and toil shall not be destroyed by idleness or inattention. But the duties of the patrons of the REGISTER and the editor are reciprocal, and each must do their part.

To give place to some articles highly important in themselves, and of more immediate interest, we have reluctantly laid over "a sketch of the public services of James Monroe," with an invaluable article from the pen of Jefferson, on education, and a great mass of other useful matter. "Our poverty but not our will consents." WE WANT MORE ROOM.

Proposed New Tariff

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Treasury Department, Feb. 12, 1816.

SIR—In obedience to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 23d of Feb. 1815, I have the honor to transmit a report on the subject of a general tariff of duties; proper to be imposed on imported goods, wares and merchandize.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

The hon. the president of the senate of the United States.

REPORT, &c.

On the 23d of February, 1815, the house of representatives "Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to congress, at their next session, a general tariff of duties proper to be imposed upon imported goods, wares and merchandize;" and, in obedience to that resolution, the secretary of the treasury has now the honor to lay before congress the following report:

Comprehending,

- I. A view of the tariff of the United States, and its incidents, upon the peace establishment.
- II. A statement of the general principles for reforming the tariff of the United States, including the means of enforcement.
- III. A general tariff proposed for the consideration of congress.

I. A view of the tariff of the United States, and its incidents, upon the peace establishment.

By an act of congress, passed on the 1st of July, 1812, (*) the permanent duties previously imposed by law, upon goods imported into the United States from foreign places, were doubled; an addition of 10 per cent. was made to the double duties upon goods imported in vessels not of the United States, and vessels belonging wholly, or in part, to the subjects of foreign powers, entering the United States, were charged with an additional tonnage duty of $1 50 cents per ton. This act was limited in its continuance to the period of one year after the conclusion of the peace with Great Britain, and it expires, of course, on the 17th of February, 1816. The act (with all its supplements) imposing an additional duty, commonly called the "Mediterranean fund," of 2½ per cent ad valorem, and a discriminating duty of 10 per cent upon that additional duty, in respect to all goods imported in vessels not of the United States, had expired on the 3d of March 1815.

Considering the subject, therefore, upon the foundation on which it is placed, by the extinction of the Mediterranean fund, and by the restoration of peace, the annexed table marked (A) exhibiting the general tariff of the United States, resulting from the successive acts of congress, imposing, augmenting and modifying the duties upon imported merchandize, compared with the rates of duties proposed for the new tariff; and it is susceptible of the discrimination marked in table No. 1, comprising the articles charged with specific duties; No. 2, comprising the articles charged with duties ad valorem, at the several rates of 12½ per cent., 15 per cent and 20 per cent.; and No. 3, comprising the articles that are free from duty.

*In the secretary's original report there are numerous references to authorities and laws which, being deemed unimportant to the reader, are omitted.

It is another important view of the subject, connected with the details of the table A, that the rate of duty upon the tonnage of vessels of the United States, and of the duties upon the goods which they import, is less than upon the tonnage of other vessels, and of their cargoes. Thus,

1st. As to the duty on tonnage.

Ships or vessels of the United States, entered from any foreign port or place, or carrying goods from one district to another district, are charged at the rate per ton, of	cents.
Ships or vessels built within the United States, but belonging wholly, or in part, to the subjects of foreign powers, entering from a foreign place or port, are charged at the rate per ton of	6
Ships or vessels of every other description entering from a foreign port or place, or carrying goods from one district to another district within the United States, are charged at the rate per ton, of	30
And it may be properly here added, that—
Ships and vessels not of the United States, or not wholly owned by American citizens, entering the ports of the United States, are charged by law with the duty "light-money" at the rate, per ton, of	50

2d. As to the duty on goods imported.

The discriminating duty imposed by law, upon goods imported in vessels not of the United States, is not made a direct charge upon the goods as specified in the table A, but it is charged generally, upon the rate of duty imposed on the like goods, when imported in vessels of the United States; and it is uniformly an addition of 10 per cent. upon the American rate of duty, whether that be specific or ad valorem.

The discriminating duty is to be considered, however, in connexion with the treaties and acts of congress, which have subjected it to temporary or permanent modifications. Thus: 1st, The Louisiana convention suspended the discriminating duties for a period of twelve years (which will expire on the 6th of March 1816) in relation to French and Spanish vessels and cargoes arriving within the ceded territory. 2dly, The convention to regulate the commerce between the territories of the United States and of his Britannic majesty will suspend the discriminating duties in relation to British vessels and cargoes, arriving within the United States from the British territories in Europe, for a period of four years, commencing on the 3d of July, 1815.

And 3dly, The act of the 3d of March, 1815, has authorized the abolition of the discriminating duties in relation to every foreign nation which shall abolish such of its discriminating and countervailing duties as are disadvantageous to the United States.

The duty on tonnage is payable at the time of entry; but before the product of the duties on goods imported reaches the public treasury, the collection is affected by the credit which the law allows to the importer, and the amount is liable to a reduction, by the allowance of drawbacks and bounties, as well as by the expense of collection.

1st. As to the credit for duties on goods imported.

On the produce of the West Indies (salt excepted) and on goods imported by sea from all foreign ports and islands lying north of the equator, and situated on the eastern shores of America, it is three months for one half, and six months for the other half.

On salt it is nine months.

On Madeira, and all other wines, it is 12 months.

On goods imported from Europe (other than wines, salt and teas) it is eight months for one third, ten months for one third, and twelve months for one third.

On goods imported from Europe, (other than wines, salt and teas,) imported from any other place than Europe, and the West Indies, it is 6 months for one half, 9 months for one-fourth, and 12 months for one fourth.

On teas imported from China or Europe, it is conditionally, upon deposits, two years, subject, as intermediate sales may be effected, to payments at four months, eight months, or twelve months, according to the amount of sales, respectively.

2d. As to the drawback of duties on goods exported.

The general provision of the law allows a drawback of the duties on goods imported into the United States, provided they amount to 50 dollars, if the goods be exported within 12 calendar months after the importation, to any foreign port or place other than the dominions of any foreign state immediately adjoining to the United States. This local limitation has been modified, however, so as to authorize an exportation, with the benefit of the drawback, from Louisiana to any port or place situated to the westward or southward thereof.

To the general provision of the law for the allowance of drawback, there are some exceptions. 1st, The additional duty of ten per cent. imposed upon goods imported in vessels not of the United States, is not the subject of drawback. 2dly, The right of exportation for the benefit of drawback is not allowed in the case of foreign dried and pickled fish, and other salted provisions, fish-oil or playing cards.

3dly, The rate of a half cent per gallon on spirits, with two and a half per cent. on the duties, and the rate of three and a half per cent. on the amount of the duties on all other goods imported, is to be retained, when they are exported for the benefit of drawback, as an indemnification for the expense accrued concerning them.

3d. As to the allowance of bounties on exports.

The act of the 29th of July, 1813, (which will expire on the 17th of February, 1816,) when it imposed a duty of 20 cents per bushel upon imported salt, allowed a bounty upon all exported pickled fish of the fisheries of the United States at the rate of 20 cents per barrel; provided the fish were wholly cured with foreign salt, on which a duty had been paid or secured. The same act authorises an annual allowance to the owners and crews of American vessels and boats employed in the fisheries, graduated according to the tonnage.

The act of the 24th of July, 1813, (which will, also, expire on the 17th of February, 1816,) when it imposed a duty of 4 cents per pound upon all sugars refined within the United States, authorised a drawback, in the nature of a bounty, upon all such of the sugar so refined as should be exported from the United States to any foreign port or place.

4th. As to the expense of the collection of duties on imports.

The successful collection of the duties on imports, before the introduction of the restrictive system, depended more upon the integrity of the commercial community than upon the rigor of the laws, or an expensive vigilance at the custom-house. It is not to be denied, or disregarded, however, that soon after that event, the spirit of illicit commerce was kindled; that it spread during the late war; and that, with every just reliance upon the honor of the American merchant, measures of greater energy have become necessary, for the protection of the fair trader, as well as for the security of the revenue. Hitherto the average annual expense of the collection may be stated at near 4 per cent. upon the annual product (exclusive of the fees paid by individuals, which may be estimated at one per cent. more) during a season of open and prosperous commerce; and it is believed that the effect of an increased expenditure in the employment of the means which are necessary to prevent and detect offences against the laws, will so augment the product of the duty, as to afford a certain and ample equivalent for the original advance.

The operation of the 'ariff exhibited in the table A. with the incidents which have been stated, may be concisely viewed, with reference to two periods in the commerce of the United States: 1st. Before the introduction of the restrictive system, from 1804 to 1807, both years inclusive; and 2d. After the introduction of the restrictive system, from 1808 to 1811, both years inclusive. Thus,

II. A statement of the general principles for reforming the Tariff of the United States, including the means of enforcement.

The tariff, which has been thus generally reviewed, originated in the year 1790, soon after the organization of the federal government. Notwithstanding the various alterations to which it was subjected, during the long period of American neutrality, it certainly has not been left in a state adapted to the present epoch. The peace of Europe will give a new course and character to the commerce of the world; and the condition of the United States is essentially changed in population, in wealth, in the employment of labor and capital, in the demand of luxuries, or of necessities for consumption, and in the native resources to supply the demand. These considerations forcibly recommend the measure of revision and reform which is now contemplated. The task, however, is not more important in its object, than difficult in the performance. The means of information are scattered and imperfect. Many conflicting interests and prejudices are to be reconciled. And in the unsettled state of commerce, much of any plan, connected with its operations, must unavoidable rest upon hypothesis, and be tested by future experiment. In every effort, therefore, to diminish the force of these obstacles, an ulterior reliance upon the wisdom of the legislature has been respectfully indulged.

In framing the propositions which this report will submit to the consideration of congress, for the establishment of a general tariff, three great objects have been principally regarded. 1st. The object of raising, by duties on imports and tonnage, the proportion of public revenue which must be drawn from that source. 2d. The object of conciliating the various national interests, which arise from the pursuits of agriculture, manufactures, trade and navigation. And 3d. The object of rendering the collection of the duties convenient, equal and certain.

1. The report which the committee of ways and means presented to the house of representatives on the 9th day of January, 1816, furnishes a foundation to estimate, with sufficient precision, for the present purpose, the proportion of the public revenue to be annually raised through the medium of the customs. It is there stated that the amount of the annual demands of the peace establishment may be placed at the sum of $15,778,669

But to this sum it is now proper to add the general amount which is appropriated for the payment of the principle of the public debt, estimated at

The difference between the treasury estimate for the naval service, (made upon conjectural ground) and the subsequent statement of the secretary of the navy made upon official documents, to wit:

The secretary of the navy's statement, after adding the sum of 200,000 dollars annually appropriated for three years, for the purchase of timber, being

The treasury estimate being 3,838,071
 The difference being 2,716,510
 And the amount which is proposed by the committee of ways and means, to add to the sinking fund, (raising it from 8,000,000 to 13,150,000) 1,121,561

5,150,000

The annual revenue to be raised, for the service of government, may, then, be stated in round numbers, at the sum of 24,000,000 of dollars independent of any provision for public institutions and public improvements; such as the president has recommended to the patronage of the legislature; such as the patriotism of congress may, from time to time, be induced to sanction; and such as will at once enlighten, enrich, and adorn the nation.

Upon the general principles of public policy, developed in the report of the committee of ways and means, the supply for all the expenses of the government, will be derived, in part from internal duties and taxes, but principally, from duties on imports. Stating therefore, the amount of the demand for revenue at $24,000,000 it has been proposed to supply annually, from the internal duties and taxes, and from the sale of public lands, the sum of 6,925,000, dollars:—that is to say, from the direct tax on lands, houses, and slaves, the sum of $2,700,000 from the duty on stills, the sum of 1,200,000 from the duty on stamps, the sum of 400,000 from the duty on refined sugar the sum of 150,000 from the duty on carriages; the sum of 175,000 from licenses to retailers, (a tax proposed to be modified,) the sum of 900,000 from the duties on sales at auction, the sum of 400,000 from the sales of public lands, the sum of 1,000,000

And the reliance for the residue of the supply must be, of course, upon the customs, to the amount of $17,075,000

It is here to be considered, that the report of the committee of ways and means contemplates the abolition or the reduction of duties or taxes heretofore pledged, "to provide for the payment of the expenses of government, the punctual payment of the public debt, and for creating a sinking fund," to an amount not less than 7,064,340 dollars; that is to say.

To abolish the duties on furniture and watches, on domestic manufactures, and on distilled spirits, in amount about 3,864,340

To abolish the additional duty on postage, in amount about 300,000

And to take from the direct tax in the nett amount, about 2,900,000

And for supplying this sum of 7,064,340 dollars, in observance of the plighted faith of the government, it has been proposed to make an addition to the customs, equal to an average rate of 42 per cent. upon the products of the duties, imposed prior to the act of the 1st of July, 1812, by which the impost was doubled (as already stated) during the continuance of the late war.

If then, the average annual product of the single duties on imports and tonnage, may be estimated (and it cannot be prudently estimated higher,) at the sum of $12,000,000

The addition of 42 per cent. upon that amount will yield a sum of 5,040,000

And will give for the amount to be produced by the customs, $17,040,000

2. The social compact is formed on the basis of a surrender of a part of the natural rights of individuals, for the security and benefit of the whole society. The federal compact is formed on the basis of a surrender of a part of the political rights of each state, for the benefit and security of the whole confederation. Hence, in the attempt "to conciliate the various national interests which arise from the pursuits of agriculture, manufactures, trade and navigation," it is necessary to recollect, that the common object of the nation will not invariably correspond with the separate objects of individuals, or of their professions, nor with the local objects of the respective states, or of the industry of their inhabitants.

Under the beneficent dispensations of Providence, the territory of the United States produces almost all the natural fruits of the earth; and pursuing the subdivision of which labor is susceptible, the citizens of the United States are engaged in the cultivation of almost every art and every science, within the scope of human knowledge. But the fruits produced, although they are the fruits of the nation, are not the same in every state; and the labor employed, although it be the labor of the nation, is employed upon very different materials, with very different results, in the different sections of the union.

From these considerations are derived the principles of general policy, by which the national character is formed, and the national interests are maintained. The interests of agriculture require a free and constant access to a market for its staples; and a ready supply of all the articles of use and consumption upon reasonable terms: but the national interest may require the establishment of a domestic preference to a foreign market, and the employment of domestic in preference to foreign labor, in furnishing the necessary supplies. And again, the interests of foreign commerce flourish most, when foreign commerce is the only medium to convey the natural products of the country to a market, and to provide for all the wants of the people in the fabrics of the manufacturer and the ar-list: but the national interest may require (contemplating equally the state of peace and the state of war) that the people should be as independent in the resources of their subsistence, as in the operations of their government. It must, however, be the aim of every just system of political economy, to secure the national interest with as little prejudice as possible to the peculiar interests of agriculture and of commerce.

There are few, if any, governments, which do not regard the establishment of domestic manufactures, as a chief object of public policy. The United States have already so regarded it. In the earliest acts of congress, which were passed after the adoption of the present constitution, the obligation of providing by duties on imports, for the discharge of the public debts, is expressly connected with the policy of encouraging manufactures. In the year 1790, the secretary of the treasury was directed, by the house of representatives, to take the subject of manufactures into consideration, with a view particularly to report upon "the means of promoting such as would render the United States independent of foreign nations, for military and other essential supplies." In the year 1810, the legislature again manifested a marked solicitude to ascertain the progress of the national independence in manufactures, by combining the business of the census with an enquiry into the state of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures, within the several districts, territories and divisions of the United States. But it was emphatically during the period of the restrictive system, and of the war, that the importance of domestic manufactures became conspicuous to the nation, and made a lasting impression upon the mind of every statesman and of every patriot. The weapons and munitions of war; the necessities of clothing and the comforts of living, were at first but scantily provided. The American market seemed for a while, to be converted into a scene of gambling and extortion; and it was not the least of the evils generated by the unequal state of the supply and the demand, that an illicit traffic with the enemy, by land and by water, was corruptly and systematically prosecuted, from the commencement to the termination of hostilities.

From these circumstances of suffering and mortification have sprung, however, the means of future safety and independence. It has been thought, that with respect to industry applied to manufactures, as well as with respect to industry applied to commerce, individuals should be left to pursue their own course, untouched by the hand of government, either to impel or to restrain. Without examining how far this opinion is sanctioned by experience, it is sufficient upon the present occasion to observe, that the American manufactures—particularly those which have been introduced during the restrictive system and the war, owe their existence exclusively to the capital, the skill, the enterprise, and the industry of private citizens. The demands of the country, while the acquisition of supplies from foreign nations was either prohibited or impracticable, may have afforded a sufficient inducement for this investment of capital and this application of labor; but the inducement, in its necessary extent, must fail when the day of competition returns. Upon that change in the condition of the country, the preservation of the manufactures which private citizens, under favorable auspices, have constituted the property of the nation, becomes a consideration of general policy, to be resolved by a recollection of past embarrassments; by the certainty of an increased difficulty in reinstating, upon any emergency, the manufactures which shall be allowed to perish and pass away; and by a just sense of the influence of domestic manufactures upon the wealth, power and independence of the government.

The object to be encouraged and protected merits, in its intrinsic value, as well as its general influence, the attention of the legislature. From the peace of 1783, until the year 1808, the march of domestic manufactures was slow, but steady. It has since been bold, rapid and firm; until, at the present period, considering the circumstances of time and pressure, it has reached a station of unexampled prosperity. The attempt, however, to obtain detailed and accurate information upon the subject, has only been successful, in a very limited degree; and, consequently, the result must be presented to the view of congress, rather as an outline and an estimate, than as a complete and demonstrative statement of facts. With this understanding, the American manufactures may be satisfactorily divided into three principal classes; allowing for such diversities of shade, as will sometimes seem to render the classification of particular manufactures doubtful, or arbitrary: First class—Manufactures which are firmly and permanently established; and which wholly, or almost wholly, supply the demand for domestic use and consumption. Second class—Manufactures which, being recently, or partially established, do not at present supply the demand for domestic use and consumption; but which, with proper cultivation, are capable of being matured to the whole extent of the demand. Third class—Manufactures which are so slightly cultivated, as to leave the demand of the country wholly, or almost wholly, dependent upon foreign sources for a supply.

First class—In the first class, it is believed, the following articles may be embraced:

- Cabinet wares and all manufactures of wood.
- Carriages of all descriptions.
- Cables and cordage.
- Hats of wool, fur, leather, chip, or straw, and straw bonnets.
- Iron castings, fire and side arms, cannon, muskets, pistols.
- Window glass.
- Leather, and all manufactures of leather, including saddles, bridles and harness.
- Paper of every description; blank books.
- Printing types.

Second class—In the second class, it is believed, the following articles may be embraced:

- Cotton goods of the coarser kinds.
- Woolen goods of the coarser kind generally, and some of the finer kinds.
- Metal buttons.
- Plated wares.
- Iron manufactures of the larger kinds; shovels, spades, axes, hoes, scythes, &c. nails, large and small.
- Pewter, tin, copper and brass manufactures.
- Alum, coppers.
- Spirits, beer, ale and porter.

Third class—In the third class, it is believed, the following articles may be embraced:

- Cotton manufactures of the finer kinds; muslins, nankeens, chintzes, stained and printed cottons of all descriptions.
- Linen of all descriptions, linen cambrics, lawns.
- Hempen cloths, sail cloth, Russian and German linens.
- Silk goods of all descriptions.
- Woolen goods of many descriptions; worsted goods of all kinds, stuffs, cambiets, blankets, carpets, and carpeting.

Hosiery of all descriptions, including knit or woven gloves.

Hardware and ironmongery, excepting the large articles, cutlery, pins, needles.

China ware, earthen ware, porcelain.

Glass of all descriptions, except window glass and phials.

The matured state of the first class of manufactures, relieves the task of forming a tariff, with respect to them, from any important difficulty. Duties might be freely imposed upon the importation of similar articles, amounting wholly, or nearly, to a prohibition, without endangering a scarcity in the supply; while the competition among the domestic manufactures alone, would sufficiently protect the consumer from exorbitant prices; graduating the rates of the markets generally by the standard of a fair profit, upon the capital and labor employed. It is true, however, on the other hand, that by imposing low duties upon the imported articles, importation would be encouraged, and the revenue increased; but without adding to the comfort or deducting from the expence of the consumer, the consumption of the domestic manufacture would, in an equal degree, be diminished by that operation, and the manufacture itself might be entirely supplanted. It is, therefore, a question between the gain of the revenue and the loss of the manufacture, to be decided upon principles of national policy. Under the circumstances of an abundant market, the interest of the consumer must stand indifferent, whether the price of any article be paid for the benefit of the manufacturer, or of the importer: but a wise government will, surely, deem it better to sacrifice a portion of its revenue, than to sacrifice those institutions which private enterprise and wealth have connected with public prosperity and independence.

The second class of manufactures presents considerations of the most interesting, and not of the least embarrassing nature, in the formation of a tariff. Some remarks have already been made upon the danger which at present threatens those manufactures, as well as upon the policy of rendering them permanently beneficial to the nation; for it is respectfully thought to be in the power of the legislature, by a well-timed and well-directed patronage, to place them, within a very limited period, upon the footing on which the manufactures included in the first class have been so happily placed, by the lapse of a few years, and the perseverance of a comparatively few individuals. The means of promoting this great object are various; but it appears to have been the early and continued practice and policy of the government, to afford encouragement to domestic products and manufactures, rather by the imposition of protecting duties, than by the grant of bounties and premiums; and, indeed, it is in that course alone, that the subject properly falls within the scope of the present report. Although some indulgence will always be required, for any attempt so to realize the national independence, in the department of manufactures; the sacrifice cannot be either great or lasting. The inconveniences of the day will be amply compensated by future advantages. The agriculturalist, whose produce and whose flocks depend for their value upon the fluctuations of a foreign market, will have no occasion, eventually, to regret the opportunity of a ready sale for his wool or his cotton, in his own neighborhood; and it will soon be understood that the success of the American manufacture, which tends to diminish the profit (often the excessive profit) of the importer, does not necessarily add to the price of the article in the hands of the consumer.

Assuming, therefore, the ground, that the manufactures of the second class will be fostered by the legislative care, the amount of the protecting duties, and the mode of imposing them, in order to be effectual, become important considerations. It must be agreed, upon all hands, that the amount of the duties should be such as will enable the manufacturer to meet the importer, in the American market, upon equal terms of profit and loss; and that the mode of imposing the duties should be such as to secure the resulting competition from the influence of clandestine or illicit practices. There still, however, remains a diversity of opinion as to the amount which will be competent, and as to the mode which will be efficient; and the aim of this report will be to strike the medium which appears to be best established from all the information that has been collected.

The third class of manufactures does not require further attention, at this time, than to adjust the rate of duty to the amount of revenue which it is necessary to draw from them. They have not yet been the objects of American capital, industry, and enterprise to any important degree; and the present policy of the government is directed to protect, and not to create manufactures.

There is, however a distinct view of the subject which ought not to be omitted. Where the demand for raw materials, or manufactured articles, in any of the departments of domestic industry is wholly, or almost wholly, dependent upon the supply from foreign nations, the access to the American market should be easy, if not entirely free. Acting upon this principle, it will be proper, above all, to respect the interest of ship building and navigation at a period when the equalization of the duties upon tonnage and merchandise, by the operation of the acts of congress, and treaties, will probably give rise to an interesting competition between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States. The shipping interest, and the manufacturing interest, must however be reconciled; and consulting best interests, the following suggestions are respectfully offered:

1. Imported iron cables, and bar iron; cables, cordage, hemp, pack-thread, twine, and seines; sheet copper, copper nails, and lead; so far as they enter essentially into the construction and equipment of ships, and are not supplied by the American manufacturer, ought to be lightly taxed.
2. The case of foreign vessels employed in bringing to the United States goods that are not the growth or manufacture of the country to which the vessels belong, may furnish a proper field for legislative regulations.
3. The case of goods imported from countries which by law confine the carriage of such goods to their own vessels respectively, will also furnish a proper field for similar regulations.

The principles involved in the proposition for a new tariff, in relation to the protection of domestic manufactures, being thus presented for consideration, the more general principles of the system remain to be briefly stated, in relation to the production of the revenue—Thus:

1. Articles intended as the source of revenue should never be so heavily charged with duties as to prevent importation, or much to diminish it.
2. Articles should never be so heavily charged with duties as to create a temptation to smuggle.
3. Articles of great size and weight, of comparatively small value, are difficult to be smuggled; and, other things being equal, they may be charged with higher duties.

4. Articles of small size and great value are easily smuggled, and must be charged with low duties, to destroy the otherwise fatal temptation to evade the law.

5. Articles imported to a great amount should rather be charged with specific duties upon their weight and measure, in order to guard against evasions and fraud, than with ad valorem duties on their value.

The difficulty of carrying the last mentioned rule into practice, has been found almost insurmountable. It has been already intimated, that in the classification of manufactures, there were several articles differently classed, which can scarcely be distinguished from each other, and which could not be separately described, with such distinctness and precision, as is requisite in a tariff, to mark the line of discrimination for different rates of specific duties. In the cotton and woollen manufactures of the United States, for instance, there are several kinds of goods extensively produced, whose names are arbitrary, and continually changing; and whose texture and quality are so various, and so easily altered or disguised, as to elude the vigilance and skill of the custom-house. For this reason—and considering, also, that the ascertainment of duties by the original cost of the goods, according to their weight and measure, is sometimes a source of vexation to the importer, leading, perhaps, to great corruption in the execution of the law; the precedent of the existing tariff has been generally pursued, which subjects all goods (for example, all cotton and woollen goods) whether fine or coarse; and whether they are, or are not, of the kinds manufactured in the United States; to one common rate of duty. A general description designates the article; renders the imposition of the duty uniform and certain, at all the ports of entry; and effectually guards against mistake or evasion.

Upon the principles, and with the views thus stated, the proposition for the new tariff has been formed. The variations from the tariff of permanent single duties, consist, principally, in the following points:

1. The rates of the duties ad valorem are changed in number from three to eight. The increase of the number will not, it is thought be attended with any disadvantage; and it will, at least, afford a better means of ascertaining hereafter the value of articles of different descriptions, which are now blended in one class; as well as the amount of the duties collected from each description. The amount of the rates of duties ad valorem is also changed from 12½, 15, and 20 per cent. to 7½, 15, 20, 22, 28, 30, 33 1-3 and 35 per cent.

2. The rates of the specific duties are generally increased upon the amount of the permanent single rates, averaging, with the increase of the rates of duties ad valorem, an aggregate of about 42 per cent. upon the aggregate product of the customs, estimated at about $12,000,000 per annum.

3. The following articles, heretofore free, are charged with duties, to wit:

	cents.
Allum, per cwt.	200
Copperas, do.	150
Copper, in sheets, rods, bolts, or nails, per lb.	4
Gum Arabic and Gum Senegal, ad. val. 7½ per cent.
Mahogany, per cubic foot	12
Tin plates, per box of 100 square feet	150
Woods for dying
Brazil, Braziletto, Camwood, per ton	600
Fustic, logwood, do.	300
Nicaragua, do.	800

Wire, brass, ad. val. 22 per cent.

4. The following articles, heretofore subject to an ad valorem duty, are charged with a specific duty, to wit:

Iron, in bars or bolts, per cwt. 75 and 150 cents.

5. The following articles, heretofore subject to specific duties, are charged with duties ad. valorem; because the product of the specific duties has been so inconsiderable, as to render it useless to distinguish them from the mass of articles charged with duties ad valorem, to wit:

	cents.
Woollen or cotton cards, former duty per doz.	50
Glauber salts, do. per cwt.	200
Hair powder, do. per lb.	4
Lime, do. casks of 60 gals.	50
Malt, do. per bushel	10
Ochre, yellow, dry, do. per lb.	1
Do. in oil do. do.	1 1-2
Pewter, plates and dishes, do. do.	4
Starch, do. do.	3
Spanish brown, do. do.	1
Quicksilver, do. do.	6

3. The means of enforcing the tariff.

The means of enforcing the collection of the duties on imports, or in other words, the means of preventing or detecting frauds upon the revenue, require a prompt, energetic, and steady attention.—The remedies to be provided for the existing defects, should be particularly applied, 1st, to guard against smuggling, by the clandestine introduction of merchandize without report, entry, or permit; 2d, to guard against smuggling, in the case of duties ad valorem, by fraudulent entries of merchandize upon fictitious invoices; 3d, to guard against smuggling, in the case of specific duties, by fraudulent entries of merchandize upon false statements of the weight, or the measure; 4th, to guard against smuggling, by clandestinely relanding merchandize exported with the benefit of drawback, or by fraudulently obtaining debentures for duties on merchandize exported in cases that are not entitled to the benefit. The details necessary to give effect to a system embracing these objects, must unavoidably be postponed until the sense of congress shall be ascertained; but it is proper at this time to bring distinctly into view the essential features of the system. In addition, therefore, to the provisions contained in the laws which now regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, the following propositions are respectfully suggested:

1. That a competent judicial authority be provided to take cognizance of all suits, prosecutions, informations and libels, for debts, fines, penalties and forfeitures, arising and accruing under the laws of the United States: a provision rendered indispensable by late decisions of some of the state courts declining such cognizance, in certain cases.

2. That a more competent provision be made for the employment of custom-house officers, cutters and barges.

3. That an adequate fund be created and set apart for the creation of custom-houses, warehouses and stores, at the principal ports of entry: a fund to be created, first, by retaining an additional amount of the duties, in cases of exportation for the benefit of drawback; and, secondly, by imposing a small duty to be called "warehouse money," upon every permit for unloading merchandize.

4. That provision be made to enforce more effectually the duty of reporting and entering vessels, and exhibiting manifests of their cargoes, upon their arrival in any port of the United States; and to abolish the privilege of making port entries.
 5. That provision be made to guard more effectually against imposition under pretence that vessels arrive in distress, that goods are damaged, and that invoices are lost.
 6. That provision be made to place all the avenues to the cargoes of vessels, before unloading, under the seal of the custom-house, and to keep the same more effectually under the charge of the inspectors, while unloading.
 7. That provision be made, that all invoices upon which entries may be effected, shall be endorsed by the American consul, by a notary public, or by some other trust-worthy agent, or officer, to be designated by law, at the place of exportation, certifying the merchandize to be priced "at the then current market price;" that entries shall only be permitted upon invoices so endorsed; and that the invoices shall be conspicuously stamped, with the seal of the custom-house, at the time of entry.
 8. That provision be made authorising the collectors, in all cases of suspicion, to add to the invoice price of the merchandize ten per cent. beyond the addition now prescribed; and if the importer refuse to pay duties on that amount, then either to take the merchandize on account of the United States, at the additional price, or to permit an entry upon the original invoice.
 9. That provision be made, that in all cases the custom-house officers shall send merchandize imported to the public stores for examination; and that they shall be there compared with the invoice, identified as to the kind and quality, ascertained as to the weight and measure, and estimated as to the value.
 10. That provision be made, requiring from the person who offers to enter merchandize a declaration, whether he acts as owner, consignee, or agent; and whether he has been instructed, after entry, to hold the merchandize to the order of the shipper; in which last-mentioned case, the collector may be authorised to suspend the entry until the shipper, or the person having an order from him, appear to make it.
 11. That provision be made, requiring the seal of the custom-house to be stamped upon all the original packages, &c. of merchandize entered for exportation, and with the benefit of drawback; which shall remain entire at the time of exportation, and which shall be certified by the consul, or other proper person, to remain entire at the foreign place of landing, in order to discharge the debenture bond.
 12. That provision be made more effectually to secure the revenue from fraud and imposition, in the transportation of merchandize from district to district, and generally in carrying on the coasting trade.
 13. That provision be made more effectually to secure the revenue from fraud and imposition, in making out invoices in the money of foreign countries; particularly of such countries as employ a paper currency.
- But while these suggestions are offered to guard the collection of the revenue, and to secure to the manufacturer the full benefit of the protecting duties, it must be recollected, that there are some provisions in the existing laws, which require to be modified, in behalf of the merchant.

For instance,

1. The time allowed by law to complete the export entries, for the benefit of drawback, is only ten days; and if not completed within that time the whole amount of the drawback is forfeited. The period should be extended, and the penalty for non-compliance should be reduced.
2. The right to export merchandize, with the benefit of drawback, ceases at the expiration of a year. The period might, without injury to the revenue, be enlarged.
3. The period allowed for making a return of damaged goods, with a view to a correspondent abatement of the duties, is limited to ten days; and the importer is sometimes charged with the whole duties on perishable articles, under the present restrictions, after the articles have perished, or are greatly decayed. A discretion should be confided to the proper officer, to make a proper abatement of the duties in both cases, upon satisfactory proof of their existence.

III. A general tariff proposed for the consideration of congress.

Upon the policy and principles, which have been stated, the following tariff in reference to duties, drawbacks and bounties has been formed.

TARIFF.

1st. A schedule of the articles to be imported into the United States, FREE OF DUTY.

All articles imported for the use of the United States.

Philosophical apparatus, instruments or books, specially imported for the use of any incorporated society, for philosophical or literary purposes, and for the use of any seminary of learning.

Specimens in natural history, mineralogy, botany and anatomical preparations, models of machinery and other inventions.

Wearing apparel, and other personal baggage in actual use; and the implements, or tools of trade, of persons arriving in the United States.

Regulus of antimony.

Bark of the cork tree unmanufactured.

Animals imported for breed.

Burr stones, unwrought.

Bullion.

Clay unwrought.

Copper imported in any shape for the use of the mint.

Copper and brass in pigs or bars. Tin in pigs or bars, old copper and brass, and old pewter.

Furs undressed of all kinds.

Raw hides and skins.

Lapis calamarinus.

Plaster of Paris.

Rags of any kind of cloth.

Wood; and wood manufactured, except mahogany and dye-wood.

Zinc, tutanag, or spelter.

Olive oil, in casks, to be used in manufactures.

2d. A schedule of articles to be charged with duties ad valorem.

At seven and a half per centum.

Dying drugs and materials for composing them, not subject to other rates of duty; gum arabic; gum senegal.

*Jewelry; gold and silver watches and clocks, or parts of either, and of the frames of clocks, of whatever materials made; gold and silver lace;

*The facility of smuggling the articles here described, can only be counteracted by diminishing the temptation, through the medium of a low duty.

embroidery and epaulettes; precious stones, and pearls of all kinds, set or not set; Bristol stones or paste work; and all articles composed chiefly of gold, silver, pearl and precious stones.

Faces of thread, silk or cotton.

At fifteen per centum.

All articles not free, and not subject to any other rate of duty.

At twenty per centum.

Linens of all descriptions, linen cambrics, lawns.

Hempen cloth, sail cloth, Russian and German linens.

Stockings and gloves of thread and silk.

Silks, satins, and all articles of which silk is the material of chief value.

At twenty-two per centum.

All articles manufactured from brass, copper, iron, steel, pewter, lead or tin, or of which these metals, or either of them, is the material of chief value.

Brass and iron wire.

Cutlery, pins, needles, buttons and buckles of all kinds.

Gilt, plated and japanned wares of all kinds.

Cannon, muskets, fire-arms and side-arms.

At twenty-eight per centum.

Woolen manufactures of all descriptions, and of which wool is the material of chief value.

At thirty per centum.

China ware, earthen ware, stone ware, porcelain and glass manufacture.

Bonnets and caps for women, fans, feathers, ornaments for head dresses, artificial flowers, millinery of all sorts.

Hats or caps of wool, fur, leather, chip, straw or silk.

Cosmetics, washes, balsams, perfumes.

Painted floor cloths, mats of grass or flags.

Sallad oils, pickles, capers, olives, mustard, comfits or sweetmeats preserved in sugar or brandy, wafers.

At thirty-three and one-third per centum.

Cotton manufactures of all descriptions, or of which cotton is the material of chief value; provided that all cotton cloths, or cloths of which cotton is the material of chief value, (excepting nankeens imported directly from China) the original cost of which, at the place whence imported, shall be less than twenty-five cents per square yard, shall be taken and deemed to have cost twenty-five cents per square yard, and shall be charged with duty accordingly.

At thirty-five per centum.

Cabinet wares, and all manufactures of wood.

Carriages of all descriptions, and parts thereof.

Leather and all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the material of chief value. Saddles, bridles, harness.

Paper of every description. Paper hangings, blank books, pasteboard, parchment, vellum, printed books.

Brushes, canes, walking sticks, whips.

Printing types.

Clothing ready made.

ALIEN DUTY.

There shall be charged an additional duty of twelve and a half per cent. upon all goods imported in vessels not of the United States, with the exception of goods imported in foreign vessels, which are specially entitled by treaty or acts of congress, to be entered upon payment of the domestic duty.

The additional alien duty of twelve and a half per cent shall not be the subject of drawback in cases of exportation.

TONNAGE DUTY AND LIGHT MONEY.

Ships or vessels of the United States, entered from any foreign port or place, or carrying goods from one district to another district, shall pay, per ton.

Ships or vessels built within the United States, but belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign powers, entering from a foreign port or place, shall pay, do.

Ships or vessels of other descriptions, entering from a foreign place or port, or carrying goods from one district to another within the United States, shall pay, do.

Ships or vessels not of the United States, or not wholly owned by American citizens, entering the ports of the United States, shall pay for "light money," do.

But the additional duty upon tonnage, and the light money imposed upon foreign vessels, are not to be exacted in the case of foreign vessels specially entitled by treaty or acts of congress to an entry upon domestic duties and charges only.

WAREHOUSE MONEY.

To constitute a fund for erecting and maintaining custom-houses, warehouses and stores,

1. There should be paid for every permit to unlade goods, 25 cents.
2. There shall be retained upon the amount of the duties of goods exported, for the benefit of drawbacks, (except spirits) five per cent.
3. There shall be retained in the case of spirits exported, for the benefit of drawback, two cents per gallon, and also three per cent. on the amount of the duties.

A separate account shall be kept at the custom-house of the money collected for this fund; and the amount shall be expended, from time to time, under such directions as the president of the U. States shall approve and authorise.

DRAWBACKS AND BOUNTIES.

There shall be allowed a drawback of the duties on goods imported into the United States, if the goods be exported within twelve months after the time of importation, subject to the following exceptions and provisions:

1. There shall not be an allowance of drawback in the case of goods imported in foreign vessels from any of the dominions or colonies of any foreign power to which the vessels of the United States are not permitted to trade.
2. There shall not be an allowance of drawback for the additional duty of twelve and a half per cent. imposed on goods imported in vessels not of the United States.
3. There shall not be an allowance of drawback in the case foreign dried and pickled fish, and other salted provisions, fish-oil, or playing cards.
4. There shall be retained upon the amount of the duties of goods exported for the benefit of drawback, (except spirits) five per cent.
5. There shall be retained in the case of spirits exported, for the benefit of drawback, two cents per gallon, and also three per cent. on the amount of the duties.
6. The present bounties, allowances, and drawbacks, shall be continued in the case of exporting pickled fish, of the fisheries of the United States; in the case of American vessels employed in the fisheries; and in the case of exporting sugar refined within the United States.

These provisions respecting drawbacks must, however, be conformed to the privileges specially allowed to foreigners by treaty, or acts of congress.

It only remains, in the performance of the task prescribed by the house of representatives, to give a succinct statement of the probable product of the duties upon imports, according to the proposed tariff.

The annual product of the single duties, has been estimated at 12,000,000: and of this sum, the specific duties produced about

It is not practicable to ascertain the amount of revenue, heretofore produced, by each of the classes of goods specified in the last table; but it is sufficiently known, that some of them produced little, while the product of others was proportionably great. Taking the whole, however, together, it is estimated that the proposed increase of duty is equal to 100 per cent. upon the aggregate amount of the former ad valorem duties. But the effects to be expected from the increased duties on woolen and cotton goods; from the diminution of the alien duties, under treaties or acts of congress, and from other considerations involved in the new system, will not permit a higher estimate of the aggregate product of the increased rates of the ad valorem duties, than the rate of 75 or 80 per cent. upon the former product.

Assuming, then, an advance of 80 per cent. upon 4,300,000 dollars (the aggregate product of the duties ad valorem as above stated) the sum will be

And adding to this sum, the amount produced as above stated, by the increase of the specific duties

1,200,000

There will be produced, to complete the amount of additional revenue required, a sum of

$5,040,000

All which is respectfully submitted.

Report on Manufactures.

Report of the committee of commerce and manufactures, to which was referred the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool.—February 13, 1816.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The committee of commerce and manufactures, to which was referred the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool, respectfully submit the following REPORT—The committee were conscious, that they had no ordinary duty to perform, when the house of representatives referred to their consideration, the memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of cotton wool. In obedience to the instructions of the house, they have given great attention to the subject, and beg leave to present the result of their deliberations.

They are not a little apprehensive, that they have not succeeded in doing justice to a subject so intimately connected with the advancement and prosperity of agriculture and commerce—a subject which enlightened statesmen and philosophers have deemed not unworthy of their attention and consideration.

It is not the intention of the committee to offer any theoretical opinions of their own, or of others. They are persuaded that a display of speculative opinions would not meet with approbation. From these views, the committee are disposed to state facts, and make such observations only as shall be intimately connected with, and warranted by, them.

Prior to the years 1806 and 1807 establishments for manufacturing cotton wool had not been attempted, but in a few instances, and on a limited scale. Their rise and progress are attributable to embarrassments to which commerce was subjected; which embarrassments originated in causes not within the control of human prudence, While commerce flourished, the trade which had been carried on with the continent of Europe, with the East-Indies; and with the colonies of Spain and France, enriched our enterprising merchants, the benefits of which were sensibly felt by the agriculturalists, whose wealth and industry were increased and extended. When external commerce was suspended the capitalists throughout the union became solicitous to give activity to their capital. A portion of it, it is believed, was directed to the improvement of agriculture, and not an inconsiderable portion of it, as it appears, was likewise employed in erecting establishments for manufacturing cotton wool. To make this statement as satisfactory as possible—to give it all the certainty that it is susceptible of attaining, the following facts are respectfully submitted to the consideration of the house. They show the rapid progress which has been made in a few years, and evidently the ability to carry them on with certainty of success, should a just and liberal policy regard them as objects deserving encouragement.

IN THE YEAR	Bales of cotton manufactured in manufacturing establishments.
1800	500
1803	1,000
1810	10,000
1815	90,000

This statement the committee have no reason to doubt; nor have they any to question the truth of the following succinct statement of the capital which is employed, of the labor which it commands, and of the products of that labor:

Capital,	$40,000,000
Males employed, from the age of seven- teen and upwards,	10,000
Women and female children,	66,000
Boys, under seventeen years of age	24,000
Wages of one hundred thousand persons, averaging $ 150 each,	$15,000,000
Cotton wool manufactured, ninety thou- sand bales amounting to	lb. 27,000,000
Number of yards of cotton, of various kinds,	yds. 81,000,000
Cost, per yard averaging 30 cents,	$24,300,000

The rise and progress of such establishments can excite no wonder. The inducements to industry in a free government are numerous and inviting. Effects are always in unison with their causes. The inducements consist in the certainty and security which every citizen enjoys of exercising exclusive dominion over the creations of his genius, and the products of his labor; in procuring from his native soil, at all times with facility, the raw materials that are required, and in the liberal encouragement that will be accorded by agriculturalists to those who, by their labor, keep up a constant and increasing demand for the produce of agriculture.

Every state will participate in those advantages. The resources of each will be explored, opened, and enlarged. Different sections of the union will, according to their position, the climate, the population, the habits of the people, and the nature of the soil, strike into that line of industry, which is best adapted to their interest and the good of the whole; an active and free intercourse, promoted and facilitated by roads and canals, will ensue; prejudices which are generated by distance, and the want of inducements to approach each other and reciprocate benefits, will be removed; information will be extended; the union will acquire strength and solidity, and the Constitution of the United States, and that of each state, will be regarded as fountains from which flow numerous streams of public and private prosperity.

Each government, moving in its appropriate orbit, performing with ability, its separate functions, will be endeared to the hearts of a good and grateful people.

The states that are most disposed to manufactures, as regular occupations, will draw from the agricultural states all the raw materials which they want, and not an inconsiderable portion also of the necessities of life; while the latter will, in addition to the benefits which they at present enjoy, always command, in peace or in war, at moderate prices, every species of manufacture, that their wants may require. Should they be inclined to manufacture for themselves, they can do so with success, because they have all the means in their power to erect and to extend at pleasure manufacturing establishments. Our wants being supplied by our own ingenuity and industry, exportation of specie to pay for foreign manufactures, will cease.

The value of American produce at this time exported, will not enable the importers to pay for the foreign manufactures imported. Whenever the two accounts shall be fairly stated, the balance against the United States will be found to be many millions of dollars. Such is the state of things, that the change must be to the advantage of the United States. The precious metals will be attracted to them, the diffusion of which, in a regular and uniform current through the great arteries and veins of the body politic, will give to each member health and vigor.

In proportion as the commerce of the United States depends on agriculture and manufactures, as a common basis, will it increase and become independent of those revolutions and fluctuations, which the ambition and jealousy of foreign governments are too apt to produce. Our navigation will be quickened; and supported as it will be by internal resources never before at the command of any nation, will advance to the extent of those resources.

New channels of trade, to enterprise, no less important than productive, are opening, which can be secured only by a wise and prudent policy appreciating their advantage.

If want of foresight should neglect the cultivation and improvement of them, the opportune moment may be lost, perhaps for centuries, and the energies of this nation be thereby prevented from developing themselves, and from making the boon which is proffered, our own.

By trading on our own capital, collisions with other nations, if they be not entirely done away, will be greatly diminished.

This natural order of things exhibits the commencement of a new epoch, which promises peace, security, and repose, by a firm and steady reliance on the produce of agriculture, on the treasures that are embosomed in the earth, on the genius and ingenuity of our manufactures and mechanics, and on the intelligence and enterprise of our merchants.

The government, possessing the intelligence and the art of improving the resources of the nation, will increase its efficient powers, and, enjoying the confidence of those whom it has made happy, will oppose to the assailant of the nation's rights, the true, the only invincible Ægis, the unity of will and strength. Causes producing war will be few. Should war take place, its calamitous consequences will be mitigated, and the expenses and burdens of such a state of things will fall with a weight less oppressive and injurious on the nation. The expenditures of the last war were greatly increased by a dependence on foreign supplies. The prices incident to such a dependence will always be high.

Had not our nascent manufacturing establishments increased the quantity of commodities, at that time in demand, the expenditures would have been much greater, and consequences the most fatal and disastrous, alarming even in contemplation, would have been the fate of this nation. The experience of the past teaches a lesson never to be forgotten, and points emphatically to the remedy. A wise government should heed its admonitions, or the independence of this nation will be exposed to "the shafts of fortune."

The committee, keeping in view the interest of the nation, cannot refrain from stating that cotton fabrics imported from India, interfere not less with that encouragement to which agriculture is justly entitled, than they do with that which ought reasonably to be accorded to the manufactures of cotton wool. The raw material of which they are made is the growth of India, and of a quality inferior to our own.

The fabrics themselves, in point of duration and use, are likewise inferior to the substantial fabrics of American manufacture. Although the India cotton fabrics can be sold for a lower price than the American, yet the difference in the texture is so much in favor of the American, that the latter may be safely considered as the cheapest.

The distance of most of the western states from the ocean, the exuberant richness of the soil, and the variety of its products, forcibly impress the mind of the committee with a belief, that all these causes conspire to encourage manufactures, and to give an impetus and direction to such a disposition. Although the western states may be said to be in the gristle, in contemplation of that destiny, to which they are hastening, yet the products of manufactures in those states are beyond every calculation that could reasonably be made; contrary to the opinion of many enlightened and virtuous men, who have supposed that the inducements to agriculture and the superior advantages of that life, would suppress any disposition to that sort of industry. But theories, how ingeniously soever they may be constructed, how much soever they may be made to conform to the laws of symmetry and beauty, are no sooner brought into conflict with facts, than they fall into ruins. In viewing their fragments, the mind is irresistibly led to render the homage due to the genius and taste of the architects; but cannot refrain from regretting the waste, to no purpose, of superior intellects. The western states prove the fallacy of such theories; they appear in their growth and expansion to be in advance of thought; while the political economist is drawing their portraits, their features change and enlarge, with such rapidity, that his pencil in vain endeavors to catch their expression, and to fix their physiognomy.

It is to their advantage to manufacture, because, by decreasing the bulk of the articles, they at the same time, increase their value by labor, bring them to market with less expense, and with the certainty of obtaining the best prices.

Those states understanding their interest, will not be diverted from its pursuit. In the encouragement of manufactures, they find a stimulus for agriculture.

The manufacturers of cotton in making application to the national government for encouragement, have been induced to do so, for many reasons.—They know that their establishments are new and in their infancy, and that they have to encounter a competition with foreign establishments, that have arrived at maturity, that are supported by a large capital, and that have from the government every protection that can be required.

The American manufacturers expect to meet with all the embarrassments which a jealous and monopolizing policy can suggest. The committee are sensible of the force of such considerations.—They are convinced that old practices and maxims will not be abandoned to favor the United States. The foreign manufacturers and merchants will put in requisition all the powers of ingenuity; will practise whatever art can devise, and capital can accomplish, to prevent the American manufacturing establishments from striking root and flourishing in their rich and native soil. By the allowance of bounties and drawbacks, the foreign manufacturers and merchants will be furnished with additional means of carrying on the conflict, and of ensuring success.

The American manufacturers have good reason for their apprehensions; they have much at stake. They have a large capital employed, and are feelingly alive for its fate. Should the national government not afford them protection, the dangers which invest and threaten them, will destroy all their hopes, and will close their prospects of utility to their country. A reasonable encouragement will sustain and keep them erect; but if they fall, they fall never to rise again.

The foreign manufacturers and merchants know this; and will redouble with renovated zeal the stroke to prostrate them. They also know, that should the American manufacturing establishments fall, their mouldering piles—the visible ruins of a legislative breath, will warn all who shall tread in the same footsteps, of the doom, the inevitable destiny of their establishments.

The national government, in viewing the disastrous effects of a short sighted policy, may relent but what can relenting avail? Can it raise the dead to life? Can it give for injuries inflicted, the reparation that is due? Industry, in every ramification of society, will feel the shock, and generations will, as they succeed each other, feel the effects of its undulations. Dissatisfaction will be visible everywhere, and the lost confidence and affection of the citizens, will not be the least of the evils the government will have to deplore. But should the national government, pursuing an enlightened and liberal policy, sustain and foster the manufacturing establishments, a few years would place them in a condition to bid defiance to foreign competition, and would enable them to increase the industry, wealth, and prosperity of the nation; and to afford to the government, in times of difficulty and distress, whatever it may require to support public credit, while maintaining the rights of the nation.

Providence, in bountifully placing within our reach, whatever can minister to happiness and comfort, indicates plainly to us our duty—and what we owe to ourselves. Our resources are abundant and inexhaustible.

The stand that Archimedes wanted, is given to the national and state governments—and labor-saving machinery tenders the lever—the power of bringing those resources into use.

This power imparts incalculable advantages to a nation whose population is not full. The United States require the use of this power, because they do not abound in population. The diminution of manual labor, by means of machinery, in the cotton manufacture of Great Britain, was, in the year 1810, as two hundred to one.

Our manufactures have already availed themselves of this power, and have profited by it. A little more experience in making machines, and in managing them with skill, will enable our manufacturers to supply more fabrics than are necessary for the home demand.

Competition will make the prices of the articles low, and the extension of the cotton manufactories will produce that competition.

One striking and important advantage, which labor-saving machines bestow, is this, that in all their operations they require few men, as a reference to another part of this report will show. No apprehensions can then be seriously entertained, that agriculture will be in danger of having its efficient laborers withdrawn from its service.

On the contrary, the manufacturing establishments increasing the demand for raw materials will give to agriculture new life and expansion.

The committee after having, with great deference and respect, presented to the house this important subject, in various points of view, feel themselves constrained, before concluding this report, to offer a few more observations, which they consider as being immediately connected with it, and not less so, with the present and future prosperity of this nation.

The prospects of an enlarged commerce, are not flattering.

Every nation in times of peace will supply its own wants from its own resources, or from those of other nations.

When supplies are drawn from foreign countries, the intercourse which will ensue, will furnish employment to the navigation only of the countries connected, by their reciprocal wants.

Our concern does not arise from, nor can it be increased by, the limitation which our navigation and trade will have prescribed to them, by the peace and apparent repose of Europe.

Our apprehensions arise from causes that cannot animate by their effects. Look wheresoever the eye can glance, and what are the objects that strike the vision. On the continent of Europe, industry, deprived of its motive and incitement, is paralyzed; the accumulated wealth of ages, seized by the hand of military despotism, is appropriated to and squandered on objects of ambition; the order of things unsettled, and confidence between man and man annihilated. Every moment is looked for, with tremulous, anxious, and increased solicitude; hope languishes; and commercial enterprise stiffens with fear. The political horizon appears to be calm, but many of no ordinary sagacity think they behold signs portentous of a change, the indications of a violent tempest which will again rage, and desolate that devoted region.

Should this prediction fail, no change for the better, under existing circumstances, can take place. Where despotism—military despotism reigns—silence and fearful stillness must prevail.

Such is the prospect which continental Europe exhibits, to the enterprise of American merchants.

Can it be possible for them to find in that region, sources which will supply them with more than seventeen millions of dollars, the balance due for British manufactures imported; this balance being over and above the value of all the exports to foreign countries from the United States. The view which is given of the dreary prospect of commercial advantages accruing to the United States by an intercourse with continental Europe, is believed to be just. The statement made of the great balance in favor of Great Britain due from the United States, is founded on matter of fact.

In the hands of Great Britain, are gathered together and held many powers, which they have not accustomed hitherto to feel and to exercise.

No improper motives are intended to be imputed to that government. But does not experience teach a lesson that should never be forgotten, that governments, like individuals, are apt "to feel power and forget right" It is not inconsistent with national decorum, to become circumspect and prudent.—May not the government of Great Britain be inclined, in analysing the basis of her political power, to consider and regard the United States as her rival, and to indulge an improper jealousy, the enemy of peace and repose?

Can it be politic, in any point of view, to make the United States dependent on any nation for supplies, absolutely necessary for defence, for comfort, and for accommodation?

Will not the strength, the political energies of this nation be materially impaired at any time, but fatally so in those of difficulty and distress, by such dependence?

Do not the suggestions of wisdom plainly show, that the security, the peace and the happiness of this nation depend on opening and enlarging all our resources, and drawing from them whatever shall be required for public use or private accommodation?

The committee, from the views which they have taken, consider the situation of the manufacturing establishments to be perilous. Some have decreased and others have suspended business. A liberal encouragement will put them again into operation with increased powers; but should it be withheld, they will be prostrated. Thousands will be reduced to want and wretchedness. A capital of near sixty millions of dollars will become inactive, the greater part of which will be a dead loss to the manufacturers. Our improvidence may lead to fatal consequences: the powers, jealous of our growth and prosperity, will acquire the resources and strength which this government neglects to improve. It requires no prophet to foretell the use that foreign powers will make of them. The committee, from all the considerations which they have given to this subject, are deeply impressed with a conviction that the manufacturing establishments of cotton wool are of real utility to the agricultural interest, and that they contribute much to the prosperity of the union. Under the influence of this conviction, the committee beg leave to tender, respectfully, with this report, the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after the 30th day of June next, in lieu of the duties now authorised by law, there be laid, levied, and collected on cotton goods, imported into the United States, and territories thereof, from any foreign country whatever, per centum ad valorem, being not less than six cents per square yard.

American Manufactures.

MR. JEFFERSON'S LETTER, on the interesting subject of domestic manufactures, an extract of which is introduced below by the Boston Chronicle, will be read with the attention due to such a writer on such a theme.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.—As the subject relating to American manufactures is so earnestly urged by various petitions to congress, we are induced to publish the sentiments of Mr. Jefferson, in answer to a letter written to him, to explain his remark, in his Notes on Virginia, "that the work shops of Europe are the most proper to furnish the supplies of manufactures to the United States." The whole letter from this renowned patriot, is a volume of instruction. At present we shall confine ourselves to notice his reply on the question of manufactures.

"Who could have imagined (says he) that the two most distinguished in the rank of nations, for science and civilization, would have suddenly descended from their honorable eminence, and setting at defiance all those moral laws established by the Author of Nature between nation and nation, as between man and man, would cover earth and sea with robberies and piracies, merely because they were strong enough to do it with temporal impunity, and that under this disbandment of nations from social order, we should have been despoiled of a thousand ships, and have thousands of our citizens reduced to Algerine slavery?—Yet this has taken place. The British interdicted to our vessels all harbors of the globe, without they had first proceeded to some one of hers, there paid tribute proportioned to their cargo, and obtained a license to proceed to the port of destination. The French, on the other side, declared the American ships to be lawful prizes, if they had touched at the port, or even been visited by a ship of the enemy nation. Thus were the United States completely excluded from the ocean. Compare (says Mr. Jefferson) this state of things with that of '85, and say whether an opinion, founded in the circumstances of that day (in which the Notes on Virginia were written) can be fairly applied to those of the present. We have experienced what we did not then believe, that there did exist both profligacy and power enough to exclude the United States from the field of intercourse with other nations. We, therefore, have a right to conclude, that to be independent for the comforts of life we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturalist. The question of '85 is suppressed, or rather assumes a new form. The question is, shall we manufacture our own comforts, or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures, must be for reducing us to a dependence upon foreign nations.—I AM NOT ONE OF THESE."

Extra postage repealed.

An act to repeal so much of an act, passed on the 23d day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, as imposes additional duties on postage.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That from and after the thirty-first day of March next, so much of the act, entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit by duties on sales at auction, and on licences to retail wines, spirituous liquors and foreign merchandize, and for increasing the rates of postage," passed the twenty-third day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, as imposes additional duties on postage, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Speaker of the house of representatives,
JOHN GAILLARD,

President of the senate pro tempore.

CHRONICLE.

American prisoners at Carthage.—A memorial requesting the interposition of the government of the United States, for the relief of our citizens detained at Carthage, has been extensively signed in Baltimore, and we believe, sent on to Washington City. It is brief and eloquent, indeed; appealing, in a manner that must be respected, to the state in which we ourselves were placed during our revolution. What was right then is right now; and we trust that an immediate and vigorous exertion may be made to relieve an unfortunate people from the miserable deaths designed for them by the abominable wretches who at present have them in their power. Great Britain did no more than make prisoners of war of the French and others who administered to our aid and comfort, during our struggle for independence, that she got possession of. But in the present case, the Spaniards have not a right to proceed so far—for, as the Baltimore Patriot justly observes—"The seizure of our vessels by the Spanish general was entirely illegal, because we understand the blockade of Carthage had neither been notified to our government, nor ever carried into effect; it was merely a nominal one, if it it ever had been declared. The Spanish ships of war, as we learn, were not attempting to enforce the blockade, and our vessels were permitted to enter unmolested, until they had come to anchor; some of them were even decoyed in. But if the blockade and the seizure of our vessels had both been legal, the imprisonment and ill-treatment of their captains, supercargoes and crews, are a horrible outrage, not only upon humanity, but against our national honor, and against the laws and usages of civilized war."

Good. The legislature of Virginia have rejected the Hartford Convention amendments to the constitution of the United States, ratified by the states of Massachusetts and Connecticut (only) as "inexpedient?"—and adopted that proposed by North Carolina, for districting each state for the election of members of congress and electors of president.—Massachusetts has, however, rejected this proposition—on what grounds we know not; indeed, we are at a loss to conceive any reasonable plea upon which it can be objected to, by the real friends of fair representation.

BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS. From the Richmond Enquirer, of Feb. 15. Yesterday, the legislature of Virginia were engaged, during the greater part of their session, in appointing the directors who are to constitute the board of public works, under the late act constituting a fund for internal improvement.—The following persons were appointed for that useful office. Among them we recognize the "Sage of Monticello," the man who penned the declaration of American independence; the citizen whom a grateful people delight to honor.

Alexander Smyth, Lewis Summers, John Stokely, to the westward of the Alleghany mountains.

Andrew Alexander, James M. Marshall, between the Allegany mountains and the Blue Ridge.

Thomas Jefferson, Charles F. Mercer, William I. Lewis, between the Blue Ridge and the head of tide water.

John Mercer, Littleton W. Tazwell, between the head of tide water and the sea coast.

Baltimore exchange.—The trustees of this magnificent fabric, (that is to be) have issued proposals to various mechanics and others, for supplies of materials and labor. An idea may be formed of the magnitude of the design, by noticing that they wish to contract absolutely for 1,500,000 brick, with liberty to extend the agreement to two millions.

Honor to the brave. The legislature of Virginia have voted the thanks of the commonwealth, with suitable swords, to maj. gen. W. Scott, maj. gen. Gaines, lieut. col. G. M. Brooks, and to the nearest male relative of the late capt. John Ritchie and major Holmes, of the army; and captain Henly, of the navy, all native citizens of that state. The particular occasions in which those persons distinguished themselves are mentioned in the resolve; but they are too notorious to the readers of the Register to require it here.

Gen. Harrison has recently been publicly entertained at Frankfort, Ky. by a number of citizens and members of the legislature, "to evince their respect for his faithful services during the late war."

Light restored. A poor woman who had been blind thirty-six years, was lately restored to sight by Dr. Worth, of New-London.

Diffidence.—The legislature of New-Jersey, at the request of the inhabitants, have lately changed the name of a township and called it Lawrence, in honor of the late captain L. of the navy. During the war, and at the very moment when we were threatened with Wellington and his "invincibles," the legislature of Massachusetts called a township in that state by the name of WELLINGTON. What would these folks have said if the legislature of a state, at the time of our quasi war with France, in 1799, had called a town by the great name of Talleyrand?

GEORGIA SUGAR.—It appears that great efforts are making to cultivate the cane in Georgia. It has been raised successfully 120 or 130 miles from the sea-coast. It is said the pine land answers equal to any other, which is very cheap. That sugar will speedily become, perhaps, the chief staple of Georgia, seems now resolved to a moral certainty; and a sudden effect in commerce may be expected, which will, also, not a little, effect other nations, the British especially—who have acted as if they thought they had a monopoly of that valuable article.

An occurrence at New-Orleans is mentioned in a letter from a gentleman there to his friend in New York, which may teach a lesson to some officers, &c. who come from Upper Canada to embark for Europe, and when there, forget that they are out of his Britannic majesty's dominions.

On the 3d of January, the citizens of New Orleans began to celebrate in a very festive manner the first anniversary of Jackson's operations, below that city; which celebration was to be continued until the 8th inclusive. Among the British merchants or agents who were purchasing cotton in the city, was a man named Pritchard, who, at the coffee house, was so indiscreet as to use scurrilous and reproachful language in speaking of the Americans; applying contemptuous epithets to the yankee army and navy. Indeed, the British consider the term yankee as a reproach, and so use it. An aged man present took down Pritchard's words, and had them placarded in the room. Presently after, a major Hunter came in, and was informed of Pritchard's conduct.—The major wrote him a note, requiring him to come to the coffee-house the next day and make a public apology. The limited hour expired without the appearance of P. on the Rialto—when Hunter repaired to the lodgings of the British agent, and administered to that offender a quantum sufficit of stripes with a cowskin-whip. Pritchard thus disgraced, was stimulated by his fellows, to challenge major H. to a duel; and finding no other mode of allaying popular contempt, or replacing himself in some sort of estimation, he adopted their advice.—The major accepted the invitation, and chose the distance, (five paces.) On the first fire, Pritchard was shot through the body. The letter, written about an hour after, says that the ball was extracted from the opposite side, and the man was not expected to survive.—Col.

Gratitude! The British government (says the Hartford Mercury) are now paying the New-England states for their infamous "Hartford Convention," by laying a duty of five dollars on each ton of plaster of Paris brought to any of them east of New-Haven.

SINGULAR OCCURRENCE! Philadelphia, Feb. 10.—A stage between this and Trenton took fire and was entirely consumed. It was occasioned by a passenger putting a hot brick on the floor of the stage to keep his feet warm; and what is most extraordinary, it burnt with such rapidity, that the passengers, 6 in number, with difficulty made their escape. Gazette.

CONGRESS

✧ The very interesting and important nature of the articles we have the pleasure to lay before our readers in the preceding pages, will afford an apology for the omission of many others, and among them, the usual journal of the proceedings of congress. As it is a great object to continue this journal sufficiently in detail for reference, &c. we shall postpone it until next week, rather than omit it—the following brief outline serving ordinary purposes until then:

As to the treaty. The senate having resolved to insist on their disagreement with the house of representatives, committees of conference were raised, who agreed upon certain modifications, which will probably be ratified by both houses.

Canadian volunteers. The bill to compensate certain Canadian volunteers, by a bounty in land, according to their rank, was passed—yeas 89, nays 54. Yeas and nays hereafter.

Disbanded officers. The house concurred, yeas 77 nays 59, with the senate, to strike out the 3d section of the bill making further provision for military services, which went to give a bounty in land to the officers late of the army of the United States, yeas and nays hereafter.

National University. The committee on that part of the president's message which relates to this subject, have reported a bill for the purpose.

The late Gen. Washington. In consequence, (we presume) of certain proceedings of the legislature of Virginia which have for their object the deposition of the remains of the illustrious Washington, at Richmond, for the purpose of erecting a monument over them, a motion has prevailed, in both houses, to raise committees to examine the proceedings of a former congress touching this matter, and report thereon.

Battle Monument.

Proceedings relative to the erection of a monument to the memory of those who fell at the battle of North Point; including the prayer of bishop Kemp, and the address of the Rev. Dr. Inglis.

The committee of vigilance and safety, to the inhabitants of the city and precincts of Baltimore.

The return of peace having terminated the active duties of the committee of vigilance and safety, its members are now desirous of preparing a suitable tribute of respect to the memory of our brave, but unfortunate fellow-citizens, who fell in defence of this city on the memorable twelfth and thirteenth of September, 1814, and have accordingly unanimously resolved as follows:—

1st. That a MONUMENT be erected, in a place to be hereafter designated by the committee, within the city or precincts of Baltimore.

2d. That the thanks of the committee be, and they are hereby presented to MAXIMILIAN GODEFROY, Esq. for his patriotic and voluntary offer, gratuitously, to prepare designs for the inspection of the committee, and to superintend the execution of the one of their choice.

3d. That the three designs presented by Mr. Godefroy are entitled to, and receive the approbation of the committee; and that the one denominated Fascial be, and is hereby adopted.

4th. That the unexpended funds of the committee of vigilance and safety be, and the same are hereby appropriated to the foregoing object.

5th. That in aid of this fund, a subscription paper be deposited at the mayor's office, on Monday the 3d of April next; that it remain there until the 4th of July following, and that no person be allowed to subscribe more than five dollars.

6th. That the names of subscribers, but not the sum subscribed, be published on the Saturday of each week until the subscription be closed.

7th. That the corner stone be laid on the 12th of September next; that there be then a grand procession; that the relatives of the deceased be invited to attend, and that a suitable address be delivered on the occasion.

8th. That the original subscription paper, carefully enveloped, for its preservation, be deposited within the corner stone, and that a copy thereof be filed with the register of the city.

9th. That MESSRS. JAMES A. BUCHANAN, RICHARD FRISBY, HENRY PAYSON, SAMUEL HOLLINGSWORTH, and JOSEPH JAMISON be, and they hereby are charged with the execution of the foregoing resolutions.

EDWARD JOHNSON, Chairman of the committee of vigilance and safety.

1st March, 1815.

GRAND PROCESSION.

The committee of vigilance and safety of the city of Baltimore, deeply impressed with the grateful recollection of the distinguished gallantry of their late fellow citizens, who fell nobly fighting in defence of their country, on the ever memorable 12th and 13th of September, 1814, unanimously resolved upon the erection of a monument to perpetuate their memories, and appointed James A. Buchanan, Samuel Hollingsworth, Richard Frisby, Joseph Jamison, and Henry Payson, five of their members, to carry into effect the said resolution. Major General Harper warmly participating in these feelings, offered his assistance on this solemn and interesting occasion, and after duly deliberating upon the subject, they have jointly agreed upon the following arrangement for the procession, which they now publish for the general information of the citizens. The gentlemen who have been selected as Marshals of the day, will give due notice of the respective times and places at which the several sections will assemble, for the purpose of joining in the general procession. As the occasion is eminently calculated to call forth all the tenderest sensibilities of the human heart, the committee of arrangement confidently indulge the expectation, that the citizens of Baltimore of every description will manifest their sympathy and regard, by joining in this tribute of gratitude to the brave defenders of our city.

The citizens not attached to any military corps will assemble in Great York street, where the procession will be formed.

Messrs. George Stiles, Isaac Phillips, William McDonald, Henry Thompson, George Winchester, Wm. Stuart, Charles Sterrett Ridgely, James Mosher, Allen Thomas, and William Jackson, to act on horseback as Marshals of the day, and the duties to be performed by each to be arranged by themselves at a meeting to be held for that purpose.

Armistead and the mayor of the city.

Prayer by the right rev. bishop Kemp. An address suited to the occasion by the rev. Dr. Inglis.

Major-general Harper will announce the movement of the procession by a federal salute from a detachment of artillery.

DIVISION ORDERS.

Third division of Maryland militia.

To pay public honors to the memory of those who have fallen in defence of their country, has been the usage of every age; and is recommended no less by sound policy, than by gratitude, love of country, and all the most exalted feelings of our nature. The honors bestowed on the dead, are the noblest incentives to virtuous deeds by the living. They cherish all the high qualities which constitute heroes and patriots. They tend to keep alive generous sentiments and affections; to foster national spirit and national pride, and to enlist in the public cause the love of fame and the desire of glory, the most powerful, and when thus directed, the most generous and ennobling passions of the human heart.

No occasion has presented itself among us, so fit for the adoption of this laudable custom, as the death of the brave men who fell at North Point, and in Fort M'Henry, on the 12th and 13th of September, 1814; days, the recollection of which ought, to fill the heart of every citizen of Baltimore with gratitude and pride, and cannot be too often or too solemnly recalled.

It was then that the peaceful inhabitants of a commercial city, not one in an hundred of whom had ever seen an enemy, or heard the sound of hostile cannon, marched forth to oppose an invading army of veterans, more than double their numbers, crowned with laurels in European warfare, flushed with recent success, and led on by a skilful, adventurous, and renowned commander. Forgetting all party dissensions and private animosities; discarding all feelings but those of patriots, husbands, fathers, sons and brothers, they braved and supported the unequal conflict; thinned the ranks and checked the progress of the foe, slew his distinguished and gallant chief, and by giving him a bitter foretaste of the resistance to be encountered in the further prosecution of his enterprize, disposed and prepared him for its abandonment: while their fellow citizens forming part of the brave garrison of Fort M'Henry, partook in the dangers and glory of its defence; and withstood for eighteen hours, without shelter and with a magazine not bomb proof, a constant and vigorous bombardment, by a powerful fleet, which laid secure beyond the reach of our guns.

In these glorious achievements, which with the blessing of Divine Providence frustrated the plans of the invader, compelled his retreat, and saved us from the horrors of capture and military contribution, perhaps of conflagration and pillage, a part of this band of brothers bravely fell, offering up their lives for their country.

Filled with admiration and gratitude for their noble sacrifice, and deeply impressed with the importance of recalling and perpetuating the remembrance of so illustrious an example, the committee of vigilance of the city of Baltimore, which acted so important and honorable a part in the transactions of that time, has resolved to erect a MONUMENT to their memory, and to commence the work on the first anniversary of their fall. Their fellow-citizens, whose munificence and gratitude furnish the means of accomplishing this laudable undertaking, intend to solemnize its commencement by a general procession. In this testimonial of respect, it is on every account proper that their brothers in arms should join; as well those who more immediately partook with them in the dangers and glory of the day, as those who stood ready to partake, and by their countenance and support contributed so largely to the happy result.

The major general commanding the third division of Maryland militia, has therefore, Resolved, after conferring with the committee of vigilance, to call out the third brigade, to which the deceased belonged, and the cavalry of the eleventh, which composed a part of the reserve, in the lines before the town. As it might be inconvenient to a great part of the infantry of the eleventh to attend, on account of their remote situation, they will not be called out; but the officers are invited to attend, with as many of the non-commissioned officers and privates as can make it convenient, either by entire companies, or as individual volunteers, who may be formed into companies, battalions and regiments after their arrival, under such officers as the brigadier general may designate.

The major general is confident that no motives for attention to this order and invitation need be urged, in addition to those already noticed.

It is therefore ordered, that the third brigade of Maryland militia, commanded by brigadier general Sterrett, and the cavalry of the eleventh, commanded by brigadier general Stansbury, with such part of the infantry of the latter as may attend, do assemble and parade on Chincopin hill, near Baltimore, on the 12th day of September next, at nine o'clock, A. M. in order to join the procession in honor of their fellow citizens and brothers in arms, who fell at North Point and Fort M'Henry. Brigadier general Stansbury will form the infantry of his brigade who attend, into companies, battalions and regiments, and will designate the officers to command them.

The two brigades will be drawn up in line, within the entrenchments, and fronting towards them: the third, as having been actually engaged at North Point, will take the right. The artillery, with side-arms only, will be on the right of the third, and its cavalry on its left. The left of the third will rest on the Philadelphia road. The right of the eleventh at a proper distance, on the left of the road, and its cavalry on its left; so as to form the rear-guard of the whole procession.

Brigadier generals Sterrett and Stansbury will appoint suitable persons, to mark out the ground for their respective brigades. They will furnish each one troop of cavalry, as an escort to the procession, to act under the direction of the marshals of the day; and brigadier general Sterrett will furnish a guard for the major general, and a detachment of artillery to fire salutes and minute guns. This detachment will be posted on the open ground, near Madison street, and west of the canal.

The third brigade, at the signal given, will counter-march from the right by its rear, to the Philadelphia road, and pursue the march down it. The eleventh will march by its right, as soon as the left of the third has countermarched, and will follow down the road. The colors will all be in mourning, the drums muffled, the arms reversed, and the music a dead march."

The signal for the march to commence will be two guns, in quick succession, from the detachment of artillery. The troops will proceed in the order prescribed, down York street into Baltimore street, and join the general procession of the citizens.

The signal for this general procession to move will be a federal salute from the detachment of artillery, which will continue to fire minute guns during the whole march of the procession.

When the troops enter Clivert-street they will incline to the right, and continue their march through Washington square, till the rear clears Baltimore street. They will then halt and form the line, to witness the ceremony.

At the commencement of the ceremony of laying the corner stone, on a signal to be given by flag, the minute guns will cease; and at its conclusion, on another signal, the detachment of artillery will fire a federal salute. The troops, in the order in which they advance, will then salute the governor of the state, commander in chief, at his quarters, and dismiss.

Brigadier general Sterrett will take order respecting the flag and signals.

The officers of the second and ninth brigades, commanded by brigadier generals Ringgold and Swearingen, and composing the residue of the third division, are invited to attend and join the procession. The officers of the division of staff will be attached to the person of the major general. By order of major general Harper.

HENRY H. PATTILLO, A. D. C.

Agreeably to the foregoing arrangement, a procession was formed in Great York street, which proceeded by the intended route to Washington square. The funeral car, surmounted by a plan of the intended monument, as designed by Mr. Godefroy, and executed by Mr. John Finley, assisted by Mr. Rembrandt Peale, was drawn by six white horses, caparisoned and led by six men in military uniform, and guarded by the Independent Blues, commanded by capt. Levering. On the arrival at the square, the band, under the direction of professors Niesinger and Banyie, performed the music selected for the occasion. The right reverend bishop Kemp then addressed the Throne of Grace in prayer; when the corner stone of the monument was laid by the architect and his assistants, under the direction of gen. Smith, gen. Stricker, col. Armistead, and the mayor. The book containing the names of the subscribers to the building of the monument; the newspapers of the preceding day; gold, silver, and copper coin of the United States, was deposited therein, together with a plate of copper, on which was engraved

"September XII,
A. D. MDCCCXV,

In the XL year of Independence,
James M. Dixon being president of the U. S.

To the memory of the brave defenders of this city, who gloriously fell in the battle at North Point on the XII September, 1814, and at the Bombardment of Fort M'Henry on the XIII of the same month;

Edward Johnson, mayor of the city.

Maj gen. Samuel Smith, brig. gen. John Stricker, and lieut. col. G. Armistead of the U. S. artillery, laid the corner stone of this monument of public gratitude and the deliverance of this city:

Raised by the munificence of the citizens of Baltimore, and under the superintendence of the committee of vigilance and safety.

J. M. Kimilian M. Godefroy, architect;

J. G. Neale, S. Baughman, and E. Horre, stone cutters;
W. Athey, stone mason."

The rev'd doct. Inglis then delivered the address; after which the mayor announced to gen. Harper that the ceremony of laying the corner stone was completed; when a federal salute was fired by the detachment of artillery, and the assembly was dismissed. Minute guns were fired, and the bells of Christ church rung muffled during the moving of the procession, and all business was suspended for the day.

PRAYER BY BISHOP KEMP.

O God! the creator and governor of the world, in whose hands are the lives of men and the fate of nations, we approach thy throne with veneration and awe. We acknowledge our numerous offences and errors—we have sinned—we have done wickedly—we have rebelled against thee our God; while thy bounties have been bestowed upon us with a liberal hand, we have forgotten our kind benefactor!

We adore thee, O merciful Father, that our chastisements have not been measured by our offences, but that in the midst of wrath thou hast remembered mercy. On this occasion we present ourselves before thee with the mingled emotions of grief and of gratitude—of grief for the loss of our beloved citizens—and of gratitude, for the great deliverance, which the bravery of our troops and the merciful goodness of our God effected for us on this memorable day. And while we erect this monument to perpetuate their patriotic and intrepid deeds; we also offer it as a testimony of thankfulness to that Being, who did not forsake our city in the day of danger—who inspired the hearts of our men with courage in so tremendous a conflict, who supported them in the face of an enemy, who had won many a severe fought field in European wars.—O God! On our gallant and beloved defenders pour down the best of heaven's blessings!

While this day reminds us, in the most forcible terms, "that man who is born of a woman, hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery—that he cometh up and is cut down like a flower—that in the midst of life we are in death;" let it also teach us that of none can we successfully seek for succor but of thee O Lord!—Thou canst frustrate all the plans of men—thou canst defeat the most extensive warlike preparations—and divest the most terrific hostile engines, of any effect but empty sound! "O Lord our protector, how excellent is thy name in all the world!"

When our minds run back to the scenes, which we erect this monument to commemorate—when we think of the heart rending grief, and the dreadful anticipations, with which we viewed our troops marching out to face the foe—when we behold the sky filled with flashes of fire, which appear still bright in our view—when we listen to the tremendous roar of cannon which seems still to vibrate on our ears—when we think of the grief of the mothers, wives, and children of those who stood exposed in this awful day—how shall we sufficiently magnify the goodness of our heavenly father, when we find ourselves, at this time, in possession of liberty, prosperity, and peace. Let our souls and all that is within us praise the Lord!

When we look upon this monument may our hearts O God, be enlarged with sentiments of benevolence towards the widows and orphans of those whose names are inscribed upon it; and may another monument of affection and charity towards these interesting sufferers be soon erected, which the influence of the elements shall not deface nor the hand of time destroy. May a perennial stream of charity issue from it like water out of the rock of Horeb, to maintain the mothers, the widows and the orphans of those who fell in defence of our city.

O God, continue thy protection to us! and guard us against the attacks of impiety and vice, foes that neither the bravery of our citizens nor the strength of our ramparts can possibly ward off—foes that would soon weaken all the energies of our country, and prostrate our fair fabric of liberty in ruins. In the day of prosperity, may we never forget our God, nor suffer the insidious and enervating influence of luxury to paralyze our free and wise institutions and render us an effeminate and weak people. But give us grace, so to maintain thy holy religion, that by its divine means and its sacred ordinances, we may be preserved a pious, a virtuous, and a happy people. Inspire our rulers with the fear of God, which is the foundation of all true wisdom, and the shield of every free government. Let the holy maxims of christianity be regarded as the ground of our policy and they will prove the ark of our safety—"that righteousness exalteth a nation, but that sin is a reproach to any people"—that "when the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice, but when the wicked beareth rule the people mourn"—that government is the institution of God for the punishment of evil doers, but for the praise of them that do well—and that to respect the authority of government and obey its laws and injunctions, are duties which we owe to God.

Fill our hearts, O heavenly Father, with the love of thee, and of our fellow creatures; and may a spirit of mildness, moderation and christian charity pervade every description of citizens! Then will this monument continue not only as a testimony of our respect for the memory of our departed citizens, but as a proof, that while we maintain the principles of christianity and cherish its noble virtues, our happiness and freedom will remain a monument more durable than marble: upon which both internal and external enemies will waste their force in vain, and exhaust their efforts in empty sound.

Continue to us, O bountiful God, the blessings of peace, and give us grace to apply these blessings in such a manner as to extend the influence of thy holy religion—to enlarge the boundaries of human happiness—to spread the knowledge and the practice of religion from the rivers to the end of the earth—so that the happy time may soon come, when wars shall cease—when man shall no more prey upon man—when all unruly passions and bad dispositions shall yield to the amiable virtues and unoffending dispositions of true christians—when "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf, and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."

Hear these our prayers, O merciful God: through the merits of Jesus Christ our saviour. Amen.

ADDRESS BY DR. INGLIS.

Men, brethren, and fellow citizens,

This day is consecrated to no common duties. Shall we joy, or shall we grieve? Shall we lament, or shall we give thanks?

Twelve months are just completing their revolution, since this fair city, and a large extent of our country, whose safety was not incorrectly adjudged to be embraced by hers, were exposed to the formidable assaults of a British fleet and army. Every shell from the bombarding squadron seemed to the ear of the timid and the wavering, and I thank God there were not many such, a minute gun that told of the funeral of enterprising and devoted Baltimore. Concern sat upon every countenance. Cowardice was not; or if existing, was ashamed to let itself be seen. The foe was discomfited, and retreated from the conflict: a haughty foe: a foe who had not scrupled to announce intentions not more destructive to us than disreputable to himself: a foe who arrogantly contemning our resources, forgot alike, that an Almighty Being rules the destinies of embattled nations, and that freemen, fighting for their families, and their homes, strike with an arm of sacred confidence, which no boasts of the invader shall wither.

The joy of deliverance, however, is bitterly mingled with the tinctures of grief. Could I be so base as to lose the remembrance of the blood by which my safety was so dearly purchased, this monumental spot, those sorrowing relatives, and all these interesting memorials of public sympathy and respect by which I am surrounded, would instantly rebuke the treason. But gratitude to God must take precedence of the tenderest tributes of social affection. Charge me not, then, with offering an unseasonable request when I ask you to temper the melancholy offices of this day with the expression of your gratitude to God for the salvation which he has been mercifully pleased, through the instrumentality of our brave fellow citizens, to effect in the midst of us. It is what the shades of those who have left you, if permitted to take part in aught that passes beneath the sun, would, I persuade myself, require at your hand: for there is scarce a social or relative virtue, be it generosity, or modesty, or piety, which does not hold a close alliance with true valour. "Not unto us," I seem to myself to hear the heroes exclaiming "Not unto us, O Lord;" and not even to the intrepid ranks in which we fought and bled and fell; "but unto thy name be the praise."

Men, brethren, and fellow citizens: come with me to their graves; and there, let me speak with you.

Tell to the world that the Lord hath kept the city, and that therefore your defenders were not vigilant in vain. Tell to the world that your dwellings are your own: that your persons are free: that independence still hallows the soil on which you tread, the blood bought heritage of your fathers: and that Almighty Providence, by your deceased heroes and their survivors in arms, hath done this thing. Almighty Providence frowned defeat and mortification on the self-confident invader, who, flushed with a long series of victories in the fields of European discipline, dreamed that an easy prey lay before him. By a Divine blessing on the general industry, zeal and patriotism, our citizens, whose habits and occupations had hitherto for a long train of years, been such exclusively as are incident to a state of peace, were rapidly converted into efficient warriors; and the city which had been destined to "sit as a widow," soon found herself enabled to sing, "Blessed be the Lord, my strength, who teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight! my goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust; who subdueth the people under me!"

Figure to yourselves your temples and your dwellings on fire: your once busy and pleasant walks, an extended battle ground: your women and children wandering in exile, they know not whither, and scarcely caring how, pursued by the clangor of arms and the shout of licentious victory. But I forbear—I cannot speak what I feel. It is not for me to paint the horrors of a populous town taken by assault:

Sad imagination may supply my deficiency. But gracious God, is it from this fate that we have been rescued? Oh, blessings on the memory of the fallen! Honor to the scars of the living! Thanks to the sword of the chief and the soldier, the veteran and the young volunteer! Praise to the patriotism of all! And with especial fervor, be everlasting glory paid to God our Saviour—most high—most mighty—and most merciful!

For, mark the reverse. The hostile step pollutes not now those hills and those vallies which were moistened by the blood of our brave militia, and by the tears of their widows and their fatherless children. Not a plume drops from the eagle's wing: not an arrow from the gripe of his talons. The battlements are safe. The banner floats proudly in the welcoming air. The stars are sovereign. The altars secured from military violence and pollution, have been loaded with the oblations of adoring thousands. The people have offered their thanksgiving unto a delivering God, and paid their vows unto the Most High. They would now do an act of justice to the brave. They now honor their noble minded defenders.

Rich shall be the reward of those who combatted, and have survived; for they have successfully acquitted themselves of one of the loftiest of social duties. Their country declares herself satisfied with their filial and prompt obedience. Conscience, with a glow of honest transport, looks back to well-sustained trials, to well-fought fields and well-earned reputation. God from on high, has blessed them in their deeds of glory.

They heard the drum beat to arms, and the trumpet sound to battle. They were told that blood must flow: They stopped not to take counsel from the unmanly idolatry of animal existence. They counted not their lives dear to them. They gazed on the star spangled banner, the lovely pledge of success that kissed the inspiring breezes of heaven. They vowed that that banner should not cease to wave. And, hear it, beloved countrymen, they kept their vow—God being their helper, they faithfully kept their vow.

That banner still waves in undiminished splendor. It sparkles in beauty on the bosom of the Mediterranean. In terror it has gleamed on the towers of Algiers.

It is the pride of our eyes; and may it wave forever!

Brave citizens! The unwithering wreaths with which glory has crowned you, will not suffer us to forget those whose example has taught us how to endure—how to fight—how to conquer—and, alas! how to die.

Yes, my countrymen, how to die. For after all, the felicity of this day is deeply tinged by the colors of death. The light that shines upon the field of glory is darkened by sepulchral gloom. From surviving patriots and soldiers resident in our community; and from those gallant men, inhabiting more distant parts, both in command and in the ranks, whose presence graces our solemnities, or the fame of whose services fastens our gratitude upon them; I must transfer your regards to our fallen heroes. When I turn my eyes to the distinguished officers on my right who conducted the defence of Baltimore, and to whose cool intrepidity and sound discretion, its inhabitants are under a lasting debt of gratitude, I am reminded that they have appeared before you on this occasion to deposit the foundation stone of a monument sacred to the memory of their brethren slain in battle. This deed of deep interest and solemnity has been done, preceded by the rites of holy religion. And I hazard nothing in affirming that all who are concerned in the performance derive from it a generous and melancholy pleasure. To high-minded men nothing can be more gratifying than language or actions expressive of the admiration due to virtue and to valor. Nothing to the christian man more sweet than the giving of honor where honor is due. Spirits of the warlike dead! whom living, we loved; and whom, departed, we bless! who would not cull the fairest and the sweetest flowrets nurtured in the kindly lap of earth, and strew them on your glorious graves? Who would not catch the last rays of the western sun, as he sinks behind the mountain top, after a day of powerful refulgence, and say 'tis thus the patriot falls—'tis thus the hero dies?

In the division orders which regulate the movement of the troops this day, the general has been pleased to exhibit so just and animated a view of the utility of monumental structures on occasions like the present, that any additional observations on the interesting subject, are rendered superfluous. It may not be thought irrelevant, however, simply to remark, that these memorials of a people's grateful affection for men who have honorably fallen in their defence, have in them not more of justice to the meritorious dead than of excitement and stimulus to the living. Wiping away the stain of ingratitude from the republican character, a character too often inconsiderately reproached by those who should more righteously and candidly estimate human nature, they prove to the youthful citizen that the hour, though it may linger, is sure to come at length, which consecrates the tomb of patriotism, and heaps its benedictions on the name of the dying hero. Well, therefore, have the fathers of our city terminated their honorable career of official labor and vigilance, by an act so worthy of the guardians of public freedom and public virtue; an act, I had almost said, which renders the citizen who first suggested it, and I am ignorant who he is, deserving himself of a monument. In thanks to this paternal body, my countrymen, for this most commendable act of theirs, give it a due weight in the direction of your principles and conduct. Come to this hallowed spot, and as citizens and soldiers, suffer yourselves to be informed at once of virtue and its praise—of duty, and its proud reward. Remember what has been done, and what has been endured by the men whose deathless names this monument records; and go, and endure, and do likewise. Their country has not forgotten them.—Your country will never forget you.

No distinction of party separated these gallant souls in the loveliness of the patriot's expiring moment. No factious temper averted one gentle bosom from the steel, that struck at the vitals of a common country, or one manly front from the bullet's swift-winged death. Let no recrimination of this accursed sort freeze any heart against the claims of freedom, the laws and the public safety. Let the only strife among us in such times of national trial, be who shall teach the enemy the speediest and the sorest lesson.

There is another instruction from this monument; instruction which I may not omit. My character as a minister of religion forbids me to omit it. God is holy. God is just. God is the avenger of guilt.—Impenitency finds no favor before him. Do I mean to cast reproach upon the heroes whom I have praised? Your candor will acquit me of this injustice. I mean simply that the perplexities, the horrors, and the desolations of war are among those rebukes with which heaven chastises men and nations for their crimes. And in these mysterious chastisements it often happens that the least guilty fall martyrs to the greater guilt of the community at large. Public repentance, therefore, must be pressed from every theatre where public suffering and public gratitude mingle in the same scene. Diminish, then, the sum of the general guilt in the diminution of your own. Return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon you; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. Out of the depths cry unto him, and he will listen graciously unto your prayer. Those who humble themselves before him, he will exalt; for sweet to him and acceptable, are the orisons of a people's humility. Be not afraid of evil tidings, but be prepared for them. Let your hearts be fixed, trusting in the Lord and doing good. Thus praying; thus acting; thus believing, and thus combatting; let no mustering thunders of alarm betray you into despair of the republic. The sacred and majestic columns of piety and of patriotism shall steadfastly support it; and liberty shall never find her grave in your intrenchments.

I add but a word. Ye widowed and childless hearts, bleeding with fresh sorrows; ye agonized bosoms, which throb at the remembrance of joys fled never to return; of affections never again to meet their objects beneath the skies: look at these badges of general grief: see this monumental offering of a saved people to the beloved memory of the virtuous and the brave: and believe that your country mourns with you. Yes, the commonwealth mixes her tears and her warm blood with yours, over the sacred ashes of the dead! Fathers and mothers—she thanks you by me for the precious gifts which you have bestowed upon her. Sisters, wives, brothers, friends—she makes your sorrows her own.—Accept her sympathy; accept her holy enthusiasm of feeling; accept the protection of that freedom, and those laws which the integrity and valor of her departed heroes—your husbands—your fathers—your sons—your brothers—were instrumental in preserving to her in that moment when honor sat weeping over their wounds, and gazed on them beautiful in death. Be comforted. There is a rest where mourners weep no more. The All-merciful invites you to that rest. I have done—Now then, my country,

Now "thy tones triumphant pour,
"Let them pierce the hero's grave;
"Life's tumultuous battle o'er,
"O, how sweetly sleep the brave!
"From the dust their laurels bloom,
"High they shoot and flourish free;
"Glory's temple is the tomb!
"Death is immortality!"

Laws of the United States.

AN ACT granting bounties in land and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers.

Be it enacted in the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That all such persons as had been citizens of the United States anterior to the late war, and were at its commencement inhabitants of the province of Canada, and who, during the said war, joined the armies of the United States as volunteers, and were slain, died in service, or continued therein, till honorably discharged, shall be entitled to the following quantities of land respectively, viz: Each colonel nine hundred and sixty acres; each major to eight hundred acres; each captain six hundred and forty acres; each subaltern officer to four hundred and eighty acres; each non-commissioned officer, musician or private to three hundred and twenty acres; and the bounties aforesaid shall extend to the medical and other staff, who shall rank according to their pay. And it shall be lawful for the said persons to locate their claims in quarter sections upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States within the Indiana territory which shall have been surveyed prior to such location, with the exception of salt springs and lead mines therein, and of the quantities of land adjacent thereto which may be reserved for the use of the same, by the president of the United States, and the section No. 16 in every township to be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of the public schools; which locations shall be subject to such regulations, as to priority of choice, and the manner of location, as the president of the United States shall prescribe.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the department of war for the time being, shall from time to time, under such rules and regulations as to evidence as the president of the United States shall prescribe, issue to every person coming within the description aforesaid, a warrant for such quantity of land as he may be entitled to by virtue of the aforeaid provision; and in case of the death of such person, then such warrant shall be issued to his widow, or if no widow to his child or children.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized and required to pay to each of the persons aforesaid, three months additional pay, according to the rank they respectively held in the army of the United States during the late war.

Treaty Question.

CONGRESS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—THURSDAY, JAN. 4, 1816.
THE COMMERCIAL TREATY.

The house in committee of the whole, on the bill for regulating commerce in conformity to the convention of commerce with Great Britain, &c.

The committee being about to rise—

Mr. Clay (speaker) said he did not rise on this occasion to enter into a discussion of the general merits of the instrument brought incidentally before the house by the present bill, particularly as there appeared to be no wish on any side of the house to enter on that subject. He rose to make some explanations relative to the third article, which perhaps might not be considered unnecessary. It would be perceived, he said, that the 3d article of the convention, which opens the trade to the British East Indies, restricted us to certain enumerated ports. This was a restriction not contained in the treaty of 1794, nor in that negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, commonly called the rejected treaty. The reason was, that upon the expiration of the charter of the East India company, which took place three or four years ago, the question so long agitated in Great Britain, had again come up, whether the monopoly of the trade to India should remain with the company, as it had done. On that occasion, it had been thought proper by the British government, to deviate to a certain extent from its former policy, and open the trade to British subjects generally, under some restrictions. By the act which then passed, the British subjects were limited to these specified ports; and it had been thought right by Great Britain, especially as it was in her opinion a grant to us without an equivalent, to limit our citizens to the same ports. That act of parliament, Mr. C. said, was a new era in the trade to British India; and it was impossible to estimate the value of the concession to us, without taking into consideration that important change. When the trade was wholly in the hands of the company, they had been found incompetent to supply India with the specie necessary for circulation; and the trade had been opened to us and other foreign powers to make up the deficit. Now that British subjects were let into the trade, it remained to be ascertained by experience, whether they could not furnish the requisite supply of specie, without the aid of foreigners. If they could, the opening of the trade to foreign powers operates as an advantage in their favor, and to the prejudice of the British merchant, to the whole amount of the profits derived by such foreign powers. These suggestions Mr. C. said, he had thought proper to make to the committee, inasmuch as some gentlemen might not have adverted to the change of the laws by which that trade was regulated.

Mr. Gaston said, that, believing the convention since its ratification in due form had become a law of the land, and unable to perceive wherein it needed the help of an act of congress to give it operation, he had viewed the bill before the committee as nugatory and unmeaning. Although he had thought it strange, that gentlemen who had abjured so many of the errors of their predecessors, should thus, by construction, retain, and, perhaps, extend a most inconvenient error in regard to the effect of treaties, he was willing, without interruption on his part, to indulge them in their course. But regarding himself as having no agency in relation to this convention, he had not entertained the most remote thought of examining into its merits or demerits. He was induced, however, to say a word in relation to the 3d article of the convention, in consequence of the observations made on it by the honorable speaker—This gentleman had stated, with a view to form an estimate of the value of the omitted East India trade therein conceded as compared with the more general grant on the same subject in the treaty of Mr. Jay, that, subsequent to the date of that treaty, Great Britain had opened this trade to her own subjects not of the East India company, and therefore needed not so much the assistance of foreign merchants to bring supplies of bullion. If this formed an item for raising the value of the concession, it was proper to state another fact which would go to the opposite side of the account and serve to adjust the balance. Since Mr. Jay's treaty (he believed in 1797) the British parliament had opened this same trade to the subjects of all friendly powers, and to this day, without treaty, it remained open to them all—the fact was, that the British East India possessions were valuable more for revenue than commerce. This revenue required a free importation of bullion from whatever quarter it could be had, and a free exportation of their commodities to foreign countries—it was, besides, desirable, that this exportation should be made to distant regions, where they were not likely to come into direct competition with the manufactures of the parent kingdom.

Whether the East India trade was at all desirable to this country, was a question on which enlightened statesmen greatly differed. Our table was groaning under the weight of petitions for prohibiting the great mass of importations from that quarter, and there had been a long and loud complaint against the perpetual drain of specie to it. However this might be, it was very certain that the only concession made by the 3d article was of a trade already open to us by a general law, and which was so desirable to them that they might find it their interest to pay us a bounty not to abandon it. Great Britain and her rulers well understood the spirit of traffic, and we might rely on it, they had not in this instance given us a "quid" without a "quo" in return for it.

Mr. Clay said, that the gentleman from North Carolina and himself were at issue on the fact. Mr. C. denied that the trade to British Indies was open to us by act of parliament. By the regulations of the local authority of those countries the trade might be open to us; but the difference between such regulations and the stipulations of a treaty was, that if there were any value in the trade to the British East India possessions, the treaty stipulations prevents us from being deprived of it by a repeal of those regulations during the continuance of the treaty. The benefit of the trade itself was another question; if not beneficial, the treaty did not force it on us. Mr. C. added, that he was not disposed to enter into a discussion of the treaty-making power. It might be sufficient for him to say, that at worst, according to the opinions of the gentlemen on the other side, the act would be harmless; whilst, in the opinion of gentlemen on this side, it was entirely necessary.

Mr. Gaston rejoined a few words rather in acquiescence in the idea of the bill being harmless. As to the East India trade, he said, it was not to be presumed, that the trade which the government of Great Britain held out to every foreign power without an equivalent, could itself be of any great use. As to the stipulation on this head, in the treaty supposed to be so favorable to us, Mr. G. said, that Great Britain was not in the habit of giving advantages without equivalents.

In reply to a previous remark of Mr. Gaston, that it was entirely an error to suppose a law necessary to give effect to a treaty, which, being the supreme law of the land, is paramount to existing laws—

Mr. Forsyth said he had no disposition to enter into the discussion of this question; but it might be necessary that he should say that the passage of this bill was not merely harmless, but indispensable; because the power of legislation was vested in congress, and could be exercised by no other authority. This doctrine was not only correct and constitutional, but had been acted on by all administrations and in all times. The provisions of the treaty being general, it was, independent of the general question of the effect of a treaty on existing laws, necessary to declare in what manner the act should be carried into effect, &c.

Some further observations passed on this subject between Mr. Gaston and Mr. Forsyth, but being afterwards amply stated by them in debate, are omitted in this place.

The committee having risen and reported the bill and amendments—an objection was made by Mr. Milnor to an amendment going to limit the operation of the bill to British vessels coming directly from the British territories in Europe. On this question some debate took place—Mr. Forsyth contending, though he considered the amendment was of no great importance, that it was according to the letter and spirit of the treaty.

On motion of Mr. Milnor, the house adjourned without deciding this question.

FRIDAY, JAN. 5.

The amendment above referred to being still under consideration—

Mr. Forsyth defended the amendment. He was of opinion that that construction, and no other, ought to be put on the treaty, which was embraced by the amendment. In the construction of any part of an instrument, reference must be made to its object. The whole object of the treaty, was, to regulate the direct commerce between the United States and the territories of Great Britain in Europe. The exception in respect to the East India trade proved the rule, and excluded the idea of other exceptions. The correctness of this construction, he said, was further evinced by the correspondence between our ministers and the British negotiators, &c. as he proceeded to shew, by reference to the published correspondence, &c.

Mr. Robertson after remarking that no inference could be drawn from papers not before the house, (as the correspondence of our ministers was not) proceeded to observe, that he could not see the necessity of the amendment. It did not belong to the treaty, any more than to the interests of the United States. That treaty gave privileges, of which this amendment, if adopted, would deprive us. The amendment went to cut off a trade which it is of importance to us to preserve. The terms of the instrument to be carried into effect by this bill, did not, as far as he could understand, authorize the construction, that British vessels, coming from other than British ports, are to be subject to higher duties than if they came direct from a port of Great Britain. The terms of the treaty, and the interests of commerce, equally forbade such a construction. Appreciating the capability and enterprize of this, as a navigating and ship-building people, he was perfectly ready to enter the lists with any or all commercial nations, on the fair and liberal principles belonging to commerce, unaffected by commercial restrictions. He desired no more in this respect, than that we should be placed on an equal footing with other powers, not doubting but we should gain profit from the competition. He referred to the act of the last congress, hypothetically repealing the discriminating duties, as evidence of the intention of congress to hold out an invitation to all nations to do away their discriminating duties, on a pledge that we would do the same. The treaty, he said, was merely an echo of the principles of that law. Then why should not the most liberal interpretation be given to the treaty? He could, he said, readily conceive, that a commerce carried on circuitously by G. Britain, under such a construction, would be of but little importance to her, because of the relative situation of her and our ports. But there were many cases occurring in the course of commercial transactions, when the privileges would be highly advantageous to us, as in the case of clearing out to one port, and desiring to seek further for a market, &c. a case daily occurring. For the construction of a treaty we ought to resort no where but to the instrument itself; and he did not think the amendment could be supported on it.

Mr. Tucker said, that he feared he should incur the imputation of presumption, in venturing upon a discussion involving commercial considerations, with which he could not pretend to be familiar.—Convinced, however, of the impropriety of such of the amendments reported by the committee of the whole house, as had a tendency to discriminate between the direct and indirect trade with the British dominions in Europe, he rose very respectfully to suggest to his friend, at the head of the committee of foreign affairs, the propriety of waiving those amendments; and at the same time, to offer to the house the reasons which had induced such a suggestion.

It appears to me, continued Mr. Tucker, that in legislating on this convention, we should confine ourselves to the terms of the instrument itself, without attempting by any suparadded phraseology, to give it a construction which we may suppose it will bear. The terms of the law ought strictly to correspond with those of the treaty, lest by departing from it we should hazard a breach of faith, the imputation of which we should be solicitous to avoid. Whether we regard the convention as so plain, as not to be susceptible of a two-fold meaning or not, it is equally evident that it would be unwise to depart from its phraseology in framing the act under consideration. For if it be not susceptible of more than one meaning, why shall we attempt to explain what requires no explanation? If, on the contrary, it does admit of a double construction, what right have we, as one of the contracting parties, to pronounce upon the true interpretation of the instrument, which may not equally be claimed by the other party to the convention. By such a course of proceeding, the treaty itself would be the source of most serious collisions. But, if on the contrary, we should pass this act in the terms of the treaty, and leave to the executives of the two nations to settle and adjust any ambiguity it may contain, no evil can ensue. If it be attempted in the two countries, to settle the meaning of the instrument by legislative provision, it is probable the parties will soon be at issue, as no means can be devised for mutual explanations between them, in a legislative character. But, if the adjustment be left with the executive, such mutual explanations can and will take place, and every unpleasant collision may be avoided.

But let us enquire for a moment, whether the evils likely to be incurred by the United States, in case the provisions of the treaty are confined to the direct trade, are of so serious a nature, as to tempt us, even for a moment, to put at hazard our reputation for good faith. So far from believing that we shall suffer by such a construction, I feel perfectly satisfied, that we should be the gainers; and, though I am conscious that I approach a subject on which commercial men ought chiefly to be consulted, yet,

I will solicit the attention of the house, whilst I distinctly state the reason of this opinion.

Pursuing the latitude which has been taken by others, I shall embrace in my remarks both the amendments which contemplate a distinction between the direct and indirect trade. There are two clauses of the treaty which are affected by these amendments. The first relates to the equalization of the tonnage, or duties and charges on the vessel, and provides that no "higher or other duty or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels, than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States," with a correspondent provision in favor of the United States. If this provision be confined to the direct trade between the United States and Great Britain, according to the terms of the bill, as amended by the committee, British vessels, it is true, could not enter into a competition with an American vessel, in carrying British articles from the continent of Europe, or other foreign ports to America, because the additional tonnage would give a preference to the American bottom. But it must be recollected that a reciprocal disadvantage is incurred by American bottoms in a like trade from the continent to Great Britain, in American articles; and that, according to the narrow and limited construction contended for, an American vessel could not enter into a competition with a British vessel in the carriage from the continent to Great Britain. But what will be the operation of the convention? To permit American vessels to compete on equal terms with British vessels, in the carriage of American produce from the continent and elsewhere, to Great Britain, or in any other trade which is now permitted, or may be hereafter suffered to be carried on in foreign ships at all; and to give a correspondent privilege to British vessels in the trade to the United States of America. Which then is likely to derive the greatest advantage from the regulation? That which is most likely to avail itself extensively of the privileges of the convention. And which is most likely to avail itself extensively of these privileges? The American ship owner, I presume, since the proximity of the ports between which he will generally trade, will make the pursuit more convenient and more profitable than that in which the British ship owner can be employed, under the same provisions of the convention. It seems manifest, for instance, that it would be much more convenient for an American to enter into the trade between Portugal and England, distant from each other only a few day's sail, than for an Englishman to engage in the trade between Portugal and the United States, separated as they are by an ocean of 3000 miles; if so, more of our ship owners than of the British, are likely to avail themselves of the privileges of the treaty, and of course we shall gain more than we can lose by its stipulations, in relation to tonnage, according to the construction for which I contend.

So much then for the provision in relation to the tonnage. Let us next see what is the operation of the next clause.

It provides that "the same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importation be in American or British vessels," with a correspondent provision in favor of American articles. The remarks already made in relation to the former clause, apply with the same force to this.—There is, it is true, but little probability of either of the two nations engaging in an indirect trade, so long as this convention lasts, by which the direct trade is permitted on such advantageous terms. In the nature of things, every merchant will prefer the direct to the roundabout trade. The importation into the United States, of British articles from foreign ports other than those of Great Britain, will, therefore, rarely take place, and will I presume, be confined to cases where the British goods do not find a ready sale in the foreign market, and are sent to America from thence, as affording a better prospect of mercantile advantage. So too the importation into the ports of Great Britain, from continental ports, of American merchandize, will only occur when the American merchant, after reaching the foreign port, finds it to his advantage to change his market, and sends his cargo from its first port of destination to Great Britain. Which of these cases is likely to occur most frequently? Is it more probable that the exporter of manufactures from Great Britain, will find it necessary to change his market, and send his goods from the continent of Europe or other foreign ports to the United States, or that the American exporter of tobacco and cotton will, on his arrival at a continental port, find his advantage in looking for a better market in London or Liverpool? The latter, without doubt. The former must rarely happen: the latter, as my friend from Louisiana has already intimated, occurs very frequently.—Great disadvantages in such cases would, of course, be experienced, if the American merchant should, in the foreign port, when he wished to change his market, encounter additional tonnage and additional imports, in case he made use of an American vessel for the transportation. In truth, no American vessel could enter into the competition with British bottoms under such unpropitious circumstances. Yet would this be precisely the state of things if the treaty be confined to the direct trade. On the other hand, if it applies also to the indirect trade, the tobacco and cotton, and other bulky articles, of American export, may change their market without its being necessary to seek for British vessels, to the exclusion of those of the United States: and American vessels would thus monopolize very soon the freight from which they are now excluded.

I cannot, therefore, but believe, that it is our interest to contend, that the convention, according to the true construction of it, comprehends the indirect as well as the direct trade. That such was the intention of the American commissioners, and the wish of the American government, is indeed strongly inferable from the existence of the act of congress, read by the gentleman from Louisiana, in which the most general terms are used, equally comprehensive with those in the convention, and equally embracing indirect as well as direct trade. With this strong and decisive expression of the legislative will, the executive have concluded this convention. They seem to have followed the expressions of the act, nor could they or the commissioners be justly censured, if the provisions were really disadvantageous. Believing the contrary, as I do, I cannot give my assent to an amendment which would exclude us from a fair advantage gained by the treaty: and even if my impressions on this subject were different, I should think it improper to attempt a legislative expression of the instrument. As I have already intimated, it seems to me that it would be most advisable to leave the construction, if doubtful, to be settled between the executives of the two nations, without hazarding collision or a breach of faith, by introducing into the law our own interpretation.

Mr. Gaston said that he had yesterday, in committee of the whole, expressed an opinion in relation to this bill, which subsequent reflection had convinced him was erroneous. He had remarked, that although the bill was in his judgment unnecessary, it was nevertheless harmless. He was now satisfied that the bill was not only unnecessary, but of a pernicious character, and while he owed it to the house to retract his error, he owed to himself an apology for adopting it. The fact was, that believing the house of representatives could have no agency in executing the commercial convention between the United States and Great Britain, and having his attention much occupied with public business of a different character, he had thought very little of the convention itself or of the bill which was introduced for carrying it into effect. And when it was remarked by a member of the committee, that a law re-enacting what he (Mr. G.) supposed to be already law, was at worst but a superfluous act of legislation, and could not therefore do harm; the remark seemed plausible, and commanded his assent for the moment. Perfectly persuaded however that this impression was incorrect, and that any legislation by the house was full of mischief, he would submit a motion calculated to try the principle of the bill. He therefore moved its indefinite postponement.

In making this motion, he assured the house, that he was not actuated by any thing like a spirit of opposition. He had come into congress with a perfect disposition to co-operate with his associates of whatever political party, in any measures which might promote the public weal. And he indulged the hope that now when the troubled night of war had departed, and the day-star of peace again beamed on our land, there would be at least a short interval of calm and sunshine, in which all could work cheerfully and harmoniously together.

In attempting to shew the impropriety of the bill, Mr. G. would endeavor, if possible, not to tread upon ground consecrated by party prejudice. He believed it was not necessary for his argument to lay down any principles in relation to the effect of a treaty constitutionally made, that might not be conceded as correct by the ancient champions of the party which now hold the government of the union. It would no doubt be recollected, that a vehement contest about the efficacy of the British treaty had taken place in the house of representatives, at an early period of our federal government. He could not undertake to speak confidently of the opinions of all who took part in that controversy, (for it was a long while since he had read the debate,) but he believed the great point in contestation, was the nature of the obligation on the house of representatives to make appropriations in conformity to the treaty. One class of politicians, (and he believed them right) considered it as a moral obligation which could only yield to obligations of a paramount kind. The other class of politicians viewed it as an obligation of discretion only, which left the house a full right to judge of the expediency or inexpediency of the treaty. There could not have been a serious difference of opinion among the wise and able men of either side, whether a treaty constitutionally made upon a subject fit for a treaty, was, or was not a law; to be executed by the executive, and expounded by the judiciary, as other laws made in other forms, prescribed by the constitution. The words of that instrument were too precise to admit of rational doubt.—“This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.” Art. 6—Part 2d. “He” the president “shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.” Art. 2d Sec. 3d. “The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States and the treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority.” Art. 3d. Sec. 2.

That it was never supposed necessary to impart a legislative sanction to a treaty, in order to vest it with every attribute of a law, was further evinced by the uniform practice of our government under different administrations. Notwithstanding the British treaty contained various provisions of a commercial character, no act of congress was passed to carry them into effect. The sole legislation which took place, was an act making appropriations for the pay of the commissioners to be appointed under the treaty. This was done precisely upon the same principles as an appropriation is made to defray the expenses attending the execution of other laws; not because the treaty or the laws require such sanction to give them validity, but because (by the constitution) public revenue can only be disbursed in consequence of regular appropriations. But there was a later precedent directly in point, and which some gentlemen might be disposed to regard with greater reverence. In the convention which was concluded between the United States and the first consul of the French republic, there was an article stipulating, that captures made on either side, should be restored. The French ship Berceau had been captured by us long before, and by the laws of our land had become the absolute property of the nation. No act of congress was passed, none was supposed necessary, to enable the president to transfer this property of the nation to the French republic. The treaty was deemed law sufficient for that purpose, and the then president (Jefferson) caused the Berceau to be restored according to the treaty.

Mr. G. was perfectly aware, that treaties, like other laws, might be so made as to require the aid of supplemental legislation. Such, however, was not the case with the convention referred to in this bill. A remark was yesterday made by a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Forsyth) designed to shew that this convention needed such auxiliary legislation; but, on reflection, he was satisfied that the remark was not well founded. The gentleman observed, that the convention stipulated only for an equality of duties in certain cases, upon importations in British and American vessels, without specifying whether this equality was to be produced by raising the rates on American vessels, or depressing those on British vessels. It will be found, however, said Mr. G. that the treaty in this respect executes itself. We have laws fixing the rates of tonnage on American vessels, and the duties on importations in them. Other laws prescribe that additional rates and duties shall be imposed in the case of foreign vessels. A treaty is then made with Great Britain, prescribing that her vessels shall be subject to the same rates and duties as are levied on American ships. As this treaty is a law of the land, it should be construed precisely as any other law. Suppose the stipulation were contained in an act of congress; then, upon the principle that subsequent acts repeal so much of prior acts as is inconsistent with them, the effect assuredly is to except British ships from the operation of the laws affecting foreign vessels generally. Whatever your duties may be in regard to American bottoms, the same duties are by the treaty made to apply to British ships.

Mr. G. said, that these observations were designed to prove, and in his judgment did prove, that the bill was unnecessary. This however, was but introductory to the position which he had advanced, that the bill was of a dangerous and injurious character.

In a government of laws, it was always to be deemed that those who are called on to obey, and those who were appointed to expound the national will, should not be perplexed and embarrassed by superfluous regulations. But there were prominent and especial evils following from an unnecessary legislation in regard to treaties. The power of making them (said Mr. G.) is, by the constitution, vested in the president, calling to his aid the counsel of the senate. If this power be so exercised that the treaty can execute itself, what is the effect of an unnecessary law enacted for its execution? To the thoughtless and superficial it might seem merely an encroachment upon the prerogative of the executive, and this might not be deemed an evil very much to be dreaded by the friends of political freedom. But, in fact, it is not a diminution of the power of the executive; it is a diminution only of his responsibility. The law confers no additional validity to the treaty—it is altogether inoperative, except as an implied sanction of the terms of the treaty. The president is answerable for making a bad compact—but under the form and pretence of enlarging legislative power, a shield is to be interposed between him and the public censure.

Besides, if the precedent be established that a treaty must be legislated into validity, an obligation is imposed upon the legislature and every branch of it to make the provisions of the law conform strictly to the stipulations of the treaty; in other words, the legislature must expound the treaty. It is easy to point out some striking absurdities which would result from this doctrine; though it is difficult to imagine all that will arise from it. Let us suppose a complex treaty, in the exposition of parts of which there is an honest and important difference of opinion between the two branches of the legislature. What is to be done? Ordinary differences of opinion which cannot be removed, and where co-operation is necessary, may be adjusted by compromise. But on this subject compromise is impracticable. The sacrifices required to be mutually made are not of opinion on a question of expediency, but of conscience on a matter of right. Each is bound by the highest of obligations to expound the treaty according to the design of its framers. If in this exposition they cannot agree, the treaty cannot be expounded, the legislative sanction cannot be given, and the plighted faith of the nation must be broken.

Again it must be admitted, for the constitution is on this particular clear and imperative, that the judicial power shall apply to all cases arising under a treaty, and of necessity in its application to such cases must expound the treaty. How is this judicial power to be exercised when the courts who are invested with it shall not agree to the correctness of your exposition; are they to be bound by your exposition? If so, then their power is not applied to cases as they arise under the treaty, but as they arise under your statute. If they are not bound by your exposition, then your act, instead of vivifying the treaty, is itself a dead letter. If they sacrifice their consciences to adopt your construction, they do not exercise judicial power on the treaty—if they do not make this sacrifice, but exercise the judicial power which the constitution gives them, then you have a law, and a constitutional law, which your own tribunals have a constitutional right to disregard!

But one would suppose that a stronger argument to prove the danger of this legislative enactment of a treaty could not be afforded, than is to be found by attending to the course which has been pursued on this bill. Not to dwell upon the singular absurdity of one of the amendments which it has been thought necessary to incorporate into it; an amendment which declares this bill a law, twenty days before it is or can become a law under the constitution; the house is perplexed in discussing the meaning of various passages in the treaty admitted to be ambiguous, and for the correct interpretation of them is referred by the chairman of the committee of foreign relations, to what? To information officially laid before it? To authentic documents in its possession? No; the house is referred to a correspondence between the negotiators of the two nations, which the gentleman (Mr. Forsyth) tells us has been laid before the senate; and a part of which he reads from a paper printed (as he also informs us) for the use of the senate. For what purpose was this correspondence laid before the senate? Assuredly it must have been to aid them in understanding the treaty before they should give advice as to its ratification. But the house of representatives, although bound to aid in legislating the treaty into operation, and in framing a law which shall conform to its precise meaning; and though greatly embarrassed to divine this meaning, in consequence of the vagueness of the treaty; is left to act without the benefit of this necessary information, except it be of such fragments as may be doled out by the bounty of the senate, or picked up by the industry or good fortune of its members. If this house have to expound the treaty, it is entitled to the possession of every document which can throw light upon its meaning. It cannot be called on to act, and be denied the means to act with intelligence. These means, there is but one authentic and constitutional mode of laying before us. They must be officially communicated, or the house, in respecting them, will shew a want of respect for itself.

Mr. G. concluded, by remarking that if the house should concur with him in the opinion that the convention was complete in itself, and needed no legislative aid to carry it into effect, they ought to be exceedingly cautious in setting a precedent which was calculated to mislead and embarrass. Although no immediate injury might result from the act in this case, other than the delay and the difficulty of getting at the meaning of this treaty, yet immense inconveniences might flow from following such a precedent, in case of more complexity. As the bill was a departure from the established usage of the government—unnecessary, and likely, as a precedent, to be productive of mischief hereafter—he believed the wise and safe course was to decline acting further upon it.

Mr. Wright said, he hoped and trusted the amendment proposed to this bill would not be adopted. The bill had for its object, he said, the establishment of an uniformity of the impost and tonnage, as well as of the drawbacks on articles the growth, produce or manufacture of his Britannic majesty's territories in Europe, imported into any of the ports of the United States. The amendment proposes to limit the importations by adding "directly from the territories aforesaid." The treaty, in its terms, may include the indirect as well as the direct trade, and has been ratified by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and has become the supreme law of the land. This treaty is a compact between Great Britain and the United States. The British parliament has no power but to pass laws to carry treaties into effect—the king has the sole power of making them; and here the president and senate have the power of the king—from whence results the impropriety of our attempting, in a law to carry the treaty into effect, any additions to the treaty. We have no diplomatic power. If there is any ambiguity in any article, we, who represent only one of the parties, have no power to bind the other party by any act or construction; that can be effected only by an explanatory article made by the agents of both parties. Sir, in any contestation about the treaty and its true import, this amendment, if adopted, could not be considered as part of the instrument. The treaty is a record, and like all others, can be tried only by itself. I ask, if the judiciary, in expounding this treaty, were to be of opinion that it included the indirect as well as the direct trade, what would be the operation of the proposed amendment, if adopted? it certainly would be considered as the act of but one party, as having no operation in the case—a work, therefore, of supererogation.

Mr. Gaston having moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill indefinitely—

The bill was, on motion of Mr. Tucker, laid on the table.

MONDAY, JAN. 8.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill, and of Mr. Gaston's motion—

Mr. Forsyth said, that the motion for an indefinite postponement of the bill, made by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Gaston) rested upon the ground that it was not necessary to legislate upon the subject of the convention. Mr. F. presumed that it was not the intention of gentlemen to enter into the investigation of the extent of the treaty-making power, or of the nature of the obligation imposed by a treaty when made. He could not suppose it was intended to rake up the ashes of the dispute on that question in the year 1795. The constitutional principle had been settled so far as it depended on the representatives of the people at that period, on the first treaty with a foreign government which had been concluded after the adoption of the constitution. By referring to the journals of the proceedings of congress, it would be found that the principle established was "that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the constitution to the power of congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by congress." The recollection of the gentleman from North Carolina was, therefore, not faithful, when he supposed the doctrine of that day confined the power of congress in the execution of treaties, to cases of appropriation only. The rule was general, and applied to all cases without distinction, over which power was specially given by the constitution to the legislative department. This general rule, since that period, has been uniformly and consistently observed. In the execution of the British treaty, no law was passed at the period of the memorable dispute already alluded to, but one appropriating money; but the cause might be discovered by referring to the treaty itself. None of its provisions were inconsistent with the existing laws. Subsequently, however, it was found necessary to provide by law for the faithful execution of the 19th article. By this article was stipulated, that when one party was belligerent and the other a neutral power, to prevent injury to the property, &c. of the neutral upon the ocean, from the improper conduct of the captains and crews of private armed vessels, the owner and master should give bond and security in the sum of 150 pounds or 3000 pounds, according to the size of the vessel and the number of her crew, to answer for the injuries which might be sustained by such misconduct.—When the quasi war was authorized against France, the president was empowered to grant permissions to private armed vessels, the stipulation of the treaty was embodied in the act of congress. The same provision was made in nearly the same words, in the war against Tripoli. The conduct of the government had been regulated by the same rule in their legislative acts to carry into effect the treaty with Spain. An appropriation law was passed, to pay the necessary expences. This was all that was then deemed necessary. But the 10th article of the treaty, intended to provide for the case of vessels of either nation, forced by distress into the ports of the other. The condition of the treaty was dictated both by policy and humanity; it was, that the goods thus forced under the protection of either of the contracting parties, should, if landed, be reloaded and carried away without the payment of the customary duty, either on the vessel or cargo. No act was passed until the case actually occurred.—Sometime during or before the year 1804, the Spanish brigantine Nancy came into Norfolk in distress. In order to give to her owners the benefit of the treaty stipulation, it was deemed necessary to pass an act remitting the duties in that particular instance, and providing that they should not be payable in similar instances in future. The treaty with France in 1801, had been alluded to by the gentleman from N. C. (Mr. Gaston.) By referring to the appropriation act, passed in consequence of the ratification of that treaty, it will be found to contain a declaration of the obligation to return vessels captured during the war, according to the conditions of the convention. Mr. F. presumed that this was supposed a sufficient authority for the delivery of the Berceau by the president, in performance of the conditions of the treaty. The statute book was full of examples, but none were more decisive than those founded upon the cession of Louisiana to the United States by France in 1803. Although France ceded it to the United States, congress thought it necessary to pass an act authorizing the president to take possession of it, and to use the military force, if necessary, for that purpose. Although it was recognized as belonging to the United States, and of course governed by their laws, so far as they were applicable to its situation, at that time it was deemed most expedient to pass an act to lay and collect duties on imports and tonnage within the said territory. In this act, provision was made to secure to French and Spanish ships the commercial advantages which were promised as one of the conditions of the cession. But this was not all: in the year 1800, an act was passed, allowing drawback of duties on goods exported from the United States to New Orleans, being a foreign port. Although the reason of this act had ceased, and it might have been considered repealed by the transfer of this port to the United States, it was supposed necessary to repeal the act by an act of congress, passed in 1803.

Louisiana, too, was admitted into the union, not by treaty stipulation, but by an act of congress, in performance of the obligation imposed by it.

Mr. F. said that no difference was made by the constitution between treaties with foreign powers, and treaties made with the Indians within the territorial limits of the United States. The rule had been extended to them. Without enumerating the particular cases, he could refer to an arrangement which had been made with all the Indian tribes with whom we had entered into compacts—that crimes committed by whites upon Indians, within the Indian territory, should be punished in the same manner as if the same offence had been committed upon a citizen of the United States, within the jurisdiction of some district of the United States.—This engagement had been complied with so far as it could be complied with by the government. Prosecutions had been instituted against those who had been accused of such offences. Mr. F. did not remember of any punishments, but this was not the fault of the government. These prosecutions were, however, commenced, not upon the treaty, but upon the law, made in consequence of the treaty engagement. These remarks, Mr. F. trusted, would satisfy the house, that the course proposed to be pursued in relation to the late convention with Great Britain, was perfectly in unison with the practice in all former cases, and justified by the rule upon which that practice had been founded. The only difference between the present and former cases was, that in this case the convention stipulates advantages to British vessels which cannot be enjoyed without an alteration of the system of revenue, and repeal of existing laws. Some gentlemen had imagined that the law of the last session, on the subject of discriminating duties, contained all the necessary provisions to meet this contract between the two countries.—This was a mistaken opinion. The law of the last session repealed our discriminating duties, on tonnage, &c. of foreign vessels, and on goods imported in foreign vessels, upon a condition which has not happened, that is, that an abolition of all the discriminating duties, so far as they were injurious to the commerce of the United States, should have taken place in that foreign nation to which the vessel and goods should belong. The treaty between this country and Great Britain stipulates an abolition of discriminating duties only in the ports of his Britannic majesty's European dominions. Mr. F. said, it was somewhat extraordinary that it should be doubted, in this country, whether the house of representatives were authorized to act upon a subject which, in England, would have required the interposition of the house of commons. He did not intend to draw any argument from the resemblance of the two governments, but to bottom one upon the difference between them. It could not be denied that in this government, the executive power, including its authority to make treaties, was more limited than in Great Britain. Yet in Great Britain, this very treaty will require an act of parliament before it can be carried completely into effect—an act which some of us will live long enough to see. This was the ordinary course in that country. At some of the most remarkable periods in British history, instances had occurred. A commercial treaty was negotiated between France and England, after the peace of Utrecht—it was not carried into effect, because the house of commons rejected the bill introduced by the ministry to alter the commercial and revenue laws according to the compact between the two nations. In the year 1786, a treaty of commerce between those nations, was carried into effect by an act of parliament, framed according to its stipulations. Mr. F. said that the order in council of the 17th August, 1815, which he had taken occasion to read to the house a day or two before, was founded upon an act of parliament, passed, as he had understood, for the express purpose of enabling the prince regent to conform the existing regulations of commerce to the treaty which might be made by the ministers of the United States and Great Britain, and in the discussion of the principles in which they were engaged. The order in council, like the act upon which it was founded, was to continue in force until six weeks after the next session of parliament. Within these six weeks after the meeting of parliament, the necessary provision will, no doubt, be made, by the competent authority, in the ordinary mode.

The gentleman from N. Carolina (Mr. Gaston) had advanced a singular opinion, that by exercising the power of passing laws to give effect to treaties, you diminish the responsibility without diminishing the power of the president and senate. Mr. F. could not conceive how a check upon the exercise of any authority could diminish the responsibility of the person to whom it was granted. It was certainly true, when congress passed acts according to the provisions of a treaty, they declared to the people it was better to perform the stipulations it contained, than to violate the faith of the nation, which had been pledged by the constitutional authority. But if congress, from a conviction that the rights of the people had been wantonly surrendered or the national honor tarnished by treaty, should refuse to pass the laws necessary for its execution, the president and senate would feel, what they can feel in no other way, the responsibility under which their power is exercised.

It had been said, that treaties are the law of the land. It is so printed in the margin of the article of the constitution to which the gentleman (Mr. Gaston) had referred, and it seemed to be taken for granted, that law and treaty were convertible terms. If this idea is correct, the distinction taken between acts of appropriation to pay the expences of treaties, and other legislative acts to carry them into effect, is unnecessary. The constitution says, that money shall not be drawn out of the treasury unless appropriations are previously made by law. But a treaty being a law, an appropriation may be made by treaty. But Mr. F. said, the object of that part of the constitution was, to declare the supremacy of the constitution, acts made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made or to be made under the authority of the United States, over the constitutions and laws of the states. The relative force or effect of treaties and laws was to be collected from the whole charter; from the nature and dependence of its parts—from the objects over which treaties and laws severally operated—and from the intention of the people by whom the power of making them were granted—and for whose benefit they are to be exercised. But, Mr. F. said, the examination of these topics would require him to enter further into the constitutional question than he wished or intended to go. For the present he would content himself with the expression of the general proposition upon the basis of which the bill had been reported. Whenever a treaty contains any thing contrary to the constitution, it is void; wherever it contains any thing contrary to existing laws, the laws must be repealed by congress before the engagement can be complied with—because the constitution can be altered only by the constitutional mode of amendment. A law can be repealed only by the authority which enacted it. Mr. F. said although the question respecting the propriety of the amendments made in the committee of the whole house, was superseded by the motion of indefinite postponement, he hoped to be indulged with a few observations in reply to some suggestions of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Robertson,) from Virginia (Mr. Tucker,) and from North Carolina, (Mr. Gaston.) He was not conscious of having committed any impropriety in referring to documents printed by order of the senate. He did not suppose information was less valuable in one form than in another. He had not taken his construction of the treaty from the correspondence he had quoted, but from the instrument itself, and he could not see the irrationality or irregularity of referring to such documents for the confirmation of an opinion previously formed. From the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) he certainly did not expect observations of the character which had dropped from him, as he had been informed that they agreed in opinion, upon the construction of that article of the convention which had been the source of discussion.

Mr. F. said he was not induced to offer the amendments to the committee, by a belief that such a construction was advantageous to the United States, but simply because he believed it to have been the intention of the parties. If the calculation of advantages was to govern the construction, the amendments ought not to prevail. It had been suggested by the gentlemen from Virginia and Louisiana, that vessels of the United States bound to France and Spain, might reach the port of destination, and finding a bad market might choose to go to England in search of a better. Gentlemen asked if such vessels were to be deprived of the benefits of this treaty. Mr. F. said he was not able to speak with precision and certainty on this subject, but according to his present impressions, he believed that a vessel under such circumstances would be considered as engaged in the trade between France or Spain and Great Britain, and not in the trade between the United States and Great Britain. Mr. F. apologized for this digression from the question, and concluded by reserving to himself the privilege of entering more fully into the examination of the treaty making power, if it should be made necessary by the discussion, which had been so unprofitably and unnecessarily commenced.

Mr. Hopkinson said, that not anticipating that this bill, which was laid upon the table but yesterday, would so soon be called up for discussion, he had not given that reflection to it, which was necessary for an argument on its principles. Such thoughts and suggestions, however, as had occurred to him on the moment, he would offer to the house with all possible brevity; and a sincere wish that he had been able to give more consideration to their matter, and a better shape to their manner. The gentlemen who press the passage of this bill, said he, seem to take a range of observation far wider than the subject, and to travel over ground not necessary now to be explored. The subject itself offers matter enough for consideration, and of sufficient importance too to deserve the undivided attention of the house. Their ingenuity has been exerted, and their imagination put into action, to create and combine cases of supposed treaties, which would require the aid of the house to carry them into effect, and which must be submitted to its power and control. That cases may occur, and surely that cases may be imagined, in which this house might find itself exceedingly embarrassed by a treaty made by the president and senate, cannot be denied; but is the case now before us of that description? Does any body feel the least reluctance to have the convention go into operation? Does any body say its provisions are of a kind to require any aid from us to carry them into execution, as where money is required, or some collateral assistance, before the treaty can be consummated by performance? Why then shall we fret and embarrass ourselves with possible cases of difficulty, when we are called upon only to decide one, in which there is no difficulty? The cases put are all of an extreme kind; from which it is seldom safe to draw an argument. When, however, they shall occur, they will be met by the house with proper firmness and discretion; on a full view of all its rights and duties as regulated by the constitution; conscientiously performing the latter, and assuming no more of the former than it is entitled to. But let us leave those cases until they do occur—"sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

The question now before the house is, "shall this bill be indefinitely postponed?" and I would presume that if it can be shown that it is utterly unnecessary and useless; that it can produce no sensible effect; that, when passed, it will leave its subject matter precisely as it found it, there is reason enough shewn why it should not be passed. It is surely unbecoming the wisdom and dignity of this body to be gravely enacting nugatory laws; or, as some of the gentlemen have termed this, harmless laws. The enactment of a law can never be without consequences; for if the law itself means nothing and does nothing as a law, it must injure the reputation of the body enacting it. This brings me then directly to the question, do the gentlemen who insist upon this bill believe that it is, in any manner, necessary to the validity of the convention to which it refers? Does that convention require such a law to give it force and effect? Are we to put the finishing hand to it, without which it is a dead letter? It asks no appropriation of money; it requires no collateral or extrinsic act to be done, to enable it to live, and move, and execute its functions. If it be the supreme law of the land, it does of itself all that is necessary for its full consummation; and if it be not the law of the land, what is it? Is it be any thing it is every thing. This treaty has been made, ratified and exchanged by the president and senate, in the manner directed by the constitution. Are gentlemen willing to say, that, notwithstanding this, it still requires our concurrence or confirmation to give it life and validity? Is it no longer a treaty if we shall refuse our concurrence? For it is manifest that if our refusal will not destroy it, our concurrence cannot help it. It is one indivisible act, and its consequences are equally indivisible. I have an insuperable objection to following gentlemen in the discussion of points not necessary to the full understanding and fair decision of the matter before us; and which necessarily lead us into heated controversies and angry questions. When the aid of this house, by money or otherwise, is called for, in order to carry into execution the provisions, or some of them, which this house shall think injurious to the important interests of the country; and it shall be put to us to say, whether we will grant the required assistance, or meet the consequences of a refusal, the house will doubtless take its course with that sound discretion and deliberate judgment which the high, the awful responsibility of the act will demand. They will endeavor to reconcile their constitutional obligations with the safety and interests of the state. A case of this appalling shape and magnitude may be trusted, and must be trusted with the consciences of those who may be called upon to decide it. Happily such is not the case we are now acting upon; I, therefore, confidently bring back the question to the gentlemen, and wait their answer, how and in what manner and degree this convention is to be effected by the adoption or rejection of this bill? What influence will it have upon the validity of a contract, thus made and concluded, ratified and exchanged? That the subject matter of the treaty is within the treaty making power, can scarcely be denied. Nothing is affected by it, but the rate of duties to be paid by the respective parties, in their respective ports; as fair and usual a subject of national contracts, or treaties, as can be imagined. If the president and senate have not power to make treaties of this kind, their power is a mockery—a name without a substance; an authority with nothing upon which it can ever act or be exercised. It is contended by the gentleman from Georgia, that a treaty which affects existing laws upon a subject within the peculiar power of congress, cannot be carried into operation without the concurrent act of this house; and therefore, that inasmuch as the imposing or removing of duties is given by the constitution expressly to congress, a treaty cannot change a law regulating duties, without the aid or concurrence of congress in its ordinary mode of legislation. But his proposition is doubtless much too broad, and most general propositions are. What is more clearly, decidedly, and exclusively in the power of congress, than the right of declaring war? This must be done by a law of congress—and can be done in no other way. Yet this law of congress made on a subject thus within its exclusive power, may be repealed and has been repealed by a treaty of peace made by the president and senate, in the manner prescribed by the constitution, without any reference to the will or pleasure of this house, any dependence on its authority, or any concurrence of its laws. The treaty is duly made and ratified—peace follows; the war is terminated—the act of congress declaring war, and all other acts in relation to it repealed, without the least interference of this house or its opinion upon the subject being even asked or attended to. A treaty must be considered, as it really is, a compact or bargain between the parties, which, once made and concluded in the manner both have agreed to be binding, is no longer in the power of either. If, therefore, this convention has received its ratification in the manner and by the authority prescribed by our constitution or form of government, it is at this moment a valid and binding bargain between the two nations, and no longer rightfully in the power of either. If this convention has not been so ratified, that is, if it has not been done in the proper manner and by the proper authority, it is neither a treaty nor a contract, nor any thing else—and yet we find the president has exchanged it with the other power, as a thing done and ratified in due form and with competent authority; and we find he has proclaimed it to the American people and to the world, as a treaty made and ratified, and as the law of the land to be hereafter observed and obeyed. Has the president been premature in all this, and exceeded the constitutional limits of his authority? Let it be remembered, too, that the public promulgation of this convention as a thing done and concluded, as a bargain made and ratified, as the constitutional law of the land, was the first knowledge or intimation of its nature or contents received by this house. It came to us in the same manner and at the same time it came to every other citizen of the United States. It was communicated to the senate, together with all the correspondence and documents relating to it, in secret; it was examined, discussed and decided upon by the senate in secret; the doors of the chamber were closed upon us; we might have knocked, but should have had no admittance. Does this look like an act requiring our confirmation or aid, or on what we are to be required to pass any judgment? Call first upon the president to furnish you with the necessary information; demand of him to send you the correspondence between the ministers on this subject which we are now to pass our vote upon. All this he did for the senate; and if he has overlooked us, let us remind him of it before we proceed any further.

But can a treaty annul an act of congress? Can it repeal a law? Why not? If a treaty be, as the constitution expressly declares, a law of the land, and a supreme law, is there any thing strange or inconsistent in its repealing another and a prior law.—But the prior law, say the gentlemen, was passed and enacted by the three branches of the government; and this treaty has been made but by two.—And what of this? if the same authority, the same constitution, which gives the three branches power to make a law in general cases, gives the two branches a power to make it in this case. If the constitution declares it to be the law, it must have all the effect of a law, by whomsoever made. In the nature of things there cannot exist at the same time, under the same authority, two contradictory, inconsistent laws or rules of action. One or other must give way; both cannot be obeyed; and if, in this case, the treaty has no constitutional supremacy over an ordinary act of legislation, it at best has the admitted advantage of being earlier in point of time, of being the last constitutional expression of the will of the nation on this subject. It is worthy of remark, that the general powers of legislation is given to congress in one part of the constitution; the special power of making treaties, to the president and senate in another part; and then, the acts of both, if done constitutionally, are declared, in the same sentence in another part of the constitution, to be the supreme law of the land, and placed precisely upon the same footing of authority. I conclude these hasty undigested remarks, with repeating, that if gentlemen believe, and I have not heard it denied, that the convention will go into operation, and is indeed now in operation, without the aid of the law proposed, it is a sufficient reason why the law should not be passed.

The motion to postpone the bill having been negatived—

Mr. Gaston remarked, that perceiving the general wish to come to a conclusion on this bill, he had abstained from answering many remarks which had been made in opposition to his motion for indefinite postponement. But as the controversy was revived on the question for engrossing the bill, he would avail himself of the opportunity to rescue his opinions from misconception, and defend them against the most important of the arguments by which they had been assailed. In ascribing to the convention the power of repealing so much of the acts of congress, on the subject of discriminating duties, as was opposed to its provisions, he was supposed by gentlemen to contend for a supremacy of the power to make treaties over the power to enact laws. Some seem even to have imagined, that he exalted this power of framing treaties over the constitution itself. His opinions were founded on no such erroneous principle. He regarded acts of congress formed on subjects within the jurisdiction of congress, and treaties formed on subjects proper for treaties, as being equally laws of the nation, and he claimed for neither a superiority over the other. The constitution vests all the legislative powers, which it grants, in one organ of the national will, the congress of the United States. It vests the whole of the power of making treaties in another organ of the national will, the president, acting with the concurrence of two-thirds of the senate of the United States. It defines what are the legislative powers granted, because such a definition was necessary to distinguish between those delegated to the general government and such as were retained by the states. It does not limit the power of making treaties, because no part of this power was to be retained by the states. The entire power, therefore, on the subject of treaties, which sovereign states, according to the usages and laws of nations, may exercise, unless where it is restricted by specific prohibitions in the constitution, is vested under this general grant in the proper depositary. The constitution then imparts to proper acts of the legislative authority, and also of the treaty-making power, the character and attributes of "laws," that is, of rules of action prescribed by the sovereign power. They both derive their efficacy from being constitutional expressions of the will of the nation; and where there are two expressions of that will, which cannot stand together, the last necessarily abrogates the first. A law may repeal a treat-

ty. This was done in the case of the treaty of 1778, with France, distinctly repealed by an act of congress. And a treaty for the same reason may also repeal a precedent act of congress, as must be admitted to be the case of the treaties of peace with Great Britain and the regency of Algiers, repealing the acts declaring war against those nations.

The idea that, because the legislative power granted to congress is restricted to certain subjects, therefore the power to make treaties cannot operate on these subjects without legislative aid, seemed to him neither sound logic, nor a construction permitting the treaty power to have any useful effect. Neither a treaty of peace, of alliance, or of commerce, can well be made without affecting some of these subjects. The first usually contains stipulations in regard to captures made or to be made, and indemnities for wrongs suffered. The last must apply directly to the right of regulating commerce with foreign nations; and treaties of alliance specify the aids of men and money to be afforded in the cases prescribed. The power, therefore, to make treaties, which the constitution confides exclusively to the president, concurring with two-thirds of the senate, is essentially annulled by a construction that requires a legislative assent, whenever these treaties operate upon subjects which are the usual well known and legitimate subjects of treaty. For certainly the discretionary power of assenting to, or dissenting from any instrument, and thereby giving or refusing it efficacy, is essentially the power to make it. And if this construction obtain, treaties may be said to be prepared by the president and senate, but they can be made only by congress.

Mr. G. did not conceive that the opinions he had expressed were liable, when properly understood, to the criticism which had been made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Barbour;) they did not involve the inconsistency of permitting an act of the entire legislature to be repealed by the will of a part only of that legislature. The nation, either in the enactment of laws or in the making of treaties is always the agent. It is the will of the nation which operates in both instances—though the expression of this will is made through distinct organs, to which the functions are respectively confided. Perhaps, too, it will be found that there are salutary checks provided against an erroneous expression of this will, in the one case, as in the other. To acts of legislation, the concurrence of the president is not indispensable. Two-thirds of the senate and house of representatives can make laws without his aid. In the formation of treaties he must act, and his act must have the sanction of two-thirds of the senate. The power of making treaties and that of making laws, and the depositories of these powers should be considered as perfectly distinct from each other, as if the individuals who acted in the one case never had an agency in the other.

It did not follow, however, from his doctrine, in regard to the efficacy of treaties, that they necessarily changed or repealed legislative acts, with which they did not entirely accord. The stipulations of a treaty might amount, and often did amount, to no more than a pledge to alter or abrogate these acts, or to make legislative regulations conformable to such stipulations. Where the treaty was of this nature—that is to say, executory merely, legislative aid was necessary. But where it could execute itself, there it needed no aid. What was the nature of the obligation to carry a treaty of the former kind into effect, it was not necessary now to examine. When, however, he stated on a former occasion, that he viewed this obligation as morally binding on this house as a branch of the legislative authority, he did not think that he uttered a sentiment which, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. King) degraded the house of representatives into a mere chamber for registering the edicts of the president and senate. He viewed it as a fundamental principle of our government, that every man and every body of men in it, owed obedience to the laws of the land. The house of representatives cannot claim an exemption from this duty? They may aid in repealing laws—but so long as the laws exist, whether they have derived their origin from a legislative or a treaty declaration of the will of the sovereign power, the house of representatives, the senate, the president, is bound by them. The obligation to appropriate for treaties, was just as binding as the obligation to appropriate for the objects of existing laws. If the gentleman considered this moral restraint as unfriendly either to personal liberty, or to the political freedom of this body, he (Mr. G.) neither wished for himself, or those who were dear to him, a liberty superior to law.

In regard to the practice of the government on similar occasions, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Forsyth) had cited instances which he was not then prepared to examine. Such an examination required a deliberate review of the treaties and acts referred to, which demanded time and books that could not now be commanded. It was possible that some of the cases did prove an unnecessary legislation on subjects which treaties had adequately provided for. But what was the answer to the two prominent and marked cases which Mr. G. had before noticed, viz: the British treaty of 1795, and the convention with the French republic. In the first there were stipulations abolishing discriminating duties on importations from Canada, yet no act of congress was passed to give efficacy to these stipulations—the treaty made them law. In the French convention there was a provision for a mutual restriction of captures. Congress, it is said by the gentleman from Georgia, did pass an act in regard to this provision. They indeed did, and this act was the strongest illustration of their entire concurrence in the opinions he had expressed. This act makes an appropriation of money to authorise payment for such of the property as could not be restored in kind—but it pretended not to command such restoration where it was practicable. If the construction of the gentleman had prevailed, the last was necessary. But neither the congress gave such direction, nor did the president wait for it. He restored the Berceau. According to the exposition which (Mr. G.) had adopted, the appropriation of money was necessary, because the constitution prohibits the payment of money, without an appropriation.

Mr. G. forbore from going further into the discussion, from a conviction that the house was anxious for the question.

Mr. Thorp said, that he did not rise for the purpose of entering into a detailed argument on the question submitted to the house, but merely to state the reasons for the vote he should give; this he deemed due to his friends in this house, because he found himself opposed to the opinions of a majority of them. He should vote against the bill because he thought it unnecessary to pass such a law. The act in question did nothing more than put into the form of a law the several provisions of the treaty, regulating the commerce between the two countries, which were of themselves the supreme law of the land. These provisions did not require a construction, nor any aid by law to carry them into execution. If the object was merely to instruct the revenue officers, he would prefer its being done by the president, or secretary of the treasury, whose duty he conceived it to be, and whose competency could not be doubted. He did not know that the passage of this law, following the provisions of the treaty, would do any great mischief, but he was opposed to the principles on which it was attempted to be supported, and feared that it would at some future period form a dangerous precedent. The treaty-making power was lodged by the constitution in the president and senate, and their act became obligatory on the nation, without the interference of this house, by that section of the constitution, which declares that, "this constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land." An argument has been attempted to be drawn from the fact that the constitution, laws and treaties are classed together in the same sentence, and are all declared to be the law of the land. He said he did not know that he understood what the conclusion was, but if it was as he apprehended it to be, that being all classed together, and in one sentence declared to be the supreme law, that then a treaty was of no greater force than a law, he did conceive that the same argument would prove that the constitution was not paramount to a law, and if that construction prevailed, congress might by law repeal the constitution. But grant that the treaty had no greater efficacy than a law, and could repeal and be repealed by a law, then the act under consideration was unnecessary, as the treaty being subsequent to the law creating discriminating duties, repealed that law; and when a new tariff of duties was created it might be made to conform to the treaty. But it is said the treaty is a compact; hence it is no law to be observed by the people, but only a direction to congress to pass a law. He said, because it is a compact it is superior to the law. An individual may prescribe to himself a rule of conduct, by which he will be governed, but he may depart from that rule whenever he pleases; it is a law to himself, and the power which enacts may repeal. But if he stipulates with another a rule of conduct to be observed by himself, it is a compact, and he cannot depart from it without a violation of his plighted faith, and the rights of that other. This is the distinction between a treaty and a law; and which renders a treaty paramount to the law; the law prescribes a rule of conduct to the citizens of the state, by which they are to be governed, and may be repealed at any time; but a treaty is a compact between two sovereign states, which cannot be departed from by one without violating the faith of that state, and the rights of the other. He said, that an answer to the argument that the treaty is only a direction to congress to pass a law, was to be found in the concluding part of the same section of the constitution, which, after stating that treaties, &c. shall be the supreme law of the land, adds, "and the judges in each state shall be bound thereby." Here was a direction not to congress but to the courts of law, to construe and enforce the treaty, which they were bound to do without reference to any construction which might be put upon it by an act of this body. He trusted he should not be told that this direction was to the judges of the state courts, and not to the judiciary of the United States, and that a treaty might be enforced in the state courts, but would require a law to enforce it in the courts of the United States. For according to that construction it might produce this absurdity, that the treaty would operate upon the states individually, and congress might refuse to pass a law, whereby it could not be treated as a law by the United States' courts. He said, that he could not sanction the idea that this house had any control over the treaty-making power, to ratify or annul their acts unless it was in cases where the treaty could not execute itself, but required for that purpose provision to be made by law, such as raising money, &c. Some gentlemen seem alarmed lest the president and senate, by an assumption of power, should at length claim the right of making war, which they could do by stipulating for war in a treaty. He said, should the right of declaring war exist in one branch of the legislature independent of the others, he could not see but it might as safely be lodged with the president and senate, as with this house.—The right here claimed of supervising the treaty, would lead to that result. War has ceased; we are at peace with Great Britain, by treaty; but if this house in the plenitude of their wisdom, had not thought proper to ratify the treaty, the war is renewed; we must resume our arms, which would effectually vest this branch of the legislature with the power of making war. He said he did not believe that it entered into the views of the framers of the constitution, to vest this house with the power of rejecting or ratifying a treaty; if it did, they would not have left a power, so important, to be gathered from inference. They would have made express provision for it. It would have been easy for them, and they would have declared that the power making treaties, should be vested in the president of the United States and congress.

Mr. Calhoun observed, that the votes on this bill had been ordered to be recorded; and that the house would see, in his peculiar situation, a sufficient apology for his offering his reasons for the rejection of the bill. He had no disposition to speak on this bill; as he felt contented to let it take that course, which, in the opinion of the majority, it ought, till the members were called on by the order of the house to record their votes.

The question presented for consideration is perfectly simple, and easily understood; is this bill necessary to give validity to the late treaty with Great Britain? It appeared to him, that this question is susceptible of a decision, without considering whether a treaty can in any case set aside a law; or, to be more particular, whether the treaty which this bill proposes to carry into effect, does repeal the discriminating duties. The house will remember, that a law was passed at the close of the last session, conditionally repealing those duties. That act proposed to repeal them in relation to any nation, which would on its part agree to repeal similar duties as to this country. On the contingency happening, the law became positive. It has happened, and has been announced to the country that England has agreed to repeal. The president, in proclaiming the treaty, has notified the fact to the house and country. Why then propose to do that by this bill, which has already been done by a previous act? He knew it had been said in conversation, that the provisions of the act were not as broad as the treaty. It did not strike him so. They appeared to him to be commensurate. He would also reason from the appearance of this house, that they were not very deeply impressed with the necessity of this bill. He never, on any important occasion, saw it so indifferent. Whence could this arise? From the want of importance? If, indeed, the existence of the treaty depended on the passage of this bill, nothing, scarcely, could be more interesting. It would be calculated ed to excite strong feelings. We all know how the country was agitated when Jay's treaty was before this house. The question was on an appropriation to carry it into effect; a power acknowledged by all to belong to the house; and on the exercise of which, the existence of the treaty was felt to depend. The feelings manifested, corresponded with this conviction. Not so on this occasion. Further, the treaty has already assumed the form of law. It is so proclaimed to the community; the words of the proclamation are not material; it speaks for itself, and if it means any thing, it announces the treaty as a rule of public conduct, as a law exacting the obedience of the people. Were he of the opposition side; if he, indeed, believed this treaty to be a dead letter till it received the sanction of congress, he would lay the bill on the table and move an enquiry into the fact why the treaty has been proclaimed as a law before it had received the proper sanction. It is true, the executive has transmitted a copy of the treaty to the house; but has he sent the negotiation? Has he given any light to judge why it should receive the sanction of this body? Do gentlemen mean to say that information is not needed; that though we have the right to pass laws to give validity to treaties, yet we are bound by a moral obligation to pass such laws? To talk of the right of this house to sanction treaties, and at the same time to assert that it is under a moral obligation not to withhold that sanction, is a solecism. No sound mind that understands the terms can possibly assent to it. He would caution the house, while it was extending its powers to cases which he believed did not belong to it, to take care lest it should lose its substantial and undoubted power. He would put it on its guard against the dangerous doctrine, that it can in any case become a mere registering body. Another fact in regard to this treaty. It does not stipulate that a law should pass to repeal the duties proposed to be repealed by this bill, which would be its proper form, if in the opinion of the negotiators a law was necessary; but it stipulates in positive terms for their repeal without consulting or regarding us. Mr. C. here concluded this part of the discussion, by stating, that it appeared to him from the whole complexion of the case, that the bill before the house was mere form and not supposed to be necessary to the validity of the treaty. It would be proper, however, he observed, to reply to the arguments which have been urged on the general nature of the treaty-making power, and as it was a subject of great importance, he solicited the attentive hearing of the house. It is not denied, he believed, that the president, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the senate, have a right to make commercial treaties; it is not asserted that this treaty is couched in such general terms as to require a law to carry the details into execution. Why then is this bill necessary? Because, say gentlemen, that the treaty of itself, without the aid of this bill, cannot exempt British tonnage and goods imported in their bottoms, from the operation of the law, laying additional duties on foreign tonnage and goods imported in foreign vessels; or, giving the question a more general form, because a treaty cannot annul a law. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Barbour) who argued this point very distinctly, though not satisfactorily, took as his general position, that to repeal a law is a legislative act, and can only be done by law; that in the distribution of the legislative and treaty-making power, the right to repeal a law fell exclusively under the former. How does this comport with the admission immediately made by him, that the treaty of peace repealed the act declaring war?

He admits the fact in a single case, what becomes of his exclusive legislative right? He, indeed, felt that his rule failed him; and in explanation assumed a position entirely new; for he admitted, that when the treaty did that which was not authorized to be done by law, it did not require the sanction of congress, and might in its operation repeal a law inconsistent with it. He said, congress is not authorized to make peace; and for this reason, a treaty of peace repeals the act declaring war. In this position, he understood his colleague substantially to concur.—He hoped to make it appear, that, in taking this ground, they have both yielded the point in discussion. He would establish, he trusted, to the satisfaction of the house, that the treaty-making power, when it was legitimately exercised, always did that which could not be done by law; and that the reasons advanced to prove that the treaty of peace repealed the act making war, so far from being peculiar to that case, apply to all treaties. They do not form an exception, but, in fact, constitute the rule. Why, then, he asked, cannot congress make peace? They have the power to declare war. All acknowledge this power. Peace and war are the opposites. They are the positive and negative terms of the same proposition; and what rule of construction more clear, than that when a power is given to do an act, the power is also given to repeal it? By what right do you repeal taxes, reduce your army, lay up your navy, or repeal any law, but by the force of this plain rule of construction? Why cannot congress then repeal the act declaring war? He acknowledged, with the gentleman, they cannot, consistently with reason. The solution of this question explained the whole difficulty. The reason is plain—one power may make war; it requires two to make peace. It is a state of mutual amity, succeeding mutual hostility; it is a state that cannot be created but with the consent of both parties. It required a contract or a treaty between the nations at war. Is this peculiar to a treaty of peace? No, it is common to all treaties. It arises out of their nature, and not from any accidental circumstance attaching itself to a particular class. It is no more or less, than that congress cannot make a contract with a foreign nation. Let us apply it to a treaty of commerce, to this very case. Can congress do what this treaty has done? It has repealed the discriminating duties between this country and England. Either could by law repeal its own. But by law they could go no further; and for the same reason that peace cannot be made by law. Whenever, then, an ordinary subject of legislation can only be regulated by contract, it passes from the sphere of the ordinary power of making laws, and attaches itself to that of making treaties, wherever it is lodged. All acknowledge the truth of this conclusion, where the subject on which the treaty operates is not expressly given to congress; but in other cases they consider the two powers as concurrent; and conclude from the nature of such powers, that such treaties must be confirmed by law. Will they acknowledge the opposite, that laws on such subjects must be confirmed by treaties? And if, as they state, a law can repeal a treaty when concurrent, why not a treaty a law? Into such absurdities do false doctrines lead. The truth is, the legislative and treaty-making power, are never in the strict sense concurrent. They both may have the same subject, as in this case, commerce; but they discharge functions as different in relation to it in their nature, as their subject is alike. When we speak of concurrent powers, we mean when both can do the same thing; but he contended, that when the two powers under discussion were confined to their proper sphere, not only the law could not do what could be done by treaty, but the reverse was true; that is, that they never are nor can be concurrent powers. It is only when we reason on this subject that we mistake; in all other cases, the common sense of the house and the country decide correctly. It is proposed to establish some regulation of commerce, we immediately enquire, does it depend on our will; can we make the desired regulation without the concurrence of any foreign power; if so, it belongs to congress, and any one would feel it to be absurd to attempt to effect it by treaty. On the contrary, does it require the consent of a foreign power; is it proposed to grant a favor for a favor, to repeal discriminating duties on both sides? It is equally felt to belong to the treaty power; and he would be thought insane who would propose to abolish the discriminating duties in any case by an act of the American congress. It is calculated, he felt, almost to insult the good sense of the house, to dwell on a point apparently so clear. What then would he infer from what had been advanced? That according to the argument of gentlemen, treaties, producing a state of things inconsistent with the provisions of an existing law, annul such provisions. But as he did not agree with them in the view which they took, he would here present his own for consideration. Why then has a treaty the force which he attributed to it? Because it is an act in its own nature paramount to laws made by the common legislative powers of the country. It is, in fact, a law and something more; a law established by contract between independent nations. To analogize it to private life, law has the same relations to treaty, as the resolution taken by an individual to his contract. An individual may make the most deliberate promise—he may swear it in the most solemn form, that he would not sell his house or any other property he may have; yet, if he would afterwards sell, the sale would be valid in law; he would not be admitted in a court of justice to plead his oath against his contract. Take a case of government in its most simple form, where it was purely despotic, that is, all power lodged in the hands of a single individual. Would not his treaties repeal inconsistent edicts? Let us now ascend from the instances cited, to illustrate the nature of the two powers, to the principle on which the paramount character of a treaty rests. A treaty always affects the interests of two; a law only that of a single nation. It is an established principle of politics and morality, that the interest of the many is paramount to that of the few. In fact, it is a principle so radical, that without it no system of morality, no rational scheme of government, could exist. It is for this reason, that contracts, or that treaties, which are only the contracts of independent nations, or to express both in two words, that plighted faith has in all ages and nations, been considered so solemn. But it is said, in opposition to this position, that a subsequent law can repeal a treaty; and to this proposition, he understood that the gentleman from N. C. (Mr. Gist) assented. Strictly speaking, he denied the fact. He knew that a law might assume the appearance of repealing a treaty; but he insisted it was only in appearance, and that, in point of fact, it was not a repeal. Whenever a law was proposed, declaring a treaty void, he considered the house acted not as a legislative body, but judicially. He would illustrate his ideas. If the house is a moral body, that is, if it is governed by reason and virtue, which it must always be presumed to be, the only question that ever could occupy its attention, whenever a treaty is to be declared void, is, whether under all the circumstances of the case, the treaty is not already destroyed, by being violated by the nation with whom it is made, or by the existence of some other circumstance, if other there can be.—The house determines this question—is the country any longer bound by the treaty? Has it not ceased to exist? The nation passes a judgment on its own contract; and this, from the necessity of the case, as it admits no superior power to which it can refer for decision. If any other consideration moves the house to repeal a treaty, it can be considered only in the light of a violation of a contract acknowledged to be binding on the country. A nation may, it is true, violate a contract; they may even do this under a form of law; but he was not considering what might be done, but what might be rightfully done. It is not a question of power, but of right. Why are not these positions, in themselves so clear, universally assented to? Gentlemen are alarmed at imaginary consequences.—They argue not, as if seeking for the meaning of the constitution; but as if deliberating on the subject of making one; not as members of a legislature, and acting under a constitution already established, but as that of a convention about to frame one.—For his part, he had always regarded the constitution as a work of great wisdom, and, being the instrument under which we existed as a body, it was our duty to bow to its enactments, whatever they may be, with submission. We ought scarcely to indulge a wish that its provisions should be different from what they in fact are. The consequences, however, which appear to work with so much terror on the minds of the gentlemen, he considered to be without any just foundation. The treaty-making power has many and powerful limits, and it will be found when he came to discuss what those limits are, that it cannot destroy the constitution, our personal liberty, involve us without the assent of this house in war, or grant away our money. The limits he proposed to this power, are not the same, it is true; but they appeared to him much more rational and powerful than those which were supposed to present effectual guards to its abuse. Let us now consider what they are: The grant of the power to make treaties, is couched in the most general terms. The words of the constitution are, that the president shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators concur. In a subsequent part of the constitution, treaties are declared to be the supreme law of the land. Whatever limits are imposed on those general terms, ought to be the result of the sound construction of the instrument. There appeared to him but two restrictions on its exercise; the one derived from the nature of our government, and the other from that of the power itself. Most certainly, all grants of power under the constitution must be controlled by that instrument: for, having their existence from it, they must of necessity assume that form which the constitution has imposed. This is acknowledged to be true of the legislative power, and it is doubtless equally so of the power to make treaties. The limits of the former are exactly marked; it was necessary to prevent collision with similar existing state powers. This country is divided into many distinct sovereignties. Exact enumeration here, is necessary to prevent the most dangerous consequences. The enumeration of legislative powers in the constitution, has relation, then, not to the treaty power, but to the powers of the state. In our relation to the rest of the world, the case is reversed. Here the states disappear. Divided within, we present the exterior of undivided sovereignty. The wisdom of the constitution appears conspicuous. When enumeration was needed, there we find the powers enumerated and exactly defined; when not, we do not find what would be vain and pernicious. Whatever then concerns our foreign relations; whatever requires the consent of another nation, belongs to the treaty power, can only be regulated by it, and it is competent to regulate all such subjects; provided, (and here are its true limits) such regulations are not inconsistent with the constitution. If so, they are void. No treaty can alter the fabric of our government, nor can it do that which the constitution has expressly forbid to be done; nor can it do that differently which is directed to be done in a given mode, and all other modes prohibited. For instance, the constitution says, no money "shall be drawn out of the treasury but by an appropriation made by law." Of course, no subsidy can be granted without an act of law; and a treaty of alliance could not involve the country in war without the consent of this house. With this limitation, it is easy to explain the case put by my colleague, who said, that according to one limitation a treaty might have prohibited the introduction of a certain description of persons before the year 1808, notwithstanding the clause in the constitution to the contrary. Mr. C. said that he would speak plainly on this point; it was the intention of the constitution that the slave trade should be tolerated until the time mentioned. It covered him with confusion to name it here; he felt ashamed of such a tolerance, and took a large part of the disgrace, as he represented a part of the union, by whose influence it might be supposed to have been introduced. Though congress alone is prohibited by the words of the clause from inhibiting that odious traffic, yet his colleague would admit that it was intended to be a general prohibition on the government of the union. He perceived his colleague indicated his dissent. It will be necessary to be more explicit. Here Mr. C. read that part of the constitution, and showed that the word "congress" might be left out, in conformity to other parts of the constitution, without injury to the sense of the clause; and he insisted the plain meaning of the parties to the constitution was, that the trade should continue till 1808, and that a prohibition by treaty would be equally against the spirit of the instrument. Besides these constitutional limits, the treaty power, like all powers, has others derived from its object and nature. It has for its object, contracts with foreign nations; as the powers of congress have for their object whatever can be done in relation to the powers delegated to it without the consent of foreign nations. Each, in its proper sphere, operates with general influence: but when they became erratic, then they were portentous and dangerous. A treaty never can legitimately do that which can be done by law; and the converse is also true. Suppose the discriminating duties repealed on both sides by law, yet what is effected by this treaty would not even then be done; the plighted faith would be wanting. Either side might repeal its law without breach of contract. It appeared to him, that gentlemen are too much influenced on this subject by the example of Great Britain. Instead of looking to the nature of our government, they have been swayed in their opinion by the practice of that government, to which we are but too much in the habit of looking for precedents. Much anxiety has recently been evinced to be independent of English broadcloths and muslins; he hoped it indicated the approach of a period when we should also throw off the thralldom of thought. The truth is, but little analogy exists between this and any other government. It is the pride of ours to be founded in reason and equity; all others have originated more or less in fraud, violence or accident. The right to make treaties in England, can only be determined by the practice of that government, as she has no written constitution. Her practice may be wise in regard to her government, when it would be very imprudent here. Admitting the fact to be, then, that the king refers all commercial treaties affecting the municipal regulations of the country to parliament, for its sanction, the ground would be very feeble to prove that to be the intention of our constitution. Strong difference exists between the forms of the two governments. The king is hereditary; he, alone, without the participation of either house of parliament, negotiates and makes treaties; they have no constitution emanating from the people, alike superior to the legislature and the king. Not so here. The president is elected for a short period; he is amenable to the public opinion; he is liable to be impeached for corruption; he cannot make treaties without the concurrence of two thirds of the senate, a fact very material to be remembered; which body is in like manner responsible to the people at periods not very remote; above all, as the laws and constitution are here perfectly distinct, and the latter is alike superior to laws and treaties, the treaty power cannot change the form of government or encroach on the liberties of the country, without encroaching on that instrument, which so long as the people are free, will be watched with vigilance.

Mr. Reynolds said he rose with some diffidence to express his opinion on the great question now before the house, particularly after the great display made by the gentlemen from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, and from Virginia, Mr. Randolph, who had just sat down. But whenever a great constitutional question is involved, Mr. R. said, he would always take the liberty to deliver his sentiments while he had the honor of a seat in this house—He did not mean, however, to enter into the general discussion, which the question now assumed by the eloquence of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Randolph) at this late hour, but merely to state the grounds on which his opinion rested. Mr. R. said it was time enough to meet the extreme case, put by the honorable gentleman, when it should really and absolutely occur. And whenever ministers, who were appointed to negotiate a treaty with a foreign power, would cede a state, or part of a state, or any territory whatever, and that sanctioned by the president and two-thirds of the senate, he hoped in God, there would always be found a redeeming spirit in this house, to check at once a course so enormous and unconstitutional. Mr. R. admitted, that there are, and may be treaties which this house may be bound to register, if you please to call it, and adopt as the supreme law of the land; and those, in his opinion, are exclusively treaties of peace, that do not require any act of legislation to carry the same into effect. But, he insisted, that all treaties of commerce and alliance, or those which required this house to appropriate the money of their constituents, did, and ought to have the sanction of congress before they could be viewed as complete, or "the supreme law of the land." And it was on this ground, Mr. R. said, he was opposed in toto to the doctrines advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun) in favor of the treaty making power. But, said the gentleman with some degree of triumph, the president of the United States has already considered the commercial treaty as complete, because he has published the same to the world as the law of the land, and has merely transmitted a copy of it to this house without any documents to act upon. Sir, said Mr. R. this message is the strongest evidence that can be adduced in favor of the position I have taken. The president of the United States knew well what he was about, and the course he has taken speaks volumes on the subject. What does that message say, Mr. Speaker? It announces to us that the treaty has been duly ratified, and recommends to this house to pass such laws as may be required to carry the same into effect—Sir, this is a treaty regulating commerce between this country and Great Britain. The constitution has confided the regulation of foreign commerce to the congress of the United States. It is a municipal law, over which the house has a right to act. I shall, therefore, vote for the bill on your table, although I do not deem it of much importance as to the validity of the treaty now under consideration, or that its passage is absolutely necessary on the present occasion, but for the purpose of recording my vote in support of the great constitutional authority of this house.

Mr. Tucker said that he should not have risen to offer to the house any remarks on the subject before it, if he had not conceived that there were some important considerations that had not yet been presented to its view. Gentlemen, he said, have so eagerly entered upon the discussion of the general question in relation to the treaty-making power, a question of the greatest magnitude and interest, that their attention seems to have been, in a great measure, withdrawn from the bill under consideration. Let us remember, however, that whatever may be our respective opinions on the subject of the powers of the several branches of government, the passage of this bill may in the present state of things become absolutely necessary; let us reflect, that upon our decision on this occasion, the execution of the treaty on our part in the spirit of good faith, may essentially depend, and whilst we look to the question of constitutional power, let us not entirely forget the peculiar character of this treaty, and the provisions of this bill.

Before I call the attention of the house to the treaty itself, and endeavor to explain the necessity of legislative interference on this occasion, let me touch for a moment on the subject of the treaty-making power; without pretending, however, to comprehensive investigation of the constitutional doctrines in relation to it, as such an attempt would lead to too wide a discussion, and might prove both tedious and uninteresting.

I concede, without hesitation, that the treaty-making power is vested in the president and senate; but so far from assenting to the proposition that congress have in no case a right to interfere; I contend that it may be of the very essence of a treaty to engage on the part of the United States that congress will, or will not, do an act, or will, or will not, pass a law.

I understand a treaty made by the executive to be an engagement entered into by the president and senate on the part of the United States with a foreign power, by which something may be engaged to be done or omitted on the part of this nation. It is rather a contract by which the parties undertake that something shall be done, than an act by which it is done. The stipulations of the instrument which the nation by its executive undertakes to perform, are also of various characters, and separate and disinct natures. Some may be executive merely, some legislative; and indeed, from the treaty made under the old confederation whereby it was stipulated that the creditors of the two nations should meet with no impediment in the recovery of their debts, it seems, that the engagements of the contracting powers may on some occasions be referable to the judiciary department of the government. In either case, the treaty entered into by the president and senate, can be regarded in no other light than as an engagement on the part of this nation, that the stipulations of the contract shall be carried into effect by that department of the government within whose province they may respectively fall. Thus if it be agreed, that an executive act shall be done, the executive alone may carry the treaty into full and complete operation. If it be agreed that something shall be done, which falls within the province of the legislative power, then the legislative aid become necessary, because, though the president and senate may make a treaty, the constitution no where empowers them to make a law. These principles are not only clear and palpable, I conceive, but they have been acted on, and are admitted in effect by the course of argument which has been pursued. Thus, if it be engaged that peace shall be made and armies withdrawn, the executive, by its mandate, proclaims peace, or commands the retreat of its forces; yet, however solemn and obligatory a treaty from the moment of its signature becomes upon that department on which it binds, until that department acts, it is no rule of action for those under its control. If a treaty of peace, for example, be made, yet if the executive fail to promulgate it—if they refuse to proclaim it—if they refuse to give orders to their armies, and their commanders to suspend hostilities, no commander, no officer would be justified in acting under it until his orders were received, unless he did so upon his own responsibility. So too in the case of the treaty under consideration.—However conclusive and plain the treaty may be, who will pretend that every collector and deputy collector in the union, may without orders from any department of the government consider the treaty as the supreme law, as his supreme rule of conduct, and act accordingly? If not, then some other act is necessary to carry this treaty into operation, whether executive or legislative, I will not now stop to enquire. The treaty, then, does not execute itself: It is not, (without anything farther,) the supreme law or rule of conduct for every individual, for if it be, then every individual is justified in acting at once without waiting executive instruction: nay, after receiving such instruction, they would in conscience be bound to follow the treaty (thus become the law of the land) rather than the instruction of the president and his secretaries.

These considerations prove, sufficiently, I conceive, that even where stipulations are made which are fully within the province of the executive power, a treaty does not, cannot execute itself; that it is in truth a contract to do something, not an act by which it is done.

This distinction, Mr. Speaker, becomes yet more plain, when we come to apply it to a treaty containing stipulations by which the nation engages to do something that falls within the sphere of legislative power. I will not stop to prove by laborious reasoning, that cases may occur in which the legislative body must be called on to execute the provisions of a treaty; I will not fatigue the house with an effort to show that there are cases in which the treaty can neither operate as a law, nor the executive enforce its provisions without a law. It would be useless, for the position has always been admitted, has often been acted on, and is now most amply conceded. Such, sir, is the case of a treaty, the stipulations of which, calling upon the treasurers of the country, require an appropriation. Such too the case of a cession of territory spoken of in the debate, if we could dream of such a power existing any where in the federal government. Such, too, the case of the stipulation in the convention, by which Louisiana was ceded to the United States, whereby on certain terms she was to be admitted into the union. Let us pause for a moment and ask ourselves, whether such treaties can be regarded as executing themselves; whether they can have operation without legislative aid? Can a treaty lay a tax; can a treaty make an appropriation; can a treaty, ipso facto, cede territory; can a treaty erect a territory into a state? Can these things be done by the treaty alone, or by the aid and instrumentality of the executive without legislative assistance? It is admitted on all hands they cannot. Even the most zealous supporters of the treaty-making power acknowledge, that they must in such cases look to the legislature, though they contend that this body is bound to pass the necessary laws. I will not stop at this time to examine this principle, but ask, whether it is not palpable from these admissions, that in all such cases a treaty does not actually make or change the law, but only engages on the part of the United States that it shall be made or changed. If so, I am not incorrect in supposing, that a treaty is merely an engagement that certain acts shall be done by that department of the government within whose province they may fall; and that it does not operate in cases falling within the sphere of the legislative power, without the aid of that branch of the government.

If it were otherwise, if we were indeed to give into the monstrous construction, that a treaty of itself is to be regarded as a law; that it can repeal a solemn act of the legislature, and operate directly upon the community without the agency of that branch of the government, in cases exclusively within the legislative sphere, to what fatal lengths shall we not be led. If treaties have this effect in one case, why not in all? If in taking off a duty, why not in making an appropriation; if in repealing one law, why not in passing another; why not in laying taxes granting subsidies, making cessions of territory, and even paying tribute to an Algerine dey without consent of congress, if, indeed, our gallant seamen had not procured more honorable terms for us in the late negotiation? Can gentlemen draw the line of discrimination? Can they point out that part of the constitution, which, in the supposed concession to the treaty-making power of the legislative authority, says to the former "thus far shalt thou go and no farther?" And if they cannot, this independence of the legislature must exist in all cases or none. It is admitted that it does not exist in all (as in the cases of appropriation, &c.) and I therefore conclude it exists in none.

But if the legislative authority be necessary, is it true that we are bound to act in a particular way? Is it true that we must pass the laws which the treaty-making power engages we shall pass? Impossible! When our aid is called for, we must have the power to deliberate; if to deliberate, we must have a discretion to pass or to reject, since without it deliberation is a mockery and legislative solemnities a fair subject of derision and contempt.

There is another point of view, Mr. Speaker, in which I would present this subject to the house.

To whom has the constitutional charter given the legislative power? I answer in the explicit language of the instrument in its commencing clause, "to a congress of the United States which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." Is this ample grant restricted by any subsequent part of the instrument?—We are referred by gentlemen to the treaty-making power and to the clause which, as they contend, declares that "treaties shall be made the supreme law of the land." If indeed by any fair construction this clause can be deemed to declare that treaties shall be superior to the laws, then our adversaries may claim the victory; otherwise they must yield it. But does it so? It declares the constitution and the laws of congress, and the treaties, to be the supreme law:—Superior to what? To the laws of the states: as we perceive by the conclusion; "any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It declares all three to be supreme; it does not attempt to graduate the respective authority of each, nor can it be predicated of either, that under this clause it is superior to the others. Even the constitution itself, would have no claims to superiority, if it looked only to this passage for its title to supremacy.

If, then, the legislative power be vested in congress, and if by this clause it be not taken away or subject to the control of the treaty-making power, I presume it remains unimpaired in the representatives of the nation. If so, their concurrence is not only essential to carry into effect a treaty touching upon legislative powers, but, in acting upon it, they must deliberate with the freedom of independent legislators.

It is contended, however, by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) that a treaty is superior to the law, because it is a contract between our nation and another power. I am ready to admit, Mr. Speaker, the ingenuity of the gentleman in drawing this distinction. It is what may well be expected from his ingenious and active mind. But I think it will appear that it is more ingenious than solid, more true than applicable to the subject.

I admit that where a contract has been entered into and completed by all the necessary powers under our constitution, it is binding upon the nation. But the question still recurs, when is it complete? In the case of a treaty containing stipulations merely executive, it is complete when the ratifications are exchanged. In the case of a treaty which requires a legislative act to give it operation, we contend that the legislative sanction must be given before it is complete. Until then it is not a binding contract, and the rights of the third party (the foreign power) do not exist. Is it not the "petitio principii," or (if the gentleman will permit me to use the vulgar translation) is it not begging the question to contend, that before the legislative sanction the contract is binding, when the very question between us is, whether that sanction be necessary to make it binding?

Let it not be said that foreign nations know nothing of these constitutional niceties. My friend from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) has already given the proper answer to such a suggestion. The foreign power which contracts with us is bound to look to the constitutional charter to see that they contract with the proper authority. Suppose the treaty were ratified by the president without the assent of the senate. Could the foreign power complain of broken faith because we should refuse to abide by it? Could it allege that it knew nothing of the necessity of senatorial ratification: that it was not versed in the mysteries of our constitution? By no means. If a foreign power contracts without looking to the authority and constitutional extent of powers of those who undertake to treat with them, the loss be upon them: We are not to be the sufferers. So, if, as we contend, all treaties involving legislative power require legislative sanction, foreign powers must look to it, and seeing that the executive are not omnipotent and have no power to bind us absolutely in such cases, they must act accordingly.

Let us in testing the correctness of the principle contended for on the other side of the house, examine moreover whether it does not lead to inevitable inconsistency.—It is asserted that a treaty is superior to a law in conflict with its provisions, and repeals a prior legislative act which is at variance with its stipulations. Here then the treaty making power is superior to the law. Yet it is admitted that congress can declare war, a prior treaty to the contrary notwithstanding, and by the act of war annul and abrogate a treaty. Here then the law is superior to the treaty making power.—Can it at the same time be both superior and inferior? Can it be true that whilst the president and senate can repeal pre-existing laws, the same power which made those pre-existing laws, can in its turn become superior, and abrogate the act of the president and senate? Impossible! it is an inconsistency that cannot be admitted; it is a construction that would beget unutterable confusion.

But it is said by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun) that the act of declaring war is rather a judicial than a legislative act. I understand the gentleman's idea and admit the ingenuity of the distinction, though it cannot avail him in answer to the difficulty I have suggested. I suppose the gentleman to mean, that in passing an act declaring war the congress of the United States express their opinion in judgment on the state of the relations between this country and its adversary, pronouncing that in their judgment subsisting treaties are broken and that such an act is not to be regarded as mere ordinary legislation in which the interest and advantage of the nation are the chief objects in view. Should we admit this subtle distinction, does it avoid the difficulty? Is not the congress if possessed of the power of declaring war, whatever be the nature of the act, superior to the treaty-making power whose contracts it thereby abrogates? And does not the question still recur, whether it can be both superior and inferior—whether the legislative and the treaty-making power can reciprocally and ad infinitum repeal the acts of each other?

Such, Mr. Speaker, are some of the considerations on the subject of the treaty-making power which have presented themselves to my mind; and though it would not be difficult to take a much more extensive range on this interesting subject, yet I shall leave to others to do so and proceed to the second enquiry I proposed to myself.—Does the treaty under consideration require legislative aid to effectuate its provisions? If it does, gentlemen on all sides of the house should concur in voting for the bill. We should do so, because we all believe it advisable to carry the treaty into complete effect; those on the other side should do so peculiarly, because according to their doctrines they are morally bound to legislate where the treaty requires legislative aid. All should be solicitous to avoid the slightest imputation on the faith of the nation.

If ever there was a treaty in which legislative aid was necessary, this appears to me peculiarly to require it. Its stipulations not only comprehend subjects within the sphere of the legislative power, but those subjects of legislation which are more peculiarly the province of this branch of the government. Whether we consider the question in relation to the peculiar powers of this house in relation to taxation to the pledge of the duties in question to the public creditors, or the particular provisions of the instrument, I can perceive no constitutional means of carrying the convention into effect without legislative co-operation.

Is there, I will ask, any subject of legislation, Mr. Speaker, in which this house has greater interest or greater constitutional control than that which is in any wise connected with taxation and revenue? Can gentlemen point out any thing more important, and more interwoven with all our feelings than the question "on what articles shall the taxes be laid, from what subjects shall the necessary revenues of the government be raised?" What has produced in this house more sensation than whether the revenues shall be raised from whiskey, from sale from merchandize or land? The objects of taxation are equally important and interesting with the quantum to be raised or the approbation of it after it has been raised; and if gentlemen admit that an appropriation by this house is necessary to effectuate the provisions of a treaty, which engages that such an appropriation shall be made, they must equally concede the necessity of a legislative act, where a treaty affects the mode in which the public burdens shall be imposed. And what is the present case? The treaty engages that a part of our revenues which were heretofore raised from taxes and duties on British ships shall be taken from them, and of course shall be raised from other objects. As we must raise the amount, and can no longer derive it from British vessels we must draw it from still taxes or land taxes, or from some other source which might be equally disagreeable; and thus although this house has a peculiar control over such subjects, the president and senate under the construction given to the constitution by some gentlemen in the debate, would be vested by that instrument with the monstrous power of directing this body in what manner taxes shall be laid. This cannot be true;—this cannot be the fair interpretation of the instrument. A law in this case is therefore peculiarly necessary to remove those duties which the legislative body alone can impose, and alone can abrogate.

The necessity of legislative interference on the present occasion is yet more palpable, when we turn our attention to the public creditors. The very duties in question are pledged to them for the payment of their claims, and the nation has solemnly engaged its faith that they shall continue, until the debt is paid off, reserving however to congress (not to the president and senate) the right to substitute others in their stead. Shall this power reserved by the act to congress, composed of all the branches of the legislature, be exercised then by the president and senate alone? Shall they have the authority without our acquiescence, and the powers reserved to us, to sweep away the mortgaged subject, and break the pledged faith of the nation with the public creditor? Will the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) he who has so strenuously contended for the inviolability of contracts, will he assume such a position? I am sure he will not.—But if the president and senate have the powers reserved to congress of taking off those duties at their discretion, have they also the power of making the substance, and of laying the taxes which are to supply their place? If they have—then is the constitutional power of this house gone forever—If they have not, then they have the power of breaking the plighted faith of the nation and annulling the mortgage we have given to our creditors. Either alternative is so pregnant with mischief, that we must renounce the construction which leads to it, and acknowledge the necessity of the agency of congress, under the provisions of the law I have quoted, to abolish duties which have been solemnly pledged to their creditors.

When we look to the provisions of the convention itself we cannot doubt I conceive of the necessity of the bill before you. What does the convention provide? that the duties on American and British bottoms which are now unequal, shall be equalized:—And can this equality only be effected in one mode—by taking off the additional ten per cent. on British ships? Cannot an equalization be equally effected by raising the duties on American ships to the present duties on British vessels? And have we not even the poor privilege of deciding which of the alternatives shall be adopted? Does the treaty making power draw to it this power also? Because the president and senate have bound the nation to effect an object in one of two ways, have they also the power of declaring which of the two shall be adopted, to the exclusion of the legislative power of this house? Impossible. If we have not the right now, we never can have it hereafter; and according to this idea congress can never lay any additional duties on tonnage, however equal in their operation, because a paramount power (the president and senate) have declared that under this treaty, the extra duties shall be taken off.

I conclude therefore, Mr. Speaker, that for the reasons I have offered, our aid as a legislative body is necessary on the present occasion, and that the bill before the house should be passed. I am ready to give that aid and to vote for the passage of the bill because I believe it will be advantageous to the nation, and because I apprehend that without such an act the treaty must either remain unexecuted, or the executive must assume to itself powers which are not within its province.

Mr. Easton said, he had intended yesterday to deliver his sentiments in relation to the subject matter of the bill upon which the vote of the house was about to pass; not having then been so fortunate as to gain the floor, he now had risen to advocate its passage, and for that purpose, begged the indulgence of the house; he asked not only the indulgence, but the attention of the house to the arguments he was about to urge upon the occasion. He considered the passage of the bill very important, as it regarded the powers, under the constitution, delegated to congress; the powers delegated to the president and senate; the powers delegated to the courts of justice; and highly important as it regarded the rights and liberties of the people of this nation.

He apprehended very injurious consequences might, at some future period, result to the nation by a contrary course. The convention being reciprocal and beneficial, it was the avowed intention and desire of all parties to carry it into effect. It had been said, by gentlemen on both sides of the house, that the convention was, of itself, the supreme law of the land, whilst a majority had inclined to the opinion that legislative provisions are necessary to give it force and efficiency, though some doubted as to the expediency of legislating at all upon the subject. I am of opinion, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. E. that it is not a treaty until it shall have been sanctioned by the congress of the United States, by a legislative act, to carry it into effect.

The precedent about to be established, on the present occasion, was, of all others, the most favorable to the security, or pernicious in the extreme to the future liberties of the American people.

What are the powers by the constitution delegated to congress? And what are those delegated to the treaty-making power? In adverting to the constitution it will be found, that "all legislative powers are vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." "The congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Surely, then, this power is not granted to any other authority. It cannot be given to two separate, distinct and independent authorities. If it is given to congress, it is not given to the treaty-making power, to the exclusion of congress: it may be given to both to act in concert: it is not given to the one, to act to the exclusion of the other. This is a government of laws; it is not a government by compacts, by conventions, or by treaties concluded independent of the powers of congress, in violation of the constitution, and beyond the control of the supreme authority of the land, the sovereignty of this nation. What is the present convention? It is "a convention to regulate commerce between the territories of the United States and his Britannic majesty;" it is then an agreement upon the face of it "to regulate commerce with a foreign nation." The president "has power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the senators present concur." It is not ordained in this clause of the constitution, that such treaties are made "under the authority" of the United States, nor that a treaty thus made, shall "be the supreme law of the land." It would be indeed extraordinary, if the destinies and liberties of this nation were to rest upon the will of the treaty forming power: I say treaty forming power, because it is but another expression to convey a correct idea.

A power composed (as the case might happen) of the executive and thirteen senators, a less number by far than a majority of that honorable body; a power specially given to one authority, under the constitution, cannot be construed to be given to another; such a construction would introduce into the government an irregularity, and an inconsistency fatal to its harmony, and destructive in its consequences. The president has a qualified negative upon the laws of congress; the senate are a part of congress. Is not the regulation of commerce trusted to the proper authority? Is it not in safe hands? Will you—can you treat the authority given to congress, by the constitution, "to regulate commerce," as a dead letter?

If this construction prevails, is the treaty made without the concurrence of the president and senate? Shall it be binding without the assent of congress? If that assent is given, it is a treaty made under the authority of the United States. If it is withheld, it is a treaty made under the authority of the president and senate, and not a treaty made under the authority of the United States. I should regret, and who are they that would not regret, to see the authority and destinies of this nation placed in the hands of an executive and a senate?

If the treaty-making power possess the authority to make commercial and other regulations, they may go on regulating till they will have regulated

This branch of the government (the house of representatives) out of its whole weight of influence upon the councils of the nation; their authority will become a mere carte blanche, to be filled up as the treaty-making power may think proper to dictate or direct. Congress may regulate commerce in one manner; the president and senate, at their pleasure, change that regulation.

It is a correct principle, that subsequent laws, inconsistent with former laws, repeal such former laws, and is a rule which cannot be controverted. It is a principle as sound and potent as the eternal principles of justice. But the question to be decided is, when does a treaty become a law, when has it efficacy as such, and when shall it be binding as the supreme authority of the nation? Two separate and distinct legislative authorities, independent of each other, possessing equal power, cannot in one and the same government exist together. That is, if the executive and senate alone can legislate, it is perfectly idle to vest the legislative authority in congress. "A house divided against itself cannot stand." Congress divided against itself must fall. Congress have power, or they have not power, to legislate. If they do possess the whole power of legislation granted under the constitution, of which there cannot be a question, it follows as a certain and incontrovertible conclusion, that the president and senate alone, forming only two branches of the legislative authority of this government acting in their executive capacities, as necessarily they must do in negotiating treaties, do not possess authority to legislate independent of the house of representatives, the immediate representatives of the people; the people have not granted such power.

It would be admitted, he presumed, that ours is the best constitution and government 'here below,' that it is the best to be found among the nations of the earth. It may emphatically be stiled a constitution of checks and balances; the senate in its legislative capacity is a check upon the house of representatives; the president upon the congress. There must be a concurrence according to the provisions of the constitution to form a law, and laws must be made before they can be executed: in the executive and treaty-making capacity of the president and senate, the house of representatives, with the constitution in their hand, hold a check; a treaty cannot become the supreme law of the land which is inconsistent with the constitution or the powers delegated to congress by the constitution.

"The president shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls;" suppose they should appoint "swarms of officers" needless and unnecessary. The appointments are complete, the officers are made; they hold the seals of office under the authority of the constitution; they are officers to all intents and purposes, they are commissioned under the authority of the United States, their appointments do not infringe any right or trespass upon any authority delegated to congress, and yet in my humble opinion, congress, would not be bound in honor, or otherwise, to sanction such a procedure by originating an appropriation bill for the outfits and expenditures of such officers. Congress are not bound, nor is the nation bound, nor are the courts of justice bound, to consider a treaty as the law of the land, till that law has been made under the authority only competent to make laws for the people of this nation to wit: the congress of the United States.

It has been contended that the treaty repeals the discriminating duties, and it being concerning affairs wholly international, that the legislative acts of this government operate wholly internally, and cannot reach or affect the domestic or internal regulations of the foreign nation; that the convention therefore is a compact, and its subject matter a contract to which the legislative authority of this country cannot extend. I admit, said Mr. E. that all treaties when completed and carried into effect by the supreme authority of a state or kingdom, are compacts, and form a part of the law of nations, but this nation is not bound by a contract to which it has not given its assent; the senate do not go abroad, nor do they negotiate the terms of a treaty at home; to an honorable and beneficial treaty, the assent of congress and of this honorable house is as easily obtained as that of the senate: in ordinary legislation committees report bills, they go to different readings, according to the rules prescribed by the different branches of the legislature, are rejected, or finally, with the approbation of the president, pass into laws, and become binding on the nation. The president has no legislative authority strictly so speaking, and yet no bill can become a law without his assent, but by the consent of two thirds of both houses of congress.

There is no expression in the constitution that authorizes the senate to ratify a treaty, the phrase used by the constitution is, to make treaties. The question is, when shall a treaty be said to be made? ministers and envoys extraordinary are appointed and commissioned to agree upon the terms of a treaty; they meet the foreign embassy in convention, they conclude a treaty: the convention with Great Britain was concluded on the third day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, it was then moulded, it was not then made, although in common parlance it is said to have been made. It was like dough unbaked. It will not be bread till it is baked. The treaty is forwarded to the president: if he disapproves of it, he returns it to those who framed it; if he likes it, he submits it to the senate; if they approve of it, it is ratified; it is then said to be made. But it is not yet completed under the authority of the United States; it is only a treaty sub modo; it is not a treaty in effect. It does not become the property of the nation till it shall have received the sanction of the national consent, through the organs of the national will. The constitution does not declare that a treaty made, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall be the supreme law of the land. It does not say that a treaty so concluded, so ratified, so made, or whatsoever you may please to term it, is made under the authority of the United States. It cannot be a treaty till it shall have received the sanction of the national authority under the constitution; when it shall have received that sanction, it is then, and not till then, a treaty made under the constitution and under the laws of the United States, and such a treaty made under their authority, to which the judicial power shall extend. They are treaties only made under the authority of the United States, which are declared to be the supreme law of the land by the constitution, and which the judges in every state are bound to obey; for example; it might be said, that a piece of parchment in printed form of a commission, filled out with the name of the incumbent, and sign manual of the executive subscribed to it, is a commission; and yet it is not a commission under the authority of the U. States, until the proper seal shall be thereto set, and affixed in due form of law.

Sir, the present convention is a commercial regulation, which interferes with the powers expressly delegated to the legislative authority, and therefore must receive the legislative sanction, the confirmation of congress, before it can be binding on the people of this nation; and without which, it is not competent to the president and senate, or to the judicial authority, to enforce.

The constitution expressly ordains, that "congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof." No department or officer coming in contact with the powers delegated to congress by the constitution, have authority under the government, and it would be a solecism to say we have a government under the constitution, independent of congress. This constitution can do no injury to our republican institution; it may be productive of much good; it is placing it beyond the reach of the treaty-making power; to repeal this treaty by making another no inconvenience will result, as two thirds of the senate have concurred in approving of it; and I should presume there can be no obstacle to the passage of the bill in that honorable body.

I perceive, sir, said Mr. V. by a bill now on the table, that the senate propose to declare by act of congress, "that so much of any act or acts as is contrary to the provisions of the convention, shall be deemed and taken to be of no force or effect." If the treaty is a law, and as such, binding upon the nation, the passage of such a bill is wholly unnecessary, upon the principle that subsequent laws repeal former laws, in all cases where they are inconsistent with each other; and why are two thirds of the senate required to make a treaty? it would appear to me that as this house have not the power to negotiate a treaty, it would be scarcely proper that it should be called upon to discuss one, that two thirds of the senate present, would not deem beneficial and honorable to the country. If a contrary construction shall prevail, and it shall be determined that a treaty made and approved by the president and senate, is of itself the supreme law of the land, then indeed can they legislate, then indeed can they regulate commerce, and the supreme authority will be placed in the hands of the executive; the senate, and the courts of justice, who may also legislate without the aid, and beyond the control of congress, make contracts, and carry into effect treaties, however odious they may be to the people, or to their immediate representatives; this may be, I do not say it will be, the effect of this monstrous treaty-making power.

Congress may declare war; no authority is expressly given by the constitution to make peace; if any treaty would be binding, made independent of the legislative authority, he was inclined to believe it would be a treaty of peace, and yet this would only form one exception; it would be a treaty not against the provisions of any article of the constitution, as the power is not delegated to any other branch of the government; it becomes the exclusive province of the treaty-making power, and does not require a law to give it validity, or to carry it into effect: it is a treaty made under the authority of the United States. The great objects in going to war, are the protection of the national rights, and to secure an honorable peace; such a peace would be acquiesced in by common consent; and the power to make peace is not a dangerous power—it is suited to the trust of the executive alone, who would have authority, being the commander in chief of the whole military, to carry it into effect.—But it is perfectly idle to talk of authority to do this, that, or the other thing, under our constitution and form of government, without power to carry that authority into effect. The power to act under the constitution, is evidence of a right to act, and to act with effect. The constitution should be construed to harmonise all its parts, and the construction which he had given would produce such harmony. It is unnecessary, and would be improper in congress to legislate upon the treaty to give it a construction that belongs to another authority, to the courts of judicature, any construction congress might give it would not be binding upon the courts; yet every member who legislates upon a treaty must, in making up his opinion, whether to carry it into effect or not, give it his own construction, in order to form such opinion correctly.

In the 6th article of the constitution it is declared, that the "constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all articles which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby." What is the authority of the United States? the constitution and will of the people expressed through their representatives in the congress of the United States; the legislative authority of the nation is that authority, without which no law or treaty can become the supreme law of the land. An individual officer, a judge, a marshal, or a justice of the peace, may act under the authority of the United States, so long as he keeps himself within the pale of the constitutional limits, and the laws of the United States enjoining the duties to be by him performed. The constitution is the paramount law, but without the aid of congress it becomes inoperative. A person may possess the faculty to play upon an organ, but if he has not that instrument he does not possess either the power or the means to play upon it. The president, by the constitution, shall be commander in chief of the army and navy, when called into the service of the United States; but he cannot command, if there shall not be any army or navy called into the service of the United States.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States and the treaties which shall be made under their authority." If the words "under their authority" had been omitted, their powers would not have been construed to extend to foreign treaties. Hence the judicial power cannot carry into effect a treaty not made under the authority of the constitution and laws of the United States; a law is as necessary to the validity of a treaty as the constitution itself.

He did not wish to be understood, that a law is necessary in all cases to the validity of a treaty; he meant to extend it only to cases where a treaty would contravene the powers delegated to congress. If the constitution itself gives authority to make the treaty, the treaty thus made becomes the supreme law of the land; the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, and the judicial power of the United States shall extend to it; but a treaty not thus made cannot be carried into execution by the judicial authority; they certainly would not adjudge a treaty to be made under the authority of the United States, when the treaty is made in derogation of that authority; he spoke of the authority expressly delegated to congress.

Suppose a treaty made on a subject not prohibited, nor permitted by the constitution, as in the case of the treaty for the purchase of the province of Louisiana; that power is not expressly delegated to any authority, under the constitution, nor it is for bidden; the constitution is silent; one of the conditions of the compact is for the payment of 15,000,000 of dollars to France; the convention is ratified; the money is not paid; is it then a treaty? it is not. It becomes a nullity if the money is withheld; but, according to the argument of some gentlemen, it is a treaty, and the supreme law of the land; and yet it is not a treaty; and so, it is a treaty, and it is not a treaty: suppose the money paid, it is then a treaty, and not till then has it received the sanction of the legislative authority, under the constitution, and becomes the supreme law: the treaty contains a stipulation that the inhabitants shall be admitted into the union. It is the supreme law of the land, and yet the courts are not enabled to carry that clause of the treaty into effect: it requires further legislative provisions.

It has been said, sir, that the president has ratified the convention with Great Britain, that it has been approved of by the senate; and sent forth to the public by a proclamation as a treaty, and if it is not a treaty the president knows not what he is about. Sir, said Mr. E. the president does know what he is about: that wise, intelligent and upright chief magistrate, who has long enjoyed the confidence of this nation, was a member of the convention who framed the constitution, understands the subject correctly; in his communication of the treaty to the senate and house of representatives, on the 23d day of December last, he says, "I lay before congress copies of a proclamation notifying the convention concluded with G. Britain, on the 3d day of July last, and that the same has been duly ratified: and I recommend to congress such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States."

He who helped to make the constitution recommends to congress legislative provisions in relation to this treaty, and such as it may call for, on the part of the United States."

The principles for which I contend, Mr. speaker, said Mr. E. are briefly these: a treaty though made has not force, and cannot be said to be made under the national authority, without a law of congress giving it that authority, or to carry it into effect: that is, in all cases where the treaty in its provisions interferes with, or contravenes any of the powers expressly delegated to the legislative authority, or where from the nature of the treaty itself it requires legislative provision; but if the treaty is not made contrary to the provisions of the constitution, and does not contravene any of the powers delegated to congress, and is of the description that it can be carried into effect by the president alone, or by the president and senate, or by the judicial authority, without the aid of congress, legislation in such cases becomes wholly useless; treaties thus made are the supreme law of the land, which every citizen is bound to respect and to obey.

Mr. Pinkney said, he intended yesterday, if the state of his health had permitted, to have trespassed on the house with a short sketch of the grounds upon which he disapproved of this bill. What I could not do then, said he, I am about to endeavour now, under the pressure nevertheless, of continuing indisposition, as well as under the influence of a natural reluctance thus to manifest an apparently ambitious and improvident hurry to lay aside the character of a listener to the wisdom of others, by which I could not fail to profit, for that of an expounder of my own humble notions, which are not likely to be profitable to any body. It is, indeed, but too probable that I should best have consulted both delicacy and discretion, if I had forborne this precipitate attempt to launch my little bark upon what an honorable member has aptly termed "the torrent of debate" which this bill has produced. I am conscious that it may with singular propriety be said of me, that I am novus hospes here, that I have scarcely begun to acquire a domicile among those whom I am undertaking to address; and that recently transplanted hither from courts of judicature, I ought for a season to look upon myself as a sort of exotic, which time has not sufficiently familiarised with the soil to which it has been removed, to enable it to put forth either fruit or flower. However all this may be, it is now too late to be silent. I proceed therefore, to entreat your indulgent attention to the few words with which I have to trouble you upon the subject under deliberation.

That subject has already been treated with an admirable force and perspicuity on all sides of the house. The strong power of argument has drawn aside, as it ought to do, the veil which is supposed to belong to it, and which some of us seem unwilling to disturb; and the stronger power of genius, from a higher region than that of argument, has thrown upon it all the light with which it is the prerogative of genius to invest and illustrate every thing. It is fit that it should be so; for the subject is worthy by its dignity and importance to employ in the discussion of it all the powers of the mind, and all the eloquence by which I have already felt that this assembly is distinguished. The subject is the fundamental law. We owe it to the people to labor with sincerity and diligence, to ascertain the true construction of that law, which is but a record of their will. We owe it to the obligations of the oath which has recently been imprinted upon our consciences; as well as to the people, to be obedient to that will when we have succeeded in ascertaining it. I shall give you my opinion upon this matter, with the utmost deference for the judgment of others; but at the same time with that honest and unreserved freedom which becomes this place, and is suited to my habits.

Before we can be in a situation to decide whether this bill ought to pass, we must know precisely what it is; what it is not is obvious. It is not a bill which is auxiliary to the treaty. It does not deal with details which the treaty does not bear in its own bosom. It contains no subsidiary enactments, no dependent provisions, flowing as corollaries from the treaty. It is not to raise money, or to make appropriations, or to do any thing else beyond or out of the treaty. It acts simply as the echo of the treaty.

"Ingeminat voces, auditaque verba reportat." It may properly be called the twin-brother of the treaty; its duplicate, its reflected image, for it re-enacts with a timid fidelity, somewhat inconsistent with the boldness of its pretensions, all that the treaty stipulates, and having performed that work of supererogation, stops.—It once attempted something more, indeed; but that surplus has been expunged from it as a desperate intruder, as something which might violate, by a misinterpretation of the treaty, that very public faith which we are now prepared to say the treaty has never plighted in any the smallest degree. In a word, the bill is a fac simile of the treaty in all its clauses.

I am warranted in concluding, then, that if it be any thing but an empty form of words, it is a confirmation or ratification of the treaty; or, to speak with a more guarded accuracy, is an act to which only (if passed into a law) the treaty can own its being. If it does not spring from the "puritus leges ferendi," by which this body can never be affected, I am warranted in saying, that it springs from an hypothesis (which may afflict us with a worse disease) that no treaty of commerce can be made by any power in the state but congress. It stands upon that postulate, or it is a mere bubble, which might be suffered to float through the forms of legislation, and then to burst without consequence or notice.

That this postulate is utterly irreconcilable with the claims and port with which this convention comes before you, it is impossible to deny. Look at it. Has it the air or shape of a mere pledge that the president will recommend to congress the passage of such laws as will produce the effect at which it aims? Does it profess to be preliminary, or provisional, or inchoate, or to rely upon your instrumentality in the consummation of it, or to take any notice of you, however distant as actual or eventual parties to it? No—it pretends upon the face of it, and in the solemnities with which it has been accompanied and followed, to be a pact with a foreign state, complete and self-efficient, from the obligation of which this government cannot now escape, and to the perfection of which no more is necessary than has already been done. It contains the clause which is found in the treaty of 1794, and substantially in every other treaty made by the United States under the present constitution, so as to have become a formula, that, when ratified by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and by his Britannic majesty, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, it shall be binding and obligatory on the said states and his majesty.

It has been ratified in conformity with that clause. Its ratifications have been exchanged in the established and stipulated mode. It has been proclaimed, as other treaties have been proclaimed, by the executive government, as an integral portion of the law of the land, and our citizens at home and abroad have been admonished to keep and observe it accordingly. It has been sent to the other contracting party with the last stamp of the national faith upon it, after the manner of former treaties with the same power, and will have been received and acted upon by that party as a concluded contract, long before your loitering legislation can overtake it. I protest, sir, I am somewhat at a loss to understand what this convention has been since its ratifications were exchanged, and what it is now, if our bill be sound in its principle. Has it not been, and is it not, an unintelligible, unbaptized and unbaptizable thing, without attributes of any kind, bearing the semblance of an executed compact, but in reality a hollow fiction; a thing which no man is held to consider even as the germ of a treaty, entitled to be cherished in the vineyard of the constitution; a thing which professing to have done every thing that public honor demands, has done nothing but practise delusion? You may ransack every diplomatic nomenclature, and run through every vocabulary, whether of diplomacy or law, and you shall not find a word by which you may distinguish, if our bill be correct in its hypothesis, this "deed without a name." A plain man who is not used to manage his phrases, may, therefore, presume to say, that if this convention with England be not a valid treaty, which does not stand in need of your assistance, it is an usurpation on the part of those who have undertaken to make it; that if it be not an act within the treaty-making capacity, confided to the president and senate, it is an encroachment on the legislative rights of congress.

I am one of those who view the bill upon the table, as declaring that it is not within that capacity, as looking down upon the convention as the still born progeny of arrogated power, as offering to it the paternity of congress, and affecting by that paternity to give to it life and strength; and as I think that the convention does not stand in need of any such filiation, to make it either strong or legitimate, that it is already all that it can become, and that useless legislation upon such a subject is vitious legislation, I shall vote against the bill. The correctness of these opinions is what I propose to establish.

I lay it down as an incontrovertible truth, that the constitution has assumed (and indeed how could it do otherwise) that the government of the United States might and would have occasion, like the other governments of the civilized world, to enter into treaties with foreign powers, upon the various subjects involved in their mutual relations; and further, that it might be, and was proper to designate the department of the government in which the capacity to make such treaties should be lodged. It has said accordingly, that the president, with the concurrence of the senate, shall possess this portion of the national sovereignty. It has furthermore, given to the same magistrate, with the same concurrence, the exclusive creation and control of the whole machinery of diplomacy. He only, with the approbation of the senate, can appoint a negotiator, or take any step towards negotiation. The constitution does not, in any part of it, even intimate that any other department shall possess either a constant or an occasional right to interpose in the preparation of any treaty, or in the final perfection of it. The president and senate are explicitly pointed out as the sole actors in that sort of transaction. The prescribed concurrence of the senate, and that too by a majority greater than the ordinary legislative majority, plainly excludes the necessity of congressional concurrence. If the consent of congress to any treaty had been intended, the constitution would not have been guilty of the absurdity of first putting a treaty for ratification to the president and senate exclusively, and again to the same president and senate as portions of the legislature. It would have submitted the whole matter at once to congress, and the more especially, as the ratification of a treaty by the senate, as a branch of the legislature, may be by a smaller number than a ratification of it by the same body, as a branch of the executive government. If the ratification of any treaty by the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, must be followed by a legislative ratification, it is a mere non-entity. It is good for all purposes, or for none. And if it be nothing in effect, it is a mockery by which nobody would be bound. The president and senate would not themselves be bound by it—and the ratification would at last depend, not upon the will of the president and two thirds of the senate, but upon the will of a bare majority of the two branches of the legislature, subject to the qualified legislative control of the president.

Upon the power of the president and senate, therefore, there can be no doubt. The only question is as to the extent of it, or, in other words, as to the subject upon which it may be exerted. The effect of the power, when exerted within its lawful sphere, is beyond the reach of controversy. The constitution has declared that whatsoever amounts to a treaty, made under the authority of the United States, shall immediately be supreme law. It has contradistinguished a treaty as law from an act of congress as law. It has erected treaties, so contradistinguished, into a binding judicial rule. It has given them to our courts of justice, in defining their jurisdiction, as a portion of the lex terna, which they are to interpret and enforce. In a word, it has commun-ated to them, if ratified by the department which it has specially provided for the making of them, the rank of law, or it has spoken without meaning. And if it has elevated them to that rank, it is idle to attempt to raise them to it by ordinary legislation.

Upon the extent of the power, or the subjects upon which it may act, there is as little room for controversy. The power is to make treaties. The word treaties is nomen generalissimum, and will comprehend commercial treaties, unless there be a limit upon it by which they are excluded. It is the appellative, which will take in the whole species, if there be nothing to narrow its scope. There is no such limit. There is not a syllable in the context of the clause to restrict the natural import of its phraseology. The power is left to the force of the generic term, and is, therefore, as wide as a treaty-making power can be. It embraces all the varieties of treaties which it could be supposed this government could find it necessary or proper to make, or it embraces none. It covers the whole treaty-making ground which this government could be expected to occupy, or not an inch of it.

It is a just presumption, that it was designed to be co-extensive with all the exigencies of our affairs. Usage sanctions that presumption—expediency does the same. The omission of any exception to the power, the omission of the designation of a mode, by which a treaty, not intended to be included within it, might otherwise be made, confirms it. That a commercial treaty was, above all others, in the contemplation of the constitution, is manifest. The immemorial practice of Europe, and particularly of the nation from which we emigrated, the consonance of enlightened theory to that practice, prove it. It may be said, indeed, that at the epoch of the birth of our constitution, the necessity for a power to make commercial treaties was scarcely visible, for that our trade was then in its infancy. It was so; but it was the infancy of another Hercules, promising, not indeed a victory over the lion of Nemeæ, or the boar of Erymanthus, but the peaceful conquest of every sea which could be subjected to the dominion of commercial enterprise. It was then as apparent as it is now, that the destinies of this great nation were irrevocably commercial; that the ocean would be whitened by our sails, and the "ultima thule" of the world compelled to witness the more than Phœnician spirit and intelligence of our merchants. With this glorious anticipation dawning upon them; with this resplendent Aurora gilding the prospect of the future; nor, with the risen orb of trade illuminating the vast horizon of American greatness, it cannot be supposed that the framers of the constitution did not look to the time when we should be called upon to make commercial conventions. It needs not the aid of the imagination to reject this disparaging and monstrous supposition. Dullness itself, throwing aside the lethargy of its character, and rising for a passing moment to the rapture of enthusiasm, will disclaim it with indignation.

It is said, however, that the constitution has given to congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and that, since it would be inconsistent with that power, that the president, with the consent of the senate, should do the same thing, it follows that this power of congress is an exception out of the treaty-making power. Never were premises, as it appears to my understanding, less suited to the conclusion. The power of congress to regulate our foreign trade, is a power of municipal legislation, and was designed to operate as far as upon such a subject, municipal legislation can reach.

Without such a power, the government would be wholly inadequate to the ends for which it was instituted. A power to regulate commerce by treaty alone, would touch only a portion of the subject. A wider and more general power was, therefore, indispensable, and it was properly devolved upon congress, as the legislature of the union.

On the other hand, a power of mere municipal legislation, acting upon views exclusively our own, having no reference to a reciprocation of advantages by arrangements with a foreign state, would also fall short of the ends of government in a country, of which the commercial relations are complex and extensive, and liable to be embarrassed by conflicts between its own interests and those of other nations. That the power of congress is simply legislative in the strictest sense, and calculated for ordinary domestic regulation only, is plain from the language in which it is communicated. There is nothing in that language which indicates regulation, by compact or compromise, nothing which points to the co-operation of a foreign power, nothing which designates a treaty-making faculty. It is not connected with any of the necessary accompaniments of that faculty, it is not furnished with any of those means, without which it is impossible to make the smallest progress towards a treaty.

It is self-evident, that a capacity to regulate commerce by treaty, was intended by the constitution to be lodged somewhere. It is just as evident, that the legislative capacity of congress does not amount to it, and cannot be exerted to produce a treaty. It can produce only a statute; with which a foreign state cannot be made to concur, and which will not yield to any modifications which a foreign state may desire to impress upon it for suitable equivalents. There is no way in which congress, as such, can mould its laws into treaties, if it respects the constitution. It may legislate and counter-legislate; but it must forever be beyond its capacity to combine in a law, emanating from its separate domestic authority, its own views with those of other governments, and to produce a harmonious reconciliation of those jarring purposes and discordant elements which it is the business of negotiation to adjust.

I reason thus, then, upon this part of the subject. It is clear, that the power of congress, as to foreign commerce, is only what it professes to be in the constitution, a legislative power, to be exerted municipally without consultation or agreement with those with whom we have an intercourse of trade; it is undeniable that the constitution meant to provide for the exercise of another power relatively to commerce, which should exert itself in concert with the analogous power in other countries, and should bring about its results, not by statute enacted by itself, but by an international compact called a treaty; that it is manifest, that this other power is vested by the constitution in the president and senate, the only department of the government which it authorises to make any treaty, and which it enables to make all treaties; that if it be so vested, its regular exercise must result in that which, as far as it reaches, is law in itself, and consequently repeals such municipal regulations as stand in its way, since it is expressly declared by the constitution that treaties regularly made shall have, as they ought to have, the force of law. In all this, I perceive nothing to perplex or alarm us. It exhibits a well digested and uniform plan of government, worthy of the excellent men by whom it was formed. The ordinary power to regulate commerce by statutory enactments, could only be devolved upon congress, possessing all the other legislative powers of the government. The extraordinary power to regulate it by treaty, could not be devolved upon congress, because from its composition, and the absence of all those authorities and functions which are essential to the activity and effect of a treaty-making power, it was not calculated to be the depository of it. It was wise and consistent to place the extraordinary power to regulate commerce by treaty, where the residue of the treaty-making power was placed, where only the means of negotiation could be found, and the skilful and beneficial use of them could reasonably be expected.

That congress legislates upon commerce, subject to the treaty making power, is a position perfectly intelligible; but the understanding is in some degree confounded by the other proposition, that the legislative power of congress is an exception out of the treaty making power. It introduces into the constitution a strange anomaly—a commercial state, with a written constitution and no power in it to regulate its trade, in conjunction with other states, in the universal mode of convention. It will be in vain to urge, that this anomaly is merely imaginary, for that the president and senate may make a treaty of commerce for the consideration of congress. The answer is, that the treaties which the president and senate are entitled to make, are such, as when made, become law, that it is no part of their functions, simply to initiate treaties but conclusively to make them, and that where they have no power to make them, there is no provision in the constitution, how, or by whom they shall be made.

That there is nothing new in the idea of a separation of the legislative and conventional powers upon commercial subjects, and of the necessary controul of the former by the latter, is known to all who are acquainted with the constitution of England. The parliament of that country enacts the statutes by which its trade is regulated municipally. The crown modifies them by a treaty. It has been imagined, indeed, that the parliament is in the practice of confirming such treaties; but the fact is undoubtedly otherwise. Commercial treaties are laid before parliament, because the king's ministers are responsible for their advice in the making of them, and because the vast range and complication of the English laws of trade and revenue render legislation unavoidable, not for the ratification, but the execution of their commercial treaties.

It is suggested again, that the treaty making power, (unless we are tenants in common of it with the president and senate, to the extent at least of our legislative rights) is a pestilential monster, pregnant with all sorts of disasters! I tremble with "Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimeras dire!" at any rate, I may take for granted that the case before us does not justify this array of metaphor and fable; since we are all agreed that the convention with England is not only harmless, but salutary. To put this particular case, however, out of the argument, what have we to do with considerations like these? are we here to form, or to submit to the constitution, as it has been given to us for a rule by those who are our masters? can we take upon ourselves the office of political casuists, and because we think that a power ought to be less than it is, compel it to shrink to our standard! Are we to bow with reverence before the national will as the constitution displays it, or to fashion it to our own, to quarrel with that character, without which we ourselves are nothing; or to take it as a guide which we cannot desert with innocence or safety? But why is the treaty making power, lodged, as I contend it is, in the president and senate, likely to disaster us, as we are required to apprehend it will? Sufficient checks have not, as it seems, been provided, either by the constitution or the nature of things, to prevent the abuse of it. It is in the house of representatives alone, that the amulet, which bids defiance to the approaches of political disease, or cures it when it has commenced, can in all vicissitudes be found. I hold that the checks are sufficient, without the charm of our legislative agency, for all those occasions which wisdom is bound to foresee and to guard against; and that as to the rest (the eccentricities and portents which no ordinary checks can deal with) the occasions must provide for themselves.

It is natural, here, to ask of gentlemen, what security they would have? They cannot "take a bond or fate;" and they have every pledge which is short of it.—Have they not, as respects the president, all the security upon which they rely from day to day for the discreet and upright discharge of the whole of his other duties, many and various as they are? What security have they that he will not appoint to office the refuse of the world; that he will not pollute the sanctuary of justice by calling vagabonds to its holy ministry, instead of adorning it with men like those who now give to the bench more dignity than they receive from it; that he will not enter into a treaty of amnesty with every conspirator against law and order, and pardon culprits from mere enmity to virtue? The security for all this, and infinitely more, is found in the constitution and in the order of nature; and we are all satisfied with it. One should think that the same security, which thus far time has not discredited, might be sufficient to tranquilize us upon the score of the power which we are now considering.

We talk of ourselves as if we only were the representatives of the people. But the first magistrate of this country is also the representative of the people, the creature of their sovereignty, the administrator of their power, their steward and servant, as you are—he comes from the people, is lifted by them into place and authority, and after a short season returns to them for censure or applause. There is no analogy between such a magistrate and the hereditary monarchs of Europe. He is not born to the inheritance of office; he cannot even be elected until he has reached an age at which he must pass for what he is; until his habits have been formed, his integrity tried, his capacity ascertained, his character discussed and proved for a series of years, by a press, which knows none of the restraints of European policy.—He acts, as you do, in the full view of his constituents, and under the consciousness that, on account of the singleness of his station, all eyes are upon him.—He knows, too, as well as you can know, the temper and intelligence of those for whom he acts, and to whom he is amenable. He cannot hope that they will be blind to the vices of his administration on subjects of high concernment and vital interest; and in proportion as he acts upon his own responsibility, unrelieved and undiluted by the infusion of ours, is the danger of ill advised conduct likely to be present to his mind.

Of all the powers which have been entrusted to him, there is none to which the temptations to abuse belong so little as to the treaty making power in all its branches; none which can boast such mighty safeguards in the feelings and views and passions which even a misanthrope could attribute to the foremost citizen of this republic.—He can have no motive to palsy by a commercial or any other treaty the prosperity of his country. Setting apart the restraints of honor and patriotism, which are characteristic of public men in a nation justly free, could he do so without subjecting himself as a member of the community (to say nothing of his immediate connexions) to the evils of his own work? A commercial treaty too, is always a conspicuous measure. It speaks for itself. It cannot take the garb of hypocrisy, and shelter itself from the scrutiny of a vigilant and well instructed population.—If it be bad, it will be condemned, and if dishonestly made, be execrated. The pride of country moreover, which animates even the lowest of mankind, is here a peculiar pledge for the provident and wholesome exercise of power. There is not a consideration by which a chord in the human breast can be made to vibrate, that is not in this case the ally of duty. Every hope either lofty or humble that springs forward to the future; even the vanity which looks no beyond the moment; the dread of shame and the love of glory; the instinct of ambition; the domestic affections; the cold ponderings of prudence; and the ardent insinuations of sentiment and passion, are all on the side of duty. It is in the exercise of this power that responsibility to public opinion, which even despotism feels and truckles to, is of gigantic force. If it were possible, as I am sure it is not, that an American citizen, raised upon the credit of a long life of virtue, to a station so full of honor, could feel a disposition to mingle the little interests of a perverted ambition with the great concerns of his country, as embraced by a commercial treaty, and to sacrifice her happiness and power by the stipulations of that treaty, to flatter or aggrandise a foreign state, he would still be saved from the perdition of such a course, not only by constitutional checks, but by the irresistible efficacy of responsibility to public opinion, in a nation whose public opinion wears no masque, and will not be silenced. He would remember that his political career is but the thing of an hour, and that when it has passed he must descend to the private station from which he rose, the object either of love and veneration, or of scorn and horror. If we cast a glance at England, we shall not fail to see the influence of public opinion upon an hereditary king, and hereditary nobility, and a house of commons elected in a great degree by rotten boroughs and overflowing with placemen.—And if this influence is potent there against all the efforts of independent power and wide spread corruption, it must in this country be omnipotent.

But the treaty making power of the president is further checked by the necessity of the concurrence of two-thirds of the senate consisting of men selected by the legislatures of the states, themselves elected by the people. They too must have passed through the probation of time before they can be chosen, and must bring with them every title to confidence. The duration of their office is that of a few years; their numbers are considerable; their constitutional responsibility as great as it can be; and their moral responsibility beyond all calculation.

The power of impeachment has been mentioned as a check upon the president in the exercise of the treaty-making capacity. I rely upon it less than upon others, of, as I think, a better class; but as the constitution places some reliance upon it, so do I. It has been said, that impeachment has been tried and found wanting. Two impeachments have failed, as I have understood (that of a judge was one)—but they may have failed for reasons consistent with the general efficacy of such a proceeding. I know nothing of their merits, but I am justified in supposing that the evidence was defective, or that the parties were innocent, as they were pronounced to be.—Of this, however, I feel assured, that if it should ever happen that the president is found to deserve the punishment which impeachment seeks to inflict (even for making a treaty to which his judges have become parties) and this body should accuse him in a constitutional way, he will not easily escape. But, be that as it may, I ask if it is nothing that you have power to arraign him as a culprit? Is it nothing that you can bring him to the bar, expose his misconduct to the world, and bring down the indignation of the public upon him and those who dare to acquit him?

If there be any power explicitly granted by the constitution to congress, it is that of declaring war; and if there be any exercise of human legislation more solemn and important than another, it is a declaration of war. For expansion it is the largest, for effect the most awful of all the enactments to which congress is competent; and it always is, or ought to be, preceded by grave and anxious deliberation. This power too, is connected with, or virtually involves, others of high import and efficacy; among which may be ranked the power of granting letters of marque and reprisal, or regulating captures, of prohibiting intercourse with, or the acceptance of protections or licenses from, the enemy. Yet farther; a power to declare war implies, with peculiar emphasis, a negative upon all power, in any other branch of the government, inconsistent with the full and continuing effect of it. A power to make peace in any other branch of the government, is utterly inconsistent with that full and continuing effect. It may even prevent it from having any effect at all; since peace may follow almost immediately (although it rarely does so follow) the commencement of a war. It therefore it be undeniable that the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, has power to make a treaty of peace, available ipso jure, it is undeniable that he has power to repeal, by the mere operation of such a treaty, the highest acts of congressional legislation. And it will not be questioned that this repealing power is, from the eminent nature of the war-declaring power, less fit to be made out by inference than the power of modifying by treaty the laws which regulate our foreign trade. Now, the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, has an incontestible and uncontested right to make a treaty of peace, or absolute inherent efficacy, and that too in virtue of the very same general provision in the constitution which the refinements of political speculation, rather than any known rules of construction, have led some of us to suppose, excludes a treaty of commerce.

By what process of reasoning will you be able to extract from the wide field of that general provision the obnoxious case of a commercial treaty, without forcing along with it the case of a treaty of peace, and along with that again the case of every possible treaty? Will you rest your distinction upon the favorite idea that a treaty cannot repeal laws competently enacted, or, as it is sometimes expressed, cannot trench upon the legislative rights of congress? Such a distinction not only seems to be reproached by all the theories, numerous as they are, to which this bill has given birth, but is against notorious fact and recent experience. We have lately witnessed the operation in this respect of a treaty of peace, and could not fail to draw from it this lesson; that no sooner does the president exert, with the consent of the senate, his power to make such a treaty, than your war-denouncing law, your act for letters of marque, your prohibitory statutes as to intercourse and licenses, and all the other concomitant and dependent statutes, so far as they affect the national relations with a foreign enemy, pass away as a dream, and in a moment are "with years beyond the flood." Your auxiliary agency was not required.

in the production of this effect; and I have not heard that you even tendered it. You saw your laws departing as it were from the statute book, expelled from the strong hold of supremacy by the single force of a treaty of peace; and you did not attempt to stay them; you did not bid them linger until you should bid them go; you neither put your shoulders to the wheel of expulsion nor made an effort to retard it.—In a word, you did nothing. You suffered them to flee as a shadow, and you know that they were reduced to shadow, not by the necromancy of usurpation, but by the energy of constitutional power. Yet, you had every reason for in evidence then which you can have now. The power to make a treaty of peace stands upon the same constitutional footing with the power to make a commercial treaty. It is given by the same words. It is exerted in the same manner. It produces the same conflict with municipal legislation. The ingenuity of man cannot urge a consideration, whether upon the letter or the spirit of the constitution, against the existence of a power in the president and senate to make a valid commercial treaty, which will not, if I be correct and sound, drive us to the denegation of the power exercised by the president and senate, with universal approbation, to make a valid treaty of peace.

Nay, the whole treaty-making power will be blotted from the constitution, and a new one, alien to its theory and practice, be made to supplant it, if sanction and scope be given to the principles of this bill. This bill may indeed be considered as the first of many assaults, not now intended perhaps, but not therefore the less likely to happen, by which the treaty-making power, as created and lodged by the constitution, will be pushed from its place, and compelled to abide with the power of ordinary legislation. The example of this bill is beyond its ostensible limits. The pernicious principle, of which it is at once the child and the apostle, must work onward and to the right and the left until it has exhausted itself; and it never can exhaust itself until it has gathered into the vortex of the legislative powers of congress the whole treaty-making capacity of the government. For if, notwithstanding the directness and precision with which the constitution has marked out the department of the government by which it wills that treaties shall be made, and has declared that treaties so made, shall have the force and dignity of law, the house of representatives can insist upon some participation in that high faculty upon the simple suggestion that they are sharers in legislative power upon the subjects embraced by any given treaty, what remains to be done, for the transfer to congress of the entire treaty-making faculty, as it appears in the constitution, but to show that congress have legislative power direct or indirect upon every matter which a treaty can touch? And what are the matters within the practicable range of a treaty which your laws cannot either mould or qualify or influence? Imagination has been tasked for examples by which this question might be answered. It is admitted that they must be few, and we have been told, as I think, of no more than one. It is the case of contraband of war.—This case has, it seems, the double recommendation of being what is called an international case, and a case beyond the utmost grasp of congressional legislation. I remark upon it, however, it is no more an international case than any matter or collision incident to the trade of two nations with each other. I remark farther, that a treaty upon the point of contraband of war may interfere as well as any other treaty, with an act of congress. A law encouraging, by a bounty or otherwise, the exportation of certain commodities, would be counteracted by an insertion in the list of contraband of war, in a treaty with England or France, any one of those commodities. The treaty would look one way, the law another. And various modes might readily be suggested in which congress might so legislate as to lay the foundation of repugnance between its laws and the treaties of the president and senate with reference to contraband.—I deceive myself greatly if a subject can be named upon which a like repugnance might not occur. But even if it should be practicable to furnish, after laborious enquiry and meditation, a meagre and scanty inventory of some half dozen topics to which domestic legislation cannot be made to extend, will it be pretended that such was the insignificant and narrow domain designed by the constitution for the treaty-making power? I would appear that there is with some gentlemen a willingness to distinguish between the legislative power expressly granted to congress and that which is merely implicit, and to admit that a treaty may control the results of the latter. I reply to those gentlemen, that one legislative power is exactly equivalent to another, and that, moreover, the whole legislative power of congress may justly be said to be expressly granted by the constitution, although the constitution does not enumerate every variety of its exercise, or indicate all the ramifications into which it may diverge to suit the exigencies of the times. I reply, besides, that even with the qualification of this vague distinction, whatever may be its value or effect, the principle of the bill leaves no adequate sphere for the treaty-making power. I reply finally, that the acknowledged operation of a treaty of peace in repealing laws of singular strength and unbending character, enacted in virtue of powers communicated in terminis to congress, gives the distinction to the winds.

And now that I have again adverted to the example of a treaty of peace, let me call upon you to reflect on the answer which that example affords to all the warnings we have received in this debate against the mighty danger of entrusting to the only department of the government, which the constitution supposes can make a treaty, the incidental prerogative of a repealing legislation. It is inconsistent, we are desired to believe, with the genius of the constitution, and must be fatal to all that is dear to freemen, that an executive magistrate and a senate, who are not immediately elected by the people, should possess this authority. We hear from one quarter that it is the public liberty already in the grave, and from another that the public interest and honor are upon the verge of it. But do you not perceive that this picture of calamity and shape is the mere figment of excited fancy, disavowed by the constitution as hysterical and erroneous in the case of a treaty of peace? Do you not see that if there be any thing in this high colored peril it is a treaty of peace that must realize it? Can we in this view, compare with the power to make such a treaty that of making a treaty of commerce? Are we unable to conjecture, while we are thus brooding over anticipated evils which can never happen, that the lofty character of our country (which is but another name for strength and power) may be made to droop by a mere treaty of peace; that the national pride may be humbled; the just hopes of the people blasted; their courage tamed and broken; their prosperity stuck to the heart; their foreign rivals encouraged into arrogance and tutored into encroachment, by a mere treaty of peace? I confidently trust that, as this never has been so, it never will be so; but surely it is just as possible as that a treaty of commerce should ever be made to shackle the freedom of this nation, or check its march to the greatness and glory that await it. I know not indeed, how it can seriously be thought that our liberties are in hazard from the small witchery of a treaty of commerce, and yet in none from the potent enchantments by which a treaty of peace may strive to enchain them. I am at a loss to conceive by what form of words, by what hitherto unheard of stipulations, a commercial treaty is to barter away the freedom of united America, or of any the smallest portion of it. I cannot figure to myself the possibility that such a project can ever find its way into the head or heart of any man or set of men when this nation may select as the depositories of its power; but I am quite sure that an attempt to excite such a project in a commercial treaty, or in any other treaty or in any other mode, could work no other effect than the destruction of those who should venture to be parties to it, no matter whether a president, senate or a whole congress. Many extreme cases have been put for illustration in this debate; and this is one of them; and I take the occasion which it offers to mention, that to argue from extreme cases is seldom logical, and, upon a question of interpretation, never so. We can only bring back the means of delusion, if we wander into the regions of fiction and explore the wilds of bare possibility in search of rules for real life and actual ordinary cases. By arguing from the possible abuse of power against the use or existence of it, you may and must come to the conclusion, that there ought not to be, and is not, any government in this country or in the world. Disorganization and anarchy are the sole consequences that can be deduced from such reasoning. Who is it that may not abuse the power that has been confided to him? May not we, as well as the other branches of the government? And, if we may, does not the argument from extreme cases prove that we ought to have no power, and that we have no power? And does it not, therefore, after having served for an instant the purposes of this bill, turn short upon and condemn its whole theory, which attributes to us, not merely the power which is our own, but inordinate power, to be gained only by wresting it from others? Our constitutional and moral security against the abuses of the executive government have already been explained. I will only add that a great and manifest abuse of the delegated authority to make treaties would create no obligation any where. If ever it should occur, as I confidently believe it never will, the evil must find its corrective in the wisdom and firmness, not of this body only, but of the whole body of the people co-operating with it. It is after all in the people, upon whose Atlantic shoulders our whole republican system reposes, that you must expect that recuperative power, that redeeming and regenerating spirit, by which the constitution is to be purified and redintegrated when extravagant abuse has cankered it.

In addition to the example of a treaty of peace which I have just been considering, let me put another of which none of us can question the reality. The president may exercise the power of pardoning, save only in the case of impeachments. The power of pardoning is not communicated by words more precise or comprehensive than the power to make treaties. But to what does it amount? Is not every pardon pro hac vice a repeal of the penal law against which it gives protection? Does it not ride over the law, resist its command, and extinguish its effect? Does it not even control the combined force of judicature and legislation? Yet, have we ever heard that your legislative rights were an exception out of the prerogative of mercy? who has ever pretended that this faculty came, if regularly exerted, wresle with the strongest of your statutes? I may be told, that the pardoning power necessarily imports a control over the penal code, if it be exercised in the form of a pardon. I answer, the power to make treaties equally imports a power to put out of the way such parts of the civil code as interfere with its operation, if that power be exercised in the form of a treaty. There is no difference in their essence. You legislate in both cases subject to the power. And this instance furnishes another answer as I have already intimated to the predictions of abuse with which, on this occasion, it has been endeavored to appal us. The pardoning power is in the president alone. He is not even checked by the necessity of senatorial concurrence. He may by his single fiat extract the sting from your proudest enactments—and save from their vengeance a convicted offender.

Sir, you have my general notions upon the bill before you. They have no claim to novelty. I imbibed them from some of the heroes and sages who survived the storm of that contest in which America was summoned in her cradle. I imbibed them from the father of his country. My understanding approved them, with the full concurrence of my heart, when I was much younger than I am now; and I feel no disposition to discard them now that age and feebleness are about to overtake me. I could say more—much more—upon this high question; but I want health and strength. It is perhaps fortunate for the house that I do; as it prevents me from fatiguing them as much as I am fatigued myself.

Mr. Randolph rose. He said he was certainly very far from being among those, if any there were, who rejoiced in the personal indisposition which deprived the house of the very ingenuous, correct, and, he might add, able argument with which they had just been entertained. On the contrary, Mr. R. said, he had listened to it with very great pleasure, as a specimen of the powers of the human mind which he was not often accustomed to witness, even in this honorable house. But notwithstanding this display of eloquence, he was disposed to return to an opinion, which he had entertained when he first took his seat on Monday last, that this question was swolen by the strange, not to say injudicious management of it, to an importance which its real merits do not deserve. I give up to the gentleman from Maryland (said Mr. R.)—I am told he is from Maryland—to his utmost fury and indignation, those fanciful and fine-spun theories which seem to interdict the executive of the United States from negotiating a commercial or any other treaty whatsoever with any foreign power. On this point, sir, I agree with the gentleman altogether. I go with him the whole length, that it is competent to the president and senate to negotiate a treaty of commerce, alliance and subsidy with any foreign power, from the greatest potentate in Europe, down to a Chickasaw chief. The honorable gentleman will excuse me when I rise to declare that, howsoever I have been gratified in the display which he has made of his abilities, in one respect he certainly has disappointed me. The honorable gentleman will excuse me when I say, he has not met the question. The question, said Mr. R. is not, the competency of the executive to negotiate commercial or other treaties; but its competency, in doing so, to repeal existing laws of the land, and enact other laws in their stead—in other words, the question is, the competency of the executive to do by treaty that which can be done, as we contend, only by legislative acts. That is the question. R he understood the gentleman, Mr. R. said, he had declared that the bill before the house was not in execution of the treaty, that it contained no auxiliary enactments; that it was not necessary that the bill should pass at all—that it was a twin-brother of the treaty. If the gentleman had pursued his analogy with respect to laws and treaties, he would have found this second twin-brother worthy of being nurtured and brought to man's estate, instead of being treated as illegitimate and stifled in its birth; that this poor little twin, which came second best in the world, had not that fair division of the patrimonial estate which our laws provide; that it was in short to be put out of the way, that the presidential heir may inherit and enjoy the whole estate. If this bill were necessary, then, the gentleman had said, that the president and senate had been guilty of a tremendous usurpation. How far this view of the question might bear on the ultimate vote of the house, Mr. R. said, he could not say; but it would bear very hard upon the president, if the vote should be to-day as it was yesterday. If the argument of the gentleman from Maryland were correct, unless his representations on this head should materially affect the vote of the house, that decision would bear hard on the president and senate. But a few minutes before the gentleman had delivered his sentiments, the senate themselves had in open court plead guilty to the charge of usurpation; for they had sent down to this house a bill, either something or nothing, which, if any thing, had pronounced their usurpation. If the treaty were, what the gentleman contended, ipso facto the law of the land, the bill which the senate had sent down was mere surplusage. We do not deny, said Mr. R. that a treaty, the ratification being exchanged, has existence without the sanction of this house—at least I do not deny it—and I am responsible for no man's opinion but my own, glad enough at times if I were irresponsible for them—but I do contend that a treaty does not deprive this house of one jot, one tittle of its legislative and constitutional authority. I am not in the language of the learned doctor of laws in Padua to Shylock, "Take thou the pound of flesh but not one jot of blood"—I am not for giving to the president and senate the treaty-making power and then denying to them the use of it; but I am for giving to them all the power and all the influence which they ought to have in the government. Whilst the gentleman from Maryland was thinking on the responsibility of the president and senate, why did he not reflect on our own? Go we not back to be pressed—I hope not to be oppressed—by laws of our own enactment? If the president and senate go back to the community, to receive their approbation or condemnation—I speak of the theory, of which I may say odiet arceo; for I have long lost my faith in theories, and in theorists too—if the president and senate feel their accountability to the people, how much more are we amenable to them, when we return with the same responsibility, and at shorter periods, to our constituents. If there be any truth in the old adage, that short accounts make long friends we shall stand on as good footing with our neighbors as some presidents who have retired to private life. Our responsibility is greater than that of the president and senate. What is the responsibility of a man who is to retire, after a service of eight or ten years, to palaces which he has built with the plunder of his country—of a man who has enriched his relatives by a species of nepotism, and surrounded himself with a society of his own—who can be content to sit down with infamy in private life, provided his bags are swelled to distention, and his appetite pampered with delicacies which habit has made necessary to his enjoyments? But, granting the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland, deeming of the responsibility of the president as he deems, we would make assurance doubly sure, and take a bond or fate for the correct discharge of the executive functions in this respect. The gentleman from Maryland had said, that if the doctrine supported by the friends of this bill were sound, this constitution was an anomaly in government. It is so, Mr. R. said—and he was surprised to hear it found out to-day as if for the first time. It is an anomaly—happily for us that it is, and long might it continue so?

The gentleman from Maryland had said, if the sanction of this house became necessary to carry a treaty into effect, it was not only in their power, but it was their duty to pass a bill for that purpose.—Mr. R. said he would grant the gentleman his position with a small modification—he would grant it, if the gentleman would add a proviso, that the provision of said treaty did not betray the great interests, liberties, or rights of the nation. The gentleman had put the case of a definition of contraband by treaty, as being paramount to a law of congress encouraging the culture of the article declared contraband; a case which would, according to his humble judgment, Mr. R. said, better suit a court of admiralty than a legislative hall. But he ought, he added, to be obliged to the honorable gentleman, for having taken into his argument an idea which Mr. R. had yesterday endeavoured to embody in his own—for, he said, taking the very case the gentleman had put, there could not be a stronger selected to prove that his general argument was untenable. Suppose the executive were to make a treaty, in which tobacco, rice and cotton were declared contraband or war—o which he might add bread stuffs, butter, salt beef, onions, notions of all sorts. Would not this treaty require legislative enactment to carry it into effect; or would it, like a treaty of peace, require no intervention on the part of this house? It would have that effect perhaps in a British court of vice-admiralty at Halifax, Providence, or Bermuda; but, did the gentleman in his heart believe that such a treaty could become the law of the land on the instant of its promulgation? It could no stand; the breath, the tempest of public indignation would in an instant sweep it to eternity. It would go to the tomb of the Capulets. The gentleman demands of us, said Mr. R. to exercise the treaty; to question it whether it brings with it "airs from heaven or blasts from hell;" while her "intent is wicked or charitable." The treaty, Mr. R. said, came to him in a most agreeable shape; he was disposed to ratify it by legislation—and, if legislative enactment were not necessary, whence the bill which had passed to its third reading in this house; and whence the oill from the senate? If a treaty were of that pervading force, that like Mercury, it searches the remotest parts of the constitution, why the bill which in this house had progressed so far—and which, he hoped, would pass to the senate, whatever imputation, according to the gentleman's argument, it might cast on the executive of rank and tremendous usurpation.

For his part, Mr. R. said, he was extremely sorry that this should happen to be the only occasion, which had come within his cognizance lately, in which, according to the illustration of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, the house had refused, like the clerk in the church, to make the appointed responses to the minister. Mr. R. said, he was not one of those who would construe this occonsistency into any imputation on the majority, any more than on the minority of the house; for it happened to be a two-edged sword—it cut as much upon the right hand as upon the left, and as much upon the left hand as upon the right. One side, he said, maintained its consistency, because it cost them nothing; and the other side of the house maintained theirs for the same reason. We are each and all of us, said he, maintaining our consistency, and on the best possible terms—for it costs us nothing. The bill before us gives no power; it takes none away—it bestows not praise, it conveys no censure, except what may be inferred from the argument of the honorable gentleman. Mr. R. wished, he said, that in the future progress of their deliberations the consistency of one side of the house might be equally maintained; he wished that the spirit of the administration of Thomas Jefferson, of the first congress assembled under his administration, might be maintained by the majority of this house of the present day—even if the minority should, for the sake of consistency, be obliged to take the other side, and load the country with debts, taxes, armies and navies, and all the constituent elements of federalism, under the name of democracy. Yes, Mr. R. said, he wished that the consistency of one side might be maintained, even at the expense of the consistency of the other—but, he believed he was travelling a little out of the record. To return to the question.

Mr. R. said, he would suppose that this commercial treaty had stipulated that a duty not exceeding a certain amount, should be imposed by the two contracting parties on certain manufactures, peculiar to ourselves only, and operating therefore, on us exclusively. Could there be a doubt that this house would refuse to carry that treaty into effect by passing laws laying the necessary taxes, and would leave it to Great Britain, if she chose, to make it a cause of war with us? Have not this house the power, and would they not use it, of carrying such a treaty into effect; or, if it seems good to them, to refuse to carry it into effect, leaving it to the option of the other party to make it a cause of war or not? But, the gentleman had said, grant these doctrines to be correct, and we are the most unfortunate people under the sun—we could have no treaties! Was there any fear, Mr. R. asked—was the theory of our government so little understood, and the practice so much forgotten, that it could be supposed there would ever be wanting in this house a proper degree of deference (he would not say an improper degree of deference) to the wisdom and counsels of the executive? Let us suppose it possible, however, said Mr. R. that we should be placed in this unfortunate situation; that it should not be in our power to make a commercial treaty with any people under the sun—I believe the sun would still shine as bright, and the grass grow as green as ever. Are we, sir, to suppose, in this young country, that all diplomatic skill resides with us—and go abroad a treaty-making as Hudibrass and Don Quixotte in quest of adventures, expecting to gain all the advantages and receive no blows in return? No two knights, Mr. R. said, were ever more woefully mistaken; but not more than we should be, entertaining notions equally absurd. No, said Mr. R. if we make a treaty with any people under the sun, we must give a quid pro quo, and must always expect to give more than we get. It had been, he said, a maxim in Great Britain before the separation of the United States from that government, and it was a maxim yet, that whatever she had acquired by the valor of her arms, she had lost by negotiation. The last treat-ty of Paris might form an exception to the general rule, but, like all exceptions, it would only prove the rule. The circumstance he had referred to grew out of the form of the government of Great Britain. As the form of our government is more popular than hers, our proceedings more public, and as we are equally liable to that state of faction which is the shadow of liberty, and proves the substance to exist, until it shall be put down by the strong arm of military despotism—whatever we get broad we may expect to pay for. We must pay, and dearly too, Mr. R. said, for any advantages we should obtain from those wily kings and ministers broad, who have grown grey in diplomacy, which is but another name for duplicity. After the treaty of 1783, he said, we sent ministers abroad a treaty-making with every power that would treat with us, by way of trying our manhood—we had just come of age, taken our affairs into our own hands—he had known many young heirs try their skill in making bargains with their more wary neighbours, until they bargained away their whole estate. To such, perhaps, it would be no injurious restraint if they were debarred the treaty-making power until they arrived at years of discretion. We shall get nothing at all from these foreign nations, he assured the house, without giving therefor a full equivalent.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland had stated, that if the president and senate had not the power to make a commercial treaty, and that treaty when made did not instantly become the law of the land, then the president and senate have the power to make no treaty—and yet the gentleman had furnished in the course of his own argument an instance in direct contradiction of this position—that is, a treaty of peace, which did not in any shape require the sanction of this house.—The treaty of peace, then, is an exception to the necessity of the intervention of this house to carry treaties into effect; and it might be said that a naked treaty of peace—"let there be peace, and there was peace"—was almost the only treaty which could be negotiated, that did not require the consent of this house. Under the old confederation, however, it was said congress had made an alliance with France. This, Mr. R. observed, was a strong case for the gentleman's argument—for it might be said, if the old congress, confessedly inferior in power, possessed the right to make a treaty of alliance which had been near involving us in the vortex of the French revolution, a fortiori the president and senate now ought to have the power. He agreed to the force of this argument, if for president and senate the government was substituted. This brought him, he said, to the old opprobrium of legislation, that the question started is seldom the question run down—the question was, do the president and senate possess the power, exclusive and independent of the legislative power, to bind the people in all cases whatsoever, and to make treaties paramount to all law? That was the point—that was the gist of the question—there the argument rubbed.

If, instead of a treaty of commerce, the treaty now under consideration had been a treaty of alliance and subsidy, could the troops have been raised or taxes levied without the intervention of the legislative authority of this house? Mr. R. said they could not; and he had understood the gentleman also to admit this. What, then, was the amount of the difference between the gentleman and himself? It was this. That Mr. R. contended, this treaty being in his opinion one requiring legislative enactment to carry it into effect, this house was to exercise its legislative power in this respect under a sound discretion, and a high responsibility for the public good. It was not in Mr. R.'s opinion a sound construction, because it was competent to the president and senate to make a treaty of peace, that they could repeal or modify a law laying a tax. Miserable indeed would be the condition of humanity, if the power to put an end to the calamities of war could not be entrusted to them—and, by the way, Mr. R. said, he had no hesitation in saying that with all the pride, and consequence and airs that the government had given to itself, even in this treaty of peace, in that simple agreement 'let the conflict cease,' our adversary had got a fair and full equivalent; for she got full as much as she gave.

The president and senate may restore the relations of peace, it had been argued—Might they therefore, Mr. R. asked, repeal all the laws of the land, by treaty? But it seemed, the president and senate were controlled by public opinion, and that was a sufficient check—alluding he supposed to the press, the great battery of public opinion. Why then had it not been said in the constitution, let there be a public opinion, and all is safe—it is enough for us, if the acts of our rulers may be freely canvassed. I believe, said Mr. R. that our rights and liberties are safe, but in a very different repository from that referred to—in the state legislatures, in the bosom of the free yeomanry of the country—asserted by their muskets and their rifles, and never yielded unless cautiously and warily attacked—unless the ground be broken at a vast distance from the centinels of public liberty, and the approach secretly made.

Was the sanction of the house necessary to carry this treaty into effect? It was, or it was not. If it was, the president and senate had been guilty, it was said, of gross usurpation. But the gentleman from Maryland had acknowledged that as there are treaties which are self-executory, there are others which require legislative enactment, and which the aid of the house is required to carry into effect. A treaty of peace, by merely restoring the relations of peace and amity, Mr. R. said, did execute itself. But was it so with a treaty, stipulating that duties should be taken off or laid on, or both? The analogy between a treaty restoring the relations of peace between this country and another, and other treaties, cannot be brought in aid of a treaty which is not self-executory, which does require legislative enactment to carry it into effect, as proven by the vote of this house yesterday, and the vote of the senate to-day, [referring to the bill passed by the senate declaring the effect of the treaty.] Mr. R. said, he could conceive a case in which even a treaty, restoring the relations of peace and amity between the United States and another nation, might be received in this house as a breach of national confidence, which the house would not endure. As he liked to bring every case which he presented to this house as near the reality as could be, to liken it to something which had happened, or was very likely to happen—he would take a case which might have happened between the United States and France. It was well known, Mr. R. said, that a very large description of people in the United States, at the breaking out of the French revolution, had been anxious to plunge the United States into a war with Great Britain and her allies—and it was contended, that the public faith was pledged to guarantee the safety of the French West India islands, &c. The demand of our aid had been made in a much more sacred name than that of a sugar island—in the name of the imprescriptible rights of mankind—the liberty of the world was said to be in jeopardy; the tyrants of the world it was said, had conspired against liberty, and we ought no longer to withhold our aid. Mr. R. said, he hoped no member of this house, nor the most worthless scribbler out of it, would understand him as imputing censure to those who felt thus ardently. By the wisdom of that man, who, alone at that juncture, could have held the reins of empire, who alone could have reigned in the public madness—by his wisdom we had been saved from being involved in the vortex of that tremendous comet, which

— From its horrid hair
Shook pestilence and war.

Every patriot, not the pseudo-patriot, not he who wishes to ride on the surface of the billow, inflated by his own breath—every real patriot, approved and honored his conduct. Suppose, instead of standing in opposition to the feeling of the day, reversing the old adage, Quicquid delirant reges plectuntur Achivi—suppose general Washington had let slip the dogs of war, hallooed them on, and engaged in that war, which was terminated by the truce of Amiens—or suppose general Washington, as was the fact not long after, had been removed from the councils of his country, and succeeded by a gentleman of different political opinions, and that the first act of the new president had been, to patch up a treaty of alliance with the allies, Great Britain in particular, such a treaty as would inevitably, whilst it kept peace with England, have produced war with France—would the people of America have endured this? Mr. R. did not think they would. Such was his opinion of the public sentiment of hatred to Great Britain and predilection to republican France, which then existed, that he believed this house, instead of carrying the treaty into effect, would have been made the means of compelling peace with France, and renewing the war with Great Britain. He would take another precedent, however, from a government, the constitution of which was not anomalous; a case anterior to the revolution which, according to the fond idea of British jurists, had fixed the liberty of England on an imperishable foundation; he would take a case from the most corrupt reign of the most corrupt family that, perhaps, God ever permitted to afflict the world; a case from the days of the Stuarts. He averred it as a fact, and all history, he said, would bear him out in it, that the last of the Stuarts lost his throne in consequence of his subserviency to a foreign power, which foreign power was the object of the suspicion, deadly hatred and fear of the nation he governed. He did aver, that the Dutch wars of Charles II.—that base and rotten policy laid open more than a century after that wily man thought the evidence of it buried below the caverns of the deep, would have lost him his crown if he had continued to reign. James II. was little else than the successor in form of Charles II; and James II. lost his crown, as Charles II. would, in the end, have lost his, by making treaties against the wishes of the people, with a foreign power most obnoxious and hateful to the British nation, &c. If such was the case in England, how much more strong is the argument, that in this country the president and senate should never make any treaty, particularly one which requires legislative enactment to carry it into effect, without the previous or subsequent consent of this body.

Mr. R. said, he would trespass on the committee only by a few other remarks. He was, he hoped it was unnecessary to say, no drawcansir. He was for peace and good will among men. He understood the honorable gentleman from Maryland, when dwelling on the effect of the power of impeachment, which he (Mr. R.) believed, would have as much effect on great delinquents as a feather or a flake of snow on the impenetrable hide of a rhinoceros—he understood the gentleman to say, in allusion to a remark that the power of impeachment had been tried and found wanting, that the fact did not necessarily imply—as the honorable gentleman on whom it was tried would have said, it was a non sequitur to urge, that the power of impeachment was nugatory. I grant it, said Mr. R. As little versed as I am in dialectics, as little of a logician or methodist in argument as I am, I am willing to admit, that it does not follow, because a felon is acquitted, the law is inefficient; because the acquittal may have arisen from a defect in the evidence, in the law, or in the administration of the law; it may have arisen from another cause, which I would be the meanest and basest of mankind to admit—or it might have arisen from the defect of talents in the prosecuting attorney: and that is one of the crying sins of this nation, which calls loudly for reform. Daily and hourly are felons acquitted because they can give heavy fees to lawyers of great abilities, who know how to make the worse appear the better reason, in the courts at least—whilst the commonwealth is content to have its business let out to the lowest bidder, and its judicial business is managed, I will not say in the same manner, but not always well. I do aver, said Mr. R. that I should be wanting in respect for the gentlemen with whom I was associated on that occasion if I admitted that the impute, if I am to understand it as such, if the honorable gentleman had any application to them. I have not the slightest indisposition to admit that it may have application to one, but I believe I see in my eye a much more substantial reason for the acquittal in the case alluded to, than the want of ability with which the prosecution was conducted—he saw in the ability of the defence of the accused at least as probable a cause of the acquittal as the one which had been mentioned. But, it was really paying to the highest court in this nation a very poor compliment—What, sir! our most potent, grave and revered seniors—our very noble and approved good masters of the doctrine of the gentleman be correct that what they approve we must ratify—what, sir! the senate, on the evidence of at least fifty witnesses, not capable of making up an opinion on a question presented to them! the acquittal in that case, Mr. R. said, was referable, not, to the want of ability on the part of some of the gentlemen, at least—let us look back, said he; one of those gentlemen has since filled the office of secretary of the treasury. What, sir! a man placed at the head of the treasury not capable of conducting an ordinary prosecution in a court of justice—I will never admit an insinuation of that sort to wound the fame of one of my colleagues on that occasion. Another one is now a judge of the supreme court, civil and criminal, of the state of Maryland—was he not capable of summing up the law and evidence in such a case? I will not admit it. Another of the managers of the impeachment has since illustrated the government of Georgia—he has displayed an independence which does him honor with all feeling and independent men—was he not capable of speaking to an ordinary case before a court? I cannot admit it. No; the acquittal took place, because the constitution required, and wisely, as in the case of a treaty, the assent of two thirds of the court to the condemnation of the accused; and the assent of that two thirds was not found in the case of impeachment alluded to, whilst it never has been and never will be found wanting to the ratification of any treaty which the president may negotiate. Mr. R. said, he had received a lesson on that subject which it was not necessary now to repeat. He meant not to tell the secrets of his prison house—in the year 1800, he received a lesson, which if he was not better, he trusted he should be wiser for to his dying day, touching the nature of the initiatory and ratifying branches in relation to treaties.

One word more, Mr. R. said, and he had done—He wished he had followed the example of the honorable gentleman from Maryland in one respect, incapable as he was of following him in any other—he wished, he said, he too had taken his leave and sat down when he found his strength exhausted—He had thought it better, however, to finish what he had to say at once, and then to dinner with what appetite we may. The gentleman had made one statement he wished to notice—that the treaty was a treaty or no treaty; that, the ratifications being exchanged, it was law, or not law. It is a law, Mr. R. said in those respects not requiring the intervention of congress, but it requires legislative provisions, because it requires duties to be lowered or raised—which is equivalent to requiring an appropriation or the imposition of taxes, powers acknowledged to belong exclusively to congress. What faith, the gentleman had asked, could be put by foreign powers in compacts with this government, if a treaty may be rendered void, after its ratifications are exchanged, by the refusal of this house to act on it? there was, Mr. R. said, the widest difference between the possession of a power, and the expediency of exercising it. Suppose a treaty should have received every possible sanction, that of this house included, we still have at any time a right to break it off, without consulting the other party, and go to war. A nation puts faith in other nations, not because of this or that form of government, this or that check, or this or that balance in the operations of a government, but according to its conviction of the disposition of other nations to maintain their faith. By that criterion, by that standard of character, ours is at least as good as sterling, and, he believed, a carat better. Great Britain put faith in us for the same reason we put faith in her, tempering our faith; for though scepticism be damnable heresy in religion, it is sometimes otherwise in politics—tempering it with a proper degree of distrust on both sides.

If we put faith in a single individual at the head of a government, as in the case of treaties with European powers, how much more reason have they to put faith in the guarantee afforded by the pledge of every branch of a government like ours, representing the whole people of the United States. Before the prince regent in England, can violate a treaty, and make war, he must be supported by a vote of credit from the house of commons; this is some restraint on him—but, Mr. R. said, we have made treaties with the despots of every clime and color, from the lily and rose of the north to the jet black of Africa; and yet we are under no sort of doubt that these high contracting parties will adhere to their faith so long as they feel it their interest to do so. It then at last turned out, that foreign nations had nothing at all to do with this question; that whether the ratifications are exchanged properly or improperly, was an affair between us at home, with which foreign powers could not be permitted to meddle; and, Mr. R. said, if he was asked for a just cause of war, he could figure to himself none better than an attempt by any foreign power at intervention in our affairs. This treaty of commerce gives us leave to trade to the East Indies, and to touch at St. Helena. In that shape it came to the United States, and was satisfied here by both governments—How? In the shape in which it came? No; the very lowest grade of diplomatic functionary—he spoke of his office only—put his finger on one article, and said beware of St. Helena! A minister of Great Britain can take a treaty, and make a nose of wax, or any thing else he pleases of it—but the house of representatives of the United States are to have no word in it. He asked, whether it was competent to a British minister, after a treaty had been solemnly signed under the eye of his own master, materially to alter the provisions of a treaty?—and the alteration was a material one, because the comfort and refreshment of touching at St. Helena was a matter of some consequence in an East India voyage—it was of little consequence, he said to us, who should be soon dismissed to a good hotel and smoking table; but to the poor scorbutic sea-worn sailor, it was of great value. Was it safer for this house to exercise a controlling power on the acts of the president and senate, so as to meet the coming disease; or that it should be entirely restrained from interfering, and the president and senate go on making treaties until an extreme case, when the people would interfere and correct the procedure? Mr. R. said, he was no Jacobin—he hoped it was unnecessary to say that he was no man for a government of mobs, but of order, law and religion—but, he said, there are points beyond which the people cannot be restrained; or should we rather, said he, let the president and senate go on, provided they can find a dey of Algiers to treat with—provided they can find a place to stand on, until they make this sweeping treaty-making power a fulcrum to move the constitution from its orbit? Mr. R. concluded by observing that the senate had sent a bill to this house, a bill which he considered as yielding the question, and on which it would perhaps be best to act in preference to that now before the house.

Mr. Pinkney rose to explain; to make a few observations which he said he should have made before, but that he had understood the gentleman to wish not to be interrupted. Mr. P. said he thought he did not state to the house, that his language had not been liable to the exception which the gentleman from Virginia had shewn a disposition to take to it. The gentleman had said that impeachment had been tried and found wanting; in reference to which remark he (Mr. P.) had said that the example to which the gentleman had referred was not conclusive in support of that position; that impeachment might fail from various reasons; that the party impeached might be innocent—into which question he had not entered. Mr. P. said he was almost wholly unacquainted with the nature of either of the cases—his language was not liable to the imputation of having sought to reprehend the conduct of the gentlemen who conducted either. The gentleman had said, observed Mr. P. that he is no draw-cansir. Neither am I, sir. I should not have desired to reflect on the gentleman from Virginia—far from it; I am always disposed to speak in his praise; he has given such proofs of his genius, as command my respect. But if I had a desire, which I had not, to cast a reflection on him, what reason was there to suppose I had a desire to do soon those, some of whose names I do not know? I supposed that the house of representatives had selected men of the first ability, always as competent as any lawyer, to conduct the impeachment. I take it for granted the impeachment was managed with the utmost dexterity and talent. All I meant to say was that the failure of that impeachment did not prove that impeachment would always be found wanting. In the case expressly alluded to (that of Judge Chase) I presumed the innocence of the party. This explanation is due not only to the honorable gentleman to whom my remarks apply, but to my own honor and character.

Mr. Randolph expressed his happiness at hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman, he said, had misunderstood him in supposing him not to be disposed to allow the gentleman to explain—from his not having done so, Mr. R. confessed he had considered him as sustaining the innuendo. He reciprocated the sentiments of respect, &c. which the gentleman had expressed, &c.

Mr. Pickering said, that after so long a discussion of the question before the house, he would not have risen, had not some lights, in which it should be viewed, passed unobserved.

In this country, said he, we hold that all the powers of government originate with the people. Those powers the people might distribute in any manner they pleased. They might have vested all legislative power in one man; in a president, or in a president and senate, or in a president, senate and house of representatives. To see now they have in fact distributed the powers of government, we must look to the constitution, which they have framed for that purpose.

The first clause in the constitution reads thus: "All legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." And the inference of gentlemen on the other side of the house is, that whatever powers are expressly granted to congress, are exclusively granted; or, if any other branches of the government act upon the subjects of those powers, the concurrence of this house is necessary to render their acts valid. But if gentlemen will turn to the seven section of the first article of the constitution, they will see an important restriction on the sweeping legislative power apparently granted to the senate and house, in the first section: "Every bill which shall have passed the house of representatives and the senate, shall, before it shall become a law, be presented to the president of the United States" for his approbation; without which it will not become a law, unless, on a reconsideration of it, with the president's objections, it shall be approved by two-thirds of each house. Here, then, is one exception to the sweeping legislative powers granted to congress, as composed of the senate and house of representatives; that is, of bare majorities of the two houses; and a special legislative power is created, and vested in two-thirds of the two houses, whose concurrence is, in such case necessary to make a law.

In like manner, is complete legislative power vested in the president and senate. For we see, in the passage of the constitution so often recited, that all treaties made under the authority of the United States, are declared to be the law of the land: and the president and senate are exclusively vested with the power to make treaties, two-thirds of the senators present concurring.*

*When it is declared, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land;" no more is meant, than that they are supreme in relation to the constitution and the laws of the individual states: and hence, after declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution

But it is said, that among the various powers granted to congress, one is "to regulate commerce with foreign nations;" and that if such regulation of commerce be made the subject of a treaty, an act of congress, including the concurrence of this house, is requisite to make it the law of the land. Here the negotiating of a treaty and the making of a treaty are commounded; although they are perfectly distinct. When a minister, or other exclusive agent, has negotiated a treaty, it is, by the president, laid before the senate; and when, with their advice and consent, it is ratified by the president, it is made, it is complete; and no act of the house of representatives can add any thing to its validity. The word made is equally applied to laws and to treaties. "This constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

As to the subjects of treaties; when the framers of the constitution gave to the president and senate power to make them, without specifying or limiting the subjects to which they should be confined, it is plain the term treaties was intended to embrace the usual subjects of these contracts between nations. At the time when the constitution was ordained, we had four commercial treaties—with France, Holland, Prussia and Sweden; and a treaty of alliance, and a convention or treaty relating to consuls, with France. All these subjects, then, it is certain, are within the treaty-making power of the president and senate. The convention with Great Britain, to which the bill before us refers, embraces but two of them, commerce and consuls.

But, seeing congress have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, why should it be made the subject of treaties? The answer is—to give stability and security to commerce. Suppose the United States and Great Britain, merely by laws of the two countries, had equalized the duties on American and British vessels and their cargoes, in the manner provided by the commercial convention, and suppose that, in expectation of the permanency of those laws, the growers of cotton and tobacco in the United States were to ship those articles in vessels of the United States to Great Britain, and, pending the voyage, the government of that country should deem it expedient to repeal her equalizing laws, adds, "and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." In one other sense indeed the constitution is the supreme law; because it is the act of the people in their sovereign capacity, in the several states; and cannot be changed but by a like act of sovereignty. Hence the laws enacted by congress are required to be made in pursuance of the constitution. And although no such restriction is laid on treaties, because treaties embrace some subjects not mentioned in the constitution, (such as the making of peace and forming alliances with foreign nations,) yet a treaty, no more than an act of congress, which should contain any provision violating the constitution, would be of any validity. For the treaty-making power of the president and senate, as well as the legislative power of congress, being derived from the constitution, every exertion of that power in repugnance to it, or involving the abrogation of any of its provisions, must necessarily be void. To maintain the contrary, would be equally absurd as to say, that a superstructure could stand when its foundation was removed, or that a branch could retain life when the root was dead.

and restore the discriminating duties of tonnage and impost on American vessels and their cargoes; this would bring a very serious loss on those owners. But a treaty would prevent such repeal and consequent injury.

To a just understanding of the question before the house, another distinction should be taken; that is, between the validity and the execution of a treaty. While gentlemen on the other side (with a single exception) admit that some treaties made by the president and senate are valid, without any act to be done on the part of this house, such as simple treaties of peace, and even of alliance; seeing no special power is granted to congress by the constitution, to make peace and form alliances; yet it is said, that when the intervention of this house is necessary, as in providing and making appropriations of money, to carry treaties into execution; then the sanction of this house is requisite to give them a binding force.

But, let it be supposed, that the constitution, instead of vesting the whole treaty-making power in the president and senate, had ordained that no treaty should be valid, unless approved by the house of representatives; and suppose, also, that all the three branches of government concurring, a treaty of commerce and limits were made—such as that with Spain, in 1795. No one would then question its validity; and yet, unless the president and senate appointed commissioners to run the boundary lines, to mark the limits of the respective territories; and unless the house of representatives, concurring with the president and senate, appropriated money to defray the expense thereof, the treaty would remain unexecuted.

According to the doctrine maintained by the framer and advocates of the bill before us, there have never been any valid treaties between the United States and foreign nations, since the organization of our government; for no law of congress has reenacted their articles, (as is attempted by the present bill) or by a general enactment pronounced them to be the law of the land. Take up any of those treaties; for instance, the treaties of 1795, with Great Britain and Spain, where the appointment of commissioners, and appropriations of money were necessary to their execution. Congress passed laws making such appropriations; not to give validity to the treaties; but simply in the language of those laws to carry them into effect.

But shall treaties operate a repeal of a law of the United States? Yes: because treaties being, equally with acts of congress, the law of the land, they must repeal all the provisions of prior laws contravening their stipulations. According to the well-known maxim, that the latter laws repeal all antecedent laws containing contrary provisions; and so long as treaties exist, so long the government and nation are bound to observe them, and the decisions of the judges must conform to their stipulations. But as treaties may thus annul the laws of congress, so may these laws annul treaties; and when congress shall, by a formal act, declare a treaty no longer obligatory on the United States, the judges must abandon the treaty, and obey the law. And why? because the whole authority, on our part, which gave existence and force to the treaty, is withdrawn by the annulling act. Such is the effect of a law of congress declaring war against a nation between whom and the United States any treaties had been made. Take for example, the case of France, with whom we had a treaty of amity and commerce, a treaty of alliance, and a consular convention. These treaties having been repeatedly violated on the part of the French, Government, and the just claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed having been refused; and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations, having been repelled with indignity; and as the French persisted in their system of predatory violence, infracting those treaties, and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation: For these causes explicitly, congress, in July, 1793, passed a law enacting that those treaties should not thenceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the government or citizens of the United States. And two days afterwards, congress passed another law, authorizing the capture of all French armed vessels, to which the commerce of the United States long had been and continued to be the prey. And as in this, so in every other case in which congress shall judge there existed good and sufficient cause for declaring a treaty void, they will so pronounce, either because they intend to declare war, or because they are willing the United States should meet a war, to be declared on the other side, as less injurious to the country than an adherence to the treaty. But should congress, without adequate cause, declare a treaty no longer obligatory, they must be prepared to meet the reproach of perfidy, besides exposing the United States to the evils of war, should the offended nation think fit to avenge the wrong, by making war upon them.

A gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Randolph) among other reasons why this house should claim and exercise as a right, the giving of its formal sanction to a treaty—said, that foreign nations would place more confidence in treaties so sanctioned.—Mr. Pickens held the contrary opinion. Foreign nations, he remarked, with whom we should negotiate treaties, would look into our constitution, to see where the power to make treaties was lodged; and finding it vested in the president and senate exclusively—if they saw that, in practice, the house of representatives interposed its pretensions, that the assent of that house also was necessary; and if they saw the president and senate yielding to such pretensions, to such a manifest encroachment on their exclusive powers; instead of increasing, it would diminish their confidence in the acts of the government. For confidence is inspired and best secured by the stability of a government, and the adherence of all its branches to their respective rights.

Mr. Pickens concluded his observations in saying, that the senate would feel it its duty to maintain its constitutional rights. That having acted with the president in making the commercial treaty with Great Britain, which had thus become the law of the land, it was not to be expected that the senate would adopt the bill before the house, and thus retract the articles it had so recently enacted; and in the last article expressly declared to be binding and obligatory on the United States. It would be better, therefore, not to send the bill to the senate.

Mr. Robertson wished to have again tried the question of laying the bill from the senate on the table; but the speaker decided such a motion not now to be in order. Mr. R. then remarked, that this was a question of much importance, and he hoped no passion would intermingle in its discussion, or influence the decision of it, which, whatever it might be, ought to be the result of cool, deliberate consideration. He did not consider the act of the senate, in sending this bill to the house, as indecorous, but as a proper exercise of their powers.—However, it again brought up the whole question, and on the permission of the house, he would concisely examine it. I was delighted, said Mr. B. with the consequence of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Pickens.) I was pleased with his liberality and fair manner of meeting the question, but I was shocked with his principles. I never did hear, I never did expect to hear, within these walls, principles so dangerous as those to which the gentleman has boldly, I was about to say, daringly, given utterance. The treaty-making power, according to his doctrine, is without restraint; it is without restraint; prostrates before it all the rights of this house, and tramples under foot opinions heretofore held sacred. Whatever treaty, of whatever kind, fall within the powers of any civilized government, it is competent to our president and senate to make; if the instrument be in itself complete, if it merely annul and abrogate laws, this house cannot interfere; thus the whole of our statutes, the entire code of our laws, lies at their mercy, and may, with the aid of any foreign sovereign who will unite in the scheme, be forever annihilated. Such is the doctrine of the gentleman from Maryland. Whence does it spring; how has it been supported? let us probe it to the bottom, let us examine it with deliberation. Where is the legislative power in this government vested by the constitution? this is the sole and simple question, if it be not the only point in controversy; then my lips are closed, I have nothing more to say. If the president and senate can make treaties, without repealing existing laws or making new ones, why let them do so, let them treat, and treat, and treat; they will not alarm my fears, I shall feel no concern. There may be, for any thing I know to the contrary, many treaties which do not necessarily include legislation; there are treaties of alliance, triple and quadruple, treaties of neutrality, partition, family compacts, &c. give them up these; on these and such as these they may exercise their treaty-making power. But let them not legislate. There are bounds to this authority, as claimed for them. The legislation of congress is defined and limited by the constitution, but treaty legislation has no bounds. The president and senate, with the aid of a few commissioners, and a foreign sovereign, an emperor or a king of France, a lord Castlereagh, or any other de-pot, may govern this people without check or control, or responsibility. They may? The gentleman from Maryland says they can—they can legislate, although all legislative power is vested in congress, consisting of a house of representatives, senate and president. They may regulate commerce, although the right to regulate commerce is given to congress; they may draw money from the treasury by law, for a treaty is a law. Look to the general powers of congress; look to the specified, look to the limitations imposed upon that body—leave out this house, substitute a foreign government, their general powers are usurped, their specified powers taken from them, the limitations imposed for the good of the people utterly disregarded. The president and senate? Let them not legislate—it is the proudest, it is the only prerogative of republicanism. Legislation and representation in free governments go hand in hand. They are not representatives, they are not responsible. The gentleman from Maryland says they are more responsible than members of this house. How stands the fact? The president is elected for four years, the members of this house for two, but as, under the practice of the constitution, the chief executive magistrate serves but two terms, the last is without a shadow of responsibility; he does not present himself at the bar of the public to receive sentence of approval or condemnation. But the president is liable to impeachment. Indeed! impeachment? Yes, to be tried by that very body who advised the ratification of the instrument; to be tried by his accomplices! I ask the gentleman from Maryland if he would make himself laughed at by every man, woman and child in the community, by bringing about so futile and farcical an exhibition?—We see then the responsibility of the president, let us examine that of his co-peers. The senators are appointed for six years, not by the people, but by some dozens of individuals who form the state legislatures—they are not impeachable, if that were in this case of any importance, neither are they amenable to censure, because they transact their executive business with closed doors—they act in private, no one knows how any senator votes, he is the sole depository of his own secret—he votes and speaks as his caprice, his interests, or his judgment dictates—he fears no punishment, for his course is hidden—his executive powers are exerted in conclave—mark the word, executive powers—would it be believed that in the United States of America laws were repealed and enacted in the exercise of executive business? Why, what an anomaly is the executive legislative management!

The gentleman from Maryland goes the full length. If the treaty merely repeals laws, if it require not the aid of this house, the instrument is complete—the deed is done; but if, and according to his doctrine it can never happen, it requires some act of ours; then we have no discretion, we receive orders and must obey—if after the stabs inflicted on this body, animation still exist. The gentleman tells you to raise your suicidal arm and perpetrate self-murder! worse! your parricidal arm, and plunge a dagger in the bosom of your country—for the republic no more survives! I contain not one single feature to distinguish it from the despotisms of Europe. If this doctrine prevail, and that equally abominable principle, which authorizes the judges to declare the little remnant of your legislation null and void, because in their opinion unconstitutionally exercised; hemmed in thus by the executive and the judiciary, there is no further use for this assembly. If the legislature, the pre-eminent authority in all free government, be thus blocked up, thus circumvented, and that too by comparatively insignificant departments—departments inferior, subordinate, ministerial, then I have no hesitation in saying that I should not regret the flames that blazed around that once splendid edifice now in view, nor that a similar fate should befall this humble building in which we this day are met—for one, I would not disgrace myself by holding a seat in this degraded and miserable body.

The gentleman from Maryland contends, that whatever treaty may be made by any power on earth, may be made by our president and senate; that when made it becomes the law of the land; that in this respect their power is universal and unlimited. In what respect? In making treaties which are the laws of the land; in other words, that the president and senate can make laws of the land on all subjects, and that too without limitation. Surely nothing more is necessary than to state such doctrines to make them universally abhorred. But to deny their truth, is, according to the gentleman, to produce the most extravagant anomaly imaginable in the constitution. Is it not rendering the constitution of the United States a more extravagant anomaly to strip the legislature of the right to legislate, and transfer the law-making power to the executive? If one must yield, if the president and senate must be retrenched in their treaty-making power, or congress deprived of the right to legislate, then is there no room for hesitation; difficulties in regard to intercourse with foreign governments, can only embroil us with them; but an interference with the rights and duties of congress prostrates the only barrier between the people and despotism, and embroils them with each other. Let us preserve the union, the constitution, principles of republicanism, and the privileges of this house; let us guard against the introduction of slavish and European notions of executive supremacy, and we have nothing to fear from the hostility of a world in arms.

But who are they whom we behold in array, supporting the extravagant pretensions of the senate of the United States? What a singular phenomenon they exhibit: we find them ranged against the body of which they form a part; we find them voluntarily surrendering up the essential principle of their existence, and that too in favor of a jealous and a rival department, while the executive magistrate, in all governments sufficiently disposed to claim the full measure of his prerogative, himself admits the power properly to belong to those by whom it is thus so unaccountably abandoned. I assert, that the president of the United States does not believe, with the gentleman from Maryland, that a treaty can repeal or enact a law, and I proceed now to prove it.—In a letter dated July 27, 1812, from Mr. Monroe, then secretary of state, to Mr. Russell, we find the following remarks: "As an inducement to the British government, to discontinue the practice of impressment from our vessels, by which alone our seamen can be made secure, you are authorized to stipulate a prohibition by law, to be reciprocal, of the employment of British seamen in the public or commercial service of the United States. A stipulation to prohibit by law the employment of British seamen in the service of the United States, is to be understood in the sense and spirit of our constitution. The passage of such a law must depend of course on congress, who it might reasonably be presumed, would give effect to it." Can language be more explicit; the renunciation of the power ascribed to the executive more full? Compare it with the language of the gentleman from Maryland? According to him, the treaty might have itself repealed, instead of stipulating that congress should repeal the law in question. There are many other instances of a similar kind; but one, as clear and complete as the present, is of as much value as one thousand. Let it be observed too, that this is not strictly a commercial affair, and how, if it were not competent to the treaty-making power to act independently of congress in this case, shall it be contended it can act independently of that body, in commercial questions, notwithstanding the constitution gives to congress the power to regulate commerce? The doctrine of the gentleman properly understood, amounts to what I have already stated, an exclusive right in the president and senate to legislate for this nation, in all cases; it is neither more nor less, nor can ingenuity give to it any other meaning. And why should this enormous, this overwhelming power be yielded? Cannot the provision of any treaty be declared by law? Will not reciprocal legislation between independent nations supply the place of treaties? Might not a law contain all the provisions of the convention which has given rise to this debate? Might not, do I say? Look at the law passed at the last session by the proper authority, it is merely re-echoed by this treaty; a law of the British government meeting that of ours, would have answered precisely the purposes of their instrument; and the same may be said of all treaties. Why, if congress cannot regulate commerce, was the power given? Why accorded upon? Why the act to which I have referred? The conduct of this house may be accounted for easily enough. We deem the subject placed in part under our control—but why did the senate legislate?—why did they originate the act? Did they then think that commerce could not be regulated by the three branches? Was the act an usurpation of the treaty-making power? It commenced with themselves. Was it superfluous, or insufficient? Surely that body will make no such admission.

The house of representatives contends for no exclusive authority—it contends for such a participation in the government as is assigned to it by the constitution. Treaties may be made by legislation—but legislation must not exist through treaties. The right which we assert cannot be productive of irremediable inconvenience. The power contended for by the senate, and their advocates, subverts the very foundation of the government—totally changes its character, and establishes rank and unqualified despotism.

Mr. Taylor of N. York, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker—I have listened to the remarks of the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. Pickering) with the attention due to age and experience. The important offices he has held under this government, and the extended period of his political life, claim for his opinions particular respect.—But the tribute of respect is all I can pay—I cannot assent to his construction of the constitution, as it applies either to the legislative or the treaty making power. In my judgment, these powers, under the constitution of the United States, are perfectly distinct in relation both to the authority exercising them, and the subjects upon which they can definitively act. A treaty is a compact of accommodation between independent states, relating to their public affairs. It derives all its efficacy from the consent and agreement of the parties; it operates upon the willing only; it is obeyed by the parties no longer than obedience is voluntary. If its engagements are violated, there is no tribunal competent to afford redress—recompence can be found only in the provisions of a new compact, equally voluntary to the first, or in a resort to the ultima ratio regum. The proper subjects of treaty arrangement are, those to which legislative power cannot reach, by reason of its limited jurisdiction. Were it not for this, no treaty would, or indeed could, be made; there could be no parties capable of contracting; freedom of will would be wanting: for it is the nature of legislative power to impose upon all persons, subject to its jurisdiction, an obligation to conform themselves to the rule it prescribes. It possesses within itself a capacity of making all laws necessary to carry its enactments into complete execution; all other power is inferior and subject to its control; it is restrained only by the constitution of the government under which it acts, and limited only by its territorial jurisdiction. "The idea of law necessarily comprehends that of a penalty, consequent upon its violation, of a tribunal which determines the penalty, and a physical force to put it in execution." In a government where the will of a despot is the supreme law, it is immaterial to the subject whether that will be expressed in the announcement of a treaty or an edict; but in a government where the law-making power is vested in three departments, and the treaty-making or bargaining power in two of them, it may become vastly important to national liberty, that these two departments should not be permitted, in the form of treaties, to exercise the sovereign power of enacting and repealing laws. Does, then, the constitution give to the president of the United States the power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, in the form of a treaty, to legislate for the people of this country, by repealing the laws of congress and enacting others in their stead? The question is important; it should be discussed with temperance, and decided with firmness. I agree with my honorable colleague, (Mr. Gold) that the present occasion is auspicious for both.

It is admitted on both sides of the house, that the treaty now under consideration is well advised, and ought to be carried into full execution on the part of the United States. But it is denied by the honorable member from Massachusetts (Mr. Pickering) and by most of those who, on this occasion, vote with him, that a law or congress is necessary to give it effect, because the constitution declares, that the president shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the senators present concur; and that all treaties made, or to be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Let it be remembered, that municipal law maintains its obligation over all those subjects which are within its jurisdiction, and that a treaty-law enforces its agreements or compacts only on public international affairs which municipal law cannot reach. A law of congress compels obedience to its enactments on all subjects over which legislative power is granted to that body by the constitution; but what power is more clearly granted than that of regulating commerce? And what law is more purely municipal than that which prescribes the sum of money to be paid on the importation into a territory, of a particular article of trade or commerce? It enters into considerations of domestic policy, equally important and various. The wants of the citizens of a state both in peace and war—the encouragement of their home manufactures, and generally their whole domestic concerns are affected by it. It is, therefore, a fit subject of municipal legislation. By whom then is such legislation to be exercised? The constitution, in the first section of its first article, gives the answer, "all legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." The eighth section of the same article, which grants to congress the power of declaring war, raising and supporting armies, and coining money, grants in terms equally strong and definite, the power also of laying duties and regulating commerce. But it is contended, that as a treaty is the supreme law of the land, so it attaches to itself the essential quality of all other law, that of repealing former laws contradicting its enactments; and gentlemen have attempted to illustrate this position, by calling our attention to the treaty of peace, and asking whether it did not repeal the law declaring war? I answer the enquiry in the negative. The act of declaring war is in most limited governments purely executive. The constitution vests the exercise of that power in congress, and in exerting it congress acts rather executively than legislatively. An act declaring the relations of amity which had existed between two nations, to be terminated, may be prefaced with a recital, that the offending nation had committed acts of hostility against the other, and, therefore, that a state of war existed, as was done at the last session of congress, in passing the act for protecting the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers, or, omitting a recital in the law, it may simply enact, that a state of war is declared to exist between the two countries, leaving the publication of its causes to a report or manifesto, as was done in declaring war against Great Britain. In either case the law is purely declaratory. It presupposes hostile acts to have been committed, and does nothing more than promulgate, in an official form, the existing relations between the governments concerned. An act declaring war, is in its nature also of limited duration. The only legitimate end of war is peace: Surely it is the only end contemplated by the constitution of the United States. It is to continue in force until relations of amity shall be restored, in the manner pointed out by the constitution, and no longer. Whenever that event happens, the law becomes inapplicable, and expires by its own limitation: A treaty of peace, therefore, does not repeal an act declaring war.

Neither is a treaty the supreme law of the land, in the same sense that either the constitution or an act of congress is supreme. The second paragraph of the sixth article of the constitution, declares "this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

First, then, the constitution is supreme as being that charter of liberty proposed to the people of the United States, by their convention on the 17th September, 1787, and afterwards ratified by the people of all the states, which cannot be altered by act of congress, nor by treaty; nor in any other manner than that prescribed by the constitution itself. It is, therefore, superior in dignity and authority to every other law. Second—laws of the United States made in pursuance of the constitution; and third, treaties made under the authority of the United States, although inferior to the constitution, are, within their respective powers of making laws concerning the internal, and making compacts relative to the external affairs of the country, supreme in comparison of constitution and laws of any state, and binding upon the judges thereof. This construction of the constitution preserves the harmony of all its parts. It leaves each department to act within its own sphere, and conforms to the rule that, in expounding an instrument, such construction shall be adopted, that all its parts may stand together, and effect be given to each. But the construction, advocated by those who oppose the passage of this bill, on the ground that legislative interference is unnecessary, is in manifest contradiction of the constitution itself, and the acknowledged powers of this house. If the words "supreme law" are to be applied in precisely the same sense to the constitution, to acts of congress and to treaties, it follows that a treaty is of equal dignity and binding obligation to the constitution. And as a posterior law repeals all of a prior date which contradict its enactments, a treaty may alter, amend, or repeal the constitution itself—but the president and thirteen senators may make a treaty, therefore they may in the form of a treaty make amendments to the constitution which cannot be made without the consent of three fourths of the states in the union. Their construction is in manifest violation also of the acknowledged powers of congress. It is admitted by all that if a treaty contain a stipulation on the part of the United States to make a payment of money, that it cannot be carried into effect without the passage of a law by congress making an appropriation for that purpose—why not? Will gentlemen inform me? The constitution does not say that an appropriation law shall be passed by the senate and house of representatives. No, sir—it only says "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriation made by law." But if a treaty is the supreme law of the land, capable of altering, amending or repealing the laws of congress, money drawn from the treasury in consequence of an appropriation contained in a treaty, would be drawn not only legally, but in pursuance of the supreme law itself. A conclusion fraught with such monstrous absurdity has not yet found an advocate on this floor—but such is the inevitable consequence of the construction for which gentlemen in the opposition con end.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asked whether the treaty will not be executed even if congress refuse to pass a law for that purpose. I answer in the negative. By the existing laws, goods imported into the United States from Great Britain in American vessels pay a certain duty, and goods imported in British vessels pay a different duty. By the treaty it is agreed that in both cases they shall be charged with the same duty; the treaty does not, neither could it determine what that duty should be; whether it should be the higher or lower rate, or a modification of both; that could only be decided by municipal law; to make that decision the bill under discussion is introduced; legislation on the subject is thought necessary by the president himself. In his message communicating the treaty, he says, "I recommend to congress such legislative provisions as the convention may call for on the part of the United States." Such is not the form in which treaties capable of executing themselves are communicated. For a proof of this I refer gentlemen to the president's message at the last session of congress announcing the treaty of peace with Great Britain.

We have already seen that the constitution in its first article contains a declaration that all legislative power shall be vested in congress. The eighth section of the same article proceeds to enumerate the subjects over which that power may be exercised. "The congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." But of what avail is this power if the president and thirteen senators can by treaty abolish a tax or duty laid by congress and establish another? If they can vary the tariff of duties in any particular, they can abolish it altogether. They can agree that all goods, the growth, produce or manufacture of the British dominions, shall be admitted into the United States free of duty, in consideration that the British government will extend the same privilege to American produce imported into Great Britain; or in consideration that the British government will grant to the United States the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, to be governed as the president and senate, or as the president alone, or as any other individual may direct; or in consideration that the British government would pay to the president or the senate, or to the paymaster-general of the army of the United States, an annuity of ten millions of dollars, to be disbursed by the president of the United States—or for any other consideration which they might think proper to accept.

"To borrow money on the credit of the United States."

But of what avail is this power if the president and senate can repeal the revenue laws of congress enacted with a view to pay the interest and repay the principal of money so borrowed, or if they can by treaty borrow money themselves and pledge the public faith or mortgage the public lands for its reimbursement.

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations."

But of what avail is this power, if the president and senate can definitively agree by treaty with a foreign nation, what articles of commerce shall be admitted into the United States, and what excluded; what duties shall be paid, and what remitted; and generally upon all subjects relating to both foreign and domestic commercial transactions?

"To establish an uniform rule of naturalization."

But of what avail is this power, if the president and senate can by treaty stipulate that the subjects of a foreign government either shall not be admitted into the United States, or be admitted, shall not be naturalized, or if they can repeal the naturalization laws enacted by congress and establish others contradictory thereto?

"To declare war."

Even this exalted attribute of sovereignty is of little importance to congress, if the president and senate can, by a treaty of alliance, bind the United States to commit an act of hostility against a nation with which we are at peace, thereby producing a state of actual war as effectually as if declared by the constitutional organ of the government.

"To raise and support armies."

But this grant of power may be rendered useless, if the president and senate can, by treaty stipulation fix the number of men to be retained on the military establishment of this and another country, with a view to the mutual security of both; or by a treaty of alliance determine the contingent of force to be furnished by the United States and the amount of subsidy to be received therefor.

"To provide and maintain a navy."

This power also is annihilated, if the president and senate can agree with the government of another nation, what amount of naval force shall be retained in service by the respective countries.

The constitutional power of congress over the militia, if the construction advocated on a former occasion by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Pickering,) and his political friends, be correct, (which construction has been sanctioned too by the government of more than one state in the union,) is too contemptible to justify a single remark in regard to its possession.

In fine, there is not a legislative power granted to congress by the constitution which the president and senate may not usurp, nay, which they cannot lawfully exercise under the construction given to that instrument by the gentleman from Massachusetts, except perhaps the power of exercising, "exclusive" legislation over the district of Columbia.

Against such enormous political heresy, I am constrained to enter my solemn protest; if it ever receive the sanction of this house, the charter of American liberty will not be worth preserving; the right, dignity and power of this house, derived not from sovereign states, but from a more noble origin—the people themselves, whose representatives we are, whose wants and wishes the constitution presumes us better to know than any other branch of the government, and to whom we are amenable for the exercise of the power confided to us—these rights will be abandoned, this dignity sullied, and our power of standing between the people and oppression will be gone forever. The president and senate, uniting legislative authority to executive patronage, will manage the concerns of the government in their own way, not responsible to any earthly tribunal.

Gentlemen, however, have told us not to be alarmed—all is well—there is no danger—the president and senators are honorable men—good men and true—acting under a high responsibility—with wisdom to discern, and virtue to pursue the best interests of the country. All this may be true, but what security have you, Mr. Speaker, that their seats will always be occupied by men of equal merits? Kings have been bribed and senates corrupted—what has happened to the chief magistrates and senators of other ages and nations may possibly happen hereafter in our own country. God grant that it may not—at least, that neither we nor our children to the hundredth generation may see the evil. But should it be the misfortune of the American people to have the administration of their government committed to corrupt hands, what incalculable mischief would no. follow the doctrine of presidential and senatorial legislative supremacy. If a treaty should be made combining in its provisions all the usurpation which I have supposed possible, accompanied with circumstances indicating the most unhallowed ambition, even the poor satisfaction of punishing the offenders would be denied to the people. The senate is the sole judge of its own members, who are not liable to impeachment in any case whatever, and the president, if impeached, would be tried by judges equally criminal with himself—judges, who, in their senatorial capacity, advised the very act, for doing which the president would be arraigned at the bar of their house. The absurdity of such a trial is too manifest to require a comment.

But it is asked, is this house infallible? Is it proof against corrupt and ambitious influence? Is its patriotism above all praise? I answer, that its numerous members elected for a short period by the people themselves, are at least equally unlikely to indulge projects of ambition dangerous to the liberties of their fellow citizens as the members of the senate, which in practice is almost, and in theory altogether a permanent body. The people have therefore some additional security in the public virtue of this house for at least honest legislation, which would be entirely withdrawn by the construction of the constitution, against which I protest. And if it happen contrary to my expectation that the senate shall reject this bill, which I trust we shall shortly send to them for their concurrence, the period will already have arrived when every barrier which this house can erect will be required at our hands to guard the rights of the people against the tyranny of senatorial usurpation.

But we are again told to quit our fears, for "there is no danger." Mr. Speaker, it was one of the first lessons taught me by my parents, not to believe in the doctrine of "no danger." I remember to have read in a good old fashioned book, that it was the doctrine successfully preached by the serpent to "the mother of mankind." It was in substance the language used by Joab, who too was an honorable man, a chief and a captain over the host, while he was preparing to plunge his murderous weapon into the side of Abner, the son of Ner—and, in fine, it was the language of the Tories in the revolutionary war.—But, it was never the language of the revolutionary whig. When the British government imposed a three penny tea tax upon the people of this country, the Tories, or as they called themselves, the loyalists, said, "no danger," it is an honorable government, and the power will not be abused. But what said the whigs? It is, said they, the principle and not the sum against which we contend.—If we abandon the principle, there is no stopping point; we shall be chained together like manacled slaves, and driven wherever our masters please to drive us.—Such too was the language of republi-an whigs in 1798. And it will be the language of whig principles to the end of the world; examine the page of all history, and you will find the no-danger creed recommended by the Catalines, Arnolds, and Lemonds of all nations, and resisted by their Franklins, Browns, and Jacksons. We, Mr. Speaker, are the people's watchmen—their sentinels. It is our duty to be vigilant, to guard their liberties, and to sound an alarm at every approach of danger; and, while I have the honor to occupy this place, not one jot, nor one tittle of their rights, or of the constitutional power of this house, shall be usurped by the senate, or any other department of the government, by my consent.

Mr. Wilde said, he little thought when this debate commenced, that it would have been continued so long, and thought as little, that in the course of it, he should have troubled the house with any remarks. Till now indeed, he had been a mute, as far as he could be, a patient, and he hoped not altogether inattentive listener. Had his views of the subject been presented to the house by any other gentleman, he should still have remained so, content to prefer—however ignoble the choice—the safety of silence to the hazards of debate. As they had not, he would venture to intrude them as briefly as he could, that at least they might not tire those whom they did not please.

He desired previously, however, to offer a word or two in answer to some arguments which had been urged in the course of this discussion. It had been said by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) that the bill upon your table is unnecessary, because an act was passed at the last session repealing our discriminating duties as to all nations who should repeal their discriminating duties as to us. Now, sir, asked Mr. W. what evidence have we that Great Britain has repealed her discriminating duties as to us? The treaty indeed provides that she shall do so, and there is no doubt it will be done. But at present, sir, they are merely suspended by the order in council of the 17th of August, which we have seen in the newspapers, and which does not refer either to the words or the date of the treaty, and can as little be connected with the law of the last session. On the contrary its duration is limited to six weeks after the commencement of the next session of parliament, pointing evidently to a repeal of those duties by act of parliament before the expiration of that period, and by and by, we shall see the act repealing those duties, which it is necessary should be abolished before the law of the last session can operate effectually. Farther sir, a strict examination of that law will shew that however it might have been intended, its words fairly interpreted, reach only to goods wares and merchandize the growth or produce of the foreign nation, and not to the ships or vessels in which they may be imported; whilst the convention stipulates that all discrimination as to both shall be at an end. The law of the last session therefore is not co-extensive with the stipulations of the convention, and cannot supersede the necessity of the present bill.—But the passage of that very law, sir, furnishes an argument against the doctrines of the gentlemen who have alluded to it, so far as any argument can be drawn from the practice and opinions of the last congress. If they believed, as the gentlemen do, that the president and senate had the power of making a treaty which should have the force of a law in repealing those duties, why was it necessary to pass a law providing for their repeal? Evidently, sir, it would not have been thought necessary, for according to such a supposition they must have believed the president and senate had this power independent of all law. Their passing this law therefore is the strongest proof they could have given us of their belief that the president and senate had not this power.

Mr. W. said, if he understood the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Pickering) correctly, he undertook to shew by the uniform practice of the government since the adoption of the constitution, that laws had not been passed to carry treaties into effect, except where an appropriation of money was required, and he thence inferred, that laws for that purpose had not been deemed necessary. Mr. W. declared he had examined all the treaties which had been made, and the laws which have been passed regarding them, in conjunction with his friend and colleague who reported this bill to the house, and who gave a brief statement of the nature of the treaties made and the laws passed, and of the evident reasons why, in certain cases laws had not been thought necessary. His colleague certainly did not go into details, because with such subjects every member of the house was presumed to be acquainted; but the result of their examination was a conviction in them; but that whenever laws had not been passed in conformity with the stipulations of a treaty, it was generally, if not universally because those stipulations did not touch any of the objects committed exclusively to the jurisdiction of congress; or in other words, did not require the enactment of any new or the change of any old municipal regulation. To enter into an examination and comparison of those laws and treaties now, would, Mr. W. observed, be to inflict more upon the patience of the house than it would be willing to endure.—If, however, a positive precedent upon his part was demanded, he would lay his hand upon it at once; and it was not the less welcome, to him at least, on account of its having been established during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, a period of what he had been accustomed to consider as correct principles. It was the stronger, because Mr. Jefferson, when secretary of state, is said to have maintained the opinion now supported by the gentlemen on the opposite side of the house. The Louisiana convention, Mr. W. said, was open before him, and he found there a stipulation upon the very same subject, and in form not very unlike that of the treaty now under discussion. That stipulation provided for the admission of French and Spanish vessels into the port of New Orleans for twelve years, upon the same footing as American vessels—the law which was passed on that occasion did contain a provision to the same effect. (Here Mr. Wilde read the law and the convention.)

The bill before you, Mr. W. remarked, has been called "the echo of the treaty, its reflected image, its twin-brother." He would ask if this law and the article in the Louisiana convention are not at least of the same family, and as like one another as Sebastian and Viola?

Having made this reply to some of the arguments of others, Mr. W. said, he would now proceed to offer a few of his own.

If he had not misconceived some of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Pinkney) it was admitted, that a treaty might be either self-executory, or might require a law to carry it into effect.

He agreed perfectly in that opinion, but no rules had been furnished for deciding what treaties were self-executory, and what required laws to assist their operation; without such rules it would be impossible to determine the present question, which is to what class does this treaty belong?

What the hand of a master neglected to perform, either because his eye was fixed upon greater objects, or because he deemed it unworthy of his genius, the hand of a novice might venture to attempt; for if he failed he forfeited nothing but a reputation which is not worth preserving—while if he succeeded, he acquires all he can ever hope for, the praise of being useful. The rule which he would offer was probably not such a one as the gentleman himself would have given; certainly not as good a one, possibly little better than no rule at all. He offered it not without hesitation, and it was simply this:

That where the stipulations of a treaty relate entirely to objects purely international or extra-territorial, then they are self-executory, or at most require nothing more than an exertion of the executive or judicial powers to carry them into effect. But that where they relate solely to objects extra-territorial, objects purely of municipal legislative jurisdiction, there they require the exertion of the municipal legislative authority to assist their operation.

To the first class belonged conventions regulating the reciprocal rights and duties of nations, when one of them shall be belligerent and the other neutral, including the definition of blockade, of contraband of war, of enemy's property, of the right of search, and of all other questions, coming within the jurisdiction of the admiralty or maritime courts of either nation, sitting under, and professing at least, to decide according to the authority of national law. In the same class were included all treaties merely of peace. As to these the president and senate ratify the treaty. The president as commander in chief can suspend hostilities, and the tribunals of prize are competent to do the rest.

To the second class he would refer all treaties, conventions, and agreements, having solely for their object, a change, either reciprocal or otherwise, of any regulations merely municipal, in one or both countries. If the change was to be reciprocal, according to his idea, it would require the interposition of the legislature of each country respectively; if it is not to be reciprocal, it would require the interposition of the legislature of that country only, in which the change was to be effected.

Farther, sir, said Mr. W. treaties may be mixed or compounded of stipulations, relating to objects, some of which belong to one class and some to the other.

Of this description are treaties of guarantee, of alliance, of subsidy, of cession, of boundaries, and many others which I will not attempt to enumerate. So far as these relate to objects purely international, they are self-executory, or at all events, may be executed without the aid of the legislative power. But so far as they concern objects solely of municipal legislation, so far they require the aid of the legislative authority to carry them into effect. If the terms are reciprocal, they will require reciprocal legislation in each country, respectively, so far as they relate to the latter class of objects. If they are not reciprocal they will require legislation in that country only where municipal regulations are to be altered or affected.

Thus a treaty merely of guarantee or alliance, between two nations, both of whom are at peace, is self-executory; it is perfected by the exchange of ratifications. Its objects are purely international, and require no legislation, because they require no new municipal regulations, neither do they require the change of any already in existence.

But if such a treaty stipulate that one or both parties shall raise and keep up a certain number of troops, this stipulation if it be reciprocal, must be legislated upon in both countries; if not reciprocal, it must be legislated upon in that country which is to keep up the troops, because as to that country the object of the treaty is a municipal regulation.

As to a treaty of subsidy, that too would require legislation in the country paying the subsidy, because the appropriation of money is a municipal regulation.

With regard to treaties of alliance, with a nation already engaged in a war, as well as to treaties of cession and boundary, they required to be considered as well with relation to the extent of the power vested in the authority making them, as with relation to the objects of the treaties themselves. If the same authority which is invested with the power of making treaties possesses also the power of declaring war, then that authority may make a treaty of alliance with a nation actually engaged in a war. But if the power of making treaties and of declaring war is not lodged in the same hands, then the authority of the treaty-making power does not extend to such a case; because to make a treaty of alliance with a nation engaged in war, is to make war on the enemy of that nation.—Even if the treaty-making power is also invested with the power of declaring war, still all the stipulations of any treaty of alliance which it may make with a belligerent nation, so far as the same relate to raising troops, paying money, or to other objects of municipal regulation, so far will the stipulations of such a treaty require legislative interposition to carry them into effect. On the other hand, so far as such stipulations concern objects merely inter-national and extra-territorial, so far they are self-executory, or at all events, may be executed by the executive and judicial powers, without any legislative assistance.

With reference to treaties of boundary and cession, he would say, that if the treaty-making power of a nation is constitutionally authorised to fix its boundaries or cede any part of its territory by treaty, and does by treaty contract its boundaries or cede a part of its territory, such a treaty is self-executory.—If by a treaty of cession or boundary, it extends the limits of the nation, or acquires new territories, such a treaty, so far as it relates to objects merely municipal, will require legislation; your laws, civil and criminal, cannot be extended over it merely by treaty.

To decide how far any treaty, and particularly the treaty before us, requires legislative assistance to carry it into effect, we must ascertain first, the constitutional extent of the treaty-making power over the objects of that treaty: and secondly, how far the treaty stipulations concern such objects as are purely international, and are for this reason self-executory; and how far those stipulations relate to objects municipal and extra-territorial, and therefore cannot execute themselves or be executed without legislative interposition.

The president and senate have power to make treaties, this is said to mean all treaties—treaties of commerce as well as the rest. Granted. Still this does not decide the question. These treaties when made may be either self-executory, or they may require the aid of laws to carry them into execution.

Which class is this treaty? What are the objects of some of its stipulations? Are they purely international or municipal?—Extra or intra-territorial? They relate to the equalization of duties. Can any thing be asked be so entirely an object of municipal regulation? Can any thing be more completely intra-territorial?

Let us consider, said Mr. W. the nature of the treaty-making power. Is it a power to pledge the faith of the nation to any thing or to every thing? Possible or impossible? Evidently not. It is a power to pledge the faith of the nation for the performance of such things only as are naturally and constitutionally possible. Is it a power to pledge the faith of the nation absolutely and without qualification in all cases? Or only absolutely in some cases and qualifiedly in others? Certainly the latter. And this seemed to him the distinction. The treaty-making power is authorised to pledge the faith of the nation absolutely for the performance of all stipulations, purely international or extra-territorial, because these are either self-executory, and are in fact partly executed by the mere exchange of ratifications, as in a treaty of peace; or, they depend for their execution on the executive and judicial powers, which are sufficient for that purpose as in the restoration of prizes captured after the cessation of hostilities; as in the decision of contraband, enemy's property, blockade, the right of search, the change of property, and all other questions of maritime jurisdiction. But as to all objects of mere municipal regulation, it is not authorized to pledge the faith of the nation absolutely, and without qualification, because these are to be affected only by laws, and cannot make laws, though it can make treaties. But this treaty is a law, and the supreme law. The answer was easy—it had been given a dozen times. If the president and senate could legislate by treaty upon one object, purely municipal and intra-territorial, they could legislate by treaty upon all objects purely municipal and intra-territorial. They could lay taxes by treaty, raise troops by treaty, in short, exercise the whole legislative authority of the country by treaty. What then became of the distinction that has been taken between treaties self-executory and treaties which require laws to carry them into execution? One or the other ground must be abandoned. Either treaties operate as laws upon all objects purely municipal and intra-territorial, or upon none. If upon all, every treaty is self-executory. If upon none, then every treaty operating upon such objects requires a law to give it effect. But no object can be more completely municipal and intra-territorial, than the objects of this treaty. What can be more entirely an object of municipal regulation than the imposition of duties? What more completely intra-territorial than the execution of those duties in our own ports? Surely then a law is necessary.

In support of the position that a treaty is a law of the land, and a supreme law, an article of the constitution had been quoted and some stress laid upon the argument. If that article is accurately examined, it would be found to refer only to the states.

"The judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution and laws of the state to the contrary notwithstanding." If the framers of the constitution had intended that a treaty should control acts of congress, would they not have added "any thing contained in the act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding?" Could any thing be more obvious? But it has been said, also that a treaty could repeal a law, and the treaty of peace was triumphantly appealed to as evidence of the fact. It is asked, did not the treaty of peace repeal the law declaring war? Mr. W. answered, if it did, still it would not affect his position, which was that no treaty could repeal any regulation, merely municipal. Was war a mere municipal regulation? According to what law is it to be declared and waged? By what law is it regulated? Certainly the law of nations. Can any object be merely municipal which is regulated entirely by the law of nations? Certainly not. There were writers on national laws, whose works were confined to a consideration of the rights of war and peace. Mr. W. admitted, that raising troops and money to wage war, were mere municipal regulations, but raising troops was not waging war. It was true, also, that war may be either extra or intra territorial. Still he would enquire by what law was it regulated? Was it an international or municipal object? But he did not by any means admit, that the treaty of peace repealed the law declaring war. He held that a law could be repealed only by a law. He said that the law declaring war expired by its own limitation, as soon as peace was concluded. What was the meaning of the law declaring war? He spoke not of its words, but its effects. Simply, this: "war is hereby declared against Great Britain, and shall be waged and continue until peace is made." Would it admit any other meaning? But if, as gentlemen suppose, the treaty of peace operated by repealing the act declaring war, then nothing more was necessary than to repeal that act, in order to be at peace. He once, indeed, had heard a great peace advocate, jocularly maintain this opinion. But he imagined it would not be gravely asserted. No, undoubtedly, would be the reply; for the consent of a foreign nation would be wanting. Well then, Mr. W. added, he could say, even with the consent of that foreign nation, a repeal of the law declaring war, would not make peace, because that would be to transfer the power of making peace from the president and two-thirds of the senate, to the president and a bare majority of both houses. If then, repealing the law declaring war, even with the consent of the foreign nation to make peace, would not have placed us in a state of peace. How could it be said, that the treaty of peace operated by repealing the act declaring war?

Mr. W. said, there was one view taken of this subject by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Tucker;) he would call him his friend, if their intimacy admitted the expression, for he should think himself honored by the friendship of the gentleman; which he would attempt to enlarge.

If a duty might be repealed by treaty, the whole of our duties might be so repealed. The commissioners who made this treaty, had their instructions admitted, might have stipulated that all American vessels and goods should be duty free in England; all English vessels and goods duty free in the United States. Here would have been twelve or thirteen millions of your revenue swept away at once; and as that revenue is pledged, you would have been compelled to provide other funds for the payment of the public creditor.

Having answered several, Mr. W. said, he would in turn ask one question of the gentlemen on the opposite side? A distinction had been taken between treaties requiring an appropriation of money, and others, because the article in the constitution is restrictive, "no money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Whenever money was wanted, therefore, it seemed to be conceded a law must be passed—whereas the article relating to commerce being merely permissive no law was thought necessary. Now the power to regulate commerce, and to make war, were given to congress, in the same form of words. Congress shall have power to regulate commerce; congress shall have power to declare war. Their powers over these objects must be co-extensive. He would ask if the president and senate, under the general treaty making power, were authorized to enter into a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with a foreign nation, actually engaged in war? If they were then all the most essential powers of the government belonged to them; they could make war by treaty; they could make peace by treaty; they could raise and keep up troops by treaty; they could lay and collect taxes by treaty, and repeal them by treaty; provide for calling out the militia by treaty; and when gentlemen pided themselves in the check that they could not appropriate money by treaty, they had forgotten that they could borrow money on the credit of the United States, by treaty.

For his own part, Mr. W. did not think they could do any of those things, and he should be sorry if they could; and he did not think so because he believed the sound, the true, the safe and honest interpretation of the constitution to be, that whatever any branch of the government could not constitutionally do directly, it could not do indirectly; and as the president and senate could not make war directly, or regulate commerce directly; they could not make war by treaty, nor regulate commerce (so far as it was municipal and intra territorial) by treaty.

The power of congress to regulate commerce, had been called a residuary power, a power to regulate such parts of commerce as have not been regulated by treaty. He had no objection to the term residuary power. He would admit it to be a residuary power, but he said it was a power to regulate such parts of commerce as could not be effectually regulated by treaty. Such parts as require other sanctions than those of the law of nations to enforce them. The president and senate, Mr. W. said had power to regulate commerce by treaty, so far as it was purely international and extra territorial. Congress had power to regulate commerce by law, so far as it was purely municipal and intra territorial.

The president and senate could not lay or repeal duties by treaty. Congress could not extend or limit the right of search, or the definition of blockade, or contraband, by law. Thus each had its proper objects, and over these objects the authority of each was complete.

But the treaty making power necessarily includes the power of pledging the national faith qualifiedly, that certain acts shall be done, which its own authority is not of itself competent to do. If it does so pledge the national faith, for the performance of such acts, then it was for that power whose aid is required to effect them, to say how far it will redeem the pledge. The form of the stipulation, Mr. W. contended, makes no difference. Foreign nations treat with us with a knowledge of our constitution, and the stipulations of a treaty are understood with reference to constitutional powers. The pledge given by a treaty is understood to be a pledge to do all which the treaty-making power can, of itself perform, and to cause to be done, if possible, by the other departments of the government, whatever its own power is not competent to do.

A treaty, to be sure, had been said to repeal a law, and, therefore, it would be said that the treaty-making power has in this instance stipulated for nothing more than it was competent of itself to perform. If a treaty could repeal one law, it can repeal another; if it could repeal some it can repeal all; for he called upon gentlemen to recollect what was so clearly and forcibly demonstrated by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) that the restrictions contained in the constitution, were restrictions on the power of congress, not restrictions on the treaty-making power.

He would add nothing further. He had promised not to tire the house, and yet he had only three out hints rather than arguments. He was afraid that promise was already broken.

Mr. Sheffey, said, he was persuaded that the house was already fatigued with the protracted discussion which this subject had undergone. He should, therefore, in delivering his sentiments, be as brief as was in his power. It was most unquestionably true, as had been stated, that the inquiry which it behoved the house to make, was not what ought to be the proper distinction of the powers of the constitution, but what they really are. If the comprehensive and almost unlimited power contended for, was exclusively vested in the president and senate, it became the duty of the house, in obedience to the supreme will, to yield a ready acquiescence. But he thought it not unreasonable to contend, that unless that power was clearly granted, and in terms wholly unequivocal, a different course ought to be adopted. If there was a rational doubt, or an apparent conflict in the different parts of the constitution, as it respects the subject before the house, that construction ought to be given which best comports with the spirit and genius of the government, and preserves the salutary checks which have been provided against the abuse of power.

The leading features of this constitution, said Mr. S. are strongly and distinctly marked. Its principal characteristics consist in a distribution of its powers to different departments, and in such an organization of each as tends to check abuses. The legislative, executive and judicial powers are confided to different public agents, who, in the exercise of their respective functions, act as checks upon each other. The legislative power is so organized as to afford great security against the adoption of improper measures. In the ordinary course of legislation, no act is binding on the nation, until it has received the assent of a majority of the representatives of the people, and of the states—and, likewise, the assent of the president, the representative of both. Surely then it is not unreasonable to contend (in the absence of any positive provision) that a treaty, made by the president and senate, embracing the same subjects, confided to the legislature in distinct terms, ought not to have the force of a law, which has received the approbation of all the constituent branches of the legislative power.

Before he proceeded further, Mr. S. said, he wished to be distinctly understood. He did not mean to contend that the house of representatives had any agency in making treaties, or that a direct vote of ratification was necessary or proper; but he meant to contend that a treaty did not operate as an absolute repeal of an existing law, in conflict with it; and that when it contained affirmative stipulations, in relation to subjects expressly confided to congress, a law was necessary to give it effect. This construction will make every part of the constitution consistent with its own principles and with the spirit which pervades the whole.

In the distribution of its powers, the constitution has expressly provided that all legislative power therein granted, shall be vested in the congress of the United States. In a subsequent part, the objects to which it shall extend, are specially enumerated: No concurrent special authority, in relation to these objects, is granted to any other department of the government. But a general power is given to the president and senate to make treaties, which I admit means all treaties usually among nations. The question then is—does this general power to make treaties, so far as it is exercised, operate to the utter destruction of the special power of legislation; or shall both have their effect? Among the rules which are adopted, in the construction of instruments, none seems to be better settled, than that general powers cannot destroy those specially granted; but that when there is a conflict, the former must yield to the latter: and a rule equally correct is, that every part of an instrument shall have its due effect, if possible. Can it then be correctly contended, that the power to make treaties, conferred in general terms, annihilates (so far as the provisions of a treaty extend) the power to make laws, specially granted? Is it not more correct to adopt a construction which will equally preserve the power to make treaties, and the power to make laws, which will give to the president and senate the exclusive authority to make all treaties; and leave to the house of representatives a concurrent power in the execution of such, as embrace subjects expressly granted by the constitution to congress. A very extensive field for the operation of the treaty-making power will still exist. Every treaty of peace, of limits—all treaties regulating the conduct of the contracting nations; when either shall be at war—designating what shall be contraband, or what shall be a legal blockade—regulating the right of search, and many others will fall within its exclusive jurisdiction; and as it respects those treaties, embracing legislative objects, it will possess the right to form them, in the first instance; and also a concurrent voice in their execution.

A consideration of the comparative character of the legislative and treaty-making powers tends strongly to support this construction, and to prove, in a manner perfectly satisfactory to myself, that the latter is not superior, nor equal, to the former. That which is called sovereign power in every government, is the power to make laws. In Great Britain it is clothed with the character of omnipotence, because, as to the objects which it embraces, it is superior to any other human power, and annuls all that come in collision with it. The executive and judicial powers are under its control, and subject to its direction. In this government the power of legislation is confined to certain objects, but, as it respects those objects, its sovereignty is complete, unless restricted by the spirit or letter of the constitution. Hence I contend, that as to all legislative subjects, the sovereign supreme power has been confided to congress; and that the treaty-making power, (being an executive power) so far as it acts on those subjects, is inferior and subordinate to it.

But it is said, that a treaty, though the act of the executive department, is elevated to an equality, if not superiority, with an act of congress, by an express provision of the constitution, in which it is declared that the "constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or hereafter to be made, shall be the supreme law of the land." Let us examine this subject. Let us look into the existing state of things when this constitution was framed. The state sovereignties then existed, and were to be preserved to a certain extent. The powers of the general government, in their operation, must frequently and necessarily act on the same subjects over which the states retained some authority, and consequently produce collision. As it respected treaties, there was another consideration, which made it highly necessary that their relative character should be established. It is well known that much discussion had taken place, and a variety of sentiments entertained as to the force and effect of the treaty of peace of 1783. It was contended, (and I think some of the states so construed it) that the stipulations contained in that treaty, conflicting with the laws of the states, merely municipal, did not repeal those laws. In order, then, that these collisions might be prevented, and a due subordination secured to the authority confided to the United States, it became indispensable to declare it supreme in relation to the states. Hence it has provided, that the constitution, laws and treaties, "should be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

That the constitution did not intend to declare what should be the effect of treaties, in relation to the laws of the United States; that it did not intend to elevate an executive act so as to make it equal, or superior, to an act of the sovereign or legislative power, but leave it possessed of its natural character, is susceptible of other illustrations. In the European states, where the whole power of the government is vested in a single individual or in a single body of men, treaties are equal to laws, because they contain a manifestation of the will of the whole sovereign power in which laws themselves consist. In the government of Great Britain, however, where the treaty-making power and the legislative power are lodged in different hands, (and in that respect is like our own,) a treaty, embracing legislative subjects, is not equal to an act of parliament; but depends, so far as those subjects are concerned, for its execution on the legislature. With the British constitution before their eyes (and that they had it steadily in view, the distribution of power and the phrases employed sufficiently attest) can it be supposed that the framers of the constitution, if they intended to give to treaties the extraordinary effect now contended for, would not have declared so in express terms? I say extraordinary effect, because in the only government similar, as it respects this question, to our own, treaties embracing legislative subjects, are not equal to laws. In the clause which declares the constitution, laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, the relative character of each is not designated; and it may be as readily contended, that treaties are equal to the constitution, as that they are equal to laws. If they are equal to the constitution, then, according to the doctrine on the other side, being last in point of time, they must repeal and supersede whatever comes in conflict with it. In relation to treaties, it is not even declared that, in order to become the supreme law, they shall be made "in pursuance to the constitution." This, to my mind, proves satisfactorily, that the clause in question did not intend to fix the relative quality of the constitution, laws and treaties; but to leave it to that construction which the nature of those acts and the character of the government would readily suggest.

Permit me now to examine the extent to which the doctrine advanced on the other side would lead us. It has been said that the cases which have been suggested in argument to shew the vast, and almost unlimited power conferred on the president and senate by the construction contended for in opposition to the bill, are extreme, and ought therefore to be rejected. But to me it appears obvious, that to test the correctness of any principle, you ought to look to the consequences to which it will lead. One honorable member (Mr. Calhoun) has contended, that treaties are superior to acts of congress; and another, (Mr. Pinkney) that they are equal; though there is a difference in the force of these opinions, in substance they are the same. They amount to this, that a treaty repeals all laws opposed to it, and that it executes itself. The latter gentleman has indeed admitted, that it may sometimes be necessary to pass a law to execute a treaty; but not because there is a defect of power on the part of those who make the treaty, but because its stipulations may not be sufficiently definite. These opinions tend to the utter subversion of the legislative power, at least so far as it is vested in this house. Let us see their tendency. The constitution has confided in congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. On this subject, so highly interesting to the people, their representatives are invested with the right to judge and determine what particular regulations are most conducive to their prosperity. But the opinions stated on this floor, authorise the interposition of the president and senate at any time to supersede this right, partially or entirely, at their discretion—partially, by making treaties of commerce with some nations; entirely, by making treaties with all who have any commercial intercourse with us.

According to the honorable member from Maryland (Mr. Pinkney) if this house should refuse to raise a large military force required by the president, he may accomplish his object by negotiating a treaty with some foreign power, in which the raising of such a force shall be made a stipulation. It is only necessary to make the treaty sufficiently definite; to stipulate the number of regiments, the number of companies in each, and the number and quality of the officers to be employed, and the force, with the consent of two-thirds of the senate, will be immediately raised; the treaty will execute itself. Should money be wanting to accomplish the object, it may be obtained in the same way by treaty, a thing not unusual among other nations.

Let me pursue the subject. The constitution has granted to congress the power to declare war. In the exercise of a power in which every thing dear to the people is involved, which causes their blood to flow and their hard earnings to be wrested from them, the co-operation of the representatives was wisely required. But a treaty may make war without their consent, if we admit the construction contended for. A treaty with a foreign power may stipulate that we shall make common cause with her against her enemy; the public force will be employed accordingly and the country thus brought into an actual state of war. The same construction will authorise the president and senate to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises. Many cases might be supposed illustrative of this position. I will beg leave to state one only. Suppose, in the treaty of commerce with Great Britain, it had been stipulated that British cottons, and woollens, should pay a duty of ten or fifteen per cent. ad valorem, in the ports of the United States, and that French goods of a similar description should pay forty, fifty, or sixty per cent. Here it is most obvious that the duty which the people of the United States would pay above the ordinary duty imposed by law, would be levied off them without the consent of their representatives, though the constitution expressly provides, not only that their assent shall be necessary, but that all bills for raising revenue shall originate with them.

Congress are authorised by the constitution to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. In pursuance of which they have passed laws for the purpose of admitting foreigners to the rights of citizens, on certain conditions; among other things, a residence of five years is required. But if a treaty is equal or superior to an act of congress, a whole foreign nation may be naturalized by treaty.

The constitution has committed to congress the duty of defending the country against foreign and domestic violence, and for that purpose has given them power "to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy." Suppose a treaty should be made with a foreign nation, in which it should be stipulated, that our army should be disbanded, and our navy dismantled, and that no other similar force should be substituted; would the treaty disband the army and dismantle the navy without any legislative provision? If so, then the president and senate have the entire control of the public defence, and may lay wholly prostrate a most important power belonging to this house.

The construction contended for, will authorise the president and senate to incorporate a foreign territory as a member of this union. By the constitution, congress are empowered to admit new states; but if a treaty supersedes legislation, then it most unquestionably follows, that by a compact with a foreign nation, foreign territory may be ceded and admitted into the union, invested with all the privileges of a state.

From a candid and serious consideration of the extent to which we should be led by the high-toned doctrines which have been advanced, I cannot for a moment admit their correctness. Can it be possible that it could ever have been in the contemplation of those for whom this government was formed, that the powers of their representatives should be superseded whenever it should please the president and senate to dispense with them? Is it rational to suppose that the constitution which recognizes the sovereignty of the people should intend that a foreign nation, nay, (as has been justly remarked) a Chickasaw chief, might be substituted for this house, and as to all the powers given by the constitution, act in its stead? I think it far more consistent, more reasonable to insist, that all legislative acts designated as such in the constitution, must receive the assent of all the constituent branches of the legislature.

It has been conceded by some gentlemen in the course of this discussion, that an act of congress is necessary to execute a treaty which provides for the expenditure of public money; but that this is the only case. I can see no reason for this distinction; the treaty with Great Britain, now before the house, stipulates, that the discriminating duties as it respects British vessels, shall be abolished; in consequence of which, our revenue will be considerably diminished. Is there any substantial difference between drawing money from the treasury, and preventing an equal annual amount from coming into it? If the president and senate can impose taxes and duties on the people, why not exercise a power far inferior, and apply their proceeds to such objects as they think proper? If a treaty in every other respect is equal at least to an act of congress, why not in this? Why may not money be appropriated by treaty, when, according to sentiments of gentlemen, it is the law of the land? It has been said, that the powers of this house are operative only in ordinary cases, where no treaty provides for the same object. With equal propriety may it be said, that the clause of the constitution which directs that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law," applies only to ordinary cases of expenditure, and not when a treaty stipulates for the payment of money.

It has been strongly urged, that because a treaty of peace puts an end to the war without the concurrence of this house, it follows that a treaty repeals an act of congress, as the war must have been declared by that body. But I do not consider a declaration of war as a legislative act—it is not so deemed in Great Britain; and there is nothing in its nature which gives it that character. Among civilized nations, it has long been usual, as well to apprise the adversary nation that in future she will be treated as an enemy, as to manifest a direct respect for the opinions of mankind, to state in a public manifesto the reasons which had provoked a resort to arms. In imitation of this practice, the constitution has authorised congress to declare war; but the effect of a declaration of war is nothing more than that those who have the direction of the public force become authorised to employ it against the declared enemy. It establishes no new law. During the continuance of the war, the public law of nations must regulate the conduct and the rights of the parties. To put an end to such a state of things, municipal legislation is not competent; it can only be effected by mutual compact between the contending nations.

It will be readily perceived, that if a declaration of war is not a legislative act, then it is not subject to be repealed, as such acts ordinarily are: and the only way in which an end can be put to it is that already mentioned. According to the understanding of all, to declare war is a distinct substantive act; and to make peace is another. We never heard of peace being made by annulling a declaration of war; hence I conclude, that to make peace is not among the delegated powers of congress, either express or implied; and that, therefore, a treaty of peace neither repeals a legislative act, nor interferes with any of the powers belonging to this house.

An honorable member from North Carolina (Mr. Gaston) has said, that our co-operation is wholly unnecessary; that the president will execute the treaty in question, by giving instructions to the collectors of the customs to conform their conduct to the stipulations of the treaty. This appears to me entirely erroneous. The collectors are not the agents of the president, but the officers of the law. They derive their existence from it, and their duty is prescribed by it. They cannot justify themselves in their obedience to the mere instructions of the president. It must first appear that the act of congress imposing discriminating duties is repealed, before they can omit to collect them. Whether the treaty effects this, is the question before the house.

The honorable member from Maryland (Mr. Pinkney) stated, the other day, that congress have not the power to make any compact with a foreign government; that if the president and senate have not the exclusive power to bind the nation, in all cases, by treaty, then there is no power in this government to make treaties of commerce and other treaties, embracing any of the subjects delegated to congress. But it will be observed, that the power on the part of the president and senate to make all treaties, is not denied; the question is, after they are so made, what is their effect? The principle has been very correctly and ably stated by my honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. Tucker.) Treaties embracing subjects not confided to congress, depend for their execution on no other power than that which made them; as to those treaties which embrace such subjects, their execution belongs to the legislature. In the one case the stipulation is complete; in the other it is only a promise that those who have the power shall make it so.

The honorable gentleman, however, is mistaken in his opinion, that congress can enter into no compact with a foreign nation; at least the practice of this government is against him. We all recollect the act of the first of May, 1810, which enabled France, (to use the language of a gentleman from Tennessee, formerly a member of this house) to twist a cord about our necks which was first scorched by the flames of Moscow, and finally cut asunder by the hands of the allies at Leipzig and Waterloo. By that act it was stipulated, that if Great Britain, or France, should revoke their injurious edicts against our commerce, certain acts should be done by this government. France pretended to accept this overture and a compact was said to be thus formed, from the effect of which we have just escaped. Last year another law passed which provided that the discriminating duties should cease in relation to all nations who should adopt a like liberality towards our navigation; in consequence of which, some of the stipulations in the present treaty with Great Britain were adopted. In these cases the president acts as the agent of the law and not in virtue of his character as superintending our foreign relations.

It has been said that there is greater security in the treaty-making power being exclusively exercised by the president and senate in all cases, than if the opinions of those friendly to the present bill should be adopted. And the honorable gentleman from Maryland entered into a course of reasoning to shew the superior responsibility which attaches particularly to the president, calculated to secure a more wise and more correct exercise of the power. This argument proves too much. It tends to establish, that all the power of this government ought to be vested in the president, because of his superior wisdom and the superior responsibility of his situation. The gentleman has said much of the influence of public opinion on those who stand in high responsible situations, and has referred us to Great Britain where he says public opinion is very powerful. I agree with him, that what is called public opinion has great effect on the administration of the government. It is the unbiassed sentiment of the sound and sensible part of the community, who have not committed themselves to support any set of measures because they have not participated in the creation of the public functionaries, the king and the lords being hereditary, and the commons elected by very few. But in this country there is very little expression of public opinion, distinct from that which is manifested by election; every person thinks himself pledged in some degree to support the conduct of those on whom he has bestowed his suffrage, and the abuses of power must be extreme before the current of public opinion will set against those who are at the head of a predominant party.

If the construction contended for on the other side should receive the assent of this house, I hesitate not to say, that there will be less security, less responsibility, than in Great Britain. On one subject there has always been great jealousy there; I mean the introduction of foreign troops. It is a settled maxim of their constitution, that they cannot be introduced without the consent of parliament; but in this country there would be no such security. Should we refuse to gratify an ambitious president who designed to subvert the liberties of this country with a large army, he may negotiate with a foreign power, and, with the assent of two-thirds of the senate, introduce foreign troops. I cannot believe that the people ever did intend to confer power thus tending to jeopardize those liberties for the preservation of which this constitution was adopted.

[There are several other speeches that we would willingly have given a place, but the preceding, it is presumed, are amply sufficient to give every possible bearing of the important subject to the reader—the following is added chiefly to introduce the document and opinion of Washington.]

ED. REGISTER.

The eyes and noses being about to be called—

Mr. Huger rose, he assured the house, not to take a part in the debate; nor to offer any argument of his own: it would be unpardonable in him to do so, at that late hour, when the patience of the house must be so nearly exhausted, and the subject had been discussed so ably, so fully, and as it appeared to him, so unanswerably, on that side of the question, which he should support by his vote. Yet, as it had escaped all those who had preceded him, he could not refuse to himself the gratification, before the yeas and nays were taken of directing the attention of the house to an authority which (if the arguments already adduced had not produced conviction on every mind) could not fail to decide the point at issue, and under the shadow of which he should at all events be most happy to record his name. Gentlemen themselves, he was well satisfied, would feel indebted to him, late as the hour was, for offering to their consideration, before the final vote was taken, the extracts he was about to read from the book he had in his hand—when he informed them, that they were from the pen of the immortal Washington.

Without further preface, therefore he begged leave to refer gentlemen to the journals of the 4th congress, page 193—in which they would find recorded, president Washington's message accompanying the treaty with Great Britain, or as it is usually called Jay's treaty of 94—5, in the following words:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

The treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty, has been duly ratified, and the ratifications having been exchanged at London the 28th of October, 1795, I have directed the same to be promulgated, and transmit a copy thereof for the information of congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

March 6th, 1796.

Such then was the message of president Washington, which accompanied the copy of the treaty of 94, 5, transmitted to the House of Representatives, for the information of congress, but asking no legislative aid, sanction or co-operation, whatsoever, although the treaty had (in that precisely as in the present instance) been exchanged, ratified, and directed by him to be promulgated.

But it will be further recollected, that in the course of the discussion which afterwards took place on the subject of the treaty, grounds were taken similar to those now contended for, and a resolution was passed, requiring the president to lay before the house of representatives copies of certain papers which it was presumed might throw a light upon the merits of the treaty. In answer to this resolution or request, the president returned a written message on the 30th March, which would be found in the journals, page 292. Mr. H. observed, he would not take up the time of the house by reading the whole message at length, but he earnestly requested, and felt himself authorized, to claim the undivided attention of gentlemen to such extracts as had a particular bearing on the question, now about to be decided, and which he should proceed to submit to them.

"The course which the debate has taken on the resolution of the house, leads to some observations on the mode of making treaties, under the constitution of the United States.

"Having been a member of the general assembly and knowing the principles on which the constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the government to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion: that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; and that every treaty so made and promulgated, thenceforward became the law of the land.

"It is thus the treaty making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them, we have declared, and they have believed, that when ratified by the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the constitution, every house of representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and until the present time, not a doubt or suspicion has appeared to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one; nay, they have more than acquiesced—for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect.

"There is also reason to believe, that this construction agrees with the opinions entertained by the state conventions, when they were deliberating on the constitution; especially by those who objected to it, because there was not required, in commercial treaties, the consent of two-thirds of the whole number of the members of the senate, instead of two-thirds of the senators present, and because in treaties respecting senatorial, and certain other rights and claims, the concurrence of three-fourths of the whole number of the members of both houses, respectively, was not made necessary.

It is a fact, declared by the general convention, and universally understood, that the constitution of the United States was the result of a spirit of amity and mutual concession; and it is well known, that under this influence, the smaller states were admitted into an equal representation in the senate with the larger states; and that this branch of the government was invested with great powers—for on the equal participation of those powers, the sovereignty and political situation of the smaller states were deemed essentially to depend.

"If other proofs than these, and the plain letter of the constitution itself, be necessary to ascertain the point under consideration, they may be found in the journals of the general convention, which I have deposited in the office of the department of state. In those journals it will appear, that a proposition was made, that no treaty should be binding on the United States, which was not ratified by a law; and that the proposition was explicitly rejected.

"As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding, that the consent of the house of representatives is not necessary to the validity of the treaty, &c. a just regard to the constitution, and to the duty of my office, &c. forbid a compliance with your request.

"G. WASHINGTON.

30th March, 1796."

Mr. Huger said, he would not venture to add a single word more on the subject, but resume his seat, lest, perchance, some observation of his might draw the attention of the house from the extracts he had just read, or weaken the effects of the opinion in regard to the point at issue, between honorable gentlemen, so unequivocally given by that immortal man, who was by all acknowledged to have been equally the founder of this great republic, and the father of that constitution, they were about to interpret.

Cobbett's Letters.

FROM COBBETT'S REGISTER OF AUGUST 26.

Five letters to Lord Sheffield, on his speech at Lewes wool fair, July 26. 1815.—Intended to show,

1. That the real cause of the distress of the farmers is not to be looked for in the low price of wool and grain, nor in the existence of tythes: 2. That his lordship's hopes of a more flourishing trade in consequence of the devastations of other countries are fallacious: 3. That manufactures of all kinds are carried on to a great extent in America, and that machinery has been there put into use, with great success, in the making of woollen and cotton goods: 4. That so extensive is the growth of American wool, that some of that wool is exported to England, and that though the importation of wool is great in proportion to the whole quantity used, to impose a tax upon importation would be injurious to the country: 5. That the situation of England, compared with that of America, is such, and the inducements to emigration so great, that, in order to preserve our manufactures, not only ought there to be no tax imposed on wool imported, but that the corn bill ought to be repealed. [By William Cobbett.]

LETTER I.

Intended to show, that the real cause of the distress of the farmers is not to be looked for in the low price of wool and grain, nor in the existence of tythes.

Botley, 9th August 1815.

MR LORD—Your lordship's speech, or report, to the wool-growers, at the late fair at Lewes, pressing-ly invites me to offer some remarks on it, an invitation which I the more readily accept, as it will, for an hour or two, at least, waft my readers and myself, in the respectable company of your lordship, away from the degrading and abominable scenes of Europe, to a country, where mankind seem likely to live unyoked for a century yet to come, and where we may yet hope to see arise the means of avenging in time, the cause of the oppressed.

Your lordship expresses your disappointment that the prosperity of the wool-trade has not returned: "I had," say you, "flattered myself, that after the failure of the American embargo and non importation measures, and also of Bonaparte's attempts by decrees to ruin our trade, and that the difficulties respecting our foreign intercourse were removed, that the trade in wool and woollens would return to its former state, and proceed steadily, as heretofore; but the mischief I had foreseen, and repeatedly represented, as also the necessity of checking that mischief, has increased in a most extraordinary degree, and infinitely beyond even what had been apprehended."

I will stop here, for a moment, to observe that you have omitted any mention of the American war. You will see, by and by, that the American embargo and non-importation measures were not attended with a failure. You will see that they had the wonderful effect of assisting in creating flocks of merino sheep, manufactories of cloth, cotton, linen, iron, steel, leather, gun powder, &c. &c. and in the construction of machinery of all sorts. This I shall show you by and by; but, amongst the causes of the depression of wool, why not mention the American war? That war lasted longer than the embargo and non-importation measures. It was far more complete in its operation; and yet you pass it over in silence. My opinion is, that you would not have passed it over in silence, if the events and result of it had not been what they were. If those had not demonstrated to the world the excellence of free government, I am persuaded, that you would have not this war in the list of the impediments to the wool-trade. The omission, however, as far as related to your auditors, was perfectly safe; and if you had ascribed the fall of their produce to the malignity of the stars, they would have been just as attentive and just as full of belief as you had the happiness to find them.

Your remedy for this evil of low price of wool is the old remedy—a tax on all wool imported. To be sure; as the hop growers of Farnham would, if they could, have an additional tax put upon the hops of Kent; and as farmer Gripen would have all the wheat in the country blighted, except his own. You say that the same arguments that were made use of in defence of the corn bill will apply with equal force to a wool bill; and here you are very right. But you should have shown, that these arguments were sound; and, not having done this, you only said that a wool bill would be as wise and as just as a measure, against which petitions were presented from every part of the country, and which was, towards the period of its adoption, discussed with regular troops drawn up round the house of commons.

If, when his majesty, in his wisdom, was pleased to confer a title on your lordship, he had, at the same time, endowed you with a capacity to embrace, in one view, the whole of the interests of a community, to comprehend and to develop abstruse matters of political economy, he would have provided you with a shield against criticism, which, when you venture into the press, that bare title does not afford you. As yet, whatever we find in print about wool, at any rate, we may freely comment on; and, your lordship will be so good as to excuse me, if, upon this occasion, I should sometimes seem to forget the lord, while I am answering the author. I am about to lead your lordship into new scenes. The sight, which it is my intention to open to your view, is one of such novelty and such grandeur; I am about to exhibit to you proofs of such astonishing enterprise and improvement; such a wonderful revolution in the most important affairs of human life; that I must beseech you to call to your aid, if possible, an expansion of mind commensurate with the interest and the magnitude of the subject.

But, before I venture to lift you to this point of elevation, let us, if you please, discuss the subject of your projected wool-bill; let us, before we cross the Atlantic and the Atlantic, see if we can come to something like common sense on the question which you have now again set in agitation.

You see the farmers distressed; you see them breaking; you see the newspapers filled with notices of sales of their effects. The immediate cause of this is the want of money. The cause of that want, however, you do not seem to understand; and, if you do understand it, you keep it out of sight. You say it is the low price of their produce; you would, therefore, compel the mass of the people to pay them a higher price, not seeming to reflect, that, if you could succeed, you would only produce in other classes of men, just that quantity of distress and ruin, of which you wish to relieve the farmer. If your lordship was attacked by a ruffian, who aimed at putting out one of your eyes, and were to aim at your left eye, should you think you had done much by warding his bayonet from that eye to have it thrust ed into the other?

But, my lord, the foundation of your reasoning, if reasoning it must be called, is unsound; namely, that the distress of the farmer arises from the low price of his produce. In the time of Mr. Toot, that is to say, 70 years ago, wheat was five shillings a bushel. It is now from eight to nine shillings a bushel. At a low price be said, how could farmers have lived in his time? It is not, then, positive low price, it is relative low price, which, not to deny you very common sense, I must understand you to mean. Well, then, can you show, or can any man living show, that labor, tackle, horses, and seed, do not always bear, upon an average of even a very few years, an exact proportion to the price of wheat? In Mr. TULL's time wheat was five shillings a bushel, and the price of reaping an acre of wheat was five shillings. Wheat is now from eight to nine shillings a bushel; and the price of reaping an acre of wheat in this part of England, is nine shillings. In other parts it may be much less, labor being always higher here than in any other part of the kingdom. This is the price that I and my neighbors are actually giving at this moment. As to the present day, I state facts that are notorious; and, as to the age of Mr. TULL, thousands have his work in their hands.

If, therefore, from the very nature of the thing itself, it were possible that the price of labor (including smiths, wheel-rights, and horses) should not descend and ascend, step for step, with that of wheat which, upon an average of years, is the standard of all other products of the earth, we have proof positive, that such has not been the case in our own country. How, then, must that mind be constructed; how narrow its views; or how perverted its faculties, which can see the cause of ruin to the farmer in the low price of his produce?

You ascribe his ruin to the want of a sufficiency of money. Right so far; but, there are two ways in which a want of a sufficiency of money may come: the first is by not receiving a sufficiency: the other by the disproportionate greatness of the demands upon what is received. The man who has five hundred a year may be in no want of money; while he who has twenty thousand a year may become a bankrupt. The farmer always does, because he must, receive enough money proportioned to the labour on his farm: its receipts and expenditure here regulate each other with the greatest correctness; but, if there be a demander of money, whose demands never lower with prices; who pays no respect to seasons or any other circumstances; who comes for large sums many times in the year; who will not wait a moment; who needs none of the usual forms of law to obtain payment, but who, at once, lays hold of the crop or the utensils; and, withal, whose demands are continually increasing, if there be such a creditor, it is very clear, that, as prices fall, the farmer must sink into ruin.

Now, has not the English farmer such a creditor? His taxes, direct and indirect, far exceed the amount of all his other out-goings. Let us suppose, then, a man on his own land, who paid a hundred pounds a year for labor and a hundred and fifty pounds in taxes, when wheat was eighteen shillings a bushel. He was then able to live. If the wheat be nine shillings a bushel, his labor will cost him fifty pounds, and if his taxes fell down to seventy-five pounds, he would be still where he was. But his taxes continue to be one hundred and fifty. It is manifest, therefore, that the taxes, and the taxes only, are the cause of his ruin.

Your lordship does, indeed, allude incidentally to our taxes; but, then, this allusion is accompanied with nothing to induce the belief that you wished to point the attention of your hearers towards them as a cause of that ruin, of which you were speaking; much less do you hint at any hope of relief in this all important respect. You say: "If the landed interest (in which I include the land occupier) will not make known its grievance, it cannot expect attention or redress, and it will be responsible for the ruin that will fall on the growth of fine wool. For if the wool of all countries, untaxed and untithed, is to be poured in upon us without restriction, every man the least acquainted with the subject will agree with me that it never can be worth while to raise the wool in this kingdom; and the agriculturalist will aim only at quantity neglecting the quality of the wool."

Here, again, what a jumble of ideas. Why should he aim at quantity if his prices are depressed by any cause, no matter what, seeing that, upon an average the coarse must bear a proportion in price to the fine? These are notions which might be excused in a farmer or wool merchant; but they become not one, who sets himself up as a political economist. They belong to the sheepfold and the carding house. How nature has been thwarted. What mischief has been done by perverse man's setting her laws at defiance!

But, my lord, you talk of grievance and of redress and then you talk of the "untaxed and untithed" wool of other countries. Was it not then to be expected, that you were going to propose to make other nations adopt our taxes and tythes, or, to induce our government to remove them? Neither of those do you propose, however; but in their stead, a tax, to be paid on our coats and blankets, and on the goods which our manufacturers export. And, then, the confounding of taxes and tythes as the cause of relative expensiveness; as the cause of the English farmer's inability to contend with foreigners; though not calculated to excite surprise when coming from the lips of a vulgar uninformed farmer, it is so grossly absurd that it really fills me with shame at hearing it uttered by any English gentleman. During six centuries the land of England has yielded tythes; and surely English farmers have seen prosperous days! If the farmer did not yield tythes, would he not pay the full worth of it in additional rent?—Where, then, is, where can be, the difference to him! If the purchaser of an estate were not to yield tythe, would he not pay the full worth of it in the purchase money? Where, then, can be the difference to him! Far otherwise is it with the taxes. These are not of six centuries standing, and hardly of six years. They are a clear addition to the out-goings of the farmer: their amount like that of the tythe, is not proportioned to the value of the crop; but keeps always to its full height whether the crop be small or great, dear or cheap. If, indeed, you had spoken of tythes as the means of supporting a body of men, having enormous weight on the side of political and military power, you would have spoken of them in a manner becoming a gentleman of liberal ideas; but, to point them out as a cause of the ruin of the farmer, and that, too, in a mere pecuniary point of view, was to emulate the conduct of those grudging and unfeeling clowns, who and whose wives have all along been bawling for war in the cause of "Religion and Social Order," who have been branding as jacobins all those that wished to see an end to that war; and which clowns, groaning at last, under its consequences, now, like the much-more-to-be-pitied canine unfortunate, unconscious of the real cause of their sufferings, fly for vengeance on all that falls in their way.

Still, I have taken but a very limited view of the subject. Yet, if your lordship's head turned at the first step of the stair-case, how am I to get you to the top of St. Paul's? The task is hopeless. Unable, therefore, to stretch your mind to the measure of such a view; unable to make you capable of seeing, how, even the taxes laid upon the farmer affect him no more than they effect all the other classes of the community, except those who live upon those taxes, and that it is a general and not a partial, a lasting and not a temporary, depression that the nation now feels; unable to accomplish this object, I shall proceed to that part of your speech, where you express your expectation of speedily seeing an extraordinary demand for wool. This however, must be the subject of another letter.—I am, your lordship's most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

LETTER II.

Intended to show, that his lordship's hopes of a more flourishing trade in consequence of the devastations of other countries, are fallacious.

MY LORD—After expressing your disappointment that prosperity had not returned to the wool-trade in consequence of the "failure" of the American embargo and non-importation laws, and the cessation of the "continental system" of Napoleon; after skipping over nearly three years of war with America, a strange skip on the part of a person who became known to the literary world by his writings on American navigation and commerce; after ascribing the low price of wool and other produce here, and the consequent depression of the farmer, to the importation of produce from abroad, grown into untaxed and untithed lands; after exhorting the landlords and farmers to apply for a law to make foreign wool pay a duty, or, in other words to make foreign wool higher priced in England, instead of exhorting them to apply for the abolition of tythes and the reduction of taxes, which the premises seemed to point to as the only rational conclusion; after all this, your lordship comes to new grounds of hope; you, discover, in the fall of Napoleon and in the present state of foreign nations, "sufficient ground to expect an extraordinary demand for wool."

The passage I alluded to, is as follows:—"But I should add, that there is sufficient ground to expect an extraordinary demand for wool in consequence of the complete subjugation of those who have so long disturbed the world and deranged its commerce. France, and the other countries which have been overrun by desolating armies, are exhausted, and will not immediately re-establish their former occupations, and settle to manufactures, it is therefore most probable there will be a very unusual demand for those of woollen, not only from the countries alluded to, but also for those countries which used to be supplied from those parts which have been ravaged by war."

Whether it discover any great degree of benevolence, and whether it be wise in an Englishman, thus to describe the hope of our prosperity as built on the devastation and misery produced in other countries by wars, by invasions, of which it is well known that we even boast of having been, by the means of our money, the principal cause, whether this discovers much benevolence and wisdom in an Englishman I leave others to decide. But I think myself able to show, able to convince any rational man, that your lordship is as much deceived in your present expectations as events have proved you to have been in your expectations of four years ago.

The "extraordinary demand for wool," which you anticipate, is to arise from the exhausted state of other countries. Now, my lord, we will leave America aside for separate observation; and then let me ask you, whether Spain, Saxony, Silesia, Holland, Sweden, are less likely to grow wool now, than they were three years ago? France never exported wool. Whatever may be the political evils now to be expected, is there any reason to suppose, that the continent of Europe, settled in peace, will not grow as much wool as it has grown during its years of war? What then, as far as Europe is concerned in the growth of wool; is to cause an "extraordinary demand" for our farmers wool?

But, the benignant armies have devastated in such a way, that other nations will not "soon settle to manufactures," and, therefore, woollens will be wanted from England to supply the place of those which were formerly made abroad. Does your lordship think that we shall thresh the French into the wearing of our woollens? And, do you think, that the exhausting of the nations of Europe, that is to say, the making of them poor, will tend to make them better customers than formerly? You should think so, seeing that you tell your hearers, that the ruin of the farmer produces that of the tradesman, seeing that the farmer is the customer of the latter. Observation had enabled you to reason correctly enough upon what was passing just under your nose; but, you appear not to have been able sufficiently to enlarge your mind to extend that same reasoning to a larger scale.

Besides, supposing your notion of the suspension of continental manufactures to be correct, does not that notion make directly against your main hope, namely, an increase in the price of wool at home? If those manufactures were to be wholly suspended, the whole of the wool of the continent must come here; and, would that tend to enhance the price of wool in England? Thus it ever is with a mind incapable of enlarged views. It catches hold of detached ideas; it puts them forth one at a time without combination; it gets entangled in confusion and absurdity.

But, your lordship appears to me to be completely in error, even as to the devastating effects of war and invasion. The injuries of invasion are great, very great; but, as has been proved by numerous examples, these injuries are seldom of lasting duration. Armies pillage, rob, violate, murder; but, in a country of any considerable extent and population, they can actually commit these violences only on a comparatively small part of the property and persons. In the invasions of Napoleon he always took care, not only to protect, but to cherish and promote, every science and every art. He hoped to remain master of the greater part of his conquests; and, therefore, he every where favoured the pursuits of industry. The agriculture and manufactures of Germany suffered but little from his irruptions. He dispersed indeed, but he did not destroy, the flocks of Spain. While he left a sufficiency behind, his invasion stocked many other countries in Europe with fine woolled sheep; and, as I shall by and by show you, the U. States of America. The two staple commodities, in all countries, are, man and the earth. From these all the rest arise. Numbers are killed in wars; but what are two or three millions, and that is beyond all computation, when compared with the population of Europe? The earth, the climate, cannot be changed.—The character of a people for industry cannot be changed very suddenly. Men cannot be made to forget what they know. Invading armies oppress and often murder; but, the invaded soon revive, unless some dead weight on them be left behind. Belgium, the theatre of everlasting wars, conquered and reconquered many times in every century, has always continued to be the most populous and most flourishing part of Europe, even the environs of London not excepted. The United States of America, invaded by English and German armies in every quarter; all their cities and towns alternately taken; a formidable division among the people themselves; intestine as well as foreign war assailing them at one and the same time; a government without credit and without money, not only carried their point in war, but, as soon as peace returned, started at once in a career of prosperity; that as of old the world, and that con-level, I think, all the perditions of those, who had forbid that feebleness would be the consequence of their independence, amongst which foretellers your lordship occupied a distinguished place.

I have not heard it proposed to burn the several manufactures in France. The Times and Courier newspapers recommend the murder of a great number of people; applaud the requisitions imposed upon the French; would have the country dismembered; but, I have not heard even them point out the burning of the manufactories, though, perhaps, they look upon that as understood amongst "the measures necessary to the security of England." But, even it is would answer us no profitable purpose. These manufactories would soon rise up again; and, if they did not, France would be supplied from other countries than this. If from this, our payment must be in her produce. She would arise again quickly in one way or another; and, no thing that we can do against her will have any very durable effect as to her prosperity, while every day of war is adding to these taxes, which are the real cause of depression, of which our lordship complains, and of which no man living expects ever to see any diminution, except as the consequence of an event, of which most men turn from the contemplation as something too distressing for the mind to endure. England, in following the advice of the writers I have mentioned above, might still add much to the suffering of her neighbours; she might lacerate and tear them a good deal, but still the terrible and incurable disease, which she has contracted during the war, would cling to her loins; and, in the work of palsyng her limbs, would only be assisted by the prolonging of a state of hostility.

One would have imagined, that past experience with regard to France herself would have prevented your lordship from indulging such fond hopes of seeing other nations ruined by devastating armies. The first ten years of her revolution drove all the great proprietors from their houses; stripped them of their estates; reduced all the opulent merchants to beggary; ruined all the manufacturers and broke up their concerns; produced a bankruptcy of the government; laid the people under contributions. Yet, how did we find France in 1814? So full of prosperity;
so rich; with so little debt; with such improved agriculture and such flourishing manufactures, that we were compelled to pass a law to stop the importation of her corn, while she stood in no need of either our woollens, linens, or cottons. Nay, it is the recollection of the evidences of prosperity, that we then saw, which is now urging on our base and foolish writers to call for her destruction by means of German armies in our pay.

What becomes, then, of your lordship's hope?
What becomes of the "good ground" of your new expectation? Even now already, while there is a civil war in France; while half a million of English and German soldiers are there living at free quarter; even from the departments where some of those soldiers are, the French are now, at this very moment, bringing in their butter, poultry, eggs, fruit, &c. &c. to Falmouth and Southampton; and after paying a duty upon them, selling them at less than half the price at which we can afford to sell similar articles!
To throw such a country back, to make it tributary to our agriculture and manufactures, even for one year, would require the power of the deity and the majesty ascribed to the devil; and though there are persons enough, who manifestly possess the latter, they are happily for mankind, not in possession of the former.

If, then, there be so little foundation for your hope with regard to Europe, on what can you build that hope on the other side of the Atlantic? But, I will reserve the discussion of this question as the subject of another letter, it being of too much importance to be mixed, in any way, with inferior matter.
—I am your mos. obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

LETTER III.

Intended to show, that manufactures of all kinds are carried on to a great extent in America, and that machinery has been put into use with great success in the making of woollen and cotton goods.

My loan—it is America to which I now solicit the honor of calling your attention. If you will oblige me by laying aside, for only half an hour, your solid columns of exports and imports, your laborious details of outward and inward trade, your two-and-two-penny and three-and-three-penny accounts of wool prices, I promise to lead you into scenes of such novelty, such enterprise, and such interest, as shall make you forget, for the time, the tyranny and cruelty, the meanness and baseness, the profligacy, the perfidy, and the hypocrisy, now acting upon the theatre of Europe.

You, my lord, wrote a book, soon after the first American war, the objects of which were, to point out the means of keeping back the navigation and commerce of America, and to shew, that she could not become a manufacturing country—I was of this latter opinion about six years ago only. Three years of embargo and non-importations and dispersions of Spanish flocks convinced me of my error, which, as soon as I perceived it, I hastened to retract; and, before the last war began, I endeavored to convince our ministers, that if they still persisted in their right to impress persons out of American ships on the high seas, they would, in the space of a few years, find manufactures rising up in America that would astonish them. In short, I predicted, in my letters to the prince regent, before the war began, that, if he did enter on that war, he would, at the end of seven years, render the United States wholly independent of England for manufactures; or, at least, enable her to dispense with English manufactures.

The war did not last three years and yet this important revolution in human affairs was accomplished; and, be you assured, my lord, that it will form an epoch in the annals of the world.

But, how shall I convince your lordship that what I say is true? That is the great point. Hearsay regarding a country at such a distance is nothing. A newspaper account would not be much better. A book written by some American might mislead; for writers have a point to carry, a doctrine to establish, an opponent to beat, or a bias, at any rate, to yield to. Even an official account, published by the American government, might be incorrect and overcharged; for your lordship and I have seen many such accounts in England. What am I to do, then? Bring some persons who have been upon the spot and have accurately seen what they describe? I have no such persons at hand. I have not a single American acquaintance; and besides, I live out of the world.
How, then, am I to convince your lordship, that the merino flocks; the spinning mills, some going by steam and some by water; that the cloth manufactories; that the cotton manufactories; that the spinning jennies; that the iron mills; that wire manufactories; that crockery-ware manufactories; that the powder-mills, cannon foundries; that the manufactories of flax and hemp; and that a great many others, and all others, as far as I know, exist in America? Why, no; and, since you will believe nothing but your own eyes, for which I do not blame you; and, as I cannot take you to America, I will send the merino flocks, the manufactories, and the bales of goods into Sussex to you.

I have taken a parcel of American newspapers, that came to me altogether about a month ago, and which were published in February, March, April, and May, last, or the greater part of them. I have cut out of these, advertisements of merino sheep, &c. &c. FOR SALE. They come, as you will see, from almost every state in the union. Some are from Boston, some Baltimore, some Philadelphia, some from New-York, some from Albany, some from Pittsburg; thus embracing what may fairly be deemed the whole country. And, besides, these newspapers have come to me quite promiscuously. They have been sent by persons whom I do not know, and without any other motive than that of showing me civility. Of some of these papers I have only a single number; of others two; of others nine or ten. From Pittsburg I have only one number, and that is of a paper called the Commonwealth; and yet, in this one paper, matter is contained sufficient to establish all I say.

This is certainly a new way of describing the state of the manufacturies of a country; but, really, I do not know of any other so good. To make such a description correctly, a man must go himself to collect information all over a country. The difficulties of doing this are many and great. Here we ask no questions, rely on no reports, listen to no stories, expose ourselves to no deception. We know that these advertisements ‘speak of things that are.’ We have here, indeed, merely a specimen of what is going on. Out of three or four hundred American newspapers, I have received and quoted from only about eight or nine. What, then, must the whole of them present? Besides, we are not to suppose, that a quarter part of the factories and goods, &c. &c. are mentioned in any paper at all. So that, what we have here is a more specimen; but, it is quite sufficient to enable us to form a sound judgment upon the subject.

That I have fabricated these advertisements is not to be believed. I could not have invented so many names, dates, and circumstances. Besides, I put the name and date of each particular newspaper. If falsely, I am exposed to detection on both sides of the water, many of the papers being in other hands, in England, as well as mine. No: the advertisements must be genuine; and they form one of those masses of presumptive evidence, which is preferable to any positive proof upon earth.

Your lordship will soon see, that, in some of the advertisements, American goods and English goods both are offered for sale. I wished to leave each advertisement entire, just as I found it. I have only further to observe here, reserving my further remarks till by and by, that I have not thought it necessary to follow any particular order in placing the several advertisements. They are placed in the order in which they happened to fall under my scissors. They form, as they stand here, an undigested mass of evidence; but, it is evidence of that sort, which is impossible to fail of producing conviction. Attention, in the perusal is all that is wanted. I shall number the advertisements for the sake of more easy reference in my subsequent remarks.

NO. 1.

From the Philadelphia Democratic Press, 13th February, 1815.

FOR SALE,

A valuable Cotton Manufactory.

Situate in the county of Philadelphia on the Bustleton turnpike road, ten miles from the city, and upon the Pennepack creek. There are on the premises, one three story stone mill 40 by 45 feet, having therein 650 spindles, with the necessary preparing machinery—one frame mill occupied as a blade mill, one mansion house with convenient out buildings, seven stone houses substantially built, the greater part new, conveniently adopted for workmen, one weaving shop 60 by 20 feet, one substantial new frame building 3½ stories high, 23 feet by 33 feet, the lower story of which is fitted up as a weaving shop; the second as a store and counting house, the remainder as bed rooms, together with 25 ACRES OF GOOD LAND.

Any capitalist disposed to enter into a lucrative business will find here a favorable opportunity.

The distance is short from the city—the seat capable to drive 3000 spindles, the road turnpiked, the neighborhood populous, and producing the necessary laborers for the manufactory. The country fertile, healthy, and pleasant.

Apply on the premises to THOS. F. GORDON.

I cannot resist the temptation to indulge myself, before I go any further, in a few remarks upon this advertisement. I am here at home. In this Bustleton I lived for some time. My most intimate friends were the principal landowners of the spot. Upon the banks of this Pennepack creek I have, I verily believe, shot at more partridges than there were English and Hanoverian soldiers sent against America during the last war. What was my surprize at seeing (for here I really see it) a cotton manufactory upon the Pennepack on the Bustleton turnpike road and in a populous neighborhood! Fifteen years ago, there was not a turnpike road, and, as far as I can recollect, here were but eleven houses of all sorts within a mile of the spot here described. Bustleton is on the level, after rising the hill from the creek; and I believe, the principal part of the land on both sides of the road, are owned by my friend Thomas Paul. He was a quaker, a sensible, active, and most benevolent and public-spirited man. He was about to erect a school-house when I came away; but his town contained only his own houses, a tavern which was his, a large house which he had built for a doctor, and, I believe, two or three small houses besides. Yet, we see, not only that there is at this place a cotton manufactory, but a populous neighborhood, capable of supplying it with hands. Before I have done, I shall show you how towns grow up in America. Thus it is that men flourish and increase in a soil of freedom. Taking it for granted, that you will believe these details about Bustleton and the Pennepack to be true, seeing that, if false, I expose myself to the contempt of all America, I shall now proceed, without interruption, to the insertion of the advertisements.

[Mr. Cobbett here introduces at full length, thirty-eight advertisements, from various American papers, offering immense quantities of domestic goods for sale, and respecting manufactories of steam engines, the erection of steam mills, roads, canals, &c. exhibiting a mass of evidence of the great and rapid increase of manufactures, and the use of machinery, in every part of the union.—The advertisements fill several pages of Cobbett's register.]

Here, my lord, I close my extracts. Instead of thirty-nine, I could have made the number 100 or more. But, not being necessary to any rational purpose, I have declined making the list any longer. And, now, leaving your lordship to pause for a while and to ruminate over these indisputable facts, as they lie heaped up before you, I will, in my next letter, endeavor to show you they apply to the subject of our discussion. I am your most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

LETTER IV.

Intended to show, that so extensive is the growth of American wool, that some of that wool is exported to England, and that, though the importation of wool is great in proportion to the whole quantity used, to impose a tax upon importation would be injurious to the country.

My Lord.—In proceeding to apply to the subject before us the matter contained in my last letter, I must beg your lordship to observe, that it is not only proved, that almost every sort of manufactory was going on in America during the war; but that, as appears from the date of many of the advertisements, if not from all of them, they were neither dropped, nor likely to be either discontinued, or, apparently, to be rendered less active, by the peace; all the advertisements being dated after the peace was proclaimed in America, and many of them in the month of May.

You see, in No. 33. that sugar and indigo are produced on the banks of the Mississippi and in the territory of the United States; you know that cotton is one of the great staple commodities of Carolina and Georgia; that tobacco is the native of Virginia; you see that hemp and flax are largely cultivated and manufactured; you know that Indian corn, the cultivation of which characterizes the fairest and richest part of Europe, and is the criterion of fertile soil and good climate, is produced in abundance throughout the whole country, fourteen hundred miles in length; you know that timber is every where in abundance; you see that salt, iron, lead, copper, and coal mines, are there; and stone, and marble, and slate quarries; you see, that machinery of every sort, and worked by every kind of power, is in motion; and have you still the expectation, or the hope, that America is dependent on England for the means of giving her land, clothing her people, or furnishing her dwellings, or fighting her enemies?

But, he objects more immediately before us are wool and woollens. I have shown, I think, pretty clearly, that there is no reason to expect your hoped-for extraordinary demand for English wool from the change of affairs in Europe. And on what does that hope rest when you look at America? No. II. shows you that Merino sheep are in flocks in America. And, observe, that Pennsylvania, a very few years ago, had scarcely any sheep of any sort. The states to the northward, according to Mr. Livingston's account, abound much more in sheep of all sorts. No. XIV. shows you that wool, in all its varieties, is a great article of commerce; and No. XVI. shows you, not only that wool is a great article of commerce, but that it is sent from America to be sold in England. You see here, that there are merchants, who take consignments of wool with orders to ship to England; and this is at Boston; not at New York, which state Mr. Livingston belongs to and resides in. I know, that several cargoes of American fine wool were sent to England more than four years ago. I saw the samples myself. But, this advertisement, which proves the frequency of the thing, is worth the personal observation and testimony of a hundred witnesses sworn upon the gospels.

Now, my lord, when I come to treat of the extent to which American manufactures will be carried in peace, and which will depend, perhaps, in a great measure, upon the laws that shall be passed there, I shall speak with great diffidence; because the subject, on the score of foreign policy, as well as on the score of internal prosperity, demands an extent of knowledge as to the whole of the interests of that community, which it would be presumption in me, or in any man not upon the spot, to pretend to possess. But, with regard to the capacity of America to grow wool, and export it to England, I can speak with nearly as much confidence as I should upon her capacity to send us cotton or tobacco.

That the soil of America is fertile is well known; and, it has now been proved, that it is well adapted to the breeding and keeping of sheep. It has been proved, because such numerous flocks already exist. The only question, then, is, whether the American farmer can grow wool cheaper than the English farmer, and, from that cause, can afford to sell it at a lower price. Lower it must be sold, in order to open a market for it here, because it must come loaded with the charges of freight and other expenses, from which our wool is exempted. The price, at which the American farmer does sell wool, I have nothing to prove; but, I know, that the price of wheat is the criterion, whereby to judge of the price, at which he can afford to sell wool. Now, we see from No. XXXVIII. that the price of wheat is one dollar and twenty cents a bushel. That is to say, a dollar and a fifth. Call it six shillings of our money. This is at Pittsburg; but it must be a pretty fair average. If, then, our farmers are sinking in ruin with wheat at nine shillings a bushel, it is clear that the produce of the earth can be raised one-third cheaper there than it can here. A third, or 33 1/3 per centum, will, I should suppose, amply meet all charges on a raw material like wool. So that, at this moment, with our low prices, our ruinous prices, the American farmer can meet us in our own market, even in the infancy of his flocks.

But, we must not stop here. We cannot stop here. Produce must rise in England, or the tax cannot be paid.—Wheat cannot stand at nine shillings a bushel.—Upon an average of the last ten years, it has been twelve shillings a bushel; and, to enable us to pay the taxes, it must go even higher than that. Wool, however, must keep an even pace with the wheat, or wool will not be grown; and, how is it to keep that pace, if importations of "untaxed" wool be permitted, without a tax imposed on it here?

"Well," you will say, "and do I not recommend the taxing of foreign wool?" Yes; but, what would that effect? Why, just as much evil to the manufacturers of cloth, as good to growers of wool? Indeed, in the end, it would be an evil to the former as well as to the latter.

But, before I proceed to show to what extent your proposed measure would affect the manufactures, it is necessary to make a few observations as to the relative quantity of wool grown and wool imported. You say, that of wool imported, the quantity, in 1789, was 2,660,828 lbs. and that in 1814 it rose up to the appalling quantity of 15,712,517 lbs. I dare say that this statement is correct; because you had the actual account of imports to refer to. As to the quantity of wool grown in the country, it is impossible for any one to state it with any thing like precision. The wool is not taxed; neither the grower nor the dealer, nor the manufacturer is compelled to Keep or render an account of it. Yet, a writer in the Courier of the 8th inst. says that "your lordship must be well acquainted with the amount of it, which, so long since as 1800, was 192,000,000 lbs." Hence he is led to ridicule your alarm at the importation of 15,712,517 lbs. in a year.

If this statement of the quantity of the home growth were correct, your proposed tax, would, indeed, have nothing in it very serious to the manufacturers. But, besides, that it is next to impossible that any one should be able to come at the amount of the home growth, this statement so monstrous as to shock even the credulity that gives a currency to Moore's almanack. This gentleman has heard of millions so unaccountable, that he thinks nothing of hundreds of millions. The average weight of a sheep's fleece is four pounds, consequently there must be 48,000,000 of sheep in the country, shorn every year, or 4 1-2 to every human being, including the cities and towns. Ewes are, on an average, killed at four years old, wethers at three, and lambs at four months. They are, then, killed on an average at twenty-nine months old. They live one year before they yield any wool. Thus, for every sheep that is shorn, there is one killed in every seventeen months. So that, including a fraction, there must be killed every year, 84,000,000 of sheep and lambs; or, 3 1-2 to each human being, man, woman, and child, paupers, gypsies, felons and all. The average weight of sheep is about sixty pounds, and of lambs about thirty-six pounds. The number of sheep killed far exceeds that of lambs. But, suppose the average weight to be fifty pounds. Then, there is for each human being one hundred and seventy-five pounds of mutton in a year, or very nearly half a pound a day, for beggars, paupers, babies and all observe. But this is not all. The neat cattle nearly equal the sheep in amount of meat. The hogs surpass the sheep in this respect. So that here is one and a half pounds of meat, besides fish and poultry, every day in the year for every human being, sucking babies and all, when it is well known, that millions of even the fathers and mothers do not taste a morsel of animal food from month's end to month's end, and sometimes hardly a morsel of bread, their chief diet being tea and potatoes. What monstrous absurdity!

But, the wool! what shall we do with the wool? Suppose it all be made into the shape of broad cloth, and that each yard in length requires three pounds of wool. It would not require so much, but suppose it did. Here are 64,000,000 of yards in length, and 128,000,000 of square yards of cloth. There are 3,097, 600 square yards in a square mile. Leaving out fractions, then, here is cloth enough made in one year, without the wool imported, to cover forty square miles! The very skins of the animals would cover ten square miles! If this statement were correct, the idea of hiding the sun with a blanket would not be so very absurd.

We have, then no means of ascertaining, with any degree of exactness, the quality of the home growth. But, it is rational to suppose, that the 15,000,000 of lbs. imported, are not less than a fourth of the whole quantity of wool manufactured in the country. The amount of all the woollens exported last year was 15,600,000 sterling; and, suppose only one fourth of the woollens have been sent abroad, leaving three fourths for home consumption, the whole of the manufactured woollens would have amounted to 122,400,000 sterling. If we allow a third of the cost of the woollens for the raw material, and put the wool upon an average at 3s. sterling a pound, we shall find that the whole amount of the wool before it was manufactured amounted to 7,400,000 and some odd pounds sterling, and that the whole quantity of it was 54,000,000 of pounds weight which is not four times as much as the quantity of wool imported, and which wool, I believe is nearly all of the fine quality.

Whether I am wrong in my supposition that not less than one fourth of our woollens are exported, and that the raw material amounts to not more than one third of the price of manufactured goods; I must leave, as I do with great deference, for the reader to decide; but I must be very wide indeed of the mark, if the quantity of wool imported does not bear a proportion of at least a sixth in value to the whole of home growth.

It is clear, therefore, my lord, that the importation of wool has a very great effect on the price of wool grown at home. But, lay a tax upon wool imported, and the consequence is, a rise in the price of manufactured woollens; for, to suppose as you appear to do, that the manufacturer does not now and always upon an average of transactions, sell at as low a price as he can afford to sell; to suppose that ever-active and all-seeing competition is not sufficient upon an average of years, to apportion with the most scrupulous precision the profits of unfettered trade, is a notion so well known to belong exclusively, and of right divine, to the mob, that for any gentleman to attempt to encroach upon it is to set at open defiance every principle of justice and humanity.

The consequences of a rise in the price of manufactured woollens would be, first, a diminution in the consumption at home, unless you could by some sort of gipsy conjuring trick convey the sums into our pockets necessary to meet the rise of price. The same would take place as to exports. But much more might take place as to our foreign trade; for, if you were to prohibit the importation of wool altogether, it would be manufactured abroad; and as price is the great and true and everlasting regulator, the moment wool became so cheap elsewhere as to enable other countries to work it up and sell it at a lower price than we, that very moment would the export trade disappear. What is true as to total prohibition is true as to prohibition in part. For though the countries sending wool hither would not, all at once, begin to manufacture their own sufficiently to shut out our woollens entirely, they would do the thing by degrees; and so truly would the prohibition operate as to leave not a fraction unaccounted for in the effect.

From this general view of this part of the subject, I should now proceed to the particular case of America; but, I must postpone that till my next, in which I hope to be able to shew, not only that no tax ought to be laid upon imported wool, but that the corn-bill ought to be repealed.

I am your most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

LETTER V.

Intended to show, that the situation of England compared with that of America, is such, and the inducements to emigration so great, that, in order to preserve our manufactures, not only ought there to be no tax upon wool imported, but that the corn bill ought to be repealed.

MR LORD—The situation of England compared with that of the United States of America, is such as to induce every man to emigrate to them, who professes any degree of knowledge in the making of machinery and manufactures, or, indeed, who possesses enterprize in any art or science, and who is not bound to England by ties which cannot be broken. The number of the former is very great. There are always a great many persons, who wish to better their lot; who aspire to something more than fortune has given them. And the number of these, in agriculture as well as in arts and manufactures, must be greater now than ever, seeing the general depression, which at present reigns in England, with the most gloomy prospect for the future.

Taxes, no matter by what part of the community paid, in the first instance, or in what shape collected, produce, according to their amount, diminution of the means of living in all those who do not share in them after they are collected. The mob, both high and low, are eternally backing on the government to tax what they call luxuries. Just as if the taxes on wearing hair powder, on armorial bearings, and on sporting dogs, did not descend, through the hair-dressers, powder makers, seal-cutters, dog breakers, and game-keepers, to the bakers, butchers, chandlers' shops, tailors, shoemakers, farmers and laborers. We have an additional tax on Batchelors.—"Oh! ay! tax them as much as you please," exclaim the ripened spinsters. But, my good ladies, do you think that the taking away of a part of their fortunes will quicken their disposition to indulge in that greatest of all luxuries, of a wife? Do you not see, rather, that, what was taken from the bachelor produces a ramification of privations, some of which reach even you, my dears, who so loudly applaud the tax? Such notions as these, as they have had their rise amidst a belief in hob-goblins; amidst all sorts and sizes of superstition; so they will vanish for ever, when common sense shall indignantly kick down the last jug of holy water, and scatter the last manuels of stupidity and deception to the winds.

Taxes are necessary, in some shape or another, to pay for their services, those who carry on the public affairs, in which I include the business of the public defence. But, if they are carried to an enormous amount; if the book-keepers, the overlookers, &c. of a manufactory, for instance, take away so much that the working people are reduced to half allowance; the former may cut a brilliant figure, but the cannon must languish and decay; and the working people will, the moment they are able, endeavor, by a change of place, to better their lot.

This is the state in which England now is, including amongst the working people all those who receive no share of the taxes! because they who live upon the proceeds of their private incomes suffer in the same degree, according to their wants, as the poorest laborer suffers. That which is now taken from the people in England forms so large a part of the estates and labor (including that of professional men,) that every one feels the hardship to be the most pressing. And, we all know besides, that this pressure is not now to be of temporary duration. We all know now, that the pressure is to last for ever, unless, which is little less appalling, the burden be shaken off by a total overthrow of the funds.

It is frequently said, with what folly or impudence we shall soon see, that the trade and navigation of the country have kept pace in their increase with that of the taxes. The best way will be, not, to show, by reasoning, the utter absurdity of this; but at once to go to the government's own documents, laid before parliament, and from them to prove its falsehood. In order to take away all pretext for saying, that I am comparing a state of peace with a state of war; that I am reckoning the heavy expences of the present, or late years, as if they were to last for ever, I will take in no taxes at present, but such as are to last for ever. That is to say, the taxes on account of the debt, the capital of which, as all the world now sees, never can be paid off, or diminished, without a sponge. Well, then:

In 1789. The taxes raised on account of the debt amounted to 79,000,000

In 1814. ————— to 43,000,000

Now, if the exported produce and manufactures, if the imports, and if the number of men and boys employed in the merchant service, in 1814, were nearly five times as great as in 1789, I should be ready to say, though I see the people sinking every where under the taxes, there is some reason to doubt even the evidence of my own senses. But, the following table, which I take from the accounts laid before parliament, and for the correctness of which table, I am answerable in the eyes of a public who have these authentic documents in their hands, will show what sort of pace the trade and navigation have kept with the taxes demanded by the debt. I have taken three periods; but with regard to the first period, I have in my possession no amount of exports and imports.

N. B. The account of exports for 1800, embraced produce and manufactures of Great Britain only, while that for 1814, included those of Ireland also. The imports from China and the East Indies are not included in either year, because they are omitted in the account for 1814, in which it is stated, that the time, allowed by law, for presenting an account of those imports was not arrived. The merchant seamen include many thousands employed in the transport service.

Now, to make good the assertion, that the navigation and trade have kept pace with the taxes paid annually on account of the debt, from 1789 to 1814 inclusive, the number of merchant seamen in 1814 ought to have been nearly 544,810 instead of 172,785. And to have made good the same assertion, as relating to the period from 1800 to 1814, inclusive, the exports ought to have amounted, in the latter year, to rather more than 79,943,415, instead of 36,092,169. —and the imports ought to have amounted to rather more than 51,232,106, instead of 30,091,801.

This shows how ignorant, or what cheats, those men are, who would persuade, and who do persuade, this "most thinking nation in the world," that the ability of the country keeps pace with the demands of the government.

Here, however, before I proceed to compare our situation with that of America, must observe that a deduction ought to be made from this fearful amount on account of the depreciation of our currency.

ev. We pay in paper, which is now, in fact a legal tender. It sometimes requires more, and sometimes less, of this paper to buy a guinea, as bullion is more or less plenty in the market. But as the average price of a guinea of full weight is about 23s. in paper, let us take the depreciation at a third.—Then we pay on account of the debt, in the money of 1789, only two-thirds of 43,000,000l. or 32,000,000 leaving out the thousands. But this is more than three and a half times what we paid on account of debt in 1789; and, therefore, for the navigation to have kept pace with the taxes on account of debt, from 1789 to 1814 inclusive, there should have been in the last mentioned year, 381,367 merchant seamen, instead of 172,786; and, if we a little mend the matter by this deduction, what a blow do we give to the concern on the other side? For, if we insist on a depreciation in the paper to the amount of a third, for the sake of lightening the burden of the taxes, common honesty calls upon us to deduct a third from the value of the imports and exports.

Thus, it does not signify how much we turn the thing about. On every side it presents a permanent increase of burden without any adequate increase of ability to bear: the certainty of the decline thus far, of present distress, and the most gloomy prospect as to the future.

Compared with this situation of England, how stands that of America? But before I make any observations as to what that situation is, it may not be amiss to remind you of what, in 1783, you foretold she would be. In that year, just after the conclusion of the American war, your lordship wrote a book, the three principal objects of which appeared to be, to keep up the spirits of his majesty under his recent loss of dominion; to keep up the spirits of the nation by causing them to believe, that America was not at all likely to become a manufacturing and commercial country, or a naval power; but that, in order to prevent the latter we ought to employ all the means in our power, among which means was the withholding of all protection of American vessels from the Barbary powers, and the inducing of the other great marine powers to do the same.

The following has been published (August 19) in the London newspapers, as the list of the American fleet, employed against the Algerines.

N. B. It was stated in the London prints about three weeks ago, that our prince regent had made the dey of Algiers a present of a frigate, completely fitted out with rigging, guns, &c. It would be mortifying enough if this should have been the frigate, which commodore Decatur is said to have captured from his majesty of Algiers.

I will not attempt to characterise this last sentiment, the mind that could have given birth to which must have received appropriate punishment in seeing this same America, not asking protection from any of your "great maritime powers;" but sending a squadron of ships of war across the Atlantic, and chastising the pirates, as far as regards her, into a submission to the principles of humanity.

America has taxes and a debt too. But, this is not a debt that must necessarily last forever, or be wiped off with a sponge. It is a debt, at this time of 27,000,000l. sterling, or 108,000,000 of dollars.

The capital of our debt (of Great Britain, for Ireland has her debt too, in an equal proportion,) is now a thousand millions, laying aside odd hundreds of thousands, and out-standing debt. Suppose our population, even now that the foreigners are all gone away, to be ten millions, here is a debt of 100l. a soul, taking in babies, paupers, gipseys, beggars, soldiers, sailors, seapoys, prisoners in jails, and convicts on board the hulks; yea all, from those who feast on strawberries, at five guineas a pint, down to the troops of ragged and squalid wretches, whose Sunday's dinner consists of rumps and buns: from the skimmers, or of bullock's liver from the slaughter house. The population of America is now, to your great surprise, eight millions, and, therefore, the capital of her debt amounts to not quite 37. 10s. a soul. Whether the skimmers and tanners in that country have now any customers for the fragments of flesh, that have been left by the butcher, is more than I can say; but, if she adopt our poor system of laws, and couple with the institution a suitable proportion of cant; if she suffer, in any degree, however small, the quantity of relief of the distressed to be regulated by the quantity of godliness professed by the object of that relief; if she does this, or, in the most trifling degree, lean towards it, she will soon find, that a premium for misery and hypocrisy will operate, as all other premiums do, to increase the quantity of that on which it is bestowed. She, when it is too late, will find, to her sorrow, that fleshy bits of skin, and sheep's trotters, and bullock's liver, are not things to be thrown to the dogs. If her people should live to see that day; if they should live to see the pauperism established by law, they will see all hospitality, all real charity vanish; all the paternal, and filial, and fraternal offices of life exchanged for those of the poor-house; and, instead of an erect and independent race of laborers, proud of their rights and liberties, they will see a crawling, fawning, canting herd, knowing not the meaning of such words, and, like the beasts of the field, caring for nothing but the satisfying of their hunger, without the smallest regard as to the means. If the people of America should live to see that day; if they should be so foolish as to draw over them, though by slow degrees, this blistered shirt, they will wish, that, as in the days of their bold and hardy forefathers, their country were a howling wilderness.

However, as yet, this greatest of all calamities has not made any very considerable progress in America, and it will be the fault of the people if it ever does. There are no common beggars, no gypsies, few soldiers by profession, at present few unproductive sailors, no seapoys, the prisoners in jails are few, none in hulks. But, be there what they may of these several descriptions of persons, the capital of the debt of America amounts to only 34 pounds sterling a soul, while that of ours amounts to more than 100 pounds sterling a soul.

Let us now see the progress of the debt in America. The latter had the misfortune to start with a debt; to set out in the world with a debt upon her back. It was a misfortune, and a very serious one.

idea to bear has far exceeded any increase in the demands of the government. Her exports of domestic produce and manufactures can, at this time, hardly amount to less than sixty millions of dollars, or fifteen millions of pounds sterling; so that, if we regard (as our ministers always pretend to do) the amount of exports as the criterion of the capacity to pay the interest of debt and other taxes, here is America with fifteen millions of exports and an interest of debt of 1,357,982½ and Great Britain with an export (including Ireland) of 36,000,000 and interest of debt of 43,000,000.

But, let us put America in the worst possible light, in order to build upon nothing in the way of conjecture. Let us take her exports now to be more than they were in the time of embargoes, orders in council, &c. Even then she has an export of domestic produce and manufactures of nine millions of pounds to set against our thirty-six millions. Thus, even in this worst of all possible lights, she will stand compared with England:

Export.	Interest of Debt.
England—36,092,167½	—43,000,000
America—9,080,000	—5,431,930

Having thus put the matter in a light not to be misunderstood, and to leave no possible ground for cavil, I venture to offer as an opinion, that peace, which will infallibly give new wings to American commerce and navigation, will clip the wings of English commerce and navigation. Great part of what has lately swelled out the latter, consisted of Transports in the pay of the nation, and did in no wise whatever belong to commerce, and form no part of the means of bearing taxes. We have already seen crowds of sailors going to the admiralty to complain of want of employment. They have been to the lord mayor of London on the same errand! As if he could create commerce! As if he, though a very loyal man could find work for them, or cause bread to descend from the clouds. Is this the case in America? Oh no! There peace makes the wharves full of business. Every man and thing belonging to the sea is called for from twenty voices at once. It is said that in order to procure the chance of employment for our native sailors, all foreign sailors are to be sent home. Those in our navy may be thus disposed of; but, a law must be passed before merchants can be compelled to prefer ours before foreigners; and a law, too, precisely opposed in principle to the laws already in force; and, even in case of the navy; violating the principles of common justice, seeing that our laws make British subjects, (as far as rights and privileges go) of all foreign mariners who may have been a certain time on board of English ships. "Every foreign seaman, who, in time of war serves two years on board a British ship, is ipso facto naturalized." This is the law; and, therefore, if it be true, as the newspapers tell us it is, that the government is going to send home all the foreign seamen to make room for the employment of our own, it is going to do a deed, which I will leave your lordship, or any body else to characterize; for I will not beggar my sentiments by doing it in the way in which alone I should dare to do it. But, if this deed were to be done. If it were to take its place in the list of deeds of 1815—the consequence would be, that the seamen, thus sent home, would be ready to man the ships and carry on the commerce of other countries, who will, now that the seas will be open again, stand in need of them.

Peace, so far from reviving commerce, will in all human probability, have a contrary effect in England. The late wars have been different in their effects on commerce from former wars. They swept the sea of all commerce but our own. They made all the world tributary to us. The profits of the world's commerce centered here. By the means of our loans and taxes, we obtained a force sufficient to effect these purposes. But, this cannot continue in peace. Other nations will have each its share of commerce. Our navy, withdrawn from the ocean, will leave the nations of the world at liberty to communicate with each other. And as every ship of ours must sail loaded with a part of our debt, other nations will be able to sail and carry goods cheaper. If we attempt to prevent this by force, it is war again. More loans. If we remain, quiet, we sink in the general scale, and perit ra desunt.

British Rations.

District Marshal's office, Massachusetts,
Boston, July 23, 1814.

Having observed that lately particular civilities to individuals who have been made prisoners of war by the enemy, are published and circulated with great avidity, by which the public mind might be imposed with an idea, that our citizens in general have been and are treated with unexampled humanity; I have believed it proper to present to the American people certain documents in my office, which will place this interesting subject correctly before them.

JAMES PRINCE.

CIRCULAR.

Office of commissary general of prisoners,
Washington, June 23, 1814.

SIR—I hand you enclosed, copies of two letters which passed between the British agent of prisoners of war in this country and myself, in April last, on the subject of rations. Since the date of mine of the 2d April, letters have been received from our agents for prisoners in England, in the West-Indies, at Quebec, and at Halifax; by which it has been seen, with regret, that the British authorities, at their several depots, had reduced the prisoners ration, from that which had been established by the cartel of the 12th of May, 1813, to what is considered not only inadequate to their comfort, but insufficient to preserve the unfortunate captives from actual suffering, as will be shewn by the inclosed tables of daily rations, latterly issued our prisoners at the respective places designated. A similar change in the rations issued to the prisoners in our power, has been, thus long delayed, as well from an unwillingness to inflict pain, or suffering, however justified by the acts of the enemy, as from a hope, that by continuing the former ration, they might be induced to meet such liberality in a proper manner, and return to the system of subsistence regularly agreed upon with an authorised agent on their part, early in the last year, and which, until within a few months past, has been practised by them, at least in their possessions in North America and the West Indies.

Being disappointed in this reasonable expectation, it has become necessary to adopt the course as to their prisoners, which is pursued as to ours, in order that the insufficiency of the ration may be felt by them through their own subjects. I am instructed by the president to require that you will, immediately on receipt of this letter, cause to be issued to all the non-paroled prisoners in your charge, and within your district, daily, the following ration, and no more, viz.

- Half a pound of fresh or salt beef;
- One and a half pounds of bread;
- One quarter of a pint of pease or rice, &c.
- One pound of potatoes, and

One third of an ounce of salt,

Let especial care be taken, however, that the articles composing the rations be of good quality.

You will inform these unfortunate men of the cause of the change in their subsistence, and of the regret, with which the government finds itself compelled to adopt this measure; and you will have published, and keep constantly posted in some proper place, within the limits of the prisons, tables of the ration you shall cause to be served but under the present instructions.

I have the honor to be,

Sir, your obedient servant,

J. MASON.

James P. Ince, Esq. Marshal of Massachusetts.

Office of commissary general of prisoners,
Washington, April 23, 1814.

Sir—One of the objections to the cartel entered into between you and myself, on the 12th May last, made by the commissioners of the British administration, as stated to me in your letter of the 1st February, is to the allowance to prisoners for subsistence. The daily ration agreed upon in that instrument for prisoners, and certainly little enough to support a hearty man without suffering, was 1 lb. of beef, or 12 ounces of pork, 1 lb. of wheaten bread, $\frac{1}{2}$ pint of peas, or 6 oz. of rice, or 1 lb. of potatoes, 2 quarts of salt and 4 quarts of vinegar, to every hundred rations. In the new project of arrangement, all stipulations about quantity of provisions is rejected; and you inform me, that it is intended to give our prisoners $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of the coarsest bread a day, and to eat with their bread for two days in the week, no meat, only 1 lb. herrings, and 1 lb. of potatoes for one of these days, and for the other 1 lb. of codfish and 1 lb. potatoes; for the other five days only $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of fresh beef, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. greens, 1 oz. Scotch barley, and $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. onions, with 1-3 oz. salt, no vinegar at any time, and no salt for two days in the week.

I should not have called this subject now separately to your attention, but that in a letter just received from Mr. Storm, agent for American prisoners at Barbadoes, is the following passage. "I now have to state, that Mr. Barker, the British agent here, has officially informed me, that the convention entered into between yourself and col. Barclay has not been ratified by the government of Great Britain, of course our prisoners are not allowed more than two-thirds of what they had, I await your instructions on the subject?"

I infer from this, that the British government has come to a determination as to the provision article, and has given orders to reduce the ration to the standard stated by you, since it is actually in practice at Barbados. I beg to be informed on this subject. You are pleased to remark in your letter of the 1st February in explanation of this article, that the British government so frequently involved in war, has had such an opportunity to ascertain what is a rational and a proper allowance to prisoners, that it is reasonable to suppose the ration used in Britain, as described by you, "is in truth a proper allowance." You must permit me to observe, that this was not your opinion heretofore, and I should hope, cannot now be so, when you reflect on the subject. It is a matter of daily experience, and feeling common to every man of every class in the community; every man can at once decide that $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of coarse bread with the scanty appendages of 1 lb. of herrings, or codfish and 1 lb. of potatoes, will not satisfy for a day the cravings of hunger; and that the $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of beef, with the pitance of greens, barley and onions allowed, will be very little better. Our prisoners in your hands on such an allowance must suffer constantly and severely from hunger; your prisoners, if reduced to a like allowance, must suffer in an equal degree; and yet, repugnant as it will be to the wishes and feelings of this government, if that course has been determined on by your government, it will be necessarily adopted here. I request your particular and early attention to this case so important to humanity; and shall be much gratified, if you are authorized to make any arrangement upon the subject that may obviate the sufferings, on both sides, which must ensue by a system that will deal out to the unfortunate prisoners less subsistence than is absolutely requisite. The privations of these men are of necessity sufficiently great; let us avoid increasing them, I intreat you by refusing that, which is every where proverbially, the first call of nature, enough to eat, and the want of which sinks deepest into human wretchedness.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed)

J. MASON

Col. Thomas Barclay,

Bladensburg, April 5, 1814.

Sir—Your letter of the 2d. instant, I did not receive until yesterday noon. My letter to you of the 1st of February, was drawn up conformable to the instructions I received from the commissioners. I have long since transmitted to them a copy of my letter to you, and at the same time communicated to them fully my sentiments of each of the articles contained in the cartel of the 12th of May, and the amendments proposed.

I think it probable I shall receive an answer in May or June. In the interim however, I hope to receive your answer to my letter; indeed I have long since expected it. Under present circumstances I cannot return you an answer to the inquiry contained in your letter of the 2d of this month. The 7th article in the draft of the cartel sent you to be submitted to the president, states, "they (the present prisoners) are to be furnished by the government in whose possession they may be, with a subsistence of sound and wholesome provision." I acknowledge the clause is vague, and perhaps it would have been preferable to have specified the articles and quantity. Yet the word subsistence intends a reasonable quantity for the support of nature, and the words "sound and wholesome provision," certainly designate the quality.

The precise quantity for each government may readily be ascertained thro' the respective agents of both nations.

You misapprehend me when you state, I inform you it is intended to give the American prisoners $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. of the coarsest bread a day, &c. &c. By referring to my letters of the 1st of February, you will find I expressed myself in the words following—"I transmit herewith a table of the provisions daily issued to prisoners in Great Britain, and elsewhere in the British dominions, save in such places as the agents have adopted the regulations of the cartel, but which will eventually be countermanded. The quality of the bread is not mentioned, nor did I state, that if the proposed cartel was agreed to by the president in lieu of that of the 12th May, that the American prisoners, under the words of the cartel, would receive subsistence precisely conformable to the copy of the table of provisions sent you."

I beg leave, however, to say, I think it probable, and for the same reasons given in my letter of the 1st of February.

I have received no further information on the subject of the provisions to be issued to prisoners since I wrote you in February.

From what Mr. Storm writes you, it is evident the commissioners have sent orders to the West Indies on the subject.

Lieut. Miller, at Halifax, in his letter to me of March, does not hint that he had received any.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant, (Signed) THOS. BARCLAY.

Gen. John Mason, &c.

That the bread to be dealt out to our prisoners is of coarse quality, was ascertained from the following note accompanying col. Barclay's letter of the 1st of February, 1814.

N. B. Bread to be made of the whole wheaten meal, wherein the whole grain is to be preserved, except such parts as will not pass through the London and Bristol seam cloth No. 7, usually called an eleven shilling cloth; and what is considered equal to No. 6 of the patent cloth of fifteen shillings price. Daily rations issued to American prisoners at different British depots; as stated by letters from the agents of the United States, at the several places, and under the duties shown below, viz:

In England, at the various depots, as by letter from Mr. Beasley, dated March 18, 1814.— $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. beef, 3 days in the week, and $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. greens or turnips: 1 oz. barley, $\frac{1}{4}$ oz. onions, and 1-3 oz. of salt; $1\frac{1}{4}$ lb. bread, each day in the week; 1 lb. cod fish and 1 lb. potatoes for one day; 1 lb. herrings and 1 lb. potatoes for 1 do.

At Jamaica, as by letter from Mr. Stewart, dated February 20th, 1814.— $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. beef, $1\frac{1}{4}$ lb. bread, $\frac{1}{2}$ pint pease or rice, and 1-3 oz. salt.

At Barbadoes, as by letter from Mr. Storm, dated January 29th, 1814.—Two thirds only of the ration fixed by the cartel of the 12th May, 1813.

In Canada, as by letter from col. Gardner, dated March 26th, 1814.— $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. salted or fresh beef or pork, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. biscuit or soft bread, $\frac{1}{2}$ pint pease or 6 oz. rice, 1-3 oz. salt.

In Nova-Scotia, as by letter from Mr. Mitchell, dated May 9th, 1814.— $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. beef, $1\frac{1}{4}$ lb. bread, 1 gill pease, and 1-3 ounce salt.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

MONTREAL, JULY 30.

Head-Quarters, camp at Chambly, 2
July 2d, 1814. }
GENERAL ORDER.

Several officers of this army having recently returned from the United States, where they were held in close confinement as hostages, and having on their release signed a conditional parole, containing a pledge on their part, to return to captivity, at the expiration of a limited period, unless previously exchanged; his excellency the governor in chief and commander of the forces, considering such parole to be inconsistent with the provisions of a convention for the exchange of prisoners, which was entered into by persons duly empowered for this purpose by the government of the United States and his excellency respectively, and has already been carried into complete execution on his part, and has also been in part executed by the American government—is pleased to declare that all these officers, whether of the line, or militia, are absolved from their parole, under and by virtue of the before mention convention, that they are released, and free to serve as if they had never been prisoners of war, and are all and severally included in the general order of the 16th April, directing all prisoners of war, after the 15th May to repair to their respective corps and stations, and to resume their respective military duties.

To destroy any doubts which may by possibility be entertained with regard to the complete execution of the convention above mentioned;—to satisfy the nice and scrupulous sensibility with which a British soldier must ever examine an act professing to release him from an obligation in which his honor is implicated and pledged, and to remove every apprehension from the minds of those who may come within the scope of the general order, his excellency is pleased to authorise the communication to the army under his command, of the principal circumstances attending the commencement, progress and final conclusion of the convention, to which allusion has above been made.

At the solicitation of the government of the United States, conveyed in a letter to the secretary of state of the 10th March, and not less induced by his anxious desire to alleviate unnecessary severity which the system of retaliation had introduced into the conduct of this war—the commander of the forces did not hesitate in acceding to a proposal which seemed to promise the attainment of an object so desirable. In that spirit, and with that view, his excellency consented to the exchange of brig. general Winder, (a hostage,) in consequence of that officer having been selected by the president of the United States as an agent, vested with full powers to negotiate for an exchange of prisoners of war, as well hostages as others, his excellency was also pleased to nominate colonel Baynes as an agent vested with similar powers, on the part of the British army.

The negotiation commenced under the most favorable auspices. The basis and conditions of the convention being left to the discretion of the two officers above mentioned, it was agreed, that all prisoners of war, hostages or others, (with the sole exception of the British subjects taken from the ranks of the enemy, and sent to England for legal trial,) should be released in conformity to the regulation of the cartel. General Winder pledged himself that his government entertained the most liberal sentiments, and that the great disparity of prisoners, both with respect to rank and numbers, which the United States would receive, and for which they had no equivalent to return, should be withheld from service on parole, until duly exchanged.

This agreement was on the point of being ratified, when a despatch from the American secretary of state, dated Washington, the 22d March, was received by brig. gen. Winder, and was verbally represented by him to convey a positive prohibition to his consenting to the release of the twenty-three British soldiers held as hostages for the British subjects sent to England for trial, unless it was stipulated that they also should be released, and sent to the United States.

This proposition was instantly answered by a note informing brig. general Winder, that as a new basis had been substituted by the secretary of state, inadmissible in principle, the negotiation was, in consequence, at an end, and that his partial exchange as a preliminary measure, was also void, and of no effect, as emanating from the act which had, from the conduct of the proposing party, become a nullity.

This introduction of this new pretension on the part of the government of the United States, had arrested the progress of the negotiation, when a note from brig. gen. Winder, (No. 5,) was acceded to by colonel Baynes, as the basis of a convention, (No. 4.) To ascertain the existence of the power of the final ratification on the part of brig. gen. Winder, the commander of the forces was pleased to direct col. Baynes to address to that officer the note (No. 5,) and although the answer of brig. gen. Winder, as contained in note (No. 6,) did not completely accord with the spirit of candor professed by him, and man-acted by his excellency—nevertheless the fair construction of it was such as to carry to his mind that conviction which it must impress on every honorable man who peruses it, that brig. gen. Winder possessed the power of finally ratifying any new agreement for the exchange of prisoners, into which he might think proper to enter.

Under this impression, the commander of the forces was pleased to declare his assent to the immediate release and exchange of brig. gen. Winder; the negotiation for the exchange of prisoners on the contracted basis last proposed by brig. gen. Winder, was recommenced, and the conditions being arranged, a convention was concluded on the 15th April last, and ratified by the contracting parties.

It is under this convention, so begun and so ratified, and carried into effect, according to the tenor of it, with promptitude and good faith on the part of the commander of the forces, and to which no objection has been specified by the American government, in any of the communication, to his excellency since the conclusion of it, but which, on the contrary, must have been accepted, since it has been in part executed by that government, that his excellency the commander of the forces has been pleased thus publicly to absolve all the officers, and others, who have recently returned from the United States, from a parole which his excellency conceives to be inconsistent with the terms of the convention, and which he considers to have been entered by persons ignorant of its existence or misconceiving its conditions.

By his excellency's command,

EDWD. BAYNES, Adj. Gen.
British North America.

[The following is the only number of the documents alluded to in the foregoing, which has appeared in the Canadian papers we have received. The rest are promised.]

No. 1.

MONTREAL, APRIL 10.

Colonel Baynes has communicated to his excellency the commander of the forces, the purport and extent of the alterations explained by brig. gen. Winder to exist, between the instruction of the 19th March, addressed to him by the secretary of state, and those of the 22d of the same month received yesterday, and that the omission of the same in the first copy, was owing to error in transcribing it.

His excellency, however, on reference in the letter of the secretary of state of the 19th of March, addressed to him, as it is stated "with the view and in the sincere desire to restore to the mildest practice of civilized nations the treatment of prisoners on both sides," and authorizing brig. gen. Winder on the part of the United States government, to conclude an arrangement which may embrace the exchange, as well as those held as hostages, as of other prisoners; and his excellency learning from the latter that his instructions fully comported with the certified tenor of the proposal made in the secretary of state's letter to him, did not hesitate a moment in acceding to the other arrangements therein suggested, and was prepared to waive just grounds which he conceived he had of complaint against the government of the United States, on the subject of the exchange of prisoners of war, in the hopes of promoting an arrangement so desirable to the cause of humanity and the honor of both nations; and he is much disappointed to find his hopes frustrated by the introduction, at this period of the negotiation, of a claim so totally inadmissible, and that had the secretary of state's letter borne the most distant allusion to it, his excellency would have felt himself as he now does, prohibited from proceeding any further on the subject.

The British cannot view the confinement of twenty-three soldiers as the first act of aggression; for the undoubted right that every free nation possesses of investigating and punishing the crimes committed by her own national born subjects, in a due course of law, is too self-evident to require a comment, nor can it by any distortion of sense or justice, be construed into a just ground for an act of fair retaliation exercised on twenty-three British soldiers; the latter are characterised by their patriotism and loyalty, the former stigmatised for their treason and rebellion.

It would be wasting time to enter into further discussion on this subject.—Great Britain has successfully maintained her natural rights unsullied, for twenty years, against the whole world combined; it is not to be supposed, that it is reserved for the United States to stop the course of justice, and to dictate to England what procedure she shall observe towards her own natural born subjects, in her own courts of civil judicature, arrested in her own territories, in the actual commission of acts of treason and rebellion.

It is to be remarked, that as the exchange of prisoners of war now proposed by the United States, no longer has the general character that was at first proposed, but is specially to restore quota for quota—it becomes, on this ground, incumbent on the part of the British government, to demand as a preliminary step, a detailed statement of about 3000 prisoners, of which one third were in the United States' regular service, captured in Canada during the first campaign, given up on good faith to the United States, who at that period had no British prisoners.—and as all subsequent exchanges on the part of the United States, have been acquired by an equivalent number of prisoners simultaneously exchanged, it is insisted that the American government is bound by honor and good faith, to make full and complete satisfaction for the above debt, in conformity to the fourteenth article of the cartel, before she can in justice retain, or ask an equivalent for a single British prisoner now in her possession, and for this purpose, returns will be prepared, not only of the number of prisoners remaining unexchanged in the possession of either power, but of those given up in good faith, by the British government to the United States, and for which no return has yet been made, or satisfaction offered; and as it appears from the documents now transmitted, that the United States are adding to the number of prisoners placed in restraint as hostages, his excellency is left no alternative, and is under the imperious necessity of ordering into close confinement, all the American officers remaining in his possession, not heretofore considered as hostages.

If the instructions of the secretary of state leave to the discretion of brig. gen. Winder no latitude on the subject of the twenty three British soldiers, considered by Great Britain as the sole just origin of the system of retaliation, the further prosecution of this negotiation for the exchange of prisoners must be unavailing, as his excellency, although prepared to waive all minor considerations to meet the American government on a fair and liberal basis, is at the same time unalterably fixed in his determination not to compromise, in the slightest degree, that principle of justice and equity, upon which the measures of his government have been framed.

On a former occasion, col. Baynes communicated to maj. Melville, that if the prisoners of war in Canada were not exchanged previous to the arrival of transports expected early in the spring, it would become a necessary measure to relieve the Canadas of that charge, and that they would be sent to England, and on the opening of the river navigation, the prisoners now at Montreal will be sent to Quebec for that purpose.

EDWARD BAYNES,
Col. and Adj. General.

No. 2.

MONTREAL, APRIL 10.

Brigadier gen. Winder has received col. Baynes's note of this morning, and has read it with close and profound attention, not without considerable surprise and the deepest regret—surprise, because it seems to have been expected that the discussions depending between col. Baynes and himself, were in fact to have settled and adjusted a principal question which will no doubt occupy the congress at Gottenburg—regret because he fears that the beneficial consequences which would result from making exchanges, as far as was practicable under the powers held by general Winder, must be defeated, by persisting in the views held out by the note of col. Baynes. Exchanges, which would restore to liberty and happiness so many brave and honorable men of both nations, who may otherwise linger out a tedious protracted confinement finally to be terminated by an inglorious death, and which, beside, would leave untouched in the fullest extent, the pretension of Great Britain, on the question from whence the system of retaliation has arisen.

It appears to brigadier general Winder from the note of col. Baynes, that he considered an exchange made under the restriction in brig. gen. Winder's power, an abandonment or compromising the principle in question by the British government. Surely if this was the case as according to brig. gen. Winder's conception it certainly is not, it would have been an abandonment of it on the part of the American government if this restriction had not existed in the power, and would have been extent of power, which is confidently believed, his excellency did not expect would be conferred on the occasion—nor indeed could it be supposed, that a power to treat relative to the adjustment of this principle, would have been conferred upon a person in the situation and under the circumstances which brig. gen. Winder was when he received the power.

Brig. gen. Winder further supposes, that his excellency has, and can have in the ordinary course of things, no power to settle and adjust this question unless by special delegation, and this if known, to the government of the United States, would have drawn from them a correspondent delegation of power with a view to its adjustment.

But the government of the United States were aware that his excellency possessed, as incidental to his military command, the power of making exchanges, relative to the prisoners made from and by his command, which did not compromise the principle of the British government on this point, and therefore had in view to delegate a corresponding power to brig. gen. Winder, as it is considered they have entirely done.

The government of the United States conceived that a relinquishment of the twenty-three original hostages taken by them, would be compromising the principle on their part, and decline to give a power to this extent—they, of the contrary, do not ask a release of the twenty-three men sent to England, because that would be relinquishing it on the part of the British government. The power to take up this question, it is presumed, has been delegated to the commissioners about to assemble at Gottenburg.

But gen. Winder is at a loss to perceive, that because he does not possess this power a negotiation is to stop, which could originally only have contemplated the exchange as far as could be done, without broaching the question. And the letter of the secretary of state to his excellency of the 19th March, and his contemporaneous instructions to brig. gen. Winder, while they look to the largest possible exchange, yet reserve, and express to do so, whole and endure the right of this system of retaliation, and he most sincerely believes, his propositions of yesterday's date, entirely attain this object to both parties.

Brig. gen. Winder, conscious it would be useless to submit any observation on the other parts of col. Baynes's note, as he believes them completely embraced in one of the propositions of his note of yesterday entirely conformably to col. Baynes's wishes; and because, possessing no other powers or instructions than those already communicated, he supposes it more important, at the present moment to obviate the objections, to proceed in the negotiation, which he flatters himself the foregoing remarks will have a tendency to effect, and which, unless he can effect, would be time uselessly spent, as no result could flow from it.

Brig. gen. Winder submits these remarks in a spirit of unreserved candor, and cordiality, and without the loss of a moment—and flatters himself, that viewed by col. Baynes with the same spirit, they will be found entitled to strong and conclusive weight.

Brig. Gen. U. S. Army.

No. 3.

MONTREAL, APRIL 11th, 1814.

Brig. gen. Winder, has received col. Baynes's note of this morning, and has read it with all the attention the subject of it was calculated to awaken, and however much he regrets that he is not able to accomplish all he hoped and wished, yet he is gratified in believing, that much may be accomplished in strict conformity with the principles upon which his excellency feels himself bound to act, as detailed in col. Baynes's note of to-day, and also entirely within the powers and instructions which brig. gen. Winder has received and submitted from his government. Col. Baynes's note states "that the confinement of the twenty-three American officers, and an equal number of non-commissioned officers, considered as the first stage of retaliation on the part of the British government, and will be persevered in so long as the twenty-three soldiers, for which they are held as hostages, are kept in confinement, and cannot be affected by any exchange that does not emancipate the twenty-three British soldiers."

What brig. gen. Winder proposes, therefore, in entire conformity to this principle is, the British officers put into confinement, in retaliation for the confinement of the forty-six American officers and non-commissioned officers, shall be released and exchanged to such an extent as an equivalent value of American officers confined in retaliation for them, or who may be prisoners of war, other than the above forty-six, shall be released and exchanged.

Brig. gen. Winder, in his note of the 9th, made his propositions as extensive as he was allowed, but considered, at the same time, that if in its whole extent it was not acceptable to his excellency, he would hold himself ready to embrace any modification of them which might be more acceptable, and within brig. gen. Winder's power.

This proposition appearing to brig. gen. Winder to be so entirely within the principles contained in col. Baynes's note, he feels the most sanguine assurance of its acceptance, and, without incumbering it with any thing else, he hastens to submit it without delay.

HEAD-QUARTERS, MONTREAL.

Adjutant General's Office, 12th April, 1814.

Col. Baynes has to acknowledge brig. gen. Winder's note of the 11th inst. and is commanded to acquaint him, that the commander of the forces consents to an exchange of hostages, and all others, prisoners of war, in conformity to the scale of the cartel, under the previously stipulated conditions recited in his note, viz. That the twenty three British soldiers first confined as hostages, and the forty six American officers and non-commissioned officers, confined as hostages, in retaliation for the same, remain untouched, and be not included in the present proposed exchange.

It appearing that the American government asserts to have placed seventy seven British officers in confinement as hostages, and the right to retaliate in an equal number, being assumed by the commander of the forces, it would be necessary to place thirty one American officers in similar restraint, in order to hold seventy seven to restore in exchange; but to avoid the performance of so unpleasant a task, it is proposed that it be taken for granted, that this further act of retaliation has been carried into effect, and that the number of hostages on both sides, being equal in number, amounting to seventy seven, are declared released as hostages, and placed on the footing of ordinary prisoners of war, to be exchanged as such, in conformity to the cartel.

That this measure take place immediately in Quebec, and with the least possible delay in the United States and Halifax.

The exchange contemplated, is to include every individual held as a prisoner of war connected with the army of British north America, commencing from the first act of hostilities on either side, excepting only the twenty three British soldiers, and the forty six American officers and non-commissioned officers to be reserved as hostages, it being further stipulated, that the last mentioned forty six will be placed on the footing of ordinary prisoners of war, and exchanged as such whenever the twenty three British soldiers are so released or delivered over for exchange.

The details contained in brig. gen. Winder's note of the 9th inst. are accepted of, as forming the outline for a mutual arrangement for carrying this exchange into effect.

HEAD QUARTERS, MONTREAL,

Adjutant General's office, 12th April, 1814.

Colonel Baynes has to acknowledge brig. gen. Winder's note of this day, and is commanded to acquaint him, that the commander of the forces has no objection to the principle upon which his exchange is proposed by the secretary of state, as a preliminary measure to his entering upon the proposed negotiation, provided that the basis upon which that negotiation is to be conducted, is in its principle admissible and holds out a fair and reasonable prospect of producing the desired end.

His excellency considered the proposal as stated in the secretary of state's letter of 19th March, as coming under the description, and the accompanying letter of instructions of the same date, comporting with the same, he did not hesitate to grant his consent to the proposed exchange of brig. gen. Winder, as a proper preliminary measure—but a subsequent communication from the secretary of the United States, being received by brig. gen. Winder, and represented by him to have introduced into the first instructions, alterations in themselves inadmissible in principle, and that the same had been omitted by error in transcribing the first copy, and were therefore to be considered as forming the text and spirit of the proposition. The commander of the forces considered himself absolved from his assent to a document, which had, from the act of the proposing party, become a nullity; and thereby cancelling whatever might have emanated from it, and that he was at liberty to revert to the alternative suggested in the secretary of state's first letter, and reject the proposal in toto.

Col. Baynes is directed to inform brig. gen. Winder, that it is not his excellency's intention to sanction any partial exchange; except for the express purpose stated in the secretary of state's letter, with which he thinks it highly expedient and proper to comply, but he must require from that officer a most direct and unequivocal assurance, that he is authorised to treat, and ratify, without reservation on the part of his government, a negotiation on the principles stated in col. Baynes' note of the 11th and 12th, and to gen. Winder's note of the 11th inst.—in which case his exchange will be declared full and complete.

Brig. gen. Winder will excuse this demand, which has become necessary, from the doubts which he has himself created, as to the nature and extent of the restrictions recently placed upon him by his government.

Adjutant General N. A.

No. 6.

MONTREAL, APRIL 13.

Brigadier gen. Winder very much regrets that he should have failed in communicating to col. Baynes in the last interview the extent of the powers communicated to him with the requisite precision.

It was the intention of brig. gen. Winder, to have stated that his powers extended, without restriction, to propose and agree to an exchange of all British prisoners of war taken from the command of sir George Prevost, except the twenty-three men put into confinement in retaliation for the twenty-three men sent to England, to which extent he now assures col. Baynes his powers extend, embracing all the subjects contained in col. Baynes' notes, of the 11th and 12th, and brig. gen. Winder's of the 11th.

As it was not the intention of brig. gen. Winder that his excellency should have the least question as to the extent of his powers, he cannot but feel mortified, that an idea should have been entertained for a moment, that he intended to render them in the least degree doubtful, and he trusts this avowal will remove all such impressions, and enable col. Baynes and himself, upon the adjustment of brig. gen. Winder's exchange, to proceed without delay to the arrangement.

WM. WINDER,
Brig. Gen. U. S. Army.

[It will be recollected that the matters discussed in the above terminated in an amicable convention, by which the United States prisoners sent to England were put upon the condition of ordinary prisoners of war. But the result has not made the various proceedings less useless for record.]

Biographical Memoirs of

MAJOR GEN. WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.

Whether he who, by the mere force of his own native talents and personal exertions, has emerged from obscurity and humble birth to honors, wealth, and distinction—or he who, born to all the advantages of opulence and splendid descent, performs actions which tend rather to augment, than to impair his family stock of honor, possesses the higher claim to praise, is a question upon which the opinions of mankind are likely to be forever divided. If we look for authorities upon which to decide, to the corps of biographers, we shall find them alternately adopting and rejecting either side, as it appears to be more or less favorable to the particular subject upon which they are at the time employed, and with a pliability of taste and a spirit of accommodation, which do equal credit to their ingenuity and good nature, no less animated and eloquent in setting off to advantage the superior merits of the hero or the sage, who has sprung into distinction from the humble truckle-bed of poor, but honest parents, than earnest to emblazon the escutcheons of those who were born under canopies of state, and swaddled in purple and fine linen.

To the discriminating moral eye, however, a broad distinction between the two is at once perceptible, and is the more worthy of observation, because it tends to throw additional lustre upon one, without diminishing or drawing off a ray of glory from the other. He who, by an honest and judicious application of strong natural endowments, undismayed intrepidity, and unbending fortitude, has risen superior to the depressions of an early adverse fortune, and surmounted the manifold obstacles with which poverty obstructs the avenues to fame and wealth, has the merit of doing what it seldom falls to the lot of individuals to effect, and which none but men of extraordinary genius can accomplish: but the sons of rank and opulence, are also, by the very conditions of their birth, exposed to difficulties, and beset by obstructions, which tho' of a very different kind, are no less hard to be surmounted. At the call of a generous ambition, or the solicitation of a virtuous desire to be useful in one's generation, to break from the bewitching embraces of luxury, accommodation and ease, and spring into the cold and rugged arms of hardship, danger, and privation, is an act of heroism which, though it should not evince more genius or animal valor, certainly displays a more refined sentimental courage, and is a stronger proof of an exalted sense of honor, and of lively moral excellence than any exertions, however splendid or successful, made under the impulse of a stern necessity, and with a conviction on the part of him who makes them, that any change they can effect, may render his situation better, but cannot, by possibility make it worse than it was before.

To the value of splendid and useful achievements the adventitious circumstances of opulence and birth can add nothing, nor can they detract from them.—The military glory of a Wellesley can receive no augmentation from his ancient and illustrious pedigree; but as a moral agent, his character derives infinite lustre from his having, by his own early choice, torn himself from the "thrice driven bed of down" in which he had been nurtured and beraken himself to "the steel and flinty couch of war," when he might have lived at home in ease and sloth, and in, what vulgar souls call, dignity.

To the catalogue of those who have distinguished themselves by an early victory over sloth, sensuality and ease, and by a magnanimous oblation of life and personal services at the shrine of patriotism and military glory, it becomes our pleasing task to add the conqueror of Tippacanoë and the hero of the Thames.

Mj. gen. William H. Harrison is descended from one of the oldest and most respectable families of gentlemen in Virginia. Through the earliest records of the colonies, the name of Harrison may be traced in the highest order of office; but our particular information respecting it goes no farther back than the great grandfather of our present subject, who, tho' he died young, filled the chair of the house of delegates of that province. His son too, the grandfather of our William Henry, was a man of considerable wealth, and of vast influence in the colonies; and at his death left several sons, of whom some held considerable rank afterwards, not only in the legislative assembly of the state, but in the provincial army during the revolutionary war. Benjamin the eldest of those and the father of our hero, rendered himself particularly conspicuous by his prompt adoption of the cause of the colonies in defiance of the suggestions of self-interest, which, at that period, would have dictated an adherence to the cause of the mother country. His possessions in the country were large, his personal influence was extensive and commanding, and the consideration in which he was held by the royal government was of a nature to secure to him every advantage he could reasonably hope to derive from the favor of the crown. Insensible, however, to every personal solicitation, he, on the first breaking out of the revolutionary troubles, without hesitation or delay, formed the generous resolution to cling to the cause of his country—in defence of her rights and independence, to put his property, his life, and all his hopes on the hazard of the die, nay, if it should be necessary, to lay them all down as a sacrifice in the struggle—and in a word, to rise or fall with the fortunes of America. Zeal so very disinterested naturally inspired the people with confidence in his fidelity, while of his talents he had already given such ample proofs, as evinced his qualifications for offices of the highest trust; he was therefore elected by his countrymen to represent the state of Virginia in the continental congress during the successive sessions of 1774, 1775, and 1776—and in the year 1777, declining a re-election to congress, was chosen speaker of the lower branch of the state legislature, in which office he continued to act till the year 1782, when he was appointed governor of Virginia in the room of governor Nelson, who had resigned. In all these dignified stations his conduct was so decided and beneficial to the country, and he on every occasion evinced so much, spirit, patriotic zeal and wisdom, that, with each successive gradation of office, he rose in the esteem, affection and confidence of his fellow citizens, till at length he reached the high form graced with the Washingtons, the Henrys, the Randolphs, and the other illustrious men who formed that splendid constellation of worthies, which will immortalize the new world.

In the unwearied discharge of these most important duties we find him employed during the whole of the revolutionary war. Looking to the journals of congress we see them filled with repeated testimonials of the implicit trust reposed in his talents and fidelity by that august body.—There, he appears as one of the three members nominated to proceed to Washington's camp in the year 1775, in order to persuade the army to extend their term of service—again, one of the committee appointed to determine whether New-York should be burned or defended; after that, chairman of that celebrated committee styled "the board of war,"—and lastly, chairman of the no less dignified than memorable assembly in which that momentous subject, the declaration of independence, was debated.

Thus honored and deserving of honor, lived the father of general Harrison to the year 1791, when at the age of sixty-five he was gathered to his forefathers, leaving behind him three sons, the youngest of whom, is the gentleman of whose exploits we are now to speak, and who was born at the family seat in Virginia on the ninth of February 1773.

Though the property of Mr. Benjamin Harrison was large, it was not sufficient to place every branch of a numerous offspring in a state of opulent independence suitable to their wonted standing and according to the customs of the society in which they lived. In his own talents, had they been exclusively devoted to the improvement of his fortune, he had a perennial spring of wealth; but those were so entirely bestowed upon public concerns, and his time was so engrossed by the official duties which he had to perform at a distance from home, that his private affairs were neglected by him, and of course impaired. Office, which in all other times and countries has tended to enrich the possessor, brought nothing but glory to our patriots of that day, and Mr. Harrison, while he was asserting his country's independence, was consuming his family's patrimony. Not that he was addicted to any of those wasteful sports, much less to any of those degrading vices, on which splendid fortunes are too often lavished away in that state. His establishment at Berkly is represented as a model of elegant comfort, and liberal but correct hospitality—in which, however, plain good sense presided and banished that thoughtless prodigality and extravagance which makes many of the Virginians "traded and taxed of other nations," and indeed, "soils their addition," yet, owing to the causes already mentioned his fortune began to fall to waste, and this suggested to him the expediency of giving his sons such an education as would qualify them for lucrative as well as honorable pursuits in life.

William Henry, who entered upon his education after his elder brothers had finished theirs and been settled in business, was at an early age placed at a grammar-school, from which in due time he was sent to Hamden-college, where he remained till he completed his fourteenth year, when he was moved to an academy in Southampton county. There he remained till he entered his seventeenth year; at which time, being pronounced by the principal well qualified to commence the study of physic, for which he was destined by his father, he was placed for a short period under the tuition of doctor Leiper, a practising physician of respectable standing in Richmond, and in the spring of 1791, was sent to Philadelphia to finish his medical studies.

It was while he was on his journey to Philadelphia that his father died, and this event determined him to abandon altogether a profession which he had consented to enter upon, merely to gratify that gentleman. The reception he met from all the eminent professors of that day,—Rush, Shippen, Wistar, &c. particularly from the first of these, on account of the services rendered by his father during the progress of the revolution, was insufficient to shake his purpose. But what profession to choose in lieu of the medical was the question which demanded the most prompt decision, as his brother had given him to understand by letter, that the personal property left by his father fell short of what would be necessary to the successful prosecution of his original scheme of life.

The connexions of this gentleman, however, were respectable: the family influence was great. Besides president Washington's having a warm interest in his welfare—he was related to attorney general Randolph, to colonel Bassett, and to Mrs. Washington; and Mr. Randolph, on being appointed secretary of state, offered him a situation in his office. General Henry Lee, of Virginia, however, having about the same time proposed to him to take a commission in the army, he without hesitation agreed to accept it, as infinitely more congenial with his taste and active disposition than any other situation that he could hope to acquire; yet justly apprehensive that his choice would not meet the approbation of his connexions; he settled it that general Lee should solicit the commission at the war office without communicating the matter to either of his friends; Mr. Randolph, or Mr. Morris; but the president happening to mention the affair to Mr. Morris, the latter immediately required our young gentleman's attendance at his house; upon which our young soldier suspecting that the object of the summons was to dissuade him from going into the army, flew to the war office, received his commission in the first regiment of United States infantry, thence hastening to judge Wilson took the necessary oaths before him, and then proceeded with those documents in his pocket to the house of his patron and friend, who expressed his entire disapprobation of the step he had taken, but said that he would no longer oppose it; and added, "You are going to a fine country, where, if you should leave the army, you may establish yourself to advantage." The regiment in which he was commissioned was then employed on the western waters, under general St. Clair; and from subsequent events it would seem as if Mr. Morris had spoken in the spirit no less of the prophet than the friend; for that very country soon after became the scene of his fame, and the high-road to his fortune and honor.

After spending in Philadelphia a few weeks, during which he was employed in the recruiting service, he proceeded to join his regiment, and arrived at fort Washington in the north-western territory, a few days after the defeat of general St. Clair's army by the Indians. His arrival is yet remembered by several persons at Cincinnati, who, when he became a man of consequence and popularity in that country took pleasure in describing his person. The ensign might have been forgotten, but the governor and the major general buoyed up all the minute circumstances which would have sunk with the poor subaltern officer to the bottom of oblivion. Accordingly, we are told that ensign Harrison, when he joined his corps was a stripling of nineteen years of age; tall, thin, puerile in his person, and to all appearance but wretchedly qualified for the hardships to which a soldiery is liable in the wilderness.—Yet with such a frame, softened by all the comfort and delicacy in which the wealthy families of the southern states rear up their children, was our military novice at once exposed to the most trying circumstances.

The broken remains of general St. Clair's army were every day arriving at the fort, naked, broken down and dispirited. The period of service of the militia had expired: the detachment of the second regiment of regulars that was in the action under St. Clair, was entirely cut up, and thus the task of maintaining the line of posts that had been erected of establishing new ones, and of affording convoys for provisions, devolved upon an inconsiderable body composed of between three and four hundred of the first regiment, and the miserable fragments of general St. Clair's shattered army. The situation of our young soldier was now such as might well have discouraged the stoutest heart, and disposed him to listen to the admonitions of his friends in Philadelphia—nay, so formidable was the prospect before him that a friend whom he met by accident at the fort, after giving him a lively picture of the excessive hardships to which he must necessarily be exposed, with a frame and constitution so wholly unequal to it, exhorted him to resign his commission and return home again, assuring him that even though he should be able to sustain those hardships, it was scarcely possible he should resist the seductive habits of intemperance which at that time prevailed in the army. All these remonstrances were unavailing. Taking counsel partly from his own private inclinations, and partly from a nice sensibility to shame, which suggested, in exaggerated colors, the impropriety of retreating from his purpose at such a crisis, and perhaps a little too from the apprehension of being ridiculed by his former associates, he determined to persevere, and was soon after appointed to the command of a detachment of twenty men ordered to escort a number of pack-horses to fort Hamilton; a duty which, though it was attended with singular difficulties, distresses and privations, and with all the hardships incident to Indian warfare, such as lying out unsheltered and exposed to the inclemency of the weather, to rain and snow and wind by night as well as by day, he accomplished to such perfect satisfaction that he received the public thanks of general St. Clair for his conduct.

Soon afterwards general St. Clair set out for Philadelphia, and early in January, 1792, general Wilkinson being appointed colonel of the second regiment, took the command of the army. Of this event general Harrison always speaks with pleasure, as making a very interesting era in his life. To the goodness of general Wilkinson he never omits a fair opportunity of bearing testimony, or of declaring that, besides a multitude of acts of kindness he owes the preservation of his temperate habits to the indefatigable tenderness and friendly admonition of the general, who not only gave him the best advice, but upon one occasion prevented him from being sent to a distant post, in conformity to his regular tour of duty, lest he should acquire from the example of his commanding officer of that post a habit of dissipation. It was by these means Harrison became so strongly impressed with the difficulty of avoiding habits of intemperance, that he formed a resolution never to drink more than was necessary to allay thirst, to which he has ever since scrupulously adhered.

The successive defeats of Harmer and St. Clair pointed out to government the necessity of adopting a more effectual mode of repressing the Indians, or in other words, of calling into action against them a larger force and a more cautious system of operations. Negotiations for peace, therefore, were set on foot, in order, if possible, to bring the savages to reason, at the same time that an act of congress was passed for raising a considerable army: and in order to provide against that error which had occasioned the two past defeats, viz. the want of discipline in the troops, the whole of the year 1792 and the winter and spring of 1793 were employed in raising men, and instructing them in military discipline. The new troops were stationed under general Wayne, at first, a few miles below Pittsburg, and then descending the Ohio, were encamped upon its banks below Cincinnati, where Harrison joined them, in June, 1793, and was appointed second aid-de-camp to the commander in chief, having been in the preceding year raised to a lieutenancy in the first regiment.

In September, it being understood that the negotiations with the Indians had failed of effect and were broken off, the army, consisting of four thousand five hundred effective regulars, including some troops of dragoons, and of an auxiliary force of two thousand mounted militia under the command of general Scott, marched to Greenville; but an early setting in of the frost rendered it advisable to put the troops into winter quarters, huts were built, and a system of discipline, calculated for the kind of warfare in which they were to be employed, was diligently put in practice. Here young Harrison devoted himself to the study and practice of his profession with such success, that he obtained the confidence of his commander and the attachment of his associates.

It was not, however, till the latter end of June, 1794, that general Wayne was enabled to march from Greenville, the enemy retreating before him as he advanced. He took and destroyed the town of the Indians, and advanced upon the British fort lately built at the foot of the rapids of the Miami river. The Indians had collected in that neighbourhood, and on the 20th of August opposed the march of the American army, who soon routed them, and driving them to within a short distance of the British fort, encamped in full view of it. In this battle Harrison's conduct received the warmest applause from general Wayne. He had been appointed by the general to assist in forming the left wing of the regular troops; a task of extreme difficulty, owing to the thickness of the woods in which they were posted, and he accomplished it with great skill and effect.

Thus completely vanquished and humiliated, the Indians sued for peace; in the winter an armistice was granted to them, and in the August following a treaty terminated all their differences, and, with those, the war.

In the autumn of 1795, Mr. Harrison, now a captain, was married to the youngest daughter of John Cheeves Symmes, Esq. one of the judges of the north-western territory; and on the departure of general Wayne for the Atlantic states, was continued by him in his post of aid-de-camp, and left in the command of fort Washington. In the former of these offices he remained till the death of general Wayne, which happened in the course of the following year.

In 1797 captain Harrison finding the country repopulated in peace, left the army, and was in a few weeks afterwards appointed secretary of the north-western territory in the room of W. Serjeant, Esq. who was raised to the office of governor of the Mississippi territory. In the year 1799 he was sent as a delegate to congress from the north western territory, and had an active share in bringing through congress the law for changing the defective system that had been in use for the sale of public lands, and in introducing the plan now in operation. He was in fact the person who originated that measure, the happy effects of which upon the treasury of the United States are now acknowledged by every one: for it has been ascertained, that the immense growth of population which enabled that territory in a short time after to become one of the states, and at this time not one of the smallest, arose altogether from that plan.

When the Indiana territory was formed out of a part of the north-western, Mr. Harrison was appointed, by Mr. Adams, the first governor of it; and in the year 1801 removed to the capital of it (Vincennes) with his family. At the expiration of the three years for which he had been appointed, he was again nominated to that office by Mr. Jefferson, and continued to retain it under Mr. Madison till he was called to the command of the north-western army after the fall of Detroit.

During his administration he directed his attention to the disciplining of the militia, and exerted himself in endeavoring to civilize and better the condition of the Indian tribes that fell under his superintendence. In his letters to governor Scott of Kentucky, which have been published, and in his speeches to the Indiana legislature, he strenuously recommended the system of the old republics, under which military instruction was commenced at school. In consequence of that recommendation the United States gave a section of each township of Indiana for the use of schools; and an entire township near Vincennes towards the establishment of a college, for the express purpose of military institution.

Of his anxiety to secure the Indians from iniquity and the aggressions of the whites, to promote their civilization, and to induce them to raise domestic animals as a substitute for the wild game which was rapidly decreasing, his speeches and messages to the legislature of Indiana bear abundant testimony; while the many advantageous treaties he made with them prove his popularity with that singular race of beings.—But a still stronger proof is this:—A few of the party attached to the prophet gave out that the tribes who signed the treaty at fort Wayne in 1809, were overawed by a large force into that measure, contrary to their inclinations. This was a foul aspersion; for the truth has been established beyond controversy, that at the time of negotiating there were no more than thirty soldiers along with governor Harrison, while the Indians amounted to more than eighteen hundred—and he was entirely in their power, having slept at a house half a mile from the fort surrounded by a multitude of Indians.

The civil administration of general Harrison as governor of the territory, though not attended with such splendid circumstances as his military achievements, do him no less credit. A minute detail of his conduct in that high office would be out of its place in such an article as this, and could not be very interesting to the reader. For the present purpose it is sufficient to state that his management of the territory obtained the universal applause of the people, and the unequalled approbation of the general government. One event of it, however, merits particular description, as well on account of its important effects upon the public concerns, as of its serving to illustrate the character of general Harrison—we mean the expedition on the Wabash, in the autumn of 1811, which ended in the victory of Tippecanoe.

A confederation of Indians under the command of a Shawanese imposter of considerable talents and great ambition, who passed for a prophet, and by that means acquired vast influence and a powerful ascendancy over the savages, had for some time excited the vigilance of the Indiana government, and at length proceeded to such an alarming extent as to render it necessary either to bring them to terms of definite accommodation by amicable treaty, or to reduce them by force of arms. Accordingly, governor Harrison collected an army to go against them; and in order to avoid if possible having recourse to the sword, and to take advantage of the alternative of negotiation, if the prophet and his people should feel disposed to an amicable adjustment, he headed the army himself. As he approached the prophet's town, he found it necessary to proceed with the utmost caution, not only to avoid an ambuscade which the treachery of the enemy would have provided for his reception, but to procure an interview with them in order to learn their object, and open a negotiation with their chiefs. The conduct of the Indians, as he advanced; not only justified but increased his suspicions, and suggested to him the expediency of keeping his men drawn up in constant order of battle, and even of making them sleep ready dressed and accoutred, to prevent their being taken by surprise. During the whole of his last day's march, parties of the savages were seen continually lurking in his way and hovering about the thickets on either side; but every effort to speak with them was found ineffectual.—When our army came near the prophet's town, an American captain, with a flag and an interpreter, was despatched to request a conference; but the Indians appearing on both his flanks, striving to cut him off, the captain was recalled, and the governor, finding every attempt to bring the savages to a parley answered with contempt and insolence, resolved to encamp for the night, and in the morning to take some effectual means of opening a conference. At length a person who was said to be of high estimation with the prophet, came forward, expressed surprise at our troops having advanced so rapidly, and added that his chief was given to understand, by the persons who had been sent to him a few days before, that the governor would not advance to the prophet's town until he had received an answer to his demands—that this answer had been despatched by a chief who accompanied back the governor's messengers, but who had unfortunately missed the army by taking the road on the other side of the river. The governor answered, that he had no intention of attacking them until he should discover their intentions—that he would encamp on the Wabash that night; and on the next morning would have an interview with the prophet. In the meantime he assured the man that no hostilities should be committed on the part of his army. The chief seemed much pleased, and promised that the conditions should be faithfully reciprocated.

That night the governor encamped his army in line of battle, and ordered the troops, even when it was their time to lie down to sleep, to keep their accoutrements on, so that they might on the slightest alarm, be ready for action without a moment's delay. They were regularly called up an hour before day, and kept under arms until it was quite light. In the morning the governor arose himself at a little after four o'clock, and the signal for calling out the men would have been given in two minutes, when an attack was commenced by the savages upon the left flank of his camp. Only one gun (says the governor in his letter to the secretary of war) was fired by the sentinels, or the guard in that direction who made no resistance, but abandoned their officer, and fled into the camps so that the first notice which the troops had of their danger was from the yells of the savages within a short distance of the line, but even under those circumstances the men were not wanting to themselves or to the occasion. Such of them as were awake or easily awakened, seized their arms and took their stations—others who were more tardy had to contend with the enemy in the doors of their tents.

Under all those disadvantages the men all took their stations, and governor Harrison mounting his horse rode to the place where the attack was commenced, and made such a disposition of his forces as soon compelled the savages to repent of their treachery; they were driven before our infantry, at the point of the bayonet, and the dragoons pursued and forced them into a marsh where they could not be followed. In five, they were routed in all quarters, and completely dispersed by the valor and discipline of our citizens, and the very able dispositions of his forces made by the governor.

The conduct of governor Harrison had before this event rendered him extremely popular in all the country that lies upon the banks of the western waters.—And his prompt and decisive measures against the Indians, which, by breaking up what was supposed to be a formidable conspiracy against the peace and security of the inhabitants of the Indiana territory, endeared him still more to their hearts. The breaking out of the war with Great Britain, soon after enabled him to reap fresh laurels, and not only to raise himself still higher in their estimation, but to extend his popularity to all other parts of the union.

The capture of general Hull and his army, and the surrender of the Michigan territory, which happened in August 1812, instead of depressing, gave a new spring to the spirit of the American people, and stimulated to more vigorous exertions, the executive government, who exasperated at the baseness of that transaction, and impatient of the stain which it threatened to fix on the national character, formed a determination to have immediate recourse to measures for retaking that territory and wiping off that disgrace from their arms. Accordingly, without foreseeing the many obstacles which stood in the way of their purpose, and of course without providing means to surmount them, the cabinet issued orders to general Harrison, urging him to advance as far as Detroit, and if possible to reduce Malden, during the fall of the year or in the ensuing winter. The desires of government were seconded by the voice of the people at large—particularly of those on the western waters, whose ardent, hasty, and ungovernable patriotism rendered them intolerant of delay; and the general, anxious to comply with the orders of the one, and to gratify the wishes of the other, collecting all the forces he could, hurried on to the frontier, hastened from post to post, put every thing in motion, and after encountering and overcoming a multitude of difficulties, made with incessant labor, such preparations as afforded the most reasonable assurance of success. A movement, however made prematurely and contrary to his orders, by general Winchester upon the river Raisin, and the consequent defeat and capture of that officer and his army, entirely defeated the projects of Harrison, and frustrated the objects of the campaign for that season. Finding it impossible, and indeed convinced that, though it were possible, it would be improper to transport back again to a post of safety in the interior, the provisions and munitions of war which had been brought forward with so much labor and exertion, and averse to have them destroyed or abandoned to the enemy, the general deemed it expedient to form a post of deposit for them and for the artillery, additional stores, provisions, and munitions of war, yet to be forwarded in preparation for the next campaign. It became necessary also to cover the frontiers from the marauding incursions of the savages in the spring, and seemed an object of the very first importance to secure the navigation of the river Miami, down which the great part of the supplies would be brought. For all these purposes general Harrison selected a fort on the Miami river at the foot of the rapids, to which out of respect to his friend, the governor of Ohio, he gave the name of Fort Meigs. Here he had all his stores deposited by the end of the winter, when the British officer who commanded in that quarter, getting intelligence of the situation of the fort and of its contents, resolved to make an attempt to take it, imagining that if he could accomplish their capture, the loss of the artillery, military stores, and provisions, would effectually embarrass, if not entirely prevent the operations of our armies for the following campaign.

General Proctor had been ordered to reinforce the British army on the Niagara, but the contiguity of fort Meigs to Niagara and Detroit, overawed him, and there is little doubt that the establishment of fort Meigs postponed the fate of Niagara. Not daring to leave it in his neighborhood, Proctor resolved to reduce it. General Harrison, on receiving information to that effect, hastened from Cincinnati, where he then was, with all the forces he could collect, and on the twenty second of April arrived at fort Meigs, with three hundred men, which, with those already there, made the whole of his force not more than fifteen hundred men; one third of whom during the siege were on the sick reports. This force was not a third part of what ought to have been assigned to the defence of such an important station. The secretary at war was early enough apprised of it; but neglected to authorize general Harrison, in time, to expedite a sufficient number of troops. Harrison however threw up new batteries; the officers as well as soldiers worked in the ditches, on the 27th the enemy appeared; on the 28th the fort was completely invested—and on the first of May the enemy opened his battery and continued firing till the fifth. The general's quarters were in the centre, and in decidedly the most exposed part of the fort. During the siege several shot passed through his marquee, several of his domestics were wounded, and captain McCulloch, while sitting by the general's fire, had the back part of his skull carried away. During the whole time general Harrison's fare was the same as that of the common soldiers—in no night during the siege did he sleep more than an hour, and indeed, he in general, when in the neighborhood of an enemy, never slept on an average more than four hours out of the four and twenty.

The defence of fort Meigs may be fairly considered as one of the most brilliant and extraordinary events which distinguish the late war. Exclusive of the vast disproportion of the armies, general Harrison had, at the commencement of the siege, only six hundred shot of all sizes: for the war department thinking a siege unlikely, had made no better preparation. However, the general put the best face he could upon the matter, and kept his want of ammunition a profound secret—pretending that he would not harass his troops by unnecessary firing.

It happened that for the purpose of defending the frontier, general Harrison had made a requisition on the government of Kentucky for fifteen hundred militia. Those he hoped would have arrived in time for his purpose; but only a part of a battalion under the command of major Johnson joined him before the investment of the fort: the residue descended the St. Mary's and the Au Glaize as convoys to large supplies on their way to the lake. An express sent to general Clay to hasten forward those troops, found him at fort Winchester, with his brigade reduced by detachments and sickness to about eleven hundred effective men. To attempt to throw himself into the fort in the face of an army of more than three times his number seemed hazardous; if not rash; yet general Clay resolved to attempt it on the night of the fourth of May, of which he sent notice to general Harrison, stating that he would make the effort sometime between three o'clock of the morning and day-light. He did not however arrive till nine o'clock the succeeding morning, owing to heavy rains and darkness, and to his pilots having refused to enter the rapids, which are eighteen miles long. Meantime general Harrison considering that a fair occasion was afforded him, of playing off a surprise upon the enemy, despatched captain Hamilton to general Clay with an order to land six or eight hundred of his men on the north side of the river above the enemy's batteries, and marching down under cover of the woods, to storm them, spike the canons, blow up the batteries, and retreat to the boats if practicable, and if not to file off under the foot of the hill, where they would be protected by the artillery of the fort. This order might, and ought to have been executed, and in fact, so far as carrying the batteries and spiking the canon, was executed without the loss of a single man; but colonel Dudley, who commanded the detachment, refused to let the magazine be blown up, and suffered himself to be amused by a few Indians, and drawn off into the bush and swamp, while the enemy brought a force of double his number from the camp, and compelled all but about a hundred and forty to surrender, after an obstinate resistance. In the meantime general Harrison ordered three sorties from the fort; in one of which, two batteries opened by the enemy on the south of the river were carried, the cannon were dismounted, and forty-two men and two British officers were taken. The losses and discomfitures had the effect of convincing the British general (Proctor) of his inability to carry on the siege to any prosperous issue, and suggested to him the necessity of making a precipitate retreat; which he accordingly effected on the 9th of May.

The next great military achievement of general Harrison was that of the 5th of the following October on the river Thames, in Upper Canada—whither he had followed the British army under general Proctor, who, as our army advanced, had retreated before it, abandoning fort Malden and Detroit, after having destroyed all the public buildings in both places. On the second of that month having obtained information of the force of the British, the general left Sandwich with about three thousand five hundred men in pursuit of Proctor, who was posted and said to be fortifying himself on the right bank of the river, at a distance from Sandwich of fifty-six miles, where, however, it would seem as if he did not expect to be followed, as he neglected to take the precaution of breaking up the bridges until the night of the day that our army left Sandwich. On the first night of their march general Harrison with his troops reached one of four streams which crossed their route, and which, being rendered unfordable by their depth and muddiness for a considerable distance up the country, had been necessarily furnished with bridges. Of these bridges the first had been left entire. At the second, a British lieutenant of dragoons and eleven privates, sent by Proctor for the purpose of destroying it, were made prisoners during the process; and from them general Harrison learned that the third bridge was broken up, and that the enemy had no certain information of the advance of the American army.

The general also found the second bridge, however, but imperfectly destroyed, and with little difficulty repairing it, marched on up the banks of the Thames and encamped at a place called Drake's farm. In the mean time the baggage of the army was brought up in boats, protected by three gun-boats, furnished by commodore Perry for that purpose as well as to cover the passage of the army over the Thames, or the mouths of its tributary streams. The banks being low and clear and the river deep, those vessels were well calculated for such service; but when, approaching nearer to the enemy, the river changed its character by the stream becoming narrower, and the banks high and woody, general Harrison determined to leave the boats under a guard behind him, and to trust to the bravery of his troops for effecting the passage of the river. At the third unfordable stream the bridge had been taken away, and several hundreds of the Indians disputed the passage and commenced a heavy fire from the opposite bank of the creek as well as from that of the river, upon the advanced guard. A few shot from two six pounders, however, soon dispersed the savages, and served to cover our men while throwing over another bridge. As our army approached them, the enemy set fire to their vessels and stores, filled with ordnance and other valuable property to an immense amount, and left them in flames as they retreated. However, our army took a number of muskets, two twenty-four pounders with their carriages, and a quantity of balls and shells of various sizes, together with two gun-boats and several batteaux loaded with provisions and ammunition.

Finding it necessary to pass a rapid on the Thames at a place called Arnold's Mills, which was found too deep for the infantry, the general resolved to make use of two or three boats and some Indian canoes he had taken on the spot, and with the assistance of these and by obliging each horseman to take a man of the infantry behind him, he had the whole of his army crossed over by twelve o'clock. He was now within twelve miles of the enemy, and when, advancing forward eight of those, he received information that the hostile detachment headed by general Proctor had arrived the day before at the Moravian towns, four miles higher up the river, he immediately directed the advance of Johnson's regiment to hasten their march forward for the purpose of procuring intelligence. In a short time the officer returned with the information that his progress had been stopped by the enemy, who were formed across his line of march. One of the enemy's waggons also being taken prisoner gave the general very material information.

A more able disposition could not be made under such circumstances than was now made by general Harrison. His conduct on this day is distinguished by a masterly device of his own, purely original, and such as none but a bold and inventive genius, peculiarly formed for the military profession could have hit upon, or would have hazarded. Convinced that the thickness of the woods and swampiness of the ground would render it impossible to act on horseback against the Indians on the flanks, he determined to refuse them, and at once to break the British lines by a charge of the mounted infantry: for, knowing that the American back woods-men ride better than any other people in thick woods, and that in galloping through them a musket or rifle is no impediment whatever to their speed, he reasonably anticipated what actually took place, viz. that the enemy unprepared for and surprised by such a shock, would be unable to resist it. Conformably to this resolution he directed the regiment to be drawn up in close column, with its right at the distance of fifty yards from the road, in order that it might be in some measure protected by the trees from the enemy's artillery, and with its left upon a swamp that ran parallel to the road, and to charge at full speed as soon as the enemy delivered their fire. The rest of the army being disposed with consummate ability, the whole moved forward, general Harrison being placed in the front line of infantry to direct the movements of the horsemen, and give them necessary support. After having moved forward but a short distance the latter received the fire of the British line and were ordered to charge.—The horses in the front of the column recoiled from the fire. Another volley was given by the enemy, and our column at length getting into motion, broke through the hostile ranks with irresistible force. In one minute the contest in front was over. The British officers seeing no hopes of reducing their ranks to order, and finding that our mounted men wheeled upon them and poured in another destructive fire, immediately surrendered, after a short engagement, in which only three of our troops were wounded. On the left, however, the contest was more severe between the Indians and colonel Johnson's corps; and on the right the Indians made an impression on Desha's division; but the gallant and venerable governor of Kentucky (Shelby) coming to its support with a regiment, the savages were routed with a considerable loss, many being killed in their retreat. Six pieces of brass artillery were taken on this day, three of them being the trophies of our revolutionary war, once captured at Saratoga and York, and lately surrendered to the British by general Hull. While the number of small arms taken by us, and supposed to be destroyed by the enemy themselves, amounted to above five thousand.—As to general Proctor, he escaped by the fleetness of his horses, escorted by forty dragoons and a number of mounted Indians.

The army of the British in that quarter being thus annihilated by the skill and valor of general Harrison, he returned to Detroit to await the further orders of his country. This was the last of his military achievements, and we wish that it may remain so, because we hope that during the lives of those now in existence, the peace with which we are at last blessed, will not be interrupted. But should unfortunately the reverse be the case—should the American people, be again driven to the necessity of throwing open the gates of the temple of Janus, while yet the vigor of manhood remains to general Harrison, unimpaired by infirmity or age, we have no doubt that he will be, as he has hitherto been, among the first, and most distinguished of the heroes and defenders of this republic.

We will conclude this sketch with an extract taken by permission from a letter of an officer of high rank, who served with general Harrison, and was his associate in many a hair's-breadth's escape.

It was general Harrison's constant practice to address his troops, personally, believing it to be more effective than the common mode of general orders.—He never omitted an opportunity of setting his troops the example of cheerfully submitting to those numerous and severe privations, incident to the carrying on of military operations, in an almost trackless desert, and in the most inclement seasons.

During the campaign on the Wabash, the troops were put upon a half a pound of bread per day. This quantity only was allowed to the officers of every rank, and rigidly conformed to in the general's own family. The allowance for dinner was uniformly divided between the company, and not an atom more was permitted. In the severe winter campaign of 1812-13, he slept under a thinner tent than any other person, whether officer or soldier; and it was the general observation of the officers, that his accommodations might generally be known, by their being the worst in the army. Upon the expedition up the Thames all his baggage was contained in a valise, while his bedding consisted of a single blanket, fastened over his saddle, and even this he gave to colonel Evans a British officer who was wounded.—His subsistence was exactly that of a common soldier.

On the night, after the action, upon the Thames, thirty-five British officers supped with him upon fresh beef roasted before the fire, without either salt or bread, and without ardent spirits of any kind.—Whether upon the march, or in the camp, the whole army was regularly under arms at day break. Upon no occasion did he fail to be out himself, however severe the weather, and was generally the first officer on horseback of the whole army. Indeed, he made it a point on every occasion, to set an example of fortitude and patience to his men, and to share with them every hardship, difficulty and danger.

Dr. Ramsay.

[The following biographical sketch of Dr. Ramsay, will be interesting to many of our readers, and will allay their curiosity until something more full and complete can be proposed. It is copied from the Trenton True American.]

Dr. Ramsay was born in Cumberland county, N. J. in 1748. He entered Princeton college at an early age, and took his degree of bachelor of arts in 1765. He then applied himself to the study of medicine under Dr. Thomas Pond, of Philadelphia; and was the fifth person who obtained the diploma of doctor of medicine from the Philadelphia Medical School, then the only institution of the kind in America.

Having completed his studies, he commenced the practice of physic in Cecil county, Maryland; but not meeting with the desired success in that state, he soon removed to Charleston, in South Carolina, where he continued to reside and to practice until his death.

At the commencement of the American revolution, Dr. Ramsay took a decided part in favor of his country. And when the British obtained possession of Charleston, he was one of the thirty-eight principal citizens of that place, who were, early on the morning of the 27th of August, 1780, seized in their beds by detachments of British troops, hurried on board the Sandwich guardship, and transported to St. Augustine, where they were detained nearly a year. During this gloomy period the active mind of Dr. Ramsay was employed in literary pursuits, and particularly in compiling an Universal History, 20 or 30 volumes.

In 1782, Dr. Ramsay was elected to represent the state of South Carolina in the congress of the United States; in which body he continued for four years, for the last six months of which he performed the duties of president. While he was at the seat of government, he employed every hour which he could spare from his legislative duties to collect the authentic materials from which he afterward composed his History of the American Revolution.

Dr. Ramsay was for many years successively a representative of the city of Charleston in the legislature of South Carolina; and was seven years together president of the senate of that state.

He was married twice if not oftener. One of his wives was the daughter of Dr. Witherspoon, formerly president of Princeton College, and deservedly high in the esteem of the friends of religion, liberty and literature. She died in 1784, of the scarlet fever, five days after the birth of a son who survived her. Dr. Ramsay's letter to his father-in-law on this trying occasion exhibits affection, fortitude and piety in a most exemplary degree.

His next wife was a daughter of Henry Laurens, esq. president of the continental congress, whose services and sacrifices in the cause of his country are recorded in its history, and cherished in its memory, and whose sufferings, while a prisoner in the tower of London, were shared and soothed by this amiable and accomplished daughter, afterwards Mrs. Ramsay. She departed this life in 1811. Her memoirs published by her husband since her death, portray her as one of the brightest ornaments and examples of her sex.

Dr. Ramsay has left a number of children, sons and daughters. One of the former graduated at Princeton College in 1812—and another is now or lately was, at that institution. The daughters have been represented to us as highly accomplished and amiable: and in a letter now before us, Dr. Ramsay acknowledges in grateful terms the assistance he derived from them.

Dr. Ramsay's reputation as a historian, a statesman, patriot, and a physician, holds a high rank in this country. As a historian, particularly, it may be truly observed, that no one has ever met with more undivided and unqualified approbation. He has had the singular felicity to satisfy and to please his readers of all political parties and religious sects. Neither in the United States or Great Britain has a critic ever attempted to deny the accuracy of his details or to dispute the elegance of his style, or the general excellence of his historical writings.

Besides numerous orations, reviews, dissertations, and essays for periodical works, Dr. Ramsay published during his life, a history of the American Revolution in two volumes, which is unquestionably the most popular history of that great and glorious event which has been published—a history of South Carolina, from its first settlement in 1670 to 1808, in two large volumes—a history of George Washington, in one volume—memoirs of his wife, Martha Laurens Ramsay—and an historic and biographic chart of the United States, representing the outlines of American history from 1807 to 1809.

Of his works left unpublished we are informed of but two—an universal history, mentioned above—and a history of the American Revolution, on a more extensive scale than that which has been published; and of the United States from that period to the present.

Of Dr. Ramsay's private character, the Charleston papers present us a delightful portrait. We shall conclude this article with the following extract from an ordinary notice which appeared in the Patriot of that city:

"In the domestic circle, Dr. Ramsay was a fond husband and an anxious father. Dedicating every moment of leisure that was spared to him by an extensive practice, in teaching his children the maxims of honor and religion—in opening their minds to the light of science, and the calm joys of literature—in forming their hearts to the love of mankind, and to the especial love of the land that gave them birth. In all these relations and duties of society, his own illustrious example, was the best rule to imitate.—Religious without bigotry, humane and active in all his undertakings—ardent in pursuit of knowledge and indefatigable in its application for the benefit of man—he was indeed a being whom to know, was to love and respect. His loss is deplored by a large family, who will only inherit his name and the benefit of his virtuous example—by his friend, who profited by his wisdom and his advice: by science, who must deplore the absence of his piercing, prying intellect—and by his country, who will in vain look for an equal in his warm and practical patriotism."

The late Dr. Ramsay—In the following letter will be found the affecting and shocking circumstances which attended the last scene of his life:

Charleston, May 25.

"You have ere this been informed of the death of Dr. Ramsay, but not as minutely, perhaps, as might have been. Every circumstance respecting the fatal death of such a man, must be interesting to all who know how to respect merit. The particulars were these. About noonday, this venerable and excellent man was passing by St. Michael's, near the corner of Broad and Meeting-streets, (as public a place as any in our city) when a man by the name of Linning, approached him, unseen by himself, and shot him with a large pistol, in the back. The good old man fell, and was directly conveyed to his house, about one hundred and fifty yards distant. The murderer was instantly apprehended, and lodged in prison. I presently heard an indistinct account of what had happened, and hastened through the streets, enquiring for one, whom age, learning, piety, exemplary conduct and friendly attention, had rendered dear to my heart. Understanding that he had been carried to his own house, I hastened thither. The first persons I met, were his excellent daughters; worthy their father and their mother. They were at the door of the chamber into which their wounded parent had been conveyed, and in which several physicians and other friends had already assembled. I was unable to speak, for I did not then know whether the doc. was dead or alive; but holding out both my hands, these daughters, equally distinguished by merit and misfortune, meeting me in convulsing agony, exclaimed, "O Mr. ——— what has happened unto us!" For a moment I paused, speechless—then entering the room, I beheld him, whom every good man loved, and every learned man revered, extended on a bed, with one of his wounds exposed to view. I walked round the bed until his eyes caught me, when, turning his head, which for twenty or thirty years had been adorned with the flowers of old age, and reaching forth his hand to me, "You see, sir," said he, "an old man, who did not know that he had an enemy in the world, shot down in the public streets." Then relating to me, that several years before, he and some other physicians were officially called upon, to express their opinion in a professional manner, before a court of law, respecting the sanity of one Linning, who then stood arraigned at the bar for having attempted to murder a Mr. Bailly; and that they then gave it as their opinion, that the prisoner did not possess the right use of his intellects. Upon which he was discharged from trial, and escaped the penalty of the law: That he had been informed that Linning had declared he would take his life, for his having expressed such an opinion. But regarding his threats as the unmeaning declaration of a deranged man, he took no precaution to guard against him. He has, however, said the old gentleman, "put it into execution. I am not alarmed—I know my situation. If I have received but a flesh wound, I may recover—if not, the will of God be done. I would have it however, remembered," said the good old man, "if I die of this wound, that it is my last request that Linning be not hurt; for I did think, and do still believe that he is a deranged man." At that time but one wound had been discovered, which was ascertained by the surgeons to be only a flesh wound, just above his left hip. I went to his daughters to comfort them, by letting them know that no fatal consequences were to be apprehended. But alas! on my return to the chamber, a second wound was discovered, which damped all our hopes. Another ball had entered about midway his back, near the spine. As we feared, this wound proved fatal—he languished in excruciating pain for about thirty hours; during which he hardly uttered a word, except occasionally to comfort his daughters, in anticipation of his death. He has gone to his long home, and the mourners literally go about the streets.

With a view to the immediate support of eight children, left in very destitute circumstances, as well as to favor the world at an early period with a work of forty years' labor, the inclosed proposals have been hastily issued. Will you, dear sir, take charge of the inclosed paper, and endeavor to interest the learned and charitable of Raleigh, in behalf of the most interesting and distressed family I ever knew? It will be an act of charity; and I pray that He, who has promised, that he will not fail to remember any one who, in his name, may give a cup of water to one of his distressed followers, will condescend to regard with peculiar compassion every one who may, in any manner, exert himself for the immediate relief of four pious and forlorn young women, and four boys who are too young even to support themselves. They are the children of those who feared the Lord. And I confidently trust that the God of all grace and compassion, will raise them up friends amongst his people, who have no relations that can and will assist them. God be merciful unto them; and bless all who may reach forth the arm of protection."

Marshal Blucher.

FROM AN ENGLISH PAPER.

Genhart Lebrecht Von Blucher, the descendant of a noble family in the duchy of Mecklenburg Schwerin, was born at Rostock, December 16, 1742, being the youngest of six brothers. His father was captain of dragoons in the service of the elector of Hesse Cassel, and when young Blucher was twelve years old, four of his brothers were serving in the Prussian, Russian and Danish armies. At this early period he became a cadet in the Swedish regiment of Munster Hussars; but being sent with a detachment of ten men, he was surprised and made prisoner, after having had a horse shot under him.—When he was brought before colonel Von Belling, that officer asked him many questions, and finally offered him a commission in the Prussian service. This, however, Blucher refused, unless he could gain his dismissal from that to which he owed allegiance. This the colonel succeeded in obtaining by an exchange; and immediately appointed his young friend to a lieutenancy, purchased for him the equipage that had belonged to his predecessor, and finally made him his adjutant. Under that officer, Blucher acquired a thorough knowledge of military duty; but when the colonel incurred the displeasure of his sovereign, and was displaced, his friend experienced some ill treatment in consequence of the zeal manifested by him in the defence of one whom he justly regarded as a parent. Blucher was at that time a captain, and when the major of his regiment died, a junior officer was placed over his head; on which he remonstrated earnestly with Frederick the Great, but received no redress. He then wrote a letter to the king, requesting permission to "resign rather than expose himself to the most acute sensations during every hour of his life."—To this letter Frederick wrote the following note, addressed to the commandant of the regiment:—

"Captain Von Blucher has leave to resign, and may go to the devil as soon as he pleases.

"FREDERICK."

Our hero was at this time about to be married to a lady of great merit but small fortune, and his means were also contracted, the disappointment he had sustained in the loss of his majority was severe. However, the union took place, and Blucher farmed an estate in Pomerania, where by his diligence he in a few years acquired a considerable landed property. Of that province he was also chosen high bailiff; and it should be mentioned to the honor of Frederick, that however harshly he had behaved towards Blucher in the army, he acted liberally towards him in other respects, particularly by giving him such pecuniary assistance as enabled him to purchase advantageously, and to improve his estates. On the death of that monarch, fifteen years after the retirement of Blucher, he was again called to the service, and appointed major of the second battalion of his former regiment of black hussars. He soon rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in 1793, being then full colonel, he was invested with the Order of Merit. His career of glory may be said to have commenced in the campaign on the Rhine in 1793, where he distinguished himself so conspicuously as to receive the year following the regiment of black Hussars as a reward for his services.—The same year he was promoted to the rank of major general, and invested with the grand order of the Red Eagle. At this period he became an author in the line of his profession, by publishing a valuable book, "On a war of posts and skirmishes, with observations on ambuscades."

In 1801, he was made lieutenant general, at which time he took possession of Erfurth and Mulhausen, being also appointed governor of Munster. At the battle of Jena, Blucher performed wonders, though some blame has been unjustly cast upon him for his precipitancy, when in fact the whole miscarriage of that day was owing to marshal Mullendorf. After that battle, Blucher was appointed to the command of the Prince of Wirtemburgh's corps, with orders to conduct it across the Oder; and while engaged in this service, he fell in with the French light troops, under general Klein, when, by great presence of mind, he completely deceived the enemy, with a declaration that peace had been concluded between France and Prussia. Bonaparte particularly noticed this occurrence in one of his bulletins, accompanied by a severe animadversion on the conduct of his officers. After a succession of skirmishes and forced marches, Blucher threw him self into Lubec, which he defended with great obstinacy, against superior numbers, under Bernadotte, to whom at length the Prussian hero was obliged to capitulate. After the peace of Tilsit, the king entrusted him with the command of the Silesian army, with which he has performed deeds that have astonished all Europe. After the victory of Leipsic, our veteran was made field marshal; and a few days before his landing in England, he was raised to the dignity of prince Blucher of Wahlstadt.

On the death of his first wife, Blucher married the daughter of Mr. Von Colomb, counsellor of the finances.—By his former lady he had three children—two sons, Francis and Genhardt, and one daughter, who are all living. Count Francis Von Blucher is colonel commandant of the Brown Hussars; and the second son served as captain in his father's regiment, but having resigned, he now lives on the family estates in Pomerania. The daughter married count Von Schillenburg, on whose death she took for her second husband, in 1814, baron Von der Albrecht.

Oliver Cromwell.

From the London Morning Chronicle.

A more just idea of the real disposition of Cromwell cannot perhaps be formed than from the following letter, sent with a petition, to his secretary. Its authenticity may be relied upon, and it is revived here as an illustration of that part of his character given by Lord Clarendon, in the following words:—"What he once resolved, in which he was not rash, he could not be dissuaded from, nor endure any contradiction of his power and authority, but extorted obedience from them who were not willing to yield it."

"To his highness the lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, the humble petition of Margery, the wife of William Beacham, mariner,

"Sheweth that your petitioner's husband hath been active and faithful in the wars of the commonwealth, both by sea and land, and hath undergone many hazards by imprisonment and fight, to the endangering his life; and at last lost the use of his right arm, and is utterly disabled from future service, as doth appear from the certificate annexed, and yet he hath no more than forty shillings pension from Chatham by the year—

"That your petitioner having only one sonne who is tractable to learn, and not having wherewith to bring him up, by reason of her present low estate, occasioned by the publique service aforesaid—

"Humbly prayeth, that your highness would vouchsafe to present her sonne, Randolphe Beacham, to be a schollar in Sutton's Hospital, called the Charter House."

"OLIVER P.

"We refer this petition and certificate to the commissioners of Sutton's Hospital.

"You receive from me this 28th inst. a petition of Margery Beacham, desiring the admission of her son into the Charter House. I know the man, who was one day employed in an important secret service which he did effectually, to our great benefit and the commonwealth's. The petition is a brief relation of facts, without any flattery. I have wrote under it a common reference to the commissioners: but I mean a great deal more—that it shall be done without debates or considerations of the matter, and so do you privately hint to *****

"I have not the particular shining bauble, or feather in my cap, for crowds to gaze at or kneele to, but I have power and resolution for foes to tremble at. To be short, I know how to deny petitions, and whatever I think proper for outward form, to refer to any officers or office, I expect that such my compliance with custom shall also be looked upon as an indication of my will and pleasure to have the thing done.

"See therefore that the boy be admitted.

"Thy true friend,

"OLIVER P.

"Fe'y 28, 1657."

This letter, written in confidence, and without dissimulation, furnishes a strong contrast to the cant and hypocrisy which are generally the distinguishing marks of Cromwell's correspondence. To write a great deal, and mean nothing, seems to have been his usual practice—in the present instance he says little, but "means a great deal more;" and that he was in earnest, is perhaps proved from the total absence of all scriptural quotations and spiritual ejaculations, with which his public letters so pre-eminently abound.

Michilimackinac.

Extract of a letter from an intelligent officer in the United States' army to his friend in Kentucky, dated 17th November, 1815.

"The situation of this island is most beautiful and interesting, affording a very extensive prospect uninterrupted on the expansive lake in one direction, and enlivened on the other by the main, on the right and left, with beautiful islands, scattered around. This is the most elevated island on the lakes; its highest ground is several hundred feet above the lake, and resembles a naked ridge terminating abruptly at its extremities of about one mile in length. Below, and a half mile nearer the margin of the lake, is situated fort Mackina, which, although more than an hundred feet lower than the elevation first mentioned, is yet upwards of 100 feet above the lake. The British, when last in possession of this island, erected a small work on the summit of this ridge, and at that extremity nearest the fort, consisting of a block-house surrounded by a circular parapet of earth, but left unfinished. It is, however, intended to be completed, with some improvements, and occupied by a guard. Its distance from water, and the impracticability of obtaining any by digging, prevented the main fortifications being erected on this position, which is capable of being rendered impregnable; from whence, with a few pieces of ordnance, the fort, with any garrison, is entirely untenable.

"I have examined the ground where Croghan landed, and the lamented Holmes fell. The retreat must have been most timely and fortunate, or his command would inevitably have been destroyed; fifty men could have prevented his force ever reaching the fort. The land intervening being covered with a small growth of wood impenetrably thick. There are many individual advantages attending a residence on this island, from the healthiness of its climate, which I doubt not is equal to any known; the air and water, both of the springs and lake, being as pure as can exist. The military forces here exceed —, and the sick report seldom exceeds one to a company. A variety of the finest fish I ever saw, can be procured in tolerable abundance every season of the year, and the vegetables of the island are superior in size and nutriment, although the soil which produced them is gravelly. About fifteen families reside here, who do not generally possess sufficient accomplishments to render their society desirable; being in one branch descended from the aborigines, possessing cunning and depravity, and who are no less devoted to British interest. However, in the milder seasons of the year, the society here is more refined, genteel and numerous. The British are erecting a fort on Drummond's island, which lies about two miles S. W. of St. Joseph, and about 35 from this. No intercourse has yet been introduced between the officers of this and that post, nor has any disposition been manifested by those of either for its commencement. Few Indians are now here, they having gone to their hunting ground, but those I have seen are extremely humble and timid."

Epigram.—The following was written says a London paper, on the first leaf of Walter Scott's poem of "Waterloo."

Nap and myself one common fate may rue;
We both have lost a crown by Waterloo."

Arch-bishop Carrol.

This venerable and respected man died at Baltimore on the 3d of December 1815.—The following notice of his decease was published in the papers of that city the next day.

"Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like unto his."

The death of the venerable prelate which it is our task to record to day, will be felt and sincerely lamented as an individual loss by all who had the happiness to know him personally; for it was indeed a source of real happiness to have a personal acquaintance with a man so truly amiable.

To him the change was joyful—a change from pain to bliss and glory which will know no interruption, the consciousness of which made his last moments a scene of christian triumph, the knowledge of which will tend to console and comfort those, who feel most sensibly for his departure.

COMMUNICATED.

Died yesterday, about 6 o'clock in the morning, the MOST REVEREND DOCTOR JOHN CARROLL, Arch Bishop of Baltimore, in the 80th year of his age.

His friends and acquaintances are respectfully invited, without further notification, to attend his funeral to-morrow, the 5th inst. at ten o'clock; the procession will move from St. Peter's church down Saratoga street to Rutaw-street, thence to Franklin-street, thence to the church of the seminary, the place of interment.

No carriage will be admitted into the procession.

When such a man as arch-bishop Carroll dies, a man who filled so large a space in the public eye, and leaves so great a void in the community, something more than a mere notice of the event is justly expected. Without presuming, therefore, at this time to enter into a detailed account of his long and useful life, or to portray at large the features of his distinguished character, a brief and very imperfect biographical memoir of this illustrious individual is now given, which is submitted to the public, in the hope and expectation, that it will soon be gratified with a much fuller and more satisfactory account of his life and character from some more skillful and competent hand. Arch-bishop Carroll was born at Upper Marlborough, in the state of Maryland, in the year 1735, and was sent at the age of ten or twelve years to a grammar school at Bohemia, in Cecil county. Even at this early period he gave striking presages of his future worth and eminence, by the mildness and innocence of his manners, his docility and assiduity.

From this school he was sent to the college of St. Omers in France, whence, after going through the studies of that celebrated institution with the most distinguished success and honors, he was transferred to the college of Liege, and was there ordained a priest; and, after surrendering his patrimonial estate to his brother, became a member of the society of Jesus. Upon the dissolution of that society, he acted as the secretary of the dispersed Fathers, in their remonstrance with the court of France respecting the temporal interests of the abolished order. For this station he was peculiarly qualified as well by his distinguished learning and talents, as by the remarkable purity and elegance of his style, in the French as well as Latin language. He then went to England and was selected by the late lord Stourton (a Catholic nobleman) to accompany his son, the present lord Stourton, as his preceptor and governor on the tour of Europe. During this tour, he wrote a concise and interesting history of England, for the use of his pupil, still preserved in manuscript, he also kept a journal of his travels, which strikingly displays that good sense, sound judgment, and enlightened intelligence, which ever distinguished him.

Upon his return to England, he resided some time in the family of lord Arundel (another Catholic nobleman); but upon the approach of the revolutionary war he withstood the earnest and pressing solicitations of his noble and beneficent patron, and came back to his native country. Shortly after his return, at the request of the American congress, he accompanied Dr. Franklin, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, (his relative and friend) and the late judge Chase, on a political mission to Canada, and throughout the arduous and hazardous conflict which ensued, he remained fervently attached to the cause of his country. He did not at any time, however, neglect his clerical duties, the primary object of his care and solicitude. Upon his arrival in his native country, he lost no time in taking upon himself the laborious care of several Catholic congregations, widely separated from each other; where his memory is cherished with the most enthusiastic affection.

Sometime after the establishment of our independence, the Catholic body in this country, (before that time subject to a spiritual hierarchy in England) solicited the pope to erect the U. States into an Episcopal See; and the subject of this memoir was nominated to the sovereign pontiff as the bishop. There was no hesitation on the part of the pope, to whom his character and talents were well known, in confirming the nomination. At a later and recent period, at the solicitation of the Catholic clergy of his diocese, he was raised to the dignity of arch-bishop.

In the exercise of his sacred functions he displayed a spirit of conciliation, mildness and christian humility which greatly endeared him to those under his charge.

His manners and deportment in private life were a model of the clerical character; dignified yet simple, pious but not austere. This secured him the affectionate attachment of his friends and the respect of all.

In him religion assumed its most attractive and venerable form, and his character conciliated for the body over which he presided, respect and consideration from the liberal, the enlightened, and the virtuous of all ranks and denominations; for they saw that his life accorded with the benign doctrines of that religion which he professed.

The members of his own church, to whom he was in truth a guide and a father—who daily witnessed the kindness, the beneficence, and the tenderness of his heart—who in the purity of his doctrines and precepts saw the purity of his own unsullied character—who saw him on his death bed, with the meekness, the patience, and the cheerfulness of a saint and a martyr, view the sure and rapid approaches of his own dissolution; concerned not for himself, but anxious only for the welfare of those, whom he was soon to leave, will long remember him with the most profound, heartfelt grief, gratitude and veneration.

He taught us how to live—and oh, too high
The price of knowledge, taught us how to die.

Death, the terrors of which he had so often dispelled from the minds of others, had no power to disturb his serene and tranquil soul.

But long will his bereaved and disconsolate flock mourn the loss of him, who was the succour and support of the wretched; who, when this world could afford them nothing on which to lean, turned to him for consolation, as their spiritual father.

Long will the poor mourn for one, who always relieved their wants to the utmost extent of his means, and even extended his care of them beyond the bounds of his own existence.—They will long weep for him who watched and wept, who prayed and felt for all.

Those helpless orphan children, to whom he was indeed a father, and flocked around him dying to receive his last advice and blessing, may well weep, for their loss is irreparable.

His church may well mourn, for her loss is incalculable.

Jewish Manuscript.

CURIOUS AND UNIQUE MANUSCRIPT.

The literati are likely to be highly interested with an original, ancient and complete manuscript of the Pentateuch, now in the possession of Mr. Joseph Sams, of Darlington, Durham.

This original copy is of leather: it is in two volumes, about two feet wide, and measures 169 feet long! It is composed of goat-skin leather, and is most excellently dressed so as to have an exquisite softness to the touch. Each sheet of skin is divided into pages, five inches and a half in width. The letters are very large, and not only most excellently written, but ornamented with a number of Tagin or Coronac, which is a thing peculiar to the most ancient manuscripts. Each sheet of leather is stitched very neatly to the others with a kind of substance, in appearance not unlike cat-gut.

The antiquity of this manuscript may be inferred by its being written on leather, a circumstance which would hardly have taken place after the invention of vellum was made. It was recently procured from the continent under the most interesting circumstances. It is believed to be from 14 to 1500 years old; and in any case is the oldest copy of the law extant. There is reason to believe it has been above 800 years in one family, on the continent. It is well known to what a degree the Jews venerate their sacred books, and with what care they preserve them; it will, therefore, be believed, that nothing but the most afflicting and imperious circumstances could induce a family, loving their law, to part with a treasure so precious. During the calamities which followed the train of Bonaparte's wars, a Jewish family, of opulence, was reduced to utter ruin and compelled to emigrate. They came to Holland in their exile, and were there so reduced as to be obliged to pledge, as their last remaining resource, this manuscript of their law, under a limitation of a considerable time for its redemption. The time expired, the pledge was not redeemed, and the property was sold in Holland by the person who lent his money on it. This most valuable and antique performance is now likely to become a public benefit.

It has been preserved with the greatest care, in a rich cover, fringed with a fine silk and lined. The rollers, on which the manuscript runs, are beautiful mahogany or iron wood. It has been seen by a number of Hebrew scholars and Jews: the former always expressing a literary enthusiasm, and the latter treating it with the most solemn reverence. It has been collated by a very learned man, and its readings preferred to the most ancient copies we have; so that this may justly be thought to be unique, as well as most ancient copy of the five books of Moses in existence.

These facts naturally give birth to a few reflections. Is not such a manuscript a national object? Ought it not to be purchased for the British Museum, or the Universites of Oxford or Cambridge. There are many noblemen and literati would not scruple a most generous price, and for a generous price only its present possessor ought to be induced to part with it. The writer of this article having seen it, thinks, if he may hazard an opinion, that its least value must be 2000 guineas. Surely, such a national object ought not to be allowed to be in any private hands whatever; but either the universities, or some other public body, should purchase and place it, where under regular superintendence, it may be occasionally open to the learned, and to those who are curious for the accurate knowledge of all that pertains to the records of that wonderful people, the ancient Israelites.

The Jesuits in Russia.

From Bell's London Messenger, of Jan. 22.

IMPERIAL UKASE.

UKASE OF HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR TO THE SENATE.

Being returned after conclusion of the external affairs of Europe, to the empire which God has entrusted to us, we have been informed by several complaints and reports, of the following circumstances:

The religious order of the Jesuits of the Roman catholic church had been abolished by a bull of the pope. In consequence of this measure, the Jesuits were expelled not only from the states of the church, but from all other countries; they were not permitted to remain any where. Russia alone, constantly guided by sentiments of humanity and toleration, retained them in her territory, gave them an asylum, and insured them tranquility under her powerful protection. She did not oppose any obstacle to the free exercise of their worship; she did not deter them from it either by force, by persuasion, or seduction; but in return she thought she might expect from them fidelity, attachment, and utility. In this shape they were permitted to devote themselves to the education and instruction of youth.—Fathers and mothers entrusted to them their children without fear, to teach them the sciences and to form their manners. It is now proved that they have not fulfilled the duties which gratitude imposed on them, that they have not kept themselves in that humility which the christian religion commands, and that, instead of remaining peaceable inhabitants in a foreign country, they have endeavoured to trouble the Greek religion, which, from the remotest times has been the predominant religion of our empire, and on which, as on an immovable rock, repose the tranquility and the happiness of the nations subject to our sceptre; they have begun first by abusing the confidence which they had gained. They have turned aside from our worship young people who had been entrusted to them, and some women of weak and inconsiderate minds, and have drawn them to their church.

To induce a man to abjure his faith, the faith of his ancestors—to extinguish in him the love of those who profess the same worship—to render him a stranger to his country—to sow discord and animosity in families—to detach the brother from the brother, the son from the father, and the daughter from the mother—to excite divisions among the children of the same church—is that the voice and will of God, and his divine son Jesus Christ our Saviour, who shed for us his most pure blood "that we might live a peaceful and tranquil life, in all sort of piety and honesty?" After such actions, we are no longer surprised that the order of these monks has been removed from all countries, and no where tolerated. In fact, what state can suffer in its bosom those who spread in it hate and disorder? Constantly occupied in watching over the welfare of our faithful subjects, and considering it as a wise and sacred duty to stop the evil in its origin, that it may not grow to maturity and produce bitter fruits—We have, in consequence, resolved to ordain—

1. That the catholic church, which is here, be again re-established upon the footing in which it was during the reign of our grand-mother of glorious memory, the empress Catharine II. and till the year 1800

2. To make all the monks of the order of the Jesuits, immediately to quit St. Petersburg.

3. To forbid them to enter our two capitals.

We have given particular orders to our ministers of police and public instruction for the prompt execution of this determination, and for all that concerns the house and institution hitherto occupied by the Jesuits. At the same time, and that there may be no interruption in the divine service, we have ordered the metropolitan of the Roman catholic church to cause the Jesuits to be replaced by priests of the same religion who are now here, till the arrival of monks of another catholic order, whom we have sent for, for that purpose.

ALEXANDER.

The director of the department, SOURGUINOFF.

The Jesuits are expelled from Petersburg for having abused the asylum and protection afforded them—for having endeavoured to disturb the established religion of the state—for having attempted to make proselytes, and for sowing dissension in private families. "After such actions," says the ukase, "we are no longer surprised that the order of the monks has been removed from all the countries, and no where tolerated. In fact, what state can suffer in its bosom those who spread in it hate and disorder?" This ukase, for the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Russian capital, affords a singular contrast to the papal decree or bull, by which the necessity of the restoration of the order is enforced.

Learning owes much to the indefatigable studies and researches of the Jesuits. But the benefits which they conferred in this respect were done away by that spirit of proselytism which introduced discord into private families, set father in open hostility to son, daughter to mother, wife to husband, and proceeded upon that impious and presumptuous doctrine, that none could be saved who were out of their creed. "To worship God," said corporal Trim, "according to the religion of our fathers, seems to be the safest and most natural way." "I think so too," cried my uncle Toby. "None can be saved," thundered out Dr. Slop, "but those who are of the true Catholic faith." "God only knows," replied my uncle Toby, with meekness, "who are to be saved, but I trust if it should be found we have done our duty to our neighbor, the protestant will find favor in the sight of God equally with the Catholic." "Heresy! impiety!" cried Doctor Slop, "True religion," said my Father

National Poetry.

DEFENCE OF FORT M'HENRY.

The annexed song was composed under the following circumstances.—A gentleman had left Baltimore in a flag of truce for the purpose of getting released from the British fleet, a friend of his who had been captured at Marlborough.—He went as far as the mouth of the Patuxent, and was not permitted to return lest the intended attack on Baltimore should be disclosed. He was therefore brought up the Bay to the mouth of the Patapsco, where the flag vessel was kept under the guns of a frigate, and he was compelled to witness the bombardment of Fort M'Henry, which the admiral had boasted that he would carry in a few hours, and that the city must fall. He watched the flag of the fort through the whole day with an anxiety that can be better felt than described, until the night prevented him from seeing it. In the night he watched the bomb-shells, and at early dawn his eye was still greeted by the proudly waving flag of his country.

Tune—ANACREON IN HEAVEN.

O! say can you see by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hail'd at the twilight's last gleaming,
Whose broad stripes and bright stars through the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watch'd, were so gallantly streaming?
And the rockets' red glare, the bombs bursting in air,
Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there;
O! say does that star-spangled banner yet wave,
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave?

On that shore dimly seen through the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,
What is that which the breeze, o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, half conceals, half discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected now shines in the stream,
'Tis the star-spangled banner, O! long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

And where is that land who so vauntingly swore
That the havoc of war and the battle's confusion,
A home and a country, should leave us no more?
Their blood has wash'd out their foul footsteps' pollution.
No refuge could save the hireling and slave,
From the terror of flight or the gloom of the grave,
And the star-spangled banner in triumph doth wave,
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave.

O! thus be it ever when freemen shall stand,
Between their lov'd home, and the war's desolation,
Blest with vict'ry and peace, may the heav'n rescued land,
Praise the power that hath made and preserved us a nation!
Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto—"In God is our trust;"
And the star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave,
O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave.

THE PILLAR OF GLORY.

By EDWARD C. HOLLAND, of Charleston, S. C.

For which was awarded a medal of the value of one hundred dollars.

Hail to the heroes whose triumphs have brighten'd
The darkness which shrouded America's name;
Long shall their valor in battle the lightn'd
Live in the brilliant escutcheon of fame;
Dark when the torrens flow,
And the rude tempests blow,
The stormy-clad spirit of Albion raves;
Long shall she mourn the day,
When, in the vengeful fray,
Liberty walk'd like a God on the waves.

The ocean, ye chiefs, (the region of glory,
Where fortune has destin'd Columbia to reign)
Gleams with the halo and lustre of story,
That curls round the waves as the scene of her fame;
There on the raging tide,
Shall her proud navy ride,
The bulwark of freedom protected by heav'n;
There shall her haughty foe,
Bow to her prowess low,
There shall renown to her heroes be giv'n.

The pillar of glory, the sea that enlightens,
 Shall last till eternity rocks on its base,
 The splendor of fame, its waters that brightens,
 Shall light the footsteps of time in its race:
 Wide o'er the stormy deep,
 Where the rude surges sweep,
 In lustre shall cick the brows of the brave;
 Honor shall give it light,
 Triumph shall keep it bright,
 Long as in battle we meet on the wave.

Already the storm of contention has hurld
 From the grasp of old England the trident of war,
 Th' beams of our stars have illumind the world,
 Unfurld, our standard beats proud in the air;
 Wild glares the eagle's eye,
 Swift as he cuts the sky,
 Marking the wake where our heroes advance;
 Compass'd with rays of light,
 Hovers h' o'er the fight;
 Albion is heartless and stoops to his glance.

FROM THE BOSTON PATRIOT.

Our country, our fathers—our firesides and lives,
 Our ancestors' altars, our friends and our wives;
 For these we are fighting, for these our heart's blood
 Shall blush through the ocean, and mount up to God.
 Come away, then away, to the roar of the wave,
 Where death, rob'd in thunder, peals the song of
 the brave.

Descended from heroes, our souls of pure flame,
 The heirs and the guardians of WASHINGTON's fame;
 In battle his spirit smiles on us with pride;
 And the pray'r that we breathe, is—"a grave at his side."

Come, brothers, away, join the roar of the wave, Where death, rob'd in thunder, peals the song of
 the brave.

Remember how dear independence was bought;
 Remember the days when our forefathers fought;
 In the seas, on the hill-tops, their honor'd bones lie,
 Who with garlands of glory, greet LAWRENCE on high.

Then, brothers, away, join the roar of the wave,
 Where death, rob'd in thunder, peals a song to
 the brave.

Hark! the groans from the sea, as they launch to his grave,

The hero, whose blood ting'd the foam of the wave;
 'Tis the sigh of his crew, as they mourn round his bier;

'Tis the drop of the heart, as it melts to a tear.
 Then, brothers, away, join the roar of the wave,
 Where death, rob'd in thunder, peals the song of
 the brave.

From the wood thrills a shriek—'tis the mother laid low;

O God! snatch the child from the murderer's bow;
 Already the red knife now recks through their hair;
 Already—has ceased—the loud shrieks of despair.

Then, brothers, away, join the roar of the wave,
 Where death, rob'd in thunder, peals the song of
 the brave.

Can the brave sleep in peace while beauty is sighing?
 Can the brave sleep in peace while their brothers are dying.

While the cries of the infants are on the gale swelling
 And the allies of hell thro' the wilderness yelling?
 Then, brothers, away, join the roar of the wave,
 With death, rob'd in thunder, peal the song of
 the brave.

The signal—to action—an oath, and a pray'r;
 All sheeted in lightning—Jo! Lawrence is there!
 The battle loud rages—still louder that shriek—
 'Mid the cannon's deaf roaring, the infants' tears speak.

To victory then—join the roar of the wave,
 Where death, rob'd in thunder, peals the song of
 the brave.

Tune—"The Pillar of Glory."

Written for the celebration of the 4th of July, 1814, by E. C. HOLLAND, Esq. of Charleston, S. C.

Swell the proud Pæan! the day-star advances,
 Whose glories the triumph of Freedom proclaim,
 Long may the lustre around it that glances,
 Lead us to liberty, commerce and fame.

Bright from the billows foam,
 Girt with a starry zone,
 Thy genius Columbia, sublimely aspires,
 Stern as her eagle eye,
 Ranges through earth and sky,
 Lightens its glare with more radiant fires.

Bold were the spirits thy rights that defended,
 When rock'd with the whirlwind the waves of thy deep,

Fierce was the conflict—the battle was ended,
 And silent and long was the warrior's sleep.
 Fair bloom'd the forest wild,
 Peace through the valley smil'd,
 No more howl'd the tempest, the war-song was hush'd
 Sound then the trump of fame,
 Blest be each hero's name,
 Fearless of death, in the contest that rush'd.

Dauntless in courage, they rose in the foray,
 Refulgent as stars o'er the billowy main,
 Washington marshal'd the chieftains to glory,
 And shone o'er the host, like a pillar of flame.
 Back from thy shores afar,
 Roll'd the rude storm of war,
 The tempest-tost ark, found its mount of repose,
 Free as thy flag unfurld
 Wide o'er the western world,
 Liberty dawn'd—and America rose.

Land of my fathers—resplendent with glory,
 Thy genius shall rise o'er the ruin of time,
 Immortal thy fame, thou shalt live in the story,
 Splendid in peace—and in battle sublime!

Hark, from each rocky height,
 Dashes the tide of fight,
 The noise of the battle hath waken'd the brave,
 Proud as thy banner flies,
 Millions with ardor rise,
 Thy realm from invasion and insult to save.

Red through the shadows that darken thy fountains,
 Again like a meteor the war beacon streams,
 Deep are the thunders that roll from thy mountains,
 Martial the lustre on ocean that gleams.

Stamp'd on thy native sea,
 Offspring of liberty,
 Thy footsteps are brighten'd with triumph and fame,
 High o'er the waste of war,
 Blazons thy naval car,
 Ocean is free—and its freedom we claim
 Charleston, S. C. 31 May, 1814.

MR. SOUTHWICK—In the course of the debate in the house of assembly, on the propositions of the Hartford Convention, for amending the constitution, I heard Mr. ALLEN, of Rensselaer county, declare, that we had gained nothing but disgrace by the late war, &c. Not agreeing with Mr. Allen in his view of the subject, I have taken the liberty of making a song, to shew my opinion that we have gained laurels instead of disgrace in the late contest. It is a parody upon a late elegant effusion from Messrs. Websters' press, entitled "James Madison my Joe, Jim," and which the Websterians have so much admired. By giving it a place, you will oblige

A CONSTANT READER.

Brother Jonathan's Epistle to John Bull.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, I wonder what you mean,
Are you on foreign conquest bent, or what ambitious scheme?
Ah! list to brother Jonathan, your fruitless plans forego, Remain on your 'fast-anchor'd isle,' oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, don't come across the main,
Our fathers bled and suffer'd John, our freedom to maintain.
And him who in the cradle, John, repell'd the ruthless foe,
Provoke not when to manhood grown, oh Johnny Bull my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, your Pencocks keep at home,
And ne'er let British seamen in a Frock hither come;
For we've Hornets and we've Wasps, John, who, as you doubtless know,
Carry stingers in their tails, oh! Johnny Bull my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, you've prond and haughty grown,
The ocean is a highway, which you falsely call your own,
And Columbus's sons are valiant, John, nor fear to face the foe,
And never yield to equal force, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

When I name our naval heroes John, oh! hear old England's groans—

There's Bainbridge, Porter, Blakely, Decatur, Hull and Jones;
And while for gallant Lawrence, our grateful tears shall flow,
We never will give up the ship, oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, off Erie's distant shore,
See how the battle rages, and loud the cannons roar;
But Perry taught our seamen to crush the assailing foe—
He "met and made them ours," oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, behold on Lake Champlain,
With more than equal force John, you tried your fist again;
But the cock saw how 'twas going, and cried cock-a-doodle-do,
And Macdonough was victorious, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Your soldiers on the land, John, on that eventful day,
Mark'd the issue of the conflict—and then they ran away;
And Macomb would have Burgoyne'd John, your governor Prevo;
But ah! he was too nimble, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, in night attacks and day,
We've drove you from fort Erie—flogg'd you at Chippewa;
There's Porter, Brown and Ripley—Scott and Gaines to face the foe,

And they use the bayonet freely, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

What tho' at Washington, a base, marauding band,
Our monuments of art, John, destroy'd with ruthless hand;
Oh! 'twas a savage warfare, John, beneath a generous foe,
And brings the most disgrace on you, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, don't send your Cochranes o'er—
Few places are "assailable" on this our native shore;
And we'll leave our homes and firesides John, and crush the rep-til-ile foe,
That dares pollute our natal soil, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, when all your schemes had fail'd,
To wipe away the stigma, John, for New-Orleans you sail'd;
But heavier woes await thee John, for Jackson meets the foe,
Whose name and fame's immortal, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, your Pakenham's no more,
The blood of your invincibles crimson on our native shore—
No Hampton scenes are here, John, to greet a savage foe, Nor "body"—no, nor "beauty," oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Oh! Johnny Bull, my Joe John, your heroes keep at home,
In high spirits they came hither, but they're carried back in rums;
You say your sons are valiant, John, I grant they may be so,
But more valiant are our yankee boys, oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

Your schemes to gather laurels here, I guess were badly plann'd, We've whipp'd you on the ocean, John, we've lather'd you on land,

Then hie thee to Old England, John, your fruitless plans forego,
And haste to thy "fast-anchor'd isle," oh Johnny Bull, my Joe.

The following one was written by a young lady of this town, for the republican celebration at Lexington, Mass. on the 4th of July, and was sung in the meeting-house, by Mrs. Rowson. It is an elegant and tasteful composition, and deserves the praise of combining noble sentiments with harmonious poetry.—Box. pap.

Hail! to the birth of America's glory,
Her genius sounds loudly the trumpet of fame;
Children, their parents, and grandfathers hoary
Exult in the valor which purchas'd that name;
Her heroes have fought again,
Truth and justice to maintain,
Against foreign insult, menace and scorn;
Baltimore and Orleans free,
Have raised the shout of victory,
And offered new gems her temple to adorn.

Supreme are the joys this day will afford ye,
For Freedom has gathered green bays for each son;
Brothers made captive for vengeance implor'd thee,
And wept with delight at the battles you won:

A firm and united band,
Freed by your valiant hand,
No tyrant shall force them from liberty's tree;
With grateful emotion,
They offer devotion
To the God who protects them on land and by sea.

Who would exchange for a traitor's reflection,
The pride of the freeman who bled in our cause?
Whose prowess releas'd from disgraceful restriction
A country directed by virtue's best laws:

Their praise shall abound again,
From Europe's wildest glen,
For honor and mercy rejoice in their fame;
While carnage and plunder,
Have mark'd British thunder,
And tarnish'd what lustre might circle her name.

Our statesmen with wisdom have govern'd the nation
Avenging the wrongs which their country endur'd;
To freedom they offer'd a grateful oblation,
And peace by their judgment have firmly secur'd:

Our ships now securely ride,
Over ocean's swelling tide,
Protected by the banner they proudly display;
Ne'er shall it be seen to wave,
Guardian of that sordid slave,
Who, bought by foreign gold, shuns this auspicious day.

The genius of Columbia a laurel wreath bears,
For the heroes whose courage her power maintains,
Yet a crown of fresh cypress she mournfully wears,
For the loss which her children but recent sustains:

Blest shade of departed worth,
Smile on your nation's mirth,
O'er clouded by grief, for the statesman we mourn:
Sure GENY in realms above,
Will share in our anxious love,
For the country he cherish'd, but ne'er can rejoin.

This spot, which first witness'd Columbia's commotion,

Exhorts us to equal in valor and truth,
What we hallow this day with grateful emotion;
The mem'ry of champions who guarded our youth:
Here Lawrence, Burrowes, Allen's shades,
And those who fought on freedom's glades,
Unite with the spirits of seventy-five;
To receive the just praises,
Of their country, which raises
Their fame to the portals of Heaven's archive.

From the Port Folio—NAVAL SONG.

Sons of the deep! ye spirits brave,
 Whose victories saved a nation's fame;
 From whom the rulers of the wave
 First learn'd the pangs of fear and shame.
 To you the goblet's flowing free,
 To you we fill where'er you roam,
 Whether you brave the stormy sea,
 Or dare the thunderer in his home!

Skilful and bold, by labor nurst,
 By honor taught, by hardship tried;
 In danger and in glory first,
 Your country's hope, her joy, her pride!
 To your loved manes, ye gallant few,
 Our souls the song of triumph raise,
 And future years shall swell for you
 The fondly lingering notes of praise.

Long may your flag its lustre shed
 O'er the wild waters of the main;
 Long may the laurel crown your head,
 And never, never, wear a stain!
 To you, with soul-enamouring beam,
 Dear woman's magic eye shall turn;
 Your deeds shall be the sage's theme,
 And o'er the story youth shall burn.

JOVE'S EAGLE.—TUNE, "General Wolfe."
 The synod of gods were assembled in state,
 Conven'd in the regions above,
 When Phoebus arising began the debate,
 And thus he address'd father Jove:

O father! as lately the coursers of day
 Descended the road in the west,
 All faint and exhausted, I paus'd in my way,
 To give them refreshment and rest.

Looking down where the blue rolling ocean extends,
 Where once lay the region of night:
 Lo! full on my view a large continent bends
 Ne'er seen by the beams of my light.

From hence mighty rivers and lakes I survey'd,
 The trees on their margin that grow;
 And mountains projecting, such grandeur of shade,
 They frown on Olympus below.

My course was so rapid I caught but a glance,
 For I had delayed my career,
 My steeds would have check'd sister Dian's advance,
 That season to mortals so dear.

Then wing-footed Hermes the throne thus address'd:
 O father! now listen to me:
 This eagle I found while exploring the west,
 And here I present him to thee.

Jove said, while the bird on his sceptre had sprung,
 How stately! how noble his air!
 Now fain would I see if an eagle so young,
 In triumph my thunder can bear.

The bird seiz'd the bolt and resplendant he flew,
 While the gods all beheld in amaze;
 While calmly he sailed through the regions of blue,
 And bore in his talons the blaze.

See Neptune, cries Jove, how he flashes along,
 Now o'er thine empire he flies;
 From ocean is dash'd a refulgence so strong
 The lustre ascends to the skies.

He bears in his talons my thunder so well,
 'Tis a present I cannot decline;
 Henceforth let all those on Olympus who dwell
 Know the bird of the west shall be mine.

Then blue-ey'd Minerva accosted the throne;
 Thy justice shall mortals arraign;
 Thy herald is seen in thy thunders alone,
 And man will indignant complain.

Let mercy and justice thine attributes prove,
 And thus be their union express'd;
 The olive of Pallas and thunder of Jove
 Be borne by the bird of the west!

With brim-flowing nectar these words they approve,
 And this was the words they express'd:
 The olive of Pallas and thunder of Jove,
 And here's to the bird of the west!

The following lines were occasioned by a fact which actually occurred not long since, where the scene is laid, and is so highly characteristic of John Bull and Brother Jonathan, that you may perhaps consider the truth and humor of the subject deserving publicity. Rep. Adv.

A TRUE STORY.

On the plains of New-Jersey, one hot summer's day,
 Two Englishmen, snug in a coach, were vap'ring;
 A Yankee, who happened to travel that way,
 Took a seat alongside, and sat wond'ring & gaping.

Chock full of importance, like every true Briton,
 Who knows British stars far outshine our poor luna;
 These cockneys found nothing their optics to hit on,
 But what was insipid or miserably puny.

Compared with the English, our horses were colts,
 Our oxen but goats—and sheep but a lamb;
 And the people! (poor blockades) such pitiful dolts!
 Mere Hottentot children, contrasted with them!

Just then a black cloud in the west was ascending,
 The lightning flashed frequent, with horrible glare;
 While near & more near, a fierce tempest portending
 The thunder rebelled along the rent air.

An oak, by the way side, Jove's bolt made a dash on,
 With a peal that knock'd horses & cockneys all flat;
 There, hang you! cries Jonathan, quite in a passion,
 Have you got better thunder in England than that?

¶ The following original anecdote, which has been told to the editor of the WEEKLY REGISTER, so happily follows up the spirit of the preceding, that we gladly take the present occasion to insert it—

A young American who had been in London several weeks, was one day dining at the house of a merchant with a large party, where the conversation turned upon the relative merits of things in England and America, when it was modestly determined that there was nothing, whether of the product of nature or art, in the latter, that could be compared with like things in the former. The Yankee, being alone, entered but little into the dispute—however, it so happened, that as it was nearly finished, the sun made its appearance—on which he arose from the table and taking up his hat, gave three cheers, to the great alarm of the company. On an anxious enquiry "what was the matter?"—he said—"nothing—only that he had not seen his countryman so long that he could not help greeting his unexpected appearance!"

BATTLE OF NEW-ORLEANS.

From a London paper.

'TIS NIGHT! The combat's rage is o'er,
The watch fires blaze from hill to hill,
The bugle note is heard no more,
But all is solemn, hush'd and still!
Save when some faint and mournful tone,
Swells on the midnight breeze a dying moan.

How chang'd the scene, where morn beheld
A gallant host in bright array;
While martial notes exulting swell'd,
To cheer the brave on danger's way;
And hope and valor bade the pulse beat high,
Thrill'd the warm heart, and fir'd the kindling eye.

Now the pale beams by moonlight shed,
A field of blood disclose,
Where on their chill and lowly bed,
The martyr'd brave repose,
And the dead calm, the desolate suspense,
With nameless horror chill the shuddering sense.

Thousands are here who sprang to arms,
When the shrill clarion peal'd the strain,
By danger's call, or glory's charms,
Ne'er to be rous'd again:
E'en now, while shades and stillness reign,
A viewless band are near—the spirits of the slain.

Whence came that deep tremendous sound
Whence broke that flash intensely bright,
Bursting the midnight calm profound?
A cannon peal disturbs the night!
'Tis past, and deeper is the gloom,
And all again is silent as the tomb.

Glancing by fits on shiver'd steel,
A quiv'ring light the moon beams throw,
And through the broken clouds reveal
Full many a sight of death and woe;
Gleaming on pallid forms around,
Stretch'd on the soldier's bier, the cold and dewy ground.

Midnight and death o'er all the soil,
A fearful deep repose have spread;
Worn with long hours of martial toil,
The living slumber with the dead,
Nor hear the wounded faintly sigh,
Nor dream of those who round them bleed and die!

Rest, slumberers rest! the morn shall wake,
And ye to arms again shall rise!
Your sleep the clarion call shall break,
And life and hope shall fire your eyes.
But oh! what thousands strew the battle plain,
Whom day spring ne'er shall wake, nor war note rouse again.

SONG.

Composed by Mr. John M. Creery, of Petersburg, Virginia, and sung at that place on the fourth of July, 1815.

No more the loud tones of the trumpet resound,
No more the war-bugle's wild notes strike the ear;
Our warriors return from the battle renown'd,
To the bosom of friendship and families dear.
Mild peace round her flings
Balmy sweets from her wings,
The welkin with echoes of happiness rings;
Come, toast our brave heroes, and swear this great day
We will hand down in glory till time pass away.

The Briton enrag'd, has proclaim'd in his pride,
To erase the strong fabric our sires had erected;
To pollute the fair fame for which millions have died,
To destroy freedom's temple, by freemen protected.
Boasting loud o'er the wave,
Come his Wellingtons brave,
Ah! who shall the green tree of liberty save?
Mark the Eagle of freedom, his banners unfurled,
His eye on the sun, while suspense chains the world.

From a thousand ships pouring, his conquerors of France,
Debouch on our plains in the dread pomp of war;
Confiding in conquest they gaily advance,
Their deep-mouth'd artillery thunders afar;
Near Niagara's roar,
The parched earth drank their gore,
Our heroes their laurels triumphantly tore.
Brown, Scott, Gaines and Ripley, their falchions raised high,
Their resolve—"we will conquer or gloriously die."

See the sons of the west, like a dark cloud of night,
With eagerness forth from their deep forests throng;
Their death-tubes of terror prepar'd for the fight,
Like their own Mississippi, impetuous and strong;
Tis Jackson who leads
Them to glorious deeds,
Where the vaunting invader in agony bleeds;
Come, toast then our heroes, we swear this great day,
We will hand down in glory till time pass away.

From the Columbian.

Mr. Holt—Sir, the following parody (if it can be so called) on the American Star, was written by two Journeymen ship carpenters, during their short stay at Sacket's Harbor, after hearing the news of peace at that place. If you think it worth inserting in your paper, you will much oblige a
A constant reader.

I.

Come strike up an anthem the war dogs cease howling,
Already they eagerly flee o'er the plain;
The red cloud of war o'er our land's no more scowling;
Soft peace views the scene and returns once again.
The infant now smiling is clasp'd by its mother,
The youth sheaths his sword and for pleasure prepares;
While beauty smiles sweetly on lovers and brothers,
Who have crowned with laurels the American stars.

II.

At the loud sound of peace let all cowards awaken,
Who dreaded the rifle and cannon's deep roar,
No more with pale fear or faint doubting be shaken,
The foes hostile foot treads no more on our shore.
No more unprotected the female's left weeping,
Insulted by ruffians or dragg'd to despair;
Behold from our frontier the Briton retreating, Dismay'd by the brilliant American Star.

III.

The spirit of Lawrence, of Pike, and of Burrows,
Look down from the Heavens with aspect serene:
Come sailors, and soldiers, a tear for those heroes,
Rejoicing they'll see us in peace once again;
To us the high boon by the Gods has been granted,
To spread the glad tidings of liberty far;
When thousands invaded, we met them undaunted,
And fought and defended the American Star.

IV.

Your hands, then, dear comrades, round liberty's altar,
United we've fought by the side of the brave;
If any were found in the contest to falter,
Their weakness we'll pity—'tis all they can crave.
Then, freeman, return to your homes with assurance,
The Lion of Britain is driven afar;
No more he'll invade, or with baneful influence,
Invite the fell savage to tarnish our Star.

NAVAL SONG.

Charge the can cheerily.

Now coil up your nonsense 'bout England's great navy,
And take in your slack about oak hearted tars;
For frigates as stout, and as gallant crews have we;
Or how came her Macedon decked with our stars?
Yes, how came her Guerriers, her Peacocks and Java,
All sent broken riddled to old Davy, of late?
How came it, why, split me! than Britons we'er braver;
And that shall they feel, too, whenever we meet.

Then charge the can cheerily,
Send it round merrily,
Here's to our country and captains commanding;
To all who inherit,
Of Lawrence the spirit,
Disdaining to strike while a stick is left standing.

Nay, if unwar's we should run (a fresh gale in) Close in with a squadron, we'd laugh at 'em all;
We'd tip mast'r Bull such a sample of sailing,
As should cause him to fret like a pig in a squall.
We'd show the vain boaster of numbers superior,
Though he and his slaves at the notion may sneer,
In skill, as in courage, to us they're inferior,
For the longer they chase us, the less we've to fear.

Then charge the can, &c.
But should a razor be espied ahead nearly,
To tickle her we'd crowd ev'ry stitch we could make;
Down chests, and up hammocks, would heave away cheerily,
And ready for action would be in a shake.
For her swaggering cut through, and metal not caring,
Till up with her close should our fire be withheld,
Then pour'd in so hot that her mangled crew fearing
A trip to the bottom, should speedily yield.

Then charge the can, &c.
Britannia, although she beleaguers our coast now,
The dread of our wives, and our sweethearts as well,
Of ruling the waves, has less reason to boast now,
As Dacres, and Cayden, and Whyniates can tell.
Enrolled in our annals live Hull and De Catur,
Jones, Lawrence and Bainbridge, Columbia's pride;
The pride of our navy, which, sooner or later,
Shall on the wide ocean triumphantly ride.

THE IRON GREYS.

A patriotic ode—Tune "Adams and Liberty."
"Pro bono Patria!"

HARK! the trumpet of war calls the sons of the brave;
Descendants of sires deemed immortal in story,
Your fathers appeal from the vest of the grave,
To preserve from corrosion their laurels of glory.
Arise in your might—Snatch the wreath from the blight,
The garland of Fame, won by valor in fight,
On the altar of freedom your offerings raise,
Inspired by the blessing, be warmed by the blaze.

Let us merge in one feeling of generous stamp,
Every private concern and all party distinction;
Let each breast be a fortress, our country a camp,
And indignantly foil every hostile pretension.
Arouse! one and all; hear the patriot call,
"United we stand, and divided we fall!"

From a Vandal invasion, or a Sarsen grave, Preserve for your sons what your forefathers gave.

'Gainst your liberties foes, be your banners unfurled,
To spurn from your shores every foot of invasion;
From aggression secure the young hope of the world,
And as firm as your hills, fix the rights of the nation.
While yankee blood warms, we heed no alarms,
If true to ourselves, let the world come in arms;
The slumbering Hercules rous'd by the shock,
Will prove to the world his legitimate stock.

Will the sons of Columbia, inert and supine,
See their cities in flames, and their temples degraded?
Will liberty's heirs basely fly from her shrine,
When their homes are attacked and their fire-sides invaded?
Disgrace! whom the slave! in oblivion's wave,
Who will not support on the verge of his grave,
His honor, his freedom, his country's fair fame,
Involute from insult, untarnished with shame.

Be firm, be united, resolved to maintain,
Those gifts which alone make this life worth possessing,
Your foes will retire from a contest so vain,
Your struggles be crowned by your God with his blessing,
Then brandish your steel, and to heaven appeal,
Let your insolent foe-men discomfited feel,
How mighty your strength when by wisdom arrayed,
How majestic your power when in union displayed.

All hail to the hand, who, like Spartans, have joined Heart and hand, to repel the assaults of aggression,
Inspired by one soul and informed by one mind,
They will check by their deeds, the 'roids of oppression.
May glory embaze in the liveliest rays,
The patriotic skill of the true "Iron Greys,"
And gratitude, honor, the worth of the brave,
With a wreath for his brow or a tear for his grave.

SONG.

Written for the anniversary of American Independence.
(July 4th, 1815)—by BENJAMIN GRASSO, ESQ.

Tune—Battle of the Nile.

Rejoice, rejoice! Columbia's sons rejoice!
Blest be the Day, which gave your freedom birth;
Rejoice, rejoice! Columbia's sons rejoice!
And let your songs resound throughout the earth.
For our eagle in mid heaven (fla'd in brilliant story)
Sears in effulgence amidst constellat'd glory;
And the records of your fame,
All triumphantly proclaim—
And the records of your fame,
All triumphantly proclaim—

Columbia—brave Columbia's sons immortaliz'd shall be.

Chorus.

Huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza, boys.
Freedom's sacred temple—impair'd in grand display:
Huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza, boys,
'Tis Columbia's—bless'd Columbia's natal day.

All hail the Day of grateful Independence;
Liberty secured from veng'ful war's alarms;
Freedom's great charter, with benefits immense,
Render'd better and glory to your arms.
For Washington, in triumph, led forth your troops to battle;
Exalted were their deeds, on the field, where dangers hurtle;
While the genius of your sage,
Reproduced the golden age,
While, &c.

And Washington, great Washington immortaliz'd shall be.
Chorus—Huzza, &c.

The storm of war again afflicts our nation,
Our freedom intrud'—our rights impair'd and foil'd;
But our heroes of the land, the lakes and the ocean,
Triumphantly the enemy dispos'd!
For though great as were the sins of Britannia—offending—
And dark low'd the tempest—our destinies impending;
Yet the battle of Champlain,
And the battles on the main,
Yet, &c.

With Jackson, gallant Jackson's fame, immortaliz'd shall be.
Chorus—Huzza, &c.

Charge, charge—a health—the pledge of love and honor,
(White-cliff'd Albion her royal crimes atones.)
To Hull, De Catur, Bainbridge and McDonough,
Perry, Porter, Rodgers, Burrows, Lawrence, Jones,
For Britannia no more Neptune's trident now retaining;
The commerce of the world, with pride and power enchaining;
Succumb, in hopeless frowns!
To our Jacksons, Scotts, and Browns,
Succumb &c.

To our land and naval heroes—who immortaliz'd shall be.
Chorus—Huzza, &c.

Great was the day—illustrious and glorious,
Laurels entwining the olive branch of peace;
Our veterans in arms, o'er all their foes victorious,
The war trumpet's clangor, and toils of battle cease:
Now the genius of Columbia all her rights regaining,
The patriot's "flaming sword" her liberties maintaining,
And with honor, joy and pride,
Stars and stripes on every tide,
And with &c.

Exalted, like her Eagle, bright and glorious shall be.
Chorus—Huzza, &c.

Columbia, thus in majesty supreme,
Rise in thy strength, and in grandeur spread thy fame;
On all thy foes in vengeful terrors glan,
But in peace blend sweet friendship with thy name.
For glorious, midst the nations, surrounding and admiring,
With virtue, science, arts—ambitiously aspiring,
Independence be our joy,
Our affections to employ,
Independence, &c.

And Columbia, fla'd Columbia thus immortaliz'd shall be.
Chorus—Huzza, &c.

FROM CONNELL'S REGISTER.

"War in Disguise" or, an Apology for His Majesty's Service.

One Stephen, a Lawyer, and one a Reporter,
Of War and of Taxes a gallant supporter,
In some way or other to Welfare kin,
And a Member, like him, for a Borough brought in,
Who a Master in Chancery since has been made,
Wrote a Pamphlet to shew, that Jonathan's TRADE,
Which was then carried on, on all parts of the sea,
In Bread, Meat and Clothing, and Sugar and Tea,
Was a "War in Disguise" which, though strange, at first sight,
Events have since prov'd may have been but too right;
For, when Carleen the ship of the Yankee De Catur,
Attack'd, without doubting to take her, or beat her,
A frigate she seem'd to his glass and his eyes,
But, when taken herself, how great his surprise,
To find her "A seventy-four in disguise!"
If Jonathan, thus, has the art of disguising,
That he captures our ships is by no means surprising;
And it can't be disgraceful to strike to an Eli,
Who is more than a match for the Devil himself.

PUSH.

Washington City, January 9, 1816.

The representation in congress from Pennsylvania, and a number of other gentlemen from that state, yesterday gave a dinner at McKeown's Hotel, to commodores Decatur and Stewart and captain Biddle, of the United States' navy, all citizens of that commonwealth. Among the songs given on the occasion, was the following composed and sung by Dr. Darlington, and received with unbounded applause by the company.

YANKEE TARS.

TUNE—"Mrs. Casey."

Whene'er the tyrants of the main,
Assault Columbian seamen,
They'll find them ready to maintain
The noble name of freemen.

Chorus—Then toast the brave, for they will save
Columbia's fame from sinking;
The honor'd scars of Yankee Tars
Are glorious themes for drinking.

Too long our Tars have borne, in peace,
With British domineering;
But now they've sworn the trade shall cease—
For vengeance they are steering.
Then toast, &c.

First gallant HULL, he was the lad,
Who sailed a tyrant-hunting;
And swagg'ring Dacres soon was glad
To strike to "striped Bunting."
Then toast, &c.

Intrepid JONES next boldly sought
The demons of oppression;
With a superior force he fought,
And gave the knaves a threshing!
Then toast, &c.

Then quickly met our nation's eyes
The noblest sight in nature—
A first-rate frigate, as a prize,
Brought in by brave DECATUR.
Then toast, &c.

And daring LAWRENCE next parades,
From zone to zone he sought 'em:
One boasting Briton he blockades,
And sends one to the bottom.
Then toast, &c.

Next see our gallant Enterprize,
How nobly ocean rocks her!
There BURROWS for his country dies—
But first subdues the Boxer.
Then toast, &c.

With loud applauses next we greet
The glorious news from Eric—
Behold! a powerful British fleet
Submits to gallant PERRY.
Then toast, &c.

Then WARRINGTON, his country's pride,
Sails boldly forth to serve her;
And quickly humbled, by his side,
We see the fierce Epervier!
Then toast, &c.

From noble BLAKELEY's dauntless force,
His vanquish'd foes in vain steer:
For he could stop the Acon's course,
And overhaul the Reindeer!
Then toast, &c.

MDONOUGH! hero of Champlain,
Next proved that British seamen,
With Yankee Tars contend in vain—
Because those tars are Freemen.
Then toast, &c.

With "Ironsides" brave STEWART slips
To sea, on her third cruise, sir,
And tired of flogging single ships,
She drubs them now by two's, sir!
Then toast, &c.

The Penguin next, with her vain crew,
Thought she to strike, would scorn it;
She sought a Wasp—but found in lieu,
Our BIDDLE, and his Hornet!

Then toast, &c.
Our Yankee Tars, to Afric's shore,
Our heroes, lastly, lead 'em—
And Turkish banners bow before
The starry flag of Freedom.

Then toast, &c.
Come push the flowing bowl around,
And in Columbia's story,
Long may such gallant names abound,
To vindicate her glory!

Then toast the brave, for they will save
Columbia's fame from sinking;
The honor'd scars of Yankee Tars:
Are glorious themes for drinking.

A PARODY ON WALTER SCOTT:

BY—I WONDER WHO?

On quarter-deck lord Dacres stood,
And saw the Constitution good;
Then boldly called to men below,
"To quarters! here's the Yankee foe."
Through all the ship was heard the tone
Of whistle shrill by boatswain blown.
The Yankee colors he could ken,
And see the backwood Irishmen;
And banners too with stripes and stars,
At the mast-heads appear:
While glistening through the ropes and spars,
Shine many pike and spear.
To back and guard the gunners band,
Lord Dacres' sailors were at hand,
A hardy race in Albion bred,
With jackets blue and nightcaps red,
Arrayed beneath the banner tall,
That streamed triumphant o'er the Gaul;
Marines too shouting in disorder,
Cried, "noble lord Dacres! you'll see how we'll board her."

Now every English eye intent,
On Yankee stars and stripes was bent;
So near they were that each might know,
A pistol ball could through him go.
"Come on my boys," fierce Dacres cried,
"For soon this flag, Britannia's pride,
That swept the Dutchmen from the sea,
And made the Gallic squadrons flee,
From that ship's tallest mast display'd,
Shall show that ours she's fairly made.
Level your cannon in a row,
A little higher—there—so, so;
Up boarders on the deck and cry,
Dacres for England! win or die!"
Ill would it suit an English ear,
Of such a fight as this to hear;
For desperate was the fight and long,
And either vessel stout and strong;
But now 'tis done, that fatal blow
Has laid the gallant Guerriere low;
She tries to right; tis all in vain,
Guerriere will never fight again;
The lee gun's fired, the battle's o'er,
The Guerriere sinks to rise no more.

THE OCEAN PILGRIM.

A MORAL POEM.—BY MR. DAVIS.

*Illi robur et æs triplex
 Circa pectus, erat.*

Thomas King, a young American sailor, confined on board the Ruby, guardship, at Bermuda, observed one evening a boat alongside with her sails standing, which the lieutenants had neglected to hoist in.—A squall arose, and in the darkness of the gust, he committed himself in her, to the mercy of the wind and waves, with no other provision than some biscuits and water. He was alone nine days on the awful expanse of water in this open boat; on the tenth he made the Virginia shore and landed at Cape Henry.

Strong is the love of native home,
 There vivid fancy casts her eye;
 Whether on earth, or sea we roam,
 Our native land demands the sigh.

So, I, Columbia's true born son,
 In floating dungeon long confin'd,
 Could ne'er by smiles nor bribes be won,
 To abjure the land I left behind.

Bermuda's isle had long beheld,
 In prison-ship, my cheerless fare,
 From home and voice of friends withheld,
 A mournful victim to despair.

At length, one night, a boat astern,
 With snowy sails allured my gaze;
 A squall arose—and, now, I burn,
 To leave my jailors in the haze.

Some bread and water all my store,
 A compass sav'd in vent'rous mood;
 And now alone, I traverse o'er,
 In open boat, great Neptune's flood.

'Twas Sabbath, when my frail bark roll'd,
 At mercy of the billowy steep;
 But though no bell to Vespers toll'd,
 I found a temple on the deep.

I earnest pray'd, that He, whose storms,
 In terror shake the sea and sky,
 Would take my spirit in his arms,
 And watch me with a parent's eye.

The fair moon lent the sea her light,
 Her beams upon the surface curl'd,
 And dolphins sported, passing bright,
 Around my little wooden world.

When, sudden, from a silver cloud,
 Advanc'd sweet Hope, a vision bright!
 With melting voice, she call'd aloud,
 And charn'd the silence of the night.

"Sea-pilgrim hail! old Ocean kind,
 "Shall homeward bear his sailor boy,
 "And soon a mother's arms shall wind
 "Around thy neck with speechless joy.

"Thy sisters dear, shall sobbing dwell
 "About thy form, with gushing eye;
 "And she, whose vestal tumults swell,
 "Shall at thy presence cease to sigh."

Nine days had pass'd—the tenth I knew
 By signs, that land was not remote;
 The sea had lost its sable hue,
 And swallows hover'd round my boat.

'T was so—for, soon, in angel shape
 Oppose to view, Virginia's shore!
 I land on Henry's welcome Cape,
 I kneel, and humbly God adore!

THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION,

A NEW SONG.

Written by Francis Arden, esq. and sung before the honorable the corporation of New-York, on the 4th July, 1815.

Tune—MAGGY LAUDER.

Arms of Greece, that brought the fleece,
 To Athens' famous city,
 As we are told, by bards of old,
 Was sung in many a ditty;
 But Yankees claim a prouder name
 To spur their resolution,
 Than Greece could boast and do her most,
 —The Frigate Constitution.

When first she press'd, the stream's cool breast,
 Hope hailed her, pride of story;
 And she o'er pays hope's flatt'ring praise,
 By matchless deeds of glory;
 Of all that roam, the salt sea's foam,
 None floats to Neptune dearer,
 Or fairer shines in fame's bright lines,
 Or more makes Britain fear her.

'Neath Hull's command, with a tough band,
 And nought beside to back her,
 Upon a day, so log-books say,
 A fleet bore down to thwack her;
 A fleet, you know, is odds or so;
 Against a single ship, sirs;
 So 'cross the tide, her legs she tried,
 And gave the rogues the slip, sirs.

But time flies round, and soon she found,
 While ploughing ocean's acres,
 An even chance to join the dance,
 And turn keel up, poor Dacres;
 Dacres, 'tis clear despises fear,
 Quite full of fun and prank is,
 Hoists his ship's name, in playful game,
 Aloft, to scare the Yankees.

On Brazil's coast, she rul'd the roast,
 When Bainbridge was her captain;
 Neat hammocks gave, made of the wave,
 Dead Briton's to be wrapp'd in;
 For there, in ire midst smoke and fire,
 Her boys the Java met, sirs,
 And in the fray, New-England play
 Tipp'd Bull, a sommersett, sirs:

Next on her deck, at fortune's beck,
 The dauntless Stewart landed;
 A better tar ne'er shone in war,
 Or daring souls commanded:
 Old Ironsides, once more now rides,
 In search of English cruizers;
 And Neptune grins, to see her twins,
 Got in an hour or two, sirs.

Then raise amain, the joyful strain,
 For well she has deserv'd it,
 Who brought the foe so often low,
 Cheer'd freedom's heart, and nerv'd it;
 Long may she ride, our navy's pride,
 And spur to resolution;
 And seamen boast, and landsmen toast,
THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

On a succession of our Naval Victories.

BY WILLIAM RAY.

Again the voice of Vic'try cheers
 The nation with its sound!
 Death-struck the British host appears,
 Whose flag has wav'd "a thousand years,"
 And never an equal found.

Neptune, astonish'd at the sight,
Now looming from the main,
Beholds the equal balanc'd fight,
And sees the British put to flight,
Again! again! again!

Convulsive through the blood-mixt wave,
He writhes his monster-form;
His voice to ocean's deepest cave,
Where sleep the bodies of the brave,
Come thund'ring like a storm!

Convene, convene, ye ocean pow'rs!
And let us trace the cause
Why Fortune on Britannia low'rs,
And why upon Columbia show'rs
Such triumph and applause!

But ere the councils of the king
Had solv'd their deep surprize,
Ere loud huzzas had ceas'd to ring,
A blood-stained form, on lightning wing,
Come darting from the skies.

'Twas Mars, the potent god of war,
Commission'd from above
To bear the mandate wide and far
As ev'ning from the morning Star,
Of great almighty Jove.

"Too long has proud Britannia reign'd
The tyrant of the seas,
With guiltless blood her banners stain'd,
Ten thousand by Impressment chain'd,
Whom God created free.

"Injustice, violence, and blood
Hath mark'd her naval sway;
Her perpetrations on the flood,
Abhor'd by all the great and good,
Heaven's vengeance will repay.

"Then take your Trident from her hand," (Mars thus to Neptune spoke)
"Tis Heav'n's—tis Jove's supreme command.
The God of ocean and the land,
Which fate can ne'er revoke.

"Columbia with that sceptre rest,
In whom the god's confide.
For she, great empress of the west,
By all the nations 'tis confess'd,
Hath Justice on her side."

FREEDOM, HOME AND BEAUTY.

A NEW PATRIOTIC SONG,

As sung at the Baltimore Theatre with great applause.

High o'er PATASCO's tide
Swell'd Albion's naval pride,
Advancing on the gale:
As fierce th' embodied train
Form'd on the embattl'd plain—
Yet not a cheek was pale—
Our Yeomen mark'd their strong array,
Saw proud the Lion's streamers play,
And thought of Home and Beauty,
While many maidens' anxious sighs,
And many mothers' prayers arise
That each may do his duty.

And now the marshal'd train
Rush o'er the embattl'd plain,
Amid the cannon's roar;
The hostile fronts rebound,
And many strew'd the ground
Ere battle's rage was o'er.

Ah! many a gallant soul expir'd!
Too well with patriotic feeling fir'd
For Freedom, Home and Beauty;
Yet who for country fighting, dies,
Ever with the blest must rise,
For he hath done his duty.

Peace to the patriot dead,
Entomb'd in honor's bed,
In glorious contest slain;
The land that gave such birth
Well mourns their parted worth,
And mourns them not in vain:
For ne'er shall Freedom's hallow'd name,
Die, while there lives but yet the name
Of Country, Home and Beauty;
And who for these are fighting slain,
In the next world shall meet again;
For they have done their duty.

Nor yet the struggle's oe'er
That fiercer than before
The midnight's gloom assail;
Such desolating shocks,
As when the mountain's rocks
Are tumbling to the vale
The shores re-echo'd with the blast,
Firm stood each freeman to the last
For Freedom, Home and Beauty;
'Till dimmer flash and fainter roar,
Mark'd th' invader 'd quit that shore
Where each had done his duty.

From the Saratoga Journal.

A PATRIOTIC SONG.

Tune—HUMORS OF GLEN.

Sound, sound the harsh Bugle, arouse from your slumbers;
Awake the shrill fife, and the loud thund'ring drum;
Columbians, tho' Britons assail without numbers,
Remember your sires who repose in the tomb.
When tyrants invaded, demanding submission,
Indignant they rose, resolv'd to be free;
Uniting, they bravely repell'd the aggression,
And piously planted fair Liberty's tree.

While from the tall cliff the swift Eagle flies screaming,
With pious high pointed, to pounce on her prey,
Shall freemen be sleeping, of peace vainly dreaming,
'Til rous'd by their foes, at their doors, in array?
Shall Britain, grown strong by intrigue and seduction,
The sons of Columbia afright or dismay?
Oh, no—tho' they raise the fell axe of destruction,
We'll rise and defend our fam'd Liberty tree.

See Europe's proud kings are en-angaging together;
Their object avowing to aid Freedom's cause;
One tyrant deposing—exalting another,
To show their affection for justice and laws.
Their minions combining, to aid social order—
Which means ancient reverence for Crowns to restore;
Their mandates enforcing by rapine and murder,
While weak states are sinking to rise never more.

The war dogs of Europe awhile cease engaging;
Their monarchs sit calmly dividing their prize;
While bloody Bellona, our foes more enraging,
Scowls grim on Columbia with fierce sanguine eyes.
See Britain preparing her engines of thunder,
Our free infant nation to crush with her might;
In vengeance she threatens with burning and plunder—
The wrong she resents is defending our right.

Shall city and village in ruins lie smoking,
Our foe on their booty sit feasting their eyes;
Our fields with the blood of our citizens soaking,
While mothers and infants shriek wild in surprise;
Columbia's fair daughters by ruffians surrounded,
Fall victims to lust, as surrendering their lives?
Shall husbands confin'd—by arm'd villains confounded,
Bear witness to insults and wrongs of their wives?

Oh! no—let us swear by the sword and the altar,
To join the fierce Eagle, and make a bold stand;
No mean party discord our purp'se shall altar,
While rude hostile feet shall pollute our dear land,
Led on to the charge, to all fear we'll be strangers;
Determin'd to conquer, to die or live free,
And patiently bear war's privations and dangers,
To save from destruction fair Liberty's tree.

Our soil seems the last where blest Freedom shall flourish,
The tree of Columbia now only remains:
Tho' tyrants may plant while affecting to cherish,
Experience evinces, 'twill furnish in chains,
Arouse from your slumbers on this dread occasion,
Ye sons of the brave, hence resolve to agree,
And gird on your swords in defence of the nation,
To save the sweet fruit of fair Liberty's tree.

Could Warren, Montgomery, Greene, Putnam and others,
Preceded by WASHINGTON—wake and arise!
Those heroes and sages, now sleeping like brothers;
What think ye Columbians, that all would advise?
Would paleness and terror becloud each stern feature?
E'er hint of submission and call you undone?
Oh! No, they'd all urge you to battle and slaughter,
To bravely defend the rich boon they had won.

THE WESTERN BARD.

FROM THE ENQUIRER.

TO COMMODORE JOHN RODGERS.

While Glory throws o'er Perry's name
A ray of ever-living light;
And gallant Chauncey's temples, Fame
Involves in wreaths of laurel bright;
While tears o'er Burrows—Allen, flow;
And sighs for Sigourney obtain; (a)
While all is joy, and all is woe,
For battle won and Hero slain—

The muse, at such a time, to you
Her song of fond acclaim would raise,
Tho' cros't by frowning Fortune, who Triumphant yet shall gild her lays!
Tho' gloomy clouds, and vapors drear
Obscure awhile the orb of day,
Yet glorious shall that orb appear
With wonted light, and gladdening ray!

And tho' in vain the course you urge,
For Equal Foe, in grade and might,
To utmost Europe's frozen verge,
Where all is day, or all is night;
Yet thou, brave man, in happier hour,
As smiling fortune cheers the main,
With equal Foe, in grade and power,
Shall battle find, and glory gain!

Since first commenc'd thy bright career, (b)
'Till now—what splendors rise between?
The noblest speculation, ne'er
Had formed so grand—sublime a scene!

(a) This was a most amiable, as well as a gallant young officer, who gloriously lost his life, in defence of his vessel on the Potomac, July 15th. Although down, and mortally wounded, he was heard repeatedly from the shore encouraging his men, until a subsequent fire from the enemy terminated his existence!

I would say a few words more relative to this unhappy rencontre. A very young officer with the men—their commander slain, and overpowered by numbers, abandoned the vessel, and swam ashore. The enemy took possession, and retiring, left her in flames. Two men, John T. Courtney and Samuel Harrison, of the county of Westmoreland—notwithstanding they were fully apprised of the danger—notwithstanding that the spectators were flying in every direction from the expected explosion, gallantly, in the canoe, paddled on board; and although the lead lining the bulk-head which separated the cabin from the magazine, was actually melting away, persisted in their efforts, and saved the vessel! They are both poor, and a trifling compensation from government would be deservedly bestowed, and thankfully received.

(b) Every one knows it was the brave Rodgers who first bade the British feel the strength of yankee arm and yankee powder—hinc illa lachrymæ.

Since then, how oft hath Albion 'wail'd

The force of young Alcides, who

The Hydra of the deeps assail'd, (c)

And cleft the Monster-Fiend in two!

'Till nature, sick'ning, sinks in years,
And Virtue, Time and Space decay;

'Til Sun's and Planets leave their spheres,
And Earth and Ocean melt away—

'Til then thy Life shall live with Fame

On sculptur'd dome, and gilded page;

'Til then thy deeds shall time proclaim

From zone to zone, and age to age!

Some future Homer here shall sing:

Some Bard of more than mortal fire,

With Muse of brightest, boldest wing

To sweep with living lay the lyre;

And who, tho' ages sunk in time,

And sunk the suns that gild the west!

Thy deeds to raptur'd worlds shall hymn!

And be by raptur'd worlds confess'd!

SEDLEY.

From the North American Review.

"THE SINE QUA NON."

When Adam was stationed in Eden's fair power,
The lord of the beast, the bird and the flower,
He exclaim'd the 'creation my sceptre may own,
To happiness still there's a sine qua non,

Sine qua non, sine qua non.

To happiness still there's a sine qua non.

Then Deity pitied the creature he made,

And sent in compassion a help-mate and aid;

From Adam, while sleeping, he pluck'd out a bone,
And formed of the rib the sweet sine qua non,

Sine qua non, &c.

Oh! then, laugh'd the landscape and garden around,

And man, blest with beauty, true happiness found,

What our ancestor did all his children have done,

And woman is still the sweet sine qua non,

Sine qua non, &c.

The parson will hammer and stammer all day,

That life's joys are fleeting, and man is but clay;

Still, though not recorded in Mark, Luke nor John,
He sticks to the text of the sine qua non,

Sine qua non, &c.

The Lawyer who labors and sweats in his cause,

And puzzles his brain in expounding the laws,

Quits the forum with joy, and, without pro or con,

Finds a precedent pat in the sine qua non,

Sine qua non, &c.

Oh! tell us, ye heirs of Hypocrates' skill,

Ye men of the mortar, the pestle and pill,

What drop can encrimson the cheek pale and wan,

Like the dew from the lips of the sine qua non,

Sine qua non, &c.

The poet may sing of the charms of the lyre,

Of Helicon's fount and Promethean fire,

Though his music surpasses the Mantuan swan,

Yet what is it all to the sine qua non?

Sine qua non, &c.

Then fill up a bumper—let's drink to the smile,

That sorrow, misfortune, and care can beguile;

In life's chequered path may we gaily move on,

Ever cheer'd by the love of the sine qua non,

Sine qua non, &c.

A Secretary of the Embassy.

(c) I mean British "maritime superiority"—the scourge of the world—All the monsters of the ancients—Gorgons, Centaurs, Hydras, Sphinxes, &c. &c. put together, were never half so terrible.

WRITTEN SOON AFTER THE BATTLE OF ERIE.

Tune—Irish Harp.

Hail to the chief, now in glory advancing,
 Who conquer'd the Britons on Erie's broad wave:
 Who play'd Yankee Doodle to set them a dancing,
 Then tript up their heels for a wat'ry grave;
 May heaven its favors shed
 On his victorious head—
 Bold may he battle and conquer the foe:
 While the loud cannon's roar
 Echoes from shore to shore,
 Strike for Columbia—strike! lay the proud low!

Ours! ours is the country where freemen are dwelling,
 No tyrant nor lordling disturbs here our ease;
 Our hearts—freemen's hearts, proud with liberty swelling,
 Disdain the cold tyrant that preys on the seas.
 Once—though weak in war,
 With many a wound and scar
 Bruis'd we the Bull till he ran off with fear;
 Yes! soon the time will come,
 When e'en the Yankee drum,
 Sounding like death-bell, each Briton will scare.

Then fight, heroes fight! for the laurel of glory;
 While England insults us with proud haughty scorn;
 So long may you fight to ennoble the story;
 Of our freemen triumphant o'er Britons forlorn.

While thus ye glory gain,
 O'er all the wat'ry main,
 Yankees shall sing the exploits of the brave;
 And all Columbia's boys
 Exult with patriot joys,
 O'er our heroes that fight on the wave.

[The following is one of the successful prize poems for which the editors of the Port Folio gave a premium of one hundred dollars. It was written by JAMES C. HOLLAND, of Charleston, South Carolina.]

When Freedom first the triumph sung,
 That crush'd the pomp of Freedom's foes,
 The harps of Heaven responsive rung,
 And thus the choral number rose:
 Rise Columbia! brave and free!
 Thy thunders when in battle hurl'd,
 Shall rule the billows of the sea,
 And bid defiance to the world.

Supremely blest by fate's decree,
 Thy hardy tars in battle brave,
 Shall plume thy wings and keep them free,
 As in the motion of thy wave:
 Rise Columbia, &c.

The stars that in thy banner shine,
 Shall rain destruction on thy foes,
 Yet light the brave of ev'ry clime,
 To kindred, friendship and repose:
 Rise Columbia, &c.

The storms that on thy surges rock,
 Around thy flag shall idly sweep,
 Proof to the tempest's fiercest shock,
 Its stripes shall awe the vassal deep:
 Rise Columbia, &c.

Encircled with a flood of light,
 Thy eagle shall supremely rise,
 Lead thee to victory in fight,
 And bear thy glory to the skies:
 Rise Columbia, &c.

THE BATTLE OF NIAGARA.

FROM THE PORT FOLIO.

In imitation of Campbell's Hohenlinden.

O'er Huron's wave the sun was low,
 The weary soldier watch'd the bow,
 Fast fading from the cloud below,
 The dashing of Niagara.

And while the phantom chain'd his sight,
 Ah! little thought he of the fight—
 The horrors of the dreamless night
 That posted on so rapidly.

Soon, soon, as fled each softer charm,
 The drum and trumpet sound alarm,
 And bid each warrior nerve his arm
 For boldest deeds of chivalry.

The burning red cross waving high,
 Like meteor in the evening sky,
 Proclaims the haughty foeman nigh,
 To try the strife of rivalry.

Columbia's banner floats as proud,
 Her gallant band around it crowd,
 And swear to guard or make their shroud,
 The starry flag of liberty.

"Haste, haste thee, SCOTT, to meet the foe,
 And let the scornful Briton know,
 Well strung the arm, and firm the blow,
 Of him who strikes for liberty."

Loud, loud the din of battle rings,
 Shrill through the ranks the bullet sings,
 And onwards, fierce, each foeman springs,
 To meet his peer in gallantry.

Behind the hills descends the sun,
 The work of death is but begun,
 And red, through twilight's shadows dun,
 Blazes the vollied musketry.

"Charge, MILLER, charge the foe once more"—
 And louder than Niagara's roar,
 Along the line is heard encore,
 "On, on to death or victory."

From line to line with lucid glow,
 High arching shoots the rocket's bow,
 And lights the mingled scene below,
 Of carnage, death and misery.

The middle watch has now begun,
 The horrid battle fray is done,
 Nor longer beats the furious drum,
 To death, to death or victory.

All, all is still—with silent tread,
 The watchman steals among the dead,
 To guard his comrade's lowly head,
 Till morning gave him sepulture.

Now in the west, of splendor shorn,
 The midnight moon, with bloody horn,
 Sheds her last beam on him forlorn,
 Who fell in fight so gloriously.

Oh! long her crescent wax and wane,
 Ere she behold such fray again,
 Such dismal night, such heaps of slain.
 Poe mixt with foe promiscuously.

From the New-Orleans Gazette.

With great pleasure we lay before our readers the following patriotic song. It describes the operations of the late campaign with perfect truth, great humor, and no little poetry.

THE RETREAT OF THE ENGLISH.

A YANKEE SONG.

(Tune—Nancy Dawson.)

The English mustered mighty strong,
And bro't their choicest troops along,
And thought it but a little song,
To take our town of Orleans.

From the Plymouth and the Chesapeake,
From Portsmouth too, and Cork so sleek,
All came to take a Christmas freak,
In our gay town of Orleans.

See Cochrane, who is stiled Sir Knight,
With Gordon too, that naval wight,
And Packenham, all full of fight,
To have a dash at Orleans.

With Gibbs and Keane, and Lambert too,
And others, who kept out of view,
Making, in all, a pretty crew,
To take our town of Orleans.

To Ile au Chat their fleet first steer'd,
Where near a hundred sail appear'd;
And, from their numbers, many fear'd
Th' impending fate of Orleans.

They entered Bayou Bienvenue,
Where there were traitors* not a few,
To help them on and bring them thro'
To this our town of Orleans.

They to the Levee quickly come,
And made, as tho' they were at home—
Indeed, they were but eight miles from
The very town of Orleans.

The news at last to Jackson came;
His mighty soul was in a flame;
He swore an oath, I dare not name,
He'd save the town of Orleans.

The town was in a mighty rout;
He ordered all the forces out;
His troops so steady and so stout,
To fight and bleed for Orleans.

Away went Jackson at their head,
And many gallant man he led;
All swore they'd fight till they were dead,
To save the town of Orleans.

The English camp he's soon among,
And found them near five thousand strong,
From swamp to river stretch'd along
Against the town of Orleans.

And now began a bloody fight;
The English heroes tried their might,
But many think, the coming night,
Did save these foes of Orleans.

Then Jackson, not to risk the town,
Reined for a while his spirit down,
And trenches dug, and raised a mound,
To save the town of Orleans.

The English grown twelve thousand strong
The twenty-eighth again come on,
And thought our lines would soon belong
To them, as well as Orleans.

Repuls'd:—on New-Year's next they came,
But on that day were served the same,
And met a loss, they do not name,
From those who fought for Orleans.

But 'twas the eighth they tried their might,
And brought their army all in sight,
And swore our men would, at the sight,
All fly towards New-Orleans.

That morning's sun did rise in blood;
For all our men right valiant stood,
As every honest Yankee should,
Against the foes of Orleans.

The muskets and the cannons roar;
Our men most dreadful volleys pour,
A rolling fire, unknown before,
Upon the foes of Orleans.

Sir Edward led the eager crew,
And pointing to the town in view,
Gave them the sack and pillage too,
If they would get to Orleans.

But see! his threatening spirit's fled;
And Gibbs too lies among the dead,
With many more, who boasting said,
They'd dine that day at Orleans.

Such carnage ne'er was known before;
More than three thousand stain our shore,
And some assert, a thousand more,
Of the proud foes of Orleans.

Soldiers! you've had no vulgar game,
Wellington's troops here yield their fame;
Invincibles was once their name,
But this they've lost near Orleans.

A bloodless vict'ry, on our side,
May well increase the general's pride;
For, see—the field is only dyed
With English blood near Orleans.

The proud, but disappointed foe,
Is now, well taught our worth to know,
And all they ask, is but to go Far—far away, from Orleans.

See how these heroes scour the plain!
Their boats can scarce their haste restrain,
So anxious now their fleet to gain,
And get away from Orleans.

Aboard, and sick of Yankee sport,
They're dressing up a long report,
To suit their gracious sovereign's court,
Of their great feats near Orleans.

Here's to the EIGHTH! a brilliant day!
'Tis pride to have been in that affray,
Which drove the Englishmen away,
From this our town of Orleans.

*Alluding to the fishermen who piloted in the English boats.

Here's to the gallant GENERAL! who
Has saved our town and country too;
A braver man the world ne'er knew,
Than he who fought for Orleans.

Brave sons of Tennessee! a toast!
Of you your country well may boast,
She cannot find a braver host
'Mong those who fought for Orleans.

SIEGE OF PLATTSBURG.

Sung at the Theatre, in Albany, in the character of a Black Sailor.

Tune—"Boyn Water."

Back side Albany stan' lake Champlain,
One little pond, haf full a' water,
Plat-te-bug dare too, close pon de main,
Town small—he grow bigger do herearter.
On lake Champlain,
Uncle Sam set he boat,
And Massa M'Donough, he sail 'em;
While Gen'ral M'Comb
Make Pla-te-bug he home,
Wid de army, who courage nebber fail 'em.

On 'leventh day of Sep-tem-ber,
In eighteen hund'ed an fourteen,
Gubbener Probosc, an he British soger,
Come to Plat-te-bug a tea party courtin;
An he boat come too,
Arter Uncle Sam boat,
Massa 'Donough do look sharp out de winder—
Den Gen'ral M'Comb,
(Ah! he always a' home.)
Catch fire too, jiss like a tinder.

Bang! bang! bang! den de cannons gin t' roar
In Plat-te-bug, an' all 'bout dat quarter;
Gubbener Probosc try he hand 'pon de shore,
While he boat take he luck 'pon de water—
But Massa M'Donough
Knock he boat in de head,
Break he hart, broke he shin, 'tove he caffin in,
An Gen'ral M'Comb
Start ole Probosc home—
Tot me soul den, I mus die a laffin.

Probosc scare so, he lef all behine,
Powder, ball, cannon, tea-pot an kittle—
Some say he catch a cole—trouble in mine,
Cause he eat so much raw an cole vittle—
Uncle Sam berry sorry,
To be sure, for he pain;
Wish he nuss heself up well an harty—
For Gen'ral M'Comb
An Massa 'Donough home,
When he notion for a nudder tea party.

The following, a la mode de Pindar, on the SECOND ESCAPE of the Constitution from the British squadron, is from the Boston Gazette; and is a very happy imitation of Wolcott's style and manner.

KING GEORGE AND "OLD IRONSIDES."

A SQUIB—BY PETER QUINCE.

The king, God bless him, late, at early morn,
Restor'd to sense, was seen to tread the lawn,
Eager to learn the CONSTITUTION's fate!
So says report—report sometimes will lie:
But reader, well thou know'st, full well as I,
This ship has troubled much his royal pate.

When boasted Dacres, humbled by her power,
And the fam'd JAVA in unlucky hour,

Receiv'd her frown, and shrunk beneath the tide;
Cæsar grew pale at first, then rav'd, and swore
NEPTUNE was base, and AMPHITRITE was more,
Thus on the Yankee contests to decide.

Still "ironsides" in safety rides the wave;
The king resolves his sinking fame to save;
And many a ship is sent her course to trace,
Follow'd by squadrons too, the sea to roam;
(The pondrons weight e'en makes old ocean groan,)
To give the single Constitution chase!

The fleet returns—thus George, with sparkling eyes,
"Hey! hey! what news? what news? hey! hey! he cries—
His majesty to hear was all agog—
When Stuart*—Collier*—Kerr*—with crimson'd face,
Thus spake—"We gave the Constitution chase,
And ah! great sire, we lost her in a fog!"

"Fog! fog! what fog! hey, Stuart, what fog! say,
So then the foe escap'd you, Stuart, hey?"

"Yes please your majesty, and hard our fate"—
"But why not, Stuart, different courses steer?"
Stuart replied (impute it not to fear),

WE THOUGHT IT PRUDENT NOT TO SEPARATE.

RULE BRITANNIA,

A new song or parody, as finally amended by its author:

WHEN Britain from the boiling main,
Her smould'ring summits heav'd on high,
This direful presage of her reign,
Bellona sounded through the sky,
Rule Britannia, Britannia rule the waves,
And lash thy tributary slaves.

The nations not so blest as thee,
Shall see their commerce rise to fall,
For thou shalt subjugate the sea,
And grasp the treasure of them all.
Rule, &c.

Still more majestic shalt thou rise
From ceaseless war's unbounded spoil,
And neutral navies for thy prize
Inflate thy domineering isle.
Rule, &c.

Enslav'd, the sons of friendly pow'rs
Shall man thy fleets o'er num'rous seas,
Their wealth shall swell thy ravish'd stores,
Their statutes bow to thy decrees.
Rule, &c.

Each realm shall writhe beneath thy pow'r
Far as thy bloody navies roam,
To banish peace from ev'ry shore,
And rivet tyranny at home.
Rule, &c.

Shall such thy naval throne prevail,
Or rouse the vengeance of the gods;
O'erpress its yielding base and fall,
With haughty Carthage, Tyre and Rhodes.
When thou no more shalt rule, no more shalt rule the waves,
But shrink, abash'd among the slaves.

SIR—The following burst of patriotic feeling appeared in the 25th number of the "Philolexion Observer," which, if you think it fit to meet the public eye, you are requested to publish. The Philolexion Observer is a species of weekly paper, conducted by a member of the Philolexian Society, established in Columbia college, for the promotion of literary composition. It is already the repository of many valuable essays, and excellent poetical pieces, and, at a future day, may contribute to the instruction and amusement of the public. It was commenced on December 10th, 1813, and has been regularly read to the society at every meeting since that period. M.

ODE.

Souls of the brave! Ye spirits, fled
To mingle with the mighty dead!
Ye Patriots true! who, side by side,
Have bravely fought, and nobly died!
Methinks, a poet's musing eye,
Your visionary forms can spy,
Where Æther's realms with lightnings glow,
And awful thunders roll below.
Methinks, a poet's quickened ear,
Aerial voices, too, can hear,
In mellow cadence, soft and low,
Float on the breeze the notes of wo;
As reason yields to fancy's reign,
Distinct he hears the mournful strain.
Say, ye! who, 'mid the battle's roar,
Have sunk in death, to rise no more,
Why, on the fitful breezes borne,
Hover your spirits 'mid the storm?
Why soar ye not, with eagle rise,
On seraph wings, to brighter skies,
To share the glories treasured there
With kindred spirits in the air?
Again, in fancy's wild career,
The notes of sadness meet his ear—
While thus the souls of heroes slain
Whisper their woes in mournful strain.

"Land of our birth!—and bought with blood,
For thee our fathers bravely stood.
Land of our death! their sons for thee
Have died in battle gallantly.
To guard those rights, the sons have fought,
Which, with their blood, the fathers bought.
Low, in the dust, their bones repose;
The thistle o'er, their ashes grows;
The willows, to the winds that wave,
Give token of a warrior's grave.
For us no towering marble's head
Enshrines the memory of the dead;
No peans echo to our name;
Dead to the world, and dead to fame.
Yet 'tis that alone we sought:
For thee—and not for fame, we fought;
For thee we stemm'd the battle's tide;
For thee we bled—for thee we died.
As ceased, with silent Vesper's reign,
The thunders of yon battle plain;
As yon blest orb's declining blaze
Burnished the ocean with its rays;
So 'mid a stream of living light,
Our gallant deeds have sunk in night."

Ye sons of song! where sleeps the lyre
That brightened with your muse's fire?
Where are the glowing thoughts, that spread
A halo round the honored dead?
Where, now, in soothing cadence, swell,

The magic murmurs of the shell,
Whose tuneful numbers pealing high;
Sounded the strains of victory:
Or o'er the fallen hero's grave,
Chaunted the dirge of warrior brave?
Minstrel awake! whose magic lay
The pilgrim cheers on life's lone way;
Fair woman's gentle nature charms,
And the rough soldier's bosom warms,
Awake! and sound a martial strain!
Sweep the bold chords, ne'er touched in vain!
Tell of our triumphs on the wave!
Consecrate each hero's grave!
The glories sing of each proud day
That marks Columbia's martial way!
The brave inspire to deeds of arms
And rouse the weak with glory's charms!
And when the bloody combat's done—
When swells each heart, with glory won—
Then sound, in measure proud and high,
The clarion notes of victory!

INVOCATION.

Addressed to every friend of his country.

Sons of Freedom! who have bled
Where WASHINGTON or WARREN led,
Over heaps of mighty dead,
'Gainst a Tyrant Enemy;
See again! the battle lower!
Britain rallies all her power—
Now descends a fiery shower!
Cannons Roar and Rockets fly!

Shades of Patriots in the Grave!
Shades of 'parted Heroes brave!
Born, your Country's rights to save,
From a ruthless tyrant's sway!
Rouse your gallant sons to arms!
Bid them wake to freedom's charms!
Bid them rush to wars alarms!
Rouse! and drive their foes away.

Bid them hasten to the strand!
Sword to sword, and hand to hand!
Suffer not a foe to land
On the shores of liberty!
Back to ocean drive the slaves!
There to perish in its waves!
Sink them to their wat'ry graves!
Worthy not on earth to die!

CHORUS.

Sons of patriots in the grave!
Sons of 'parted heroes brave!
Born, your country's rights to save
From a ruthless tyrant's sway;
Be not blind to freedom's charms!
Be not deaf to war's alarms!
Rouse ye! Rouse ye! quick to arms!
Rouse! and drive your foes away.

Haste ye! Haste ye! to the strand!
Sword to sword and hand to hand!
Suffer not a foe to land,
On the shores of liberty.
Back to ocean drive the slaves!
There to perish in its waves!
Sink them to their wat'ry graves!
Worthy not on earth to die!

VIRGINIA, Sept. 20, 1814.

Journal of Events in Paris.

FROM THE RICHMOND ENQUIRER.

We have been favored with some extracts from the journal of a very intelligent American, who has resided at Paris during the events which have lately transpired on that theatre. They relate to a period, place, and person, that must make them peculiarly interesting. The fate of the man who has filled a larger space in the eye of his species, than any other; a city which was the capital of France, and once of Europe; a revolution, that for 30 years had shaken all Europe, and is supposed by many to have closed for ever; all the Kings of Europe in arms, confederated against one individual, and rushing to Paris to dictate a ruler and restore the race of legitimate princes; these are the scenes, those are the wonderful events which he describes. And who is it that observes them? He is no parasite of power; no butterfly that flutters round a court, no vassal that has been accustomed to bow the knee to Baal; but an American citizen, bred in the lap of liberty, in defiance to the pretensions of a Louis or a Bonaparte, except so far as they concern the rights of the French people, and the interests of his own country.

His writings shew him to be a republican—if we were at liberty to give his name, we should be saved the necessity of adding, that he is a man of no little distinction in his own country.

Such a one, viewing impartially the events which have transpired in Paris, and putting down, every day, the sentiments which they transpired, while they were fresh before him, must be listened to with attention. The Diary is a long one; and will furnish us with copious extracts for several future numbers of our paper. [Editor of the Enquirer.

Paris, June 18.—One hundred pieces of cannon announce a great victory obtained by the French; Wellington and Blücher are flying before Bonaparte. Success has attended his steps. In truth, he has need of all the advantages which success can give him. On the immediate result of the campaign he depends for existence, and France for internal peace and independence. The combinations of enemies without is terrible; the movements of the defeated within alarming. Let his eagles triumph for a little while over the mixed banners of legitimate kings; Saxony, Switzerland and Spain will suspend their blow, Poland may awake, and Italy shake off her inglorious chains. Tranquillity will be restored to the interior, and the scourge of civil war averted. The official report on this subject is of a very serious nature; it exhibits a more unfavorable view than I had anticipated. There is something mainly in laying the facts as they exist before the public; it shews a respect and a confidence in the people highly gratifying to the friends of republicanism. This full and fair expose is observable in all the reports: a few days ago, an able view of their foreign relations was submitted by Caulaincourt to the legislature.—It states to the utmost extent the dangers which threaten France; it disguises and discolours nothing, the power & resources of the combined kings are admitted, and spoken of in a temper of coolness and indifference, which those infamous projects do not merit. It should be read with attention; it is a masterly state paper.—It speaks of us as follows:

In the first rank of the friends of France, stands the Americans; a people, intended to play a great part on the theatre of political affairs, particularly in all that regards commerce. They have lately terminated an honorable war, by an honorable peace. The few concerns which they had with the Government of Louis 18th, during its short existence, sufficed to shew, that they had nothing to expect, and that the British pretensions were favored to their detriment.—The interest of the United States is simple: it is, that there should be a strong government in France. This single act decides of itself their actual position, &c.

This is all true—I have it from the best authority, that we could expect, not even justice from the late government. How could it be otherwise? Was not Louis 18th an English viceroy? Did he did not say to the world, that after God he owed his crown to that nation? That he owed his crown to them, is true—I doubt whether God took part with him, and am very certain that the French people to whom the affair exclusively belonged, did not.

June 20.—Behold the other side of the picture! We had scarcely heard of the victories of Bonaparte, when we learnt his total overthrow. The French army, his only hope, is not merely defeated, but annihilated. The nation is subdued and must submit to the terms of the conquerors.—The Emperor—but his title is quitting him forever—arrived in Paris before the news of his disastrous battle; but what can he do here? His power over the government, and his influence with the nation depended on the issue of his efforts; they will not sustain him to await the second arrival of the Cossacks.

I met with———this morning in the House of Representatives. He informed me that the contest was at an end; that the emperor would not be supported; that it was understood, before he set out for his army, that if he was defeated, no further struggle would be made to sustain him on the throne. Lucien Bonaparte advised his abdication, in preference to the attempt which would be necessarily attended with so much blood shed. Napoleon persevered in his determination to try the fate of battle; he was confident of crushing his enemies. The day of his arrival in Paris, when his certain discomfiture was known, the two houses, on motion of general La Fayette, declared themselves permanent; that all efforts to dissolve them should be considered as treasonable, &c. Under the constitution, the emperor had a right to dissolve them, and they were apprehensive he would do so. The resolutions were adopted with much unanimity. La Fayette was listened to with profound interest; he has much weight with the government and the nation, growing out of the purity of his character, and his devotion to liberty. Various reports circulated in the chamber, where through the kindness of———I obtained a seat. It was said that troops of the line had been ordered to Paris from Versailles. A motion was made to place the national guard under the command of Gen. La Fayette: steps were taken to rally them around the representatives: they will prevent the emperor, if he be so disposed from taking violent measures. The propriety of his abdicating the government has been discussed in council. The proposition is advocated by a majority, among whom is named Fouché, Caulaincourt, &c.—Carnot, Davoust, &c. are in opposition. He offered to abdicate, if they would make him dictator; that is, he would take off the livery, but he would drive. Nevertheless, it is wished by many, that he would abdicate in favor of his son, and that a regency might be established during his minority. Others are disposed to consign the government to the duke of Orleans: some that Louis 18th should be re-established; and others, that he himself should hold on and make another effort. About two o'clock Lucien Bonaparte entered with a message. It was to be read in secret: it was executed to announce his resignation; the contents have not transpired.

June 21.—It is said, his message, so far from containing his abdication, demanded an immediate levy of 40,000 men, and twenty millions of francs. And it is reported, that being apprehensive that his dismissal would be voted, he has gone to put himself at the head of the army.—But, if he could not, with the nation, oppose the allies, how can he calculate on success against both? Yesterday the resolution to protect his person was universal; he was safe so long as he obeyed the national will; to day, other sentiments prevail. A fair opportunity now offers to establish a republic. But, are they secure from dismemberment?—The accursed combination will continue to interfere. It is a conspiracy of kings, not against Napoleon, but against liberal principles. Yet they all protest against imposing a government on France. The English and Austrian governments have been explicit; and——informed me, that, in his presence, Alexander had said, that the Bourbons were incorrigible; that he had regretted having had any hand in placing them on the throne.—Let the present assembly then choose an executive magistrate; and hereafter, on the application of the majority of the people, call a convention to abrogate or change the constitution, which may now be agreed on. It appears that the emperor, now emperor no more, has not left Paris. As I walked along the Champ Elysee, in the neighborhood of the palace, which he occupies, reflecting on the gloomy solitude of its groves, when contrasted with the scene which a few short days past it exhibited, I was struck with the distant shouts of Vive l'Empereur! I hastened to the garden of the palace; there to my astonishment, I saw this very individual, who I had been told had left the city again to place himself at the head of the army. He was walking with Bertrand and three others, whose names I did not learn. They were engaged, but not earnestly, in conversation. There was no hing unusual in his appearance or manner; his countenance was firm and placid. He had determined on and prepared his abdication. A few minutes afterwards, he entered a plain carriage, drawn by two horses, and followed by two others conveying the gentlemen who were with him; repaired to the chamber of representatives to give it in, and once more strip himself of title and power. I could but reflect that on the sixth of this month he moved to that very chamber in a gorgeous carriage, covered with gold, drawn by six beautiful horses, decorated with feathers, their long manes curled and waving in the wind; with sumptuous equipage, with the members of his family and court attired in richest habiliments, in his train, whilst surrounding thousands hailed him with shouts of admiration.—Now, I was about to say, “none so poor to do him reverence;” none, indeed, in comparison with the former crowd. The number, however, rapidly increased, and as he passed on, they threw up “their greasy caps,” and cried aloud “Vive l'Empereur!” He made his acknowledgements with a bow and cheerful smile, and passed on. The gaiety of Paris is no more. It is succeeded by the deepest dejection and melancholy. The assured look and the light step which met you at every turn in the garden of the Tuilleries, and the walks of the Palais Royal, are no longer seen.

June 23.—Napoleon abdicated in favor of his son, who, for the present, is acknowledged as emperor, by virtue of the constitution. Policy points out the propriety of supporting him. I may have the tendency to break the solid phalanx of their enemies; it may draw off Austria, Italy and Germany; but the interest of the French people is nothing; but little Napoleon may find friends among the virtuous and enlightened governments of the present age; Louis the 18th has a considerable party in the nation, but few supporters in the government. The duke of Orleans is more popular; and would be preferred, if they are compelled, as probably will be the case, to receive a Bourbon. The republic, just at present, is out of the question. How can it withstand the opposition of the Bonapartists and Bourbons within, and the legitimate kings without? yet I do not despair.—It is impossible that the reign of folly and vice should be eternal.

A provisional executive has been formed. It is composed of the present ministers, and five members appointed by the two houses. Carnot, Duc D'Ortrante and general Grenier have been named by the chamber of representatives, and the duc de Vicerze and M. Quinette by the peers. Commissioners are already dispatched to treat with the allies, on whose will and pleasure depend the safety of Paris, the integrity of France, and the nature of its government. Will they accept of Napoleon the second? Will his being proposed create division and dissolve the union? Will the emperor of Austria prefer to his own immediate interest, the distant prospects of his grandson? For this is obviously a mere fetch on the part of France to obtain a breathing spell. I hope she may succeed in gulling them, and hereafter, in times of quiet, embrace the occasion to form a government more worthy of her than that of a baby “puling and piking in the nurse's arms.” But Louis le desiré will better meet the views of the legitimate kings, and his huge corpse will be again lifted into the high seat.—Miserable nation! wretched alternative! an infant or a superannuated dotard!—The French army has been dreadfully cut up. One of the gazettes stated that the imperial guards were utterly annihilated; this has been noticed in the legislature. A member on the authority of the minister of war, declared that 6000 had already rallied, and that the army of the north amounted to 60,000 men.—The youth of the Polytechnic School have requested to be taken into service, and great efforts are making to augment the military force of the nation. Union and a levy en masse would yet save the country; but I fear the one does not exist, and the other cannot consequently be resorted to. If the negotiations fail the intention now avowed is to defend Paris to the last extremity. The works of Mont Martre are strong, and confidence begins to revive. La Fayette, Sebastiani, Leforest, d'Argenson and Pontecoulant are the commissioners appointed to treat with the allies. The duke d'Ortrante (Fouche) is president of the provisional government, and Massena commander in chief of the national guards. Bonaparte has taken up his residence at Malmaison; in the event of his being obliged to fly, report gives to the United States the honor or disgrace of becoming his asylum; as to myself I view it neither in the one light nor in the other.

June 26.—The proceedings of the two houses begin to exhibit much dignity and coolness; nothing disturbs their tranquility, but the mention of a Bourbon or objections to the present government. A few days since the duke de Pontecoulant (and it is worthy of remark that he was soon after named one of the envoys,) declared, that he would not consent to accept Napoleon 2d as emperor; that he was an infant and not a resident of France.—This gave rise to a furious debate. Gen. Labedoyere declared, that the abdication of Napoleon was indivisible; that if his son was not acknowledged, he ought again to seize the sword, to declare all who refused to rally around him, infamous; to raze their houses, to proscribte their families, and to surround himself with

The brave who would again spill their blood in his defence; that there was no doubt, (alluding to marshal Ney) that he would be abandoned by vile generals, who had already betrayed him.—“Young man,” said Massena, “you forget yourself.” “You think yourself at the head of the corps de guard,” said another. Order was with much difficulty at length restored. Yet this all important question is far from being settled. It must be discussed. Austria is, if not their only, their principal hope.—It is reported with much confidence, that that power has given it to be understood, it would unite with France in favor of the young emperor. The allies, it is said, are not advancing on Paris, and it seems, that the position of the Russians is rather intended to watch the Austrians, than to aid the English and Prussians who are not in a situation to march to this capital without their co-operation. Otto set out yesterday on a mission to England. The papers announce the departure of Bonaparte; but, I have it from good authority that it is not true. He will await the result of a few eventful days. The French army has not suffered altogether as much, and the enemy has been more cut up, than was at first believed. The public countenance begins to brighten—160,000 men of the requisition of 1813 are called out; the Federes (the laboring class of Paris) have tendered their services, either to defend the city, or to march to the frontiers.—Negotiations for a general pacification with the insurgents in the West are set on foot. Marshal Ney, for stating the immensity of their loss, is denounced on all hands; yet, I suspect he told no more than the truth. Why else did Bonaparte abandon the army and abdicate the throne? These two facts speak volumes.

June 27.—The tri-colored flag, which had been taken down, is again hoisted on the public buildings. All judicial proceedings are to be conducted in the name of the French people. Were it not for foreign nations, particularly the English, a republic would be established. Bonaparte said a few days ago, that, if the allies refused to acknowledge his son as emperor, the republican form of government ought to be adopted. A law was proposed under the old pretext of state necessity, to authorise the arrest of persons charged with publishing false news, exciting desertion, or dissuading individuals from enlisting. They were also to be deprived of the right, now secured by law (the habeas corpus in fact,) of being brought immediately before the tribunals of justice. This has been successfully opposed in both houses. It was said, whatever circumstance they were placed in, it was necessary to respect individual liberty which ought always to be held sacred; that it would be foolish to adopt principles, of which they themselves might become the victims; that it was destructive of the most invaluable rights of the citizen; that so disastrous a law ought not to be adopted for the purpose of getting rid of a few agitators; that to guard against them, it was not necessary to inflict so vital a wound on the rights of humanity; that, when measures of rigor were about to be taken, necessity was always the plea; that no one could live in safety, where such a latitude was given to arbitrary power; “and for fear,” said one of the members “of being sacrificed by some petty tyrant, intoxicated with power and imagined consequence, if I were not kept there by duties which I owe to the public, I would apply for a passport, and exile myself and family to Constantinople, where I might more willingly submit to the caprice of some wretched Pacha.” Let military despots and would-be tyrants, blush at reading these sentiments; let them be deeply engrained in the heart of every freeman. But I am wandering from the subject. I could cite a hundred other recent evidences of the prevalence of liberal doctrines. For myself, then, I have no doubt, that although the flame of liberty may for a while be obscured, and apparently extinguished, it will ere long burst forth to warm and enlighten the European world. Not a word is said at present concerning either the actual or eventual government. In truth, this is no time to deliberate; the bayonets are too close at hand. I pity the situation of the French; Louis 18th, the scorn of the nation, the tool of their rivals and enemies, may be imposed upon them; and, mark! their vanity is such, that, although their hearts ache to burning, they will affect to receive him voluntarily; to consider it their own act, and “Vive le Roi” will be again the general cry. Celebrity and glory, which in their estimation were personified by Napoleon, blinded them to his political crimes; but, to have set over them political sinners notoriously destitute of fame and elevation, imbued with old and obsolete notions of divine right, and dexterous in nothing but religious juggling and mummery, is, what cannot, ought not, and will not be borne. I am not prepared to assert, that the mass of the people, either in France or in England, are sufficiently enlightened to establish and support a free government. Yet the experiment ought to be tried, and tried, and tried again. True principles will develop themselves, and strengthen even by defeat, and will ultimately, most assuredly, be crowned with success. The manner of talking about and discussing public measures in the United States is widely different from any that can be observed in either England or France. The Englishman is afraid of the laws, or rather of the influence of government, which constrains them as it pleases; he is afraid, too, of losing employment, customers and the countenance of the wealthy and the titled; he, therefore, affects silence and sulkiness. The Frenchman has not yet shaken off the timidity of centuries of slavery; but, as he must talk, with much grimace and self-complacency he expatiates on the weather, the fashions, spectacles, and a thousand other equally important subjects. At all events, whatever be the cause, it is impossible on this side of the Atlantic to learn from individuals, from groupes, from Gazettes, or in any other way, a variety of facts which you are desirous to know; all of that nature too, which with us are published from the house-tops. And this is necessary to the establishment and existence of freedom.

June 28.—The remarks with which I concluded yesterday are perfectly true. Whilst, it has been confidently and generally asserted for two or three days past that the enemy were not advancing, they have approached to within ten or fifteen leagues of the city; and, yet the miserable devils read the newspapers which contain nothing, look wise, shrug up their shoulders, take snuff and seem to be satisfied; they say too, they must have commerce. This seems to be the excuse for every thing that is dastardly.—It is not known, even now, whether there will be another battle; or, whether the city will be defended. If, as it is said, marshal Grouchy has 40,000 men, and their army amount to 70,000, surely with the aid of the people, they might yet beat the invincibles of Wellington; but, the apathy which reigns is truly wonderful. This is one of the happy effects of a community being taught to believe, that the government is no concern of theirs. The next step is to forget that they have a country; and this is easy enough, for, nothing but ignorance can be proud of mere earth, and water and air. Those who think or suppose they think, are divided and distracted. Some are clearly of opinion, that if Bonaparte would go entirely off every thing would be immediately arranged. Others await with much impatience the successful termination of the negotiation. Others say Louis the 18th, will be here in a day or two, and he will prove a King-cure-all. And others, [my heart bleeds when I speak of them] wish to promote the interests of liberty and their country. But, the pressure of circumstances is too mighty to be farther resisted. Yet, preparation for the intended attack continue to be made. The works of Mont-Martre are said to be strong, and fortifications are thrown up on the north front of the city; provisions also in great abundance have been procured; a day or two will decide all our doubts; but, with so numerous a population, and such generals as Massena, Ney, Soult, Macdonald, Jourdan, &c. what can excuse them not having already met their enemy?—The battle of Mont St. Jean has broken their spirits. Why do they not rather draw encouragement from the heroism their troops displayed? A detachment of the Imperial guards against a battery, after having lost half their numbers, were invited by the enemy, struck with admiration of their conduct, to surrender. The gallant general replied, La Garde Impériale meurt et ne se rend pas.—In a few minutes they ceased to exist! A monument bearing the inscription is about to be erected; but the insulated efforts of a standing army can effect nothing. Yet, where it exists, the people look to that alone for safety; when it is vanquished, the country is subdued. Let us remember too, that it is not the country, but the chief for which it fights. History is full of proofs; and the following facts may be considered as superfluous. General Benonid stated in the chamber of representatives to-day, that having been sent to reconnoitre, he had met near Paris many soldiers returning to their homes; that the roads were covered with detachments of the old guard to the amount of two or three thousand—who, upon being addressed and entreated to return to their posts, answered, "why should we fight? the emperor is no more." "But you have a country, friends, your glory to support." They could not be induced to return; but it is yet hoped that they will again arm and organize themselves.

The constitution of 1791 is again brought forward. M. Gamond with much eloquence and force sketched the history of France for the last twenty five years, her revolutions, her wars, and governments; deprecated anarchy and despotism, both of which they had experienced; and concluded by saying that France wished to be free, that she would be free in spite of all the efforts of Europe, and to secure her liberties, proposed the immediate adoption of that constitution. Another member had no doubt, but that the allies would respect their independence: that he was warranted in this opinion by the known magnanimity of Alexander, &c. This produced violent murmurs. The resolution was committed to a committee with no direction to report. They begin to be too fond of complimenting the allies; especially, when the motive is so easily seen through: It is a mean and shallow artifice.—Fouche [Duc d'Orante] has written a most shameful letter to lord Wellington; he compliments him on the fame he has acquired by victories over the French—calls upon him to be the advocate of their interests in the assembly of kings, where his influence cannot be less than his glory; that throughout Europe, he is known and honored; that the people, who never flatter nor calumniate, proclaim, that in all his conquests he is guided by justice, and in his policy by conscious rectitude, &c. &c. What a pitiful dog! the fellow has an eye to his property.—He possesses immense wealth in Paris and the neighborhood; so does Massena; and the one is at the head of the civil department; the other the military.

June 29.—Paris is declared to be in a state of siege. I applied a few days ago for a permis de séjour. On receiving it to day from the prefect of police, he observed it would be a protection; but as a permission to remain in the city, it was unnecessary; for there was no getting out. I was before apprized of the fact; for I had gone in the morning to the barrier d'Enfer for the purpose of visiting the cat combs; but as they communicated subterraneously with the field without the wall, I was not permitted to descend.—A great many country people with their families, furniture, cows and asses; were pressing into the city; also waggons and carts loaded with wine flour, stock and provisions of all kinds. The neighboring inhabitants are ordered to assist in throwing up works of defence. Who does not the government call upon them to rise en masse? Instead of that, they publish to the world, that Paris is only to be defended without the walls, and by troops of the line; that the National Guards are to preserve tranquillity, but are not to be sent against the enemy. Marshal Ney has published a letter to the duc d'Orante, exculpating himself from certain charges brought against him, and pointing out many errors and follies committed by Bonaparte in the memorable battle of Mont St. Jean. If he has lost reputation, he had better retrieve it in some other way.

June 30.—This morning between two and three o'clock, we were aroused by the fire of cannon in the direction of St Dennis. An engagement or rather a skirmish has taken place. The result is not yet known. It is said, that Wellington, and Blücher will not advance on the city, till they are joined by all the force, which it is possible to collect. It is supposed, that the French will not give them battle immediately; that they await the arrival of general Rapp at the head of his division. In fact, I fear on their part, it is nothing but parade and bluster for the purpose of obtaining tolerable terms. I have little hope of their making a firm and manly stand. What, if the government with the army were to abandon Paris? The English barbarians would be prevented from burning it by the Russians. Could they not stimulate the people of France to emulate the conduct of the Spaniards; to do more, to fall upon their invaders and exterminate them? I was reported yesterday, that Bonaparte had again placed himself at the head of the army. It is officially made known to-day that he has taken his departure, ordered off, but to what point is kept secret. It is probable he is in the city. Where else could he be more safe? Is he not hotly pursued by four packs of the best-bred blood hounds of Europe? He may deserve no pity; but far, very far, are his pursuers from military honor. He applied to the government for two frigates, which are ordered to be held in readiness. He asked of the duke of Wellington a passport; this, on the ground of want of authority, has been refused.—His wish was, to transport himself to the United States. In his fallen condition, I wish for the preservation of his life: certainly, I wish to his enemies no further triumph. Troops are constantly passing through the city; but, where they are from or where they are going, it is impossible to learn. They incessantly cry "Vive l'Empereur;" but, the National Guard and the citizens for the most part remain silent. Two or three individuals have been shot for crying "Vive Le Roi." If they had waited a few days, they might have been shot for remaining silent. I should not be overwhelmed with surprise, if by that time the welkin ring with "Vive Le Roi."

July 2.—The city is yet safe. The enemy has not obtained possession. There has been no general battle, and we are ignorant of the state of the negotiation. Disappointed in entering by way of Mont-Martre, and finding unexpected and insurmountable obstacles in that direction, they have crossed the Seine some distance below, and are now encamped at Versailles. Skirmishes take place daily. Last evening, the French succeeded handsomely in a sortie, and brought in from 12 to 15 hundred Prussian horse. I cannot account for the delay that has taken place in attacking the city. It might have been entered without difficulty two days ago; it was without defences on the South. Time has been of great service. The spirits of the army and the people begin to rally; and there is a chance that my Lord Wellington, if not rescued by the Russians, may find his situation a little embarrassing. But, the French may not wait. They may press a general and immediate engagement; and it is by no means certain that they will not triumph over their resolute foes. The letter of Davoust to the duke of Wellington is manly and energetic; the address of the legislature to the people is well calculated to rouse and excite them. Why, it is asked, is the war continued? Did not the powers of Europe say, that it was only against Bonaparte, that they combined, and is it known, that he has abdicated? It is plainly to be perceived, that the Bourbons can never succeed but by foreign force. Why do they not imitate the magnanimity of Bonaparte? God grant! that the nation may scatter them as chaff before the wind. The army have also addressed the government; they denounce and reject that family. It is difficult at present to say, by what part of the nation they are patronized. The war of La Vendee is at an end, and no voice is raised in their favor in his place; although their friends, the enemies of the country, surround and threaten the city. I have no doubt a great change will be witnessed, when force, foreign force, shall have given an occupant to the throne. But, it is a state of things that cannot last. The very idea of receiving a king at the hands of the English must, and ought to, render that king odious to every Frenchman; and twelve months will not elapse before he is again a fugitive from, or a victim of, their just resentment. The papers say nothing of the Russians; but it is supposed, that they, the Bavarians and the principal part of the Austrians, are advancing. The armistice effected by the Duc d'Albufera (Suchet) was, I presume, but partial. He is expected at Paris. An armistice of three days is said to be agreed upon between Ecmul and Wellington. Generals Grouchy and Soult have resigned. Nothing can excuse their withdrawing from the service of the country at this time. The cause of their displeasure is not known. No doubt, some wound to personal vanity. Their conduct has produced no bad effect. The determination to defend the city gains ground—the scholars of the Polytechnic, medical, and other schools, consider the numbers of the national guards of the adjacent towns, even the old soldiers wounded in the late bloody conflict, have pressed forward to the lines. The imperial guards say in their address to the representatives, that, when successful, they were magnanimous and generous; if it is the wish of their enemies, in he reverses they experience, to humble them, they know how to die. The courage of patriotism and the heedlessness of despair may yet exhibit a scene so terrible, as to make their invaders tremble. It appears to me in a military point of view, that Bonaparte can never be excused for having so abruptly abandoned his army; but for his precipitation, the route would not have been so complete or fatal in its consequences; and vast numbers of his troops, encouraged by his presence, would have rallied and reorganized themselves within a few leagues of the field of battle. The victors had suffered almost as much as the vanquished. Under such circumstances, to follow up success requires a splendor of genius and a vigor of character, which I suspect do not belong to Wellington or Blucher. In twelve or fourteen days the French have redeemed many of their errors, and in some sort repaired their misfortunes. Bonaparte is said to have been much occupied before his departure from Malmaison, in procuring the best works on America. He attended himself to packing them up and putting them in his valises; discourses freely of his situation, expresses no regret at renouncing the busy world, and no other desire than to spend the remainder of his days in the United States, peacefully among a free and hospitable people. Notwithstanding all this, an opinion prevails that he is still in Paris.

July 3.—Lord Wellington is reported to have said, in reply to the letter of the duc d'Ecsmul, that before he would agree to an armistice, he must receive a declaration, signed by all the members of the government, that Napoleon Bonaparte had really taken his departure; for, it was believed in headquarters, that he was still with the army. We are yet entirely in the dark, as to many most important and interesting points. It is said, that an armistice is agreed on, and that it is not; that the Russians have arrived and that they have not. I have just returned from one of the many rooms or lodges on the Boulevards, where the newspapers are read. The journal du Soir was expected with much anxiety. It arrived, was greedily devoured, and, as usual, contained nothing. The Frenchmen fouted, as if it was an extraordinary circumstance. I asked some questions as to their present situation and future prospects. They were all uninformed, and apparently indifferent. I ought not to have counted on their zeal; at such a time to be lounging in the streets! The theatres are still open, but certainly not well attended. However, I was in the garden Tivoli yesterday. There was an immense crowd. To see them dancing, enjoying music, and amusing themselves in a thousand different ways, you would little dream that their country was invaded, and their celebrated city surrounded by unfeeling and ferocious enemies; but, vive la Bagatelle, et faut s'amuser; although, the unfortunate devils apprehend sack from without and pillage from within. The mob, it is said, (although I do not observe it,) is kept down with difficulty. It is certain, that many thousands of the National Guard are actively employed night and day, in preserving order. Large bodies of them patrol the streets. Every public place is filled with them: indeed, they are so thickly planted, that you are never for a moment out of sight of a bayonet. This, but not on the same extent, is the case in London. A variety of devices are fallen upon, in order to deceive the people as to the real object. Soldiers are stationed every where; and an old rusty cannon not worth a cent, will serve as an apology for a guard of ten or a dozen armed men. Theatres, museums, jails, palaces, &c. &c. all furnish the same kind of excuse. The change of tone that is taking place hourly, is pitiful and pitiable. A few weeks ago, they were again to plant their eagles triumphantly in distant parts of Europe. An invading foe was out of the question: destruction would be the instant effect of such temerity. Then, they were to defend their independence to the last extremity: no government should be imposed upon them: above all, Louis 18th would never be received. Now, they are afraid to risk a battle; they fear for Paris, forget France, and abandon all principle. Paris is too fine a city to be touched by rude and hostile hands—o, a Roman army was disgraced, because the soldiers were alarmed at the idea of having their pretty faces scratched. This splendid toy must be preserved at the expense of the humiliation and slavery of the nation! God grant! that the United States may never have a Paris; no, nor a grand and magnificent city. If a standing army do not entirely destroy that spirit which is necessary to the defence of a country, a London or a Paris will. What! defend freedom and the soil at the expense of palaces and statues, and pictures, and plate, and window-glass? A parisian publishes to the world, that if it enter into the views of Wellington and Blucher to place over them Louis 18th or Napoleon 2d, prince Charles or Bernadotte, the duc d'Orleans or duke of Gloucester, they can't help themselves; that they have nothing to rely on but the moderation of their enemies. Where are their 25 millions of inhabitants? The government has held more manly language. Count Thibodeaux, after depicting with much force and eloquence the monstrous conduct of the allies, and the unfortunate situation of the country, concluded by saying, "but if France has heretofore rejected all chiefs hostile to her rights, what indignation ought she not to manifest towards him, who, a declared enemy to the sovereignty of the people, is placed on the throne by foreign armies; trampling over the dead bodies of Frenchmen, and carrying fire and sword and destruction among their fields and villages. Then it is, that divisions will disappear: that all Frenchmen, worthy of the name, embracing the sacred cause of their country, will hasten on the day of her deliverance from the disgraceful yoke which she has been doomed to bear. We read in all histories, particularly in our own, of princes who have conquered a throne by their own personal valor, aided by a portion of the people. These enterprises have never been humiliating. They may be considered as family dissensions. The glory of the conqueror is a patrimony, common to the conquered; but, what are the parties interested in the struggle, of which France has been the theatre for the last twenty-five years? On the one hand, the nation; on the other, a privileged order. In saying so, do we impose on France, on Europe, on the world? Tell us then, why this party has always been subdued by the force of the nation, when they have presented themselves alone in the lists? Tell us, why they have never triumphed, but when they have been sustained by foreign aid? Tell us, if they succeeded in 1815 by their own proper force, or by that of 600,000 enemies; if, when no longer thus sustained, they did not fall into insignificance, without having opposed the least resistance, without a single individual having perished in combat either for or against them? Tell us, even now, when they are preparing a bloody triumph, if they are not preceded by the armies of all Europe, in whose train they follow, &c." Unfortunate man! miserable nation! At the moment of this patriotic ebullition, force had settled the destinies of France: An armistice or rather a capitulation is agreed on. It will be made public to-morrow.

July 4.—The anniversary of American independence is the day of French subjection. I most earnestly hoped, that the 4th of July would have been to France also a day of deliverance from bondage; but, the army yields without a struggle, and the cup of humiliation must be drained to the very dregs. Neither the government nor the nation seem to have been consulted. The whole business, which probably decides the political fate of millions of human beings, has been arranged secundum artem, by a few obscure fellows vested with full powers by the respective commanders of the Prussian, and French, and English bayonets. They have agreed on eighteen articles, the number of our states, and like our toasts, were prepared by a committee last evening and have been swallowed to-day! How different in all other respects from the feast of reason and the flow of soul, which take place with us on that sacred day! surely an American cannot exult in the degradation of any country—above all, in the misfortunes of France; she aided us in the holy cause of our independence, against that government which has led the van in the destruction of all liberal principles, and which in regard to herself has been but too successful (for the moment only, I hope and believe) in imposing upon her chains, which must be thrown off, and indignation, which ought to be avenged.

I cannot go regularly through the articles. It is sufficient to say, that they provide for an armistice, for the removal of the French armies beyond the Loire, for the safety of Paris, and the preservation of both private and public property. The Tuilleries, the Louvre, the chamber of the representatives, the halls of justice, and the libraries are not to be burnt.

Much disaffection prevails; some of the imperial guard came into the restaurant where I was dining with three other Americans. One of them said, "we are betrayed; I have had this musket and this knapsack on my back for eighteen days; and we are not permitted to fight; we are given up by cowardly officers." Hearing us speak English, they became very much enraged; but immediately perceiving the cockade on one of our hats, they came to us and said; "For a moment they had believed we were Englishmen; they now knew us to be Americans; they begged our pardon for the mistake." One of them, an officer and a relation of Cuvier, said, "you are citizens of a free country; you belong to a brave nation; you have not been dishonored by the English. I will instantly go to the United States. France is sacrificed to Paris; the people to the cowards, who inhabit it." We hear nothing as yet of "vive le roi." The royalists shrink from observation; although backed by all Europe, they are afraid to come out; so far from it, the tri-colored flag still floats, and the Traillieurs or Federes, parade the streets, crying out, "vive l'empeur," "vive la liberte!" We walked in the evening to the palais royal; it was closed on our return. We observed, that all the coffee-houses were shut up, and the Boulevards, where usually hundreds of the beau monde resorted, abandoned. A report prevailed that general Vandamme had refused to obey the terms of capitulation; it was apprehended, with his corps, and perhaps followed by the whole army, he might pass through the city.—This accounted for the desertion of the public places. I returned to my lodgings about half after 10. It is now 11 and all's well.

July 5.—It seems from the papers of to-day, that a dreadful commotion was apprehended last night. They state the firing of cannon and of thousands of muskets, the appearance of groups of agitators uttering cries of rage and menace, women trembling and petrified with fear; in imagination, the city already in flames and given up to pillage. I saw nothing of this; but that it was perceived by those who ran into their houses and barricaded the doors and windows, I have no doubt. The national guards stroll about the streets, like a parcel of drones, very fierce, where there is no danger. They would pop you off a poor devil in a moment, who drank his coffee out of a saucer instead of a cup; but as to meeting the enemy, that is another affair. The only fear now is, that the invaders may be opposed—the great effort is, to keep down every sentiment of patriotism. The entry of my lord Wellington, and his excellency Blücher, will be considered as a grand spectacle—and I believe in my soul merely in that point of view, any circumstance that should prevent it, would produce great chagrin and disappointment.—The citizens are preparing for the show with much anxiety; and of beauty, fashion, paint, lace and powder, great will be the display. In the mean time, the genius of the Abbe Sieyès seems to be revived, and the legislature prepare, and give to the world with great solemnity, the most admirable specimens of bills of rights, constitutions, and laws. What an ingenious contrivance to arrest the enemy? The attempt made by the Natchez Indians to save their burning temples, by committing their children to the flames, was not more preposterous. They say, however, that the allies will not interfere further in their internal affairs—and this, I suppose, is by way of exercising their privilege; or apprehensive that they may, they wish to make good use of their time. The principles they announce are for the most part unexceptionable. For instance, they repeat what they have said in half a dozen constitutions before—that all power emanates from the people, that they should be represented, that the press, speech, and religion, shall be free, &c. But to what does all this amount? Louis 18th says, that he is the legitimate king; the Almighty has made him so, and he asks no favors, that France is his patrimony, and Frenchmen his people. To prove the truth of their principles, they shew a piece of paper; to prove the truth of his, he points to hundreds of thousands of British and Cossack bayonets. That the representatives are devoted to the interests of France, and of liberty, there is no room to doubt. They have adopted a resolution, notwithstanding the presence of the enemy, to remain at their post, to support the tricolor flag, &c. and have promulgated a series of wise and patriotic declarations. In reading them the utmost enthusiasm prevailed; they were carried unanimously, and by acclamation.

Very liberal intentions are attributed to their invaders; they are to respect the existing authorities; they are to be silent as to the future government.—Thus, they yet delude themselves with vain hopes. They are, however, worthy of our admiration for the consistency of their views. It was not the tyrant Bonaparte, but Bonaparte the supposed friend to the liberty and independence of France, whom a few weeks ago they supported. They now fly to a constitution and to laws. Bonaparte could not support their independence, whatever might have been the fate of their liberties; and without independence, what can be expected from laws and a constitution? no voice is yet raised among them in favor of Louis. They voted their declarations amidst shouts of "vive la nation," "vive la liberté," "vive l'indépendance." The white flag already waves in some parts of the south, and the superannuated royalists are furnishing up their rusty embroidered coats and cocked hats; so we shall have soon another dream of death, and the Ghosts of the olden time are again for a while to figure on the stage. But, is this absolutely certain? may not accidents occur and contingencies arise? may not the army behind the Loire with some strongly fortified towns or impregnable positions be seized upon by an indignant yeomanry, stay the overwhelming flood of debasement which threatens France, and "drag up her drowning honor by the locks?" may not the representative of the people shake off the dust of this unworthy city from their feet, erect the standard of the nation in the midst of the people, and call upon them to rally around it, as they love their country, exult in her reputation, or value their own rights? these steps might even now be taken; they ought to be taken; they would be crowned with triumph.

July 6.—This day, the barriers of the city were according to contract, delivered up to the allies. I rode out to one of the gates: there was a great crowd; I discovered nothing like levity, a good deal of indifference—but the prevailing sentiment was one of mingled mortification and indignation. The red coats showed no exultation. I sometimes thought they seemed ashamed of their errand. There is no comparison between them and the French soldiery: the latter are much finer men; their dress infinitely better. The women, struck with (as it appeared to them) the ridiculousness of the costume of their visitors, exclaimed in passing them, "mon Dieu! quel tourment!" We have always been taught by the English to believe, and we received our education entirely from them, that the French were a nation of fops and petits maîtres. The reverse is the fact; the men dress with much plainness and neatness, the women with unrivalled elegance; their taste is exquisite. Paris does not, I am sure, nor probably does the world beside, contain so laughable an animal as a Bond street beau, indeed it does not stop there; the mania of fantastic accoutrement has seized on the whole Bull family.

The most perfect tranquility reigns in the capital. All fears of commotion have vanished. The French plenipotentiaries, sent to treat with the respective belligerent sovereigns, have returned.—They all refuse to negotiate. They must again lay their wise heads most affectionately together.—How long the honey-moon of these lovers will continue, remains to be seen. I cannot help thinking, however, that the public and frequent exhibition of their mutual ardors is becoming rather disgusting. Fouché has been with Wellington and Blücher.—He was well received, although his observation gave great offence to the duke d'Artois, who was also present. He (Fouché) said, "that France would never consent to the restoration of the Bourbons with their former notions of government; that she would not return to the state of things which existed prior to the revolution; that, she would not give up all the advantages for which she had so long struggled." That two generals protested against any intentions, on the part of their masters, to dictate a government to the French people. The Prussian is said to have declared that he would not hesitate to protect the existing authorities. But against whom? against Louis? No, against all those who might endanger their safety and that of Paris, by manifesting too strong feelings in their present humbled degraded state. Fouché has a difficult part to play. If the nation make further resistance, and do not prevail, he loses his wealth; but, then Louis 18th comes in on his own terms, and probably he loses his head. As the Lord's anointed promises—"Moi qui n'ai jamais promis en vain"—to except from his gracious pardon, the instigators and authors of the late horrible conspiracy, of the number of which unfortunate gentleman, the duke d'Orléans is one, his money is to him what Paris is to France. If he can save that and his head, he would little care by what means. But the king never promises in vain. The only chance then is, to induce the allies to take no part, to oppose the Bourbon, which could be yet done with success, or to compel him to agree to terms. Louis, aided by the royalists alone, would be instantly driven out of the country. The army loath him, and is still numerous.—Lecoubre is at the head of 70 or 80,000 men; the remnant of Bonaparte's late command is about the same in amount; and Suchet has under him between 15 and 20,000. And where are the troops of the Bourbon? He has none, except perhaps a majority of the national guard, the shop-keepers of Paris. It is with great difficulty the Federes of the city can be kept down, although unarmed, and the peasantry in many of the provinces can scarcely be prevented from falling upon the royalists whenever they present themselves. Under such circumstances, then, the present government will set him at defiance, or force him to accept whatever constitution they may present. But, I have no hopes of the neutrality of the allies, because I have no confidence in the honor of the confederate kings. They will, they do interfere; they will bring the self-styled monarch and the whole family along with them; from the midst of their camp, he announces the principle of the legitimacy of sovereigns as the only basis of solid order, and asserts that it is proclaimed by the whole of Europe. What is to be the result? submission to a tool of England—or a civil war, which we kening France, may suit her purposes as well.

Ney has left Paris; it is said, with the intention of going to the United States. Bonaparte pursues his route to Rochelle. Orders are given to all British vessels to intercept him on his passage to America. Finding himself thus hunted, and the conditions of his abdication violated, may he not return to the Loire? Davoust is about to repair to Orleans, there to establish his headquarters. May its name be again illustrated by the destruction of insolent invaders! To the English there is something ominous of evil about it; between three and four hundred years ago, they found it so on the banks of the Loire, and again very recently on those of the Mississippi.

July 7.—On this day the capital of France yielded up its independence and its reputation without a struggle; and this day six years past, the trophies of Wagram seemed to have placed the military character of the French beyond the effects of change or chance.—Of the heroes of that memorable battle, Bonaparte is an out-law; Bernadotte, an alien, MacDonald, an exile, Marmont, denounced as a traitor, and Massena, commander of a patrol.

The last act of the piece, I don't know what to name it, is now under representation. The Prussians in great force have entered and marched through the city, with swords drawn, guns charged and musketes lighted. Wee beside the unlucky wight who looks awfy! One of the dragoons with his musket cocked pursued a poor devil, who fled into the crowd for refuge, pressing and getting behind an American gentleman and myself. He was upon the point of firing, and I should probably have received my death at the hands of a two penny cut-throat scoundrel in regiment's. They proceeded to the chancelleries, turned out the provisional government neck and heels, took possession of the Luxemburg where the peers were sitting, planted cannon on the bridges, and a few hours arranged and settled every thing. In 1846, the French paraded in triumph the streets of Berlin, and recreated them selves in the palaces and gardens of Potsdam and Sans-Souci. "Even handed justice now commends the poisoned chalice to their own lips," and the Prussian exultingly tramples over their capital, pollutes their magnificent edifices, and sates the sweets of the enchanted waters of St. Cloud, Versailles, and the champs Elysees.

How the French conducted themselves. I know not, but, the contemptuous and insulting looks of the Prussians were insufferable; besides this, the brutality of their conduct in riding among groups of men, women and children, and clacking with their whips the horses and drivers of carriages passing them! Never, no never, ought a wreath to be forgiven, who elevates himself by insulting on his country, humiliation so bitter, and disgrace so deep. Berlin, and Vienna and Moscow, and Wasington were taken by enemies; these were subjects of regret, but not of mortification; but, Paris is insulted and derided by her friends, by Louis Le De ne, and hordes of affectionate Englishmen and Russians. Although their capitals fell, Prussia, and Austria, and Russia, and America, valiantly and successfully opposed the foe, but, France sinks with Paris, is even compelled to smile in her agony, and kiss the hands which indict on her bloody and indelible stripes.

July 8.—The chamber of peers convened as usual on the 7th. They had under consideration a declaration of certain principles of government, which had been adopted by the representatives, and presented to the allied sovereigns by a committee, composed of M. M. La Fayette and three others. The duc de Dantzic (Lecoubre, I believe,) stated, that the garden of the Luxemburg was occupied by Prussian troops; this was contrary to the convention; he, therefore, proposed the appointment of a deputation to demand an explanation from Blucher. Whilst other members were very innocently expressing their astonishment at this event, a message was announced from the provisional government; its contents were as follow:—"Mr. President—Until this moment, we had reason to believe that the allied sovereigns were no unanimous as to the choice of a prince who should reign over France. Our plenipotentiaries on their return had given us the same assurances. Nevertheless, the ministers and generals of the allied powers have declared yesterday, that all the allied sovereigns had entered into an engagement to replace Louis XVIII on the throne, and that he would make his entry into the capital this evening or to-morrow. Foreign troops now occupy the chancelleries where the provisional government sit. Under these circumstances, we can do no more than offer up prayers for the happiness of our country; and, as our deliberations are no longer free, we deem it our duty to separate."—Signed Fouché, (duc d'Orante,) count Grenier, Quinette, Carnot, Caulincourt (duc de Vicenza). The members listened to the reading of their death-warrant with much calmness, submitted to their fate and dispersed. Not so in the house of representatives. They heard the message with much indignation: M. Manet, a young man of much merit and eloquence, mounted the tribuna, he inveighed against the treachery and injustice of the allies, protested against their conduct, and concluded in repeating the sublime sentiment of Mirabeau. "We sit here by the will of the people, and nothing but the power of the bayonet shall drive us hence." General Sebastiana and many other members evinced the same determination, to submit but to force. The next morning agreeably to adjournment, they repaired to their chamber. The avenue were guarded by armed men, the doors closed, and the members given to understand by the officers, that they had received formal orders not to permit them to enter. They then repaired to the house of M. Lamy, and the President, signed a process verbal of these circumstances, and retired, each his several way; "the world before them, where to choose, and providence their guide." Thus terminates the short Bonapartean government of 1815.

That the representatives have displayed much talent and energy, cannot be denied. They certainly made a bold stand when they compelled Napoleon to resign. They thought in this way to deprecate the wrath of their enemies: they have discovered their error; but at too late an hour. Their situation has been hazardous and difficult. That any other course than the one they have pursued, would have been better, I am not prepared to say—but, I will say, that nothing could be worse than the situation to which they are reduced. Under no circumstances could they, their country, and their principles be more completely subjugated and debased. They ought to have followed the army. The English will assert, that they have not interfered in the internal government of France; they only summoned and seized towns in the name of Louis 18th; and, while their friends, the Prussians, were seating him, stood by, merely as spectators; but, a vessel of war in sight when a capture is made, comes in for a share of the prize, on the principle of being present, aiding and abetting.

The king has made his solemn entry into his good city of Paris, this 8th day of July, preceded and followed by an immense concourse of bipeds, on horse-back, in carriages, and on foot. Before he ventured in, about 30,000 Prussians, again with swords drawn, guns loaded, and matches lighted, marched through the streets in terrorem. The people were thus brought to a proper state of mind to appreciate their happy lot; so, when the gouty monarch made his appearance, the women from the windows and the boys in the streets shook their handkerchiefs, waved their lillies, and cried out, "vive le roi! vive le roi!" They had done the same a little while before, when Blucher passed; and still worse, a lame drummer had excited their most enthusiastic acclamations. Every effort was made by the cavalcade to induce the crowd to cheer. This was not generally done. I discovered many countenances, which exhibited the keenest mortification, and deepest distress. Notwithstanding all the resolves to the contrary, I saw the national flag struck, and the white colors raised on the top of the column erected to commemorate the glory acquired by the French armies in the memorable campaign of 1815. This column is 133 feet high, and covered with bas reliefs of the brass of the cannon taken from the Austrians. These victories were gained under the tri-colored flag; how much like an interloper, looked the Lily-livered banner! I have witnessed frequent scuffles among individuals about the cockade. However, the contest will not continue long; as a royal proclamation has already appeared on the subject;—The army in retiring from Paris a few days ago, urged the national guard to preserve the national colors. This they resolved to do; but, a few days afterwards they were no longer to be seen. The army further declared, that they would again fly to arms, if the privilege to choose their government was denied to the nation; but, the nation feels no solicitude on the subject. The patriotism of the troops is not seconded; they are abandoned by their chiefs and by the people. They are the only depositary at present of sentiments worthy of France. Long after Bonaparte ceased to command, they continued to hold a language honorable to themselves as citizens and as soldiers. They said in their late address to the national guards, a body of men unworthy of their praise; "Adieu! brave comrades, and you, fellow-citizens, who deserve the name of Frenchmen! On the banks of the Loire, as on those of the Seine, our vows shall always be for our country, and for you." Brave men you will be compelled to descend from your elevated stand. You will follow, reluctantly, the vile example of Paris and of the national guard.—Indeed you look around for support in vain; the representatives of the people dispersed, the president of the provisional government uniting with the oppressors of the country, abandoned by your chiefs, you have no other alternative, but submission. You are at this moment surrounded by enemies, too numerous to be opposed. The Prussian army has left Paris to watch your movements; and the whole country is nothing but a camp, filled with Russians, English, Germans, Württembergers, Bavarians, Spaniards and Swiss.

The Baron de Muffling, a Prussian, is at present governor of Paris. General Maison is to be his successor; but, when is not said. English troops are encamped in the champs Elysees; the Prussians occupy the Thuilleries, carousal, &c. and are quartered in private houses. It is said, that it is the intention to destroy the bridge of Jena and all other monuments of their defeats. The Germans, Italians, &c. ought to do the same. Paris ought to be stripped of her borrowed plumage. She is no longer worthy of honorable trophies. To preserve them she has sacrificed the nation; may she be disappointed in receiving the price of her meanness. Let the pictures and statuary of Italy and Spain be taken back; the no ses of Venice restored! the triumphal arches and columns razed! They belong to the character of the tyrant, whom she hastened to disavow; they are too intimately connected with Bonaparte, to be a source of pride or pleasure to her. The government of Louis the 18th employed itself during the former twelve months' reign, (will it be believed?) in the important task of picking the N's out of the public buildings; it can again return to that employment. Blucher demands heavy contributions; it is said, 100,000,000 Francs. The Russians are in the neighborhood; dreadful havoc, and outrages the most atrocious, have been perpetrated. When France awakes from her unaccountable torpor, and finds herself stripped of her liberties, her independence, her honors, and her property, she may find that she has yielded up these inestimable advantages with too much facility. Perhaps she may arise in the majesty of her strength, defy her foreign enemies, and bring to punishment the home bred traitors, by whose perfidy she has been insulted, disgraced and subdued.

The report is, that, Bonaparte finding it impossible to escape from Rochelle, has been arrested in going to some other port. Whether this be true or not, it may be said that the political career of him, whose renown has filled the universe, is at end. In spite of all the evils, of which he has been the author, it would be unjust to contend that he has done no good. The public works executed during his reign are immense. It is difficult to believe that so many superb monuments could have been erected in the short space of 14 years, and those, years of war. He is reproached with reason, with many acts of tyranny and cruelty, but he was often generous and humane. A Prussian officer of rank had been arrested, and was about to be brought to trial. His wife threw herself at the feet of Bonaparte, protesting his innocence; he handed her a letter: "There, said he, is the evidence of his guilt. You now hold it; throw it in the fire, there is no other proof against him, and he must be acquitted." He is accused with violating treaties. Have other sovereigns acted with greater fidelity towards him? It is said, that he was arrogant and insulting to those around him. It appears, nevertheless, to be certain, that he always had, and still has, a few fast and sincere friends. His personal courage is contested; he has fought fifty-eight battles, more and bloodier than those of Cæsar; but genius and wisdom have their limits. Bonaparte possessed great resources; but physically and morally, they were insufficient to oppose the force, by which he has been overwhelmed. In becoming a despot, he dug his own grave; in making the people slaves, he destroyed that patriotism and zeal, which his own safety and greatness, as well as that of France, equally required.

The Parisians are a good deal puzzled, what to make of the blessings which flow in upon them so rapidly. They are delighted with the king, Monsieur, and the duc de Berry; in ecstasies with their religion, t'air going to mass, &c. and sing with much glee all their churches, the Domine, salvum fac regem. They are also much charmed with the allies, and some, a few days ago, cried out, "vive le general Blucher! vive le noble Wellington!" But the inundation begins to be overpowering—200,000 Prussians, 120,000 Russians, without taking into consideration the English, Bavarians, Wirtemburgers, Hanoverians, &c. &c. seem to be more than necessary for an escort to the king. Besides the general Blucher has demanded the immediate payment of 100,000,000 francs; he has quartered his soldiers on the citizens at the rate, in some parts of the town, of from ten to fifteen in each house; has required that they should receive each day a ration composed of bread, fish and salt meat, rice, butter, beer, wine, brandy, and tobacco; and that to sleep on they should have mattresses, with a blanket, sheets and pillow. In addition to all this, they begin to fear for the monuments and public buildings; and the bridge of Jena, it is said, will certainly be destroyed. The Russians yet have not come up. When they take their share, there will be but little left. The bankers say, it is impossible to comply with the requisition. General pillage is apprehended. Lord Wellington has been applied to, to interfere; but, declines, it is said, on the score of some difference between himself and the Prussian. A deputation has been sent off to Frederick; but, I suspect, all this is done for the purpose of giving Louis an opportunity of interposing with effect, and of thus entitling himself to the gratitude of his children, for saving them from ruin.—A mine has been sprung under one of the arches of the bridge of Jena; but it resisted its effects. The emperor Alexander, who arrived last night, has been requested by a deputation of citizens to interfere. Louis seems neither to possess power nor influence. The city is entirely in the hands of the Prussians and English; the police is subject to their management. Passports are granted, on the one side of the river, by a col. Barnard, and on the other by col Phil. The emperor of Austria and king of Prussia have made their appearance; and also my lord Castlereagh, who may be considered as the king of England; so, it may be fairly said, that no where else can so goodly a crop of royalty be seen. How delightful it would be, if they could be joined by the king of Hayti, the caliph of Bagdad, the queen of Trebizond, the emperor of Morocco, and the hetman of the Cossacks! In that case, they really would be worth looking at. Louis, by the grace of God, has nominated the notorious Talleyrand, minister of foreign affairs; so we may stand clear. Fouché is to be minister of police, when the two colonels aforesaid shall be pleased to take their departure; so, he saves his head and his money, and gets an office into the bargain! France has been betrayed by a few wealthy satraps in and about Paris. All governments and all countries are the same to the rich and the luxurious. If mortification at their fallen and degraded state, is to be discovered any where, it is among the lower and middling classes of people. The royal or grandee mob have destroyed the celebrated coffee-house in the Palais-Royal. It seems, that formerly, songs were sung there, in praise of Bonaparte. Last night, at the theatre Français, a Mademoiselle Mars was ordered to cry "vive le roi!" She refused; it was put to vote, and carried by a small majority, that she should comply. "Well, gentlemen," she said, "I can say, vive le roi; vive le roi!" There was something admirably sarcastic in her manner. She gained a complete triumph; the foolish and disappointed audience hung down their heads, and she went on with her part. The Bourbonists are certainly the most king-loving tribe in the world. It is impossible to gorge these greedy gulpers. Alexander, Francis, Frederick, Louis, all go down. What a pity it is that the whole fraternity are not at Paris!

I have just returned from the bridge of Jena. I saw the effects of the effort to destroy it. It is now to be spared further: assault, and only to be stigmatized by having the "alias" de l'École Militaire tacked to it. The bridge of Austerlitz, also, is to be rechristened. It is to be called, hereafter, the Pont du jardin du roi. The bust of Napoleon has been taken from the museum of that name.—Surely, they will not condescend to keep the three hundred pieces of statuary, with which he has enriched it. They already begin the great work of scratching out the N's and scraping off the eagles. What a sublime undertaking! how insignificant in comparison are the monuments erected by Bonaparte! His schools and hospitals, fountains and aqueducts, triumphal arches and columns, hid their diminished heads. On the subject of the bridges, the king plucked up a mighty spirit—"Sir," said he to Blucher, "if you intend to blow up the bridges, have the politeness to indicate to me the time of the explosion, that I, myself, may repair to one of them and perish with it." As Mr. Burchel says, in the vicar of Wakefield, "fudge!" We have little cause to complain of the brutality and vandalism of the English at Hampton, at Havre de Grace, and at Washington. They were our enemies; but here the allies are friends, and their atrocities beggar all description. If Bonaparte was a consuming fire, they are a torrent, which puts out the fire, but, marks its course with ruin and devastation. The grass never grew again where the horse of Attila once planted his hoof; but Attila had only one. The modern Prussians have no other breed. From the frontiers of Paris their track is desolation. Blucher is the principal actor, the hero of the drama; Wellington is manager or prompter; stands a little behind the scenes and gives him the cue. Nothing can equal the distress of the neighboring inhabitants; they are reduced to the necessity of begging daily rations of bread, which are sent to them from this place. The celebrated manufacture of China at Seve, the forms of the machinery, the tools of the workmen are all destroyed. The manufacture of arms at Versailles have shared the same fate; and, between 2 and 300 waggons have been loaded with the spoils and sent off.—The gardens and public edifices of Malmaison, and St. Cloud, have been despoiled of their ornaments, their pictures and statues. The garden of the Luxemburg and the champ Elysees have been converted into Augean stables; whilst the beautiful trees stripped of their bark, already exhibit the "sere and yellow leaf." The garden of plants was to have shared the same fate; but, has been saved through the intervention of Humboldt.—With regard to these facts, and hundreds of others of the same kind, the papers are silent; whilst, they are filled with the most fulsome compliments, to their masters, and with proclamations of Louis le desiré changing the names of streets, bridges and palaces.

I have put off closing these notes till the last moment. Now, to be brief: it is said, that Bonaparte is taken, that he is dead, that he is with the army, and that he is besieged in the island of Rie. Which of these reports is true, I know not: perhaps neither. Ney is to be the first victim; his property is sequestered, and his person sought after. The report of this morning is, that the French army have turned upon their pursuers, the Prussians, and defeated them with great slaughter. Their loss is estimated at 25,000 men; it may be all false, although much weight here is attached to it. Rapp with his division has joined to him Suchet has evacuated Lyons, and is on his march to the same point. The division of Lecoq is still respectable—and Valenciennes is in the neighborhood, besides many more distant towns, still holds out. If Bonaparte joins the army, there will yet be desperate doings. I would amount in a few weeks to 250,000 men. With the aid of the yeomanry, who have on some occasions lately, without other support, opposed the invaders, they might be even now driven from the country.

Paris, July 13, 1815.

JOURNAL OF EVENTS.

[Subsequent continuation.—PARIS, JULY 22]

The loose sheets which I despatched on the 13th July, brought you along with the current events to that period. Let us proceed. The subjugation of France becomes every day more and more complete. Town after town capitulates, and the marshals and generals of the empire hasten to announce their submission. The army every where, and the people in many of the provinces, would oppose their further degradation; even the Vendéans have proposed to join their fellow subjects in considering as a common cause the integrity and independence of their country. But this spirit is effectually subdued by a pusillanimous king, a cowardly nobility, and a pitiful set of fellows with trinkets about their necks and little pieces of ribbon depending at their button holes. Would you believe it? Your European great man is as proud of a gewgaw, as an Indian of a Blue Bead, or an inhabitant of Madison Island of a whale's tooth. And on whom are these marks of favor bestowed? Why on those, as in Lilliput, who shew the greatest dexterity and suppleness in creeping under, or jumping over a stick. Alexander and Frederick passed through the street in which I reside, a few minutes ago. I saw their majesties.—They rode white horses, and Alexander wore a white, and Frederick a blue coat; I believe I remarked nothing else worth mentioning. I suspect Bonaparte very properly estimated the character of the first, when he said by way of compliment in his presence, and loud enough to be heard, that he was "the handsomest man in Europe." The idea of our having friends among the monarchs of the world, is dangerous and absurd. They are bound together in the strictest alliance: a most perfect understanding exists among them, and a firm determination, to eradicate all principles which may militate against their hereditary claims to govern mankind. May they no endeavor to restore America to George the III? It is as much his patrimony, as France is that of Louis 1. . . The Guelphs too have not been out of possession more than eight or ten years longer than the Capets. If the doctrine be true, that hereditary sovereignty is alone legitimate, are not the people (the sovereigns of the United States) usurpers? Let us then be cautious, keep ourselves quiet and band our resources. The royalists here hate us most cordially; they view our revolution as having caused their own, and they indulge in many ominous predictions, of the fate which awaits us. The government of America is the only remaining head of the hydra, and that ought to be taken off. Even the short, but eventful time that I have been in Paris, the change that has occurred in regard to us is very observable. A few weeks ago the Moniteur gave our country precedence under the head of foreign news—Now, we are entirely pretermitted or introduced in the shape of a column quoted from some tory Eastern print, stating our loss in the late war, at 50,000 men, our expences at $150,000,000, and our disgrace as consummated by a treaty of peace; but really under existing circumstances we cannot expect, nor ought we to wish for their respect. The newspapers, Paris and the government, exhibit one mass of meanness and sycophancy. What can be hoped for, when in one, and the same journal, you read sentiments (very much softened, however) of foreign soldiers riding like madmen through the streets, stabbing with their lances whomsoever they meet, men, women or children, and close by its side the thanks of the phantom king to Wellington and his officers for their humanity and generosity!

"It is a father (he says) who renders thanks in the name of his children." He always calls the people his children. On his arrival at the Thuilleries, he requested to be lifted up to the balcony; this was done amidst acclamations of "Vive le Roi" He commanded, and having obtained silence, pronounced the following animated and eloquent address—"Bon jour, mes enfans." The orator was encored on all sides: Menley in his gilt tub never enjoyed such triumphant feelings; he waved his lily-hand and retired.

How extraordinary are the events which I have witnessed within a few weeks! Does history embrace in so short a period, changes and revolutions so wonderful? I have seen Napoleon on the throne, surrounded by a blaze of disgusting pomp, and the next moment an insulated individual, shunned by his fellow men, or pursued by them, thirsting for his blood. Then succeeded the ephemeral and nominal reign of his son. Next, the real authority of the representatives of the people, and last and least of all, the phantasmagora, or speaking automaton, got up by a company of royal strollers and exhibiting under management at the palace of the Thuilleries. If Bonaparte were really a great man—if on his return from Elba he had forgotten his purple, and his feathers and his crown; had adhered to his plain cocked hat and riding coat; had despised the trifles which attract the vulgar great, from the Cusseta king, down to the autocrat of all the Russians; if he had declared himself general of the French armies, devoted to the liberties of his fellow citizens, and independence of France; then would have re-appeared that spirit which in the early stages of the revolution triumphed over all opposition; then, would have been spared to this unfortunate country, the deep disgrace and dreadful ruin which it is now doomed to suffer. But, after the battle of Waterloo, after his fall, all was not lost. The army, however reluctantly, yielded to the necessity which tore him from their ranks, turned with affection towards their country, and offered to assert its independence with their blood.—The people would have seconded them in this noble strife. Fighting in such a cause, the nation would have become a Hercules, and must have prevailed. Did not a handful of Greeks overthrow the mighty hosts of Darius and Xerxes? and has not France, as a republic, herself given to the universe proof, that a soldier who fights for his country is invincible? Even now when the Bonapartes are away, and the Louis's despised, it is not too late; but as sure as fate, ere long, excess of misery and mortification, the present lot of France, will arm her children with despair, and retrieve that fame, without which, she is forever fallen. Shame, shame, upon the Otrantos, Eslinges, Beneventos, and the whole infernal tribe by whom she has been betrayed and abandoned! The wretches got titles and wealth, and forgot their country. The most favorable opportunities have been already lost: the chambers of the legislature, before the arrival of the king, might have brought into action the power of the nation. Now, both civil and military chiefs are wanting; yet, this is the appointed time; longer delay will bring but augmented ruin. Additional armies of English and Russians, and Swiss, and Danes, and Austrians, and Prussians, and Hamburgers are pressing towards the Rhine. The crowned conspirators dread the effects of their invasion. Cannot the people of France see in these fears, in these precautions of the allies their own strength? The attempt to repel their enemies might fail; but this is not a moment for calculation. Resolutions to decide, ought not to be "sickled o'er with the pale cast of thought." They must hazard every thing or see their honors blasted, their country ravaged, and themselves enslaved. The king, the Royalists, the journals of Paris, make every exertion to prevent and in imitate opposition; the forces of the allies are magnified, and a disposition to resist them denounced as rebellious. What perfidy! what perversion! but notwithstanding their baseness, they have not entirely succeeded in eradicating every vestige of patriotism. A few days ago, it was stated that the army had sent in their submission; their address was published. It was further said, that the white flag floated every where throughout the kingdom. Nothing is more false. In spite of their efforts to suppress the truth, it is now well known that the army on the Loire with Davoust at its head, preserves its attitude of defiance: that Vendee within four miles of the metropolis has successfully resisted the attacks of the Prussians. It is true that "old wooden leg" as the officer is called has hoisted the white flag; but he holds the command, refuses to obey all orders from the king whom he considers as a prisoner, and foils every attempt of the allies to dispossess him. The castle is filled with the material of war which he means to deliver over to the French government, when one shall exist. General Clausel has published an order at Bordeaux, in which he says that the capital is in the possession of the enemy; and therefore no order issuing from thence can be considered as legal; that Davoust is commander in chief of the army and must alone be obeyed; he commands a considerable force. La Marque is at the head of troops formerly engaged in La Vendee. Generals Rapp and Lecourbe and Suchet lead on their respective detachments. If they could all unite on the Loire, nerved with indignation and sustained by their fellow countrymen, many of whom particularly in Alsace have already flown to arms, they would be crowned with victory, or the blaze in which they perished with the glory of France would prove also the funeral pyre of her insolent invaders. Is it not more than human patience, more than human meanness is calculated to bear? Austria has given a governor to Lorraine, Prussia has set one over Paris. The English talk openly of razing Lisle, Cambray, and all the strong holds of the country. They are this time the conquerors and not the Russians; so, if Alexander is liberally disposed, he is not to be permitted to interpose. An English officer observed to me, that he should not be surprised if Lord Wellington was to become king. This is foolish enough to be sure; but it is a good specimen of British modesty! But Alexander is not inclined to interfere beneficially: his feelings towards France have undergone a great change. The powers of Europe seem all to have transferred their hatred from Bonaparte to the nation. New views of aggrandizement break in upon them. If, Alexander is capable of effecting a great part on a great scale, a fine opportunity presents itself for him to offer himself to France, assist her to chase her foes from her bosom, to avenge herself on them; the crown is within his power, the phial of holy water is within his grasp. He would better merit them, than the superannuated Bourbon, who has filled his country with hords of lawless robbers and broken up the very foundations, not only of her happiness and independence, but of her existence. Austria, Prussia, and Holland would be crushed by the weight of his two empires, and already one of his arms reaches Hindostan, where stands the proud and principal pillar of British greatness. He has a fairer prospect of universal empire than ever had Napoleon or any other man. No king could prevent his rivalling, his surpassing the immortal achievements of his mighty name sake. But, I suspect he is a poor creature; he will be satisfied with piffing, dividing the spoil with others, and adding a few more human cattle to his Russians, and Cossacks, and Poles, who, he says, in his late proclamation fixing the destiny of Poland, are united by the common name of "SLAVES." He is certainly electioneering; but he has no further views than mere flattery and adulation. I observed him minutely, while riding thro' the Boulevards, reviewing about 20,000 Prussians. Instead of observing the troops, he kept his eye on the other side of the street on the multitude. He evidently courted acclamations, made advances, put on a most coaxing look, and frequently raised his hand to his hat. The people did not fully reciprocate his affection or appreciate his condescension.—He was chagrined and disappointed; but, whatever shouts there were, he took them to himself, altho' trotting along with him, cheek by jowl, were Frederick and Francis, and a little way behind, Wellington and Blucher, Artois and Schwartzenburg, &c.

The allies take care to preserve a wholesome terror among the French, by a frequent display of their forces. One day we have thousands and ten of thousands of Germans, with their white coats and boughs in their caps, parading the streets and Boulevards; the next, as many Russians; then, the Prussians, their very whiskers curled with rage and contempt. They are the Indian allies of the English, the Pottawatomies, &c. Blucher is another Tecumseh. Then come the Islanders, with the Hanoverians, Dutch, Brunswickers, Hessians, Belgians, &c. to the amount of 70,000. These reviews are attended by the sovereigns, magnificently accoutred and numerous attended; so, that nothing may be wanting to the production of the fullest physical and moral effect. The streets, the theatres, the gardens, and all public places, are filled with their troops: cannon placed in different parts of the town, and a piece directed against the Thuilleries. The king feels his humiliation, but is obliged to witness the outrages and robberies which his friends choose to commit. A few days ago I was at St. Cloud; the chambers of the palace, formerly occupied by Bonaparte and Louis, are now the swill tubs of Blucher. Although the other rooms were crowded with gazing, dirty, stupid soldiery, I was refused admittance by the Prussian guard. None but the militawere to be permitted to view the works of taste and splendor which they contained. However, after a little while I returned. A number of Englishmen were pressing in, and I entered unobserved. A man with a brush was busily employed in obliterating all emblematical representations of Napoleon and his achievements: the tablets of Mosaic were broken to pieces, as if by the hilt of swords, and vacant spaces appeared on the walls, whence had been taken ornaments of various kinds. A celebrated picture of the emperor, on horseback, which fronted one of Dessaix at the moment of receiving his death wound had been taken off. A Frenchman, who held some household office, and to whom I made myself known as an American, told me in great agony, that they were destroying every thing. The pillage of pictures, &c. continues; and they are now taking to pieces and packing up, plans or models in bas-relief of the fortified towns of France, to be sent to their respective countries. Thus they will become acquainted with all the defenses of France, through means the most dishonorable. The models had never been before exposed, and few individuals knew even of their existence. I saw them, they give you a better idea of a city, its fortifications and environs, than the most minute actual examination would do. It is as if you were above in a balloon, and had a most perfect view. I observed among those they were purchasing, Cambrai, Philippeville, Maubeuge, Strasburg, &c. Would it not seem from this, that it was their intention to keep possession of the places themselves. They have already divided the country into departments, and filled them with troops. Frederick and Alexander are for the partitioning system, and abuse the English for bringing Louis back, as it some what interferes with their plans, in consequence of certain inconvenient promises which have been made to him. However, it is probable that they will all get over their scruples. They are despised now for the littleness of their villainies, such as stealing pictures and statues, destroying trees and gardens, and furniture and palaces, battering the eagles, and scratching out the letter B, robbing the people of their money and taking possession of their houses, &c. Let them take possession of the country! where is the difficulty? are they not Russians and Prussians, and Austrians, and English! does not their own conduct furnish precedent? are not Poland, and Norway, and Saxony and Italy, and the Danish fleet, cases in point? is not the history of present times mere epitaphs of murdered nations. Besides, by getting rid of Bonaparte, by placing a Bourbon on the throne, nothing is effected. The French people already prepare the day of retribution. This conspiracy of kings is understood. Tyrants, however combined and confederated, are never safe; and France, if suffered to exist, will bring about their certain destruction.

It is now the 4th of August. An opportunity via New-York offers, and I embrace it with pleasure to send you this letter.

Nothing is known here of the internal situation of the country. The papers are subject to the severest inspection. They are even prevented from republishing the news in relation to France, from English gazettes, and they are above all cautious in saying any thing that can offend the allies, or encourage a spirit of resistance to their multiplied insults and outrages. Notwithstanding, however, the treachery or perhaps imbecility of the king, and the meanness of Paris, many strongly fortified towns still hold out: among the rest may be mentioned Longwy, Metz, Landau, Huninguen, Strasburg; the whole province of Alsace is in arms, Rapp has frequent battles with the Austrians, and the army of the Loire is still unsubdued. Fresh troops are daily arriving in France, and this will continue to be the case for some time. The allies will pour into the country 600 or 700,000 men, drive the people to desperation and insurrection, and thus find an apology for their massacres and depredations.

But, what their intentions are, cannot be positively ascertained. The cabinet of the Tuilleries with Talleyrand and Fouché (who Bonaparte says is an ass) at its head, are in great alarm, and profoundly ignorant of their designs. The king has written a letter to Talleyrand, in which he complains bitterly of their conduct; says that he will not consent longer to witness their outrages; that he will fly to Spain for an asylum, and thus leave his children at liberty to defend themselves or make their own terms with his pretended friends. They entered and possessed themselves of France under the pretence of opposing Bonaparte; now the army of the Loire and the partial insurrection which they are fortunate enough to excite, are their excuses for remaining. It is not sufficient, that the royal standard is every where hoisted, that the army has submitted to the king, that all the fortresses have done the same; they persevere in their hostilities. They have all along been at war with the nation; they are now at war with the king, their friend. To conciliate them further, the army must be disbanded, and the garrisoned towns delivered up to them: when all this is done, it is easy to foresee the consequences. A party, more royal than the king, has sprung up. It is fomented by the duchess of Angoulême, who is as mad as a March hare. It is as yet confined to the south: they wear a white and green cockade.—The duke of Orleans has arrived; he has many friends, and is spoken of as the commander of the army. He will not be trusted. It was reported a few days ago, that Macdonald had been placed at its head; this is not true. The allies give many proofs of uneasiness: they augment their guards in Paris, and hasten the departure of numerous detachments from their respective states. This may be, however, to give an imposing air to, and command respect for the decisions of the grand congress, which is to be held there; and at which are expected to be present (in addition to their majesties of Russia, Prussia, Austria and—b ut no, there is no king of France, except those already mentioned) the apocryphal prince regent and the devout Ferdinand. You will have seen the final destination of Bonaparte. I cannot sufficiently express my astonishment at the course he has pursued. Why did he desert the army? why abandon France? the conduct of Henry the fourth under somewhat similar, but more desperate circumstances, was widely different. He was advised to leave the country, but was prevented by marshal Brun, who said to him: "you are divided to fly from France; for my part, I contend, if you were now absent, you ought to enter it at all hazards; but, now if you retire, you will do voluntarily, what the greatest efforts of your enemies could not effect. In your present situation, to leave France even for twenty-four hours, is to banish yourself forever. The dangers which surround you are not as great as they are represented; and, those by whom you are opposed, are the same who you have already defeated. In fine, we are in France; and here we must be buried. When a crown is the prize, it is necessary to obtain it, or perish in the attempt. When there is no safety for your person, but in flight, it is best a thousand times to die than save it by such means." &c. The consequences of his firmness we all know.

In delivering himself up to the English, Bonaparte remarked substantially, that he intruded himself to a nation, in preference to an individual.—When such fellows fall themselves into difficulties, they know the difference between a government of laws, and a despotism. It is a valuable commentary on his own conduct and the pretensions of monarchs. I have it from a gentleman who heard general Blücher say, that he might have escaped with ease to the United States. I am surprised he did not do so, had that been the case. I give you now in haste the reports of the day. The allies refuse all explanations of their conduct or intentions—they insist that the army shall be immediately disbanded, and the fortresses delivered up to them. Orders to this effect, were given yesterday. T. Llevrand and Fouché wish for the appointment of the duke of Orleans, as generalissimo. He is disposed to hoist the national colors, in opposition to them, and the royal badge, the green, the colors of Artois, begin to appear.—The count d'Artois was formerly commander in chief, and threatens to leave the country, if the duke of Orleans is appointed. The utmost confusion and division reign at the Tuilleries. They have at least three parties; the kings, the duke of Artois, and the duke of Orleans. The majority of the nation will support the latter. A variety of rumors, many of them idle no doubt, but tending to shew the state of the public mind, now circulate and create considerable agitation. It is said, that fireworks are preparing for the destruction of the city, that the king is about to depart, and that the empress and her son are at Fontainebleau. Bonaparte is still believed by a great many people here to be in France. I had a conversation with the marquis de la Fayette yesterday; he says that every thing is as bad as it can be; however, still hopes that liberal principles of government will ultimately be established in France and other parts of Europe.

Paris, August, 1815.—I have more than once given it as my opinion, that the principles of an enlightened liberty, would ultimately prevail in France. To prevent this, there is no other means than the total destruction of the country. The combination of kings will in vain attempt the establishment of despotism in any other way. Enraged, rather than instructed, by past events, in vain they pursue the friends of freedom; in vain endeavor to arrest the progress of philosophy, and restore the old order of things, under the pretext of peace and regular government.

For more than twenty years, a necessary revolution has agitated Europe. It went near to destroy the assumed power of a privileged class: public opinion contended successfully against titles and priests, and armies, and wealth; the constituent parts of the privileged class, or its best support. Bonaparte appeared on the theatre of the world. He imposed on France an iron yoke; liberty was every where proscribed; the prerogatives of power could not be too far extended; nor the arbitrary will of an individual too fully acknowledged. His tyranny lost him France, or, in other words, public opinion abandoned him. A family, which had once occupied, returned to fill the throne. They were not invited back by the people; they were imposed upon them by the force of foreign bayonets. They came, surrounded by those like themselves, ignorant of a country from which they had been absent for a quarter of a century. Absolute power in the monarch was not only the best institution they could devise; it was the only resource.

What happened? the atmosphere of the present age, poisoned the old lovers of the past. All their theories in favor of what was, were destroyed by the force of what is; their dogmas were despised; their antiquated notions ridiculed; facts belied their assertions, and disappointed their anticipations.—Their eyes were half opened, and at length, they promulgated a constitution, which consecrated some of the best principles of the early stages of the revolution. It was too late—public opinion, the only foundation on which governments can rest, in the absence of bayonets, (and the bayonets were absent) had slid from under them.

Bonaparte re-appeared. He was not opposed by the nation; he was enthusiastically received by the army. It was not forgotten that he had denounced all liberal principles; his cant about ideology, and the mysteries of authority, were well remembered. He was again prepared to re-commence a frightful tyranny; but, sensible, in a little while of the magnitude of his mistake, the master of France was also compelled to conciliate the general will; to obey the general voice. Around his throne, nothing was heard but acclamations of liberty and equality, denunciations of arbitrary power, and solemn recognitions of the sovereignty of the people. The constitution which he proposed, contained the best principles of that which owed its birth to his predecessor, besides further evidences of the influence of that spirit of improvement, which neither the Louis's nor the Bonapartes have found themselves sufficiently powerful to destroy. The second advent of Napoleon from the throne, was not more rapid than his flight from it. He was not, it is true, driven away, like the Bourbons, by public opinion, but he was chased thence by 700,000 foreign bayonets—by 700,000 foreign bayonets, which have replaced the crown on the head of Louis. The French people, who are alone concerned, have neither consented, nor have they been consulted. They are considered as having no more to do with the affairs of France than with those of Japan. Their interests are sequestered; and for the present placed in the hands of Don Cossacks, Pandours and Scotch Highlanders. The flock has been consigned, by the shepherd to the safe keeping of wolves; but he who "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," pities, and will relieve their sufferings.

The superannuated dynasty roused by recent events attribute their late fall to the mildness of their government. Their flatterers demand incessantly, proscriptions, confiscations, exiles, and the re-establishment of the ancient monarchy, with all its powers. Nothing is heard but excitement to revenge.—What will be the immediate result of these menacing symptoms, it is difficult to say. But the principle of despotism is dead—it does not suit the age. The present crowned conspirators will awake to this truth.—Liberty, however threatened, has not been entirely smothered; she has kept herself afloat in the most dreadful storms; she will survive even this most dreadful crisis. The friends of arbitrary authority have gained nothing by the destruction of Bonaparte; they have removed from power this "man of destiny," as he called himself, than whom despotism never had a sincerer or an abler advocate. He has conceived great schemes to give it solidity; he had denounced to the world, that dangerous faction, the republicans, whom he denominated "ideologues et des liberaux," against whom he manifested on all occasions the most deadly hatred. They have removed him from the throne, and placed upon it a legitimate sovereign of the same principles no doubt, but not as competent to give them that support without which they cannot survive.

The only mode, then to extinguish the principles which they so much abhor, is, as I have before said, to divide and annihilate France. Will his be done? will the allies further disregard the solemn engagements they have contracted, and continue longer to trample under foot their proclamations and promises? already they have acted with a degree of atrocity to which history presents us no parallel. They attempt to excuse their exactions, their devastations, and their robberies, by citing the conduct of Bonaparte.—But Bonaparte entered Berlin and Vienna as a conqueror; he advanced to Moscow as an enemy.—He did not declare to the Austrians, nor the Prussians, nor to the Russians, that he came to re-establish a legitimate king. That he was the friend of this king; that he only fought against a particular individual, and that his destruction would be the signal of a sincere and honorable peace. But all this, they have said and sworn. What have been their oaths but perjury? their promises but snares? their curses but death? when they shall have succeeded in possessing themselves of the strong holds of the country, when the army shall have been disbanded, when they shall have stript the people of their arms, will they stop midway in their course, before they reach that point to which their steps conduct; before they accomplish that object to which their measures are preparatory, or otherwise useless and unnecessary. I have conversed with many foreign officers. They say, that France will not be altogether partitioned and cut up, but that by the time they leave her, she will be reduced to a situation that will prevent her from again disturbing the tranquility of Europe. All this, if true, is very intelligible. They will remain where they are for a long time; keep possession of the fortresses; slice off some of the departments; intimidate and impoverish the people. But the conception of grand designs, is more easy than their accomplishment.—The kings may quarrel, although there is honor among them. Their armies may find a caput in Paris—nay, as the French did in America, imbibe principles of ideology. Above all, France may imitate Spain, and Austria, and Russia and Prussia, and consider her invaders, under whatever pretext, as her enemies—and who are they who profess for her such warmth of affection? the English who consider, and have for ages, considered her as their natural enemy—the Russians, who have shown so much respect to the independence of Poland—the Austrians and Prussians, who, more than twenty years ago, while they pretended to assist the king, signed the treaty of Pilnitz. The energy of the revolution, and not the justice or love of these same allies, saved her then. Will she, when her ruin is more certainly threatened, indulge in foolish confidence, and yield without a struggle?

The people now endure a double tyranny. The exactions of the foreigners among them are intolerable, their insolence worse. They not only march in all directions over the country, destroying their woods, their public edifices and their harvests; breaking up all domestic quiet by intruding into their houses and using at will, their purse, their wine and every thing else they may choose, excluding them from places of public amusements, and trampling them in the streets; but, amidst all this oppression, they are denied by their own government, the poor privilege of complaining. A paper, "The Independent," to which I subscribed, dared to comment, loudly enough to be sure, on this state of things; it was offensive to the allies, the king's friends: the paper was suppressed; the editor thus notices the circumstance, that "finding himself unexpectedly incapable of complying with his engagements with his subscribers, he had contracted with the proprietor of the Echo du Loire to furnish them with that paper." All the journals with the slightest pretensions to independence, have been put down.

The destruction of the liberty of the press has been followed up by the annihilation of the army, by extensive proscription, by the assassination of Brune, the arrest of Labedoyere and Ney, the flight of Clausel and others. The royalists exhibit themselves in their true colours. Jacobinism was never so prosperous; and vengeance, and blood, and terror are the order of the day. The prevailing party feel that their power is ephemeral and accidental; it is this that renders them furious. Their weakness is the cause of their ferocity. Can it be believed, that a moment of alarm and intimidation will be sufficient to destroy sentiments of national independence and national freedom? The press may be destroyed, the mouth may be closed, but the eternal sentiments of liberty will live in the heart; however surrounded by bayonets, the Louises, and Robespierres, and Napoleons, and Talleyran is, will be reached and vanquished by public opinion.

I converse frequently with Frenchmen of all descriptions. They express the opinions to which I have given utterance. Amidst their grief, and indignation, and tears, they still hope for better times. I talk to the common people, they shudder at the situation of the country. When they can do it in safety, they give way to feelings of madness and rage. They all agree that they owe their humiliation principally to England; that she has at length succeeded in what she has wished for centuries to accomplish; that the ruin of France is her object, the establishment of the Bourbons on her part a mere pretence; and that she has engaged in the royal conspiracy against liberty, to effect her particular views.

The rights and privileges which the people have, within a few months, wrung from their kings, do not escape observation. The courtesousness of Alexander, the recent principles promulgated by the Austrian, Prussian and Dutch monarchs, are attributed, not to their liberality, but to their fears. It will be found that there is no stopping midway. Mankind will enjoy all their rights or none. freedom or slavery. Ferdinand shows himself more intelligent than any of them. He has acted wisely in establishing the inquisition; an army of priests is the best that a tyrant can command. Let Louis, if he wishes to reign, follow his example; re-build the bastille, renew lettres de cachet, revive monks and nuns, and religious mummeries, they are of the essence of monarchy. In what besides consisted the former government of the Bourbons? did they not tumble together and share the same fate? Shake from a building its foundation, can it stand? The constitution which he now offers, will prove his certain ruin. It is impossible that there should not be among the representatives, who are to convene under it, a great many men of liberal and enlightened views. A political body thus composed, will, day after day trench upon his privileges, till as a king, he ceases to exist. Corruption, but still more a thousand old abuses deriving strength from their antiquity, sustain the royal branch of the English government. The king would cease to exist, if the representative body deserved the name or was differently constituted. The French legislative assembly may be corrupted, but the corruption will not be so available to royalty, because it will not be so nicely and perfectly systematized. The king of Wurtemberg thought to preserve, if not to strengthen his power by means of an assembly of deputies, named, not very fairly or generally, however, by the people. They were scarcely convened, when they began, according to his majesty, to intermeddle in affairs which did not concern them—they were forthwith dismissed. This very probably will be the fate of the Dutch and Prussian assemblies. In the present contest between the kings and the people, all the powers of government are necessary to the former. They must possess wealth, have armies at will, legislate, judge and execute; it is only in this way that they can sustain their pretensions. Divide the power they have usurped, with the people, let them participate—they set up their rights, privileges, and prerogatives, and pre-ensions, and wrongs disappear, and kings and aristocrats with them.—This is the natural course of things.

I have already mentioned the arrest of Labedoyere. He was colonel of a regiment at Grenoble; and was guilty, in common with the whole army and nation, of joining Bonaparte. He became a great favourite, and was elevated to a seat in the house of peers. I gave you a specimen of his violence, and his attachment to his master: he has been tried and found guilty of rebellion and treason. If he had opposed Bonaparte, but for his overthrow, he would in that case also have been guilty of the same crime, so that the people are placed in a pleasant dilemma, when two fellows, called kings, choose to come to blows with each other. His case is to be re-heard, but it is supposed he will be executed, and that too, under the auspices of Fouché. He has committed but one treason, and Fouché a dozen. Fouché voted for the death of Louis 16th—betrayed the republic—joined Napoleon—abandoned him—joined Louis 18th—abandoned him—joined Bonaparte again—again abandoned him—and is now prime minister of Louis.—A few weeks ago, he ordered Carnot to leave Paris; in consequence the following laconic and characteristic notes, passed between them:—Carnot—"Où reus, tu que j'aillie, traître?" Fouché—"Où tu voudras, i bachelier!" I saw him a night or two ago at madame Catalani's concert. He has lately married a young and beautiful woman; he has the appearance of being about sixty, and looks like the devil.

The common people, so far from believing that Bonaparte is sent to the island of St. Helena, do not believe that he has left France. This is one of the effects of an enslaved press; they confide in nothing that is published. I am told every day that he is still in the country. They yield with much difficulty and regret, to the idea of his absence, and they console themselves with the hope, that the archduke Charles will get possession of the throne, and occupy it as regent during the minority of Napoleon 2d. Those of them who do not take this ground, express their wishes unequivocally in favor of our free government and country, with the most enthusiastic admiration, and say, twenty years hence, we must revenge the cause of the French and other people of Europe.

I fell into conversation a few nights ago, at the opera, with a Hungarian officer; he spoke of the English government with much admiration, said that their government in Hungary was, next to it, the freest in Europe; that they enjoyed the shadow of liberty, which they must cherish, as they were deprived of the substance. I told him I was an American: "Then you are an inhabitant of the happiest and freest country on earth"—and so I have been told by Germans, Russians and Dutch.

What a singular spectacle Paris now exhibits.—Since the creation of the world nothing like it has been witnessed. Paris is no longer a French town. France is France no more. Walk the Boulevards, the gardens, the palais royal; visit the theatres, the coffee houses, you see a dozen foreigners for a Frenchman. You find yourself surrounded by groups of English, Russians, Cossacks, Scotch Highlanders, Prussians, Austrians, Hungarians, Germans, Dutch, Italians, all speaking their respective languages, wearing their own dresses, and indulging their peculiar tastes and habits, and presenting to you at one glance, something but belongs to the appearance of the inhabitants of every state in Europe. The scene is interesting and instructive, and might be gratifying, if I could abstract myself from those feelings of regret and indignation which it never fails to excite.

Colonel Labedoyere has been shot. A few hours before his execution, his wife, a beautiful young woman, threw herself at the feet of the king as he passed through the crowd to his carriage, and implored his pardon; it was brutally refused: she fainted away, and was carried off by her friends in a state of insensibility. Her agony would have forced tears down Pluto's iron cheek; but monarchs are above such weakness. The execution took place near the wood of Boulogne, amidst a crowd of indignant and sorrowful spectators. The unfortunate victim, with a firm countenance, his eyes fixed on the picture of his wife, which was held up to his view by a friend, gave himself his death signal; a ball entered his forehead, two others his breast, which he had exposed naked to their fire, and he fell without a groan.

Marshal Ney has arrived; his turn comes next; but it is probable that his wealth, his numerous connections, and above all his late base conduct in relation to Bonaparte, may prevent his condemnation. Such proceedings are as impolitic as they are cruel. Bonaparte suffered his very king and all the brood to return unmolested. He shed no blood but that of the invaders of France. I hoped that the magnanimous Czar de Cosack, d'Astrachan, de Pologne, de Siberie, de la Chersonese Taurique, &c &c &c would have intervened; but it is said that these prosecutions are carried on at the instance of the allied sovereigns. It is very clear that they would not prevail, but for their presence. The British government too, though their passions urge vengeance against traitors—and as Louis owes, after the Lord above, his crown to the Lord Castlereagh, the viceroy must, of course comply.

There is little of a public nature to excite interest at present. Things remain stationary. The kings are here and their armies, and we hear nothing of their ulterior views. Not one word is said of the probable time of their returning to their respective dominions; in the mean while, there is no want of gaiety and amusement; I go frequently to the theatre Francois—the pieces are well selected and admirably performed, every part is well sustained; but Talma and Mademoiselles George, Mars and Duchesnes are particularly distinguished. I have never before seen such excellent acting, altho' I have been present when Cooper in the U. S. and Keane and Miss O'Neal in London, performed some of their favorite parts. The little theatres, as they are called, are well worth attending. There are at least a dozen of them; they are open every evening, and for the most part well filled. I went a few nights ago, to the theatre Ambigu, Comique, to witness the representation of Washington, or the Pennsylvania Orphan. It has been brought upon the stage for twenty nights in succession. It is at least as much applauded as it deserves to be; and it gives me much pleasure to believe that the name is of great service to it. But, it is by no means destitute of merit, containing many fine sentiments, and is carried through triumph.

phantly by means of a ballet performed by little negroes. It might be improved at least on the score of costume and decorations. General Washington, for instance, is dressed in a full suit of British uniform; seems always to be in the fidgets, and is seated on a splendid throne with the youthful and beautiful orphan at his side, charmed with a ballet performed by blackamoors. I had a great mind to write to the manager, requesting him to give the general a little more gravity, and a blue coat, and to convert the negroes into Indians; but I thought it was very lucky that the general himself had not been made a dancer, and so declined interfering. The plot is taken from our revolution, and is composed of the stories of Haynes and Asgill. We are favorably exhibited; and that circumstance seems to be universally pleasing to the audience. The theatre is not in a very fashionable part of the town and is not crowded with foreigners. The audience is French.

We learn from a Frankfort paper, that France is to be divided into eight military districts—Blücher's head quarters are at Caen—Wellington at Paris—Barclay de Tolly at Milan—Wrede, with the Bavarians, at Auxerre—Schwartzenburg is stationed at Fontainebleau. The Wurtembergers occupy the department of Allier, &c.—and the Saxons and Badois, the Upper and Lower Rhine. Paris is to have the honor of being placed under the protection of corps, composed and mixed up of all this heterogeneous multitude. The great men are surrounded, night and day, by guards regularly changed, and taken alternately from their respective troops. I have the supreme gratification of living not only in the same street with, but nearly opposite a prince Schwartzenburg. The band which accompanies his guard, gives us delightful music. It is composed of about thirty performers; but, notwithstanding all this, and their magnificent costume to boot, the soldiers look mean and stupid and melancholy. I never see them, but they bring to my mind a gang of negroes trembling under the terrors of the overseer's cow-skin. But, then they serve to augment the volume of prince Schwartzenburg's greatness; and to what other use has the European herd ever been applied? are they not the beasts of the Arena, goaded on to fight for the sport and amusement of wanton and idle spectators?

Fouché has addressed a letter to the king. I send you a copy. No doubt is entertained of its genuineness; but the state of things is such, that it will not be printed. It is an able production. Infamous as he is, there is no denying his talents of a superior order, and to no country on earth are they more redoubtable than to the United States. However much he and Talleyrand differ on other points, they accord perfectly in their hostility to us—I have the following facts from good authority. Some years ago, these gentlemen, while ministers of Bonaparte, agreed with the British government to furnish them with 50,000 men, to be employed in our subjugation, on condition that England would aid in restoring St. Domingo to France. The plan was nearly matured. Bonaparte was ready, or affected to be, irritated at the measure, which seems to have been undertaken by the two arch-fiends, without his privacy, and forthwith dismissed Fouché from his service.

I have this information from two respectable men, members of the late legislature. Would it not now be a fine opportunity to renew this intrigue, for the double purpose of putting down republicanism, and relieving France from a portion of the banditti, by which she is oppressed? does any one believe that Castlereagh would object? nothing would be so gratifying to the British government as a war with us.

They deem it not only politic, but necessary. They already sow the seeds of conspiracy, and it will not be their fault, if the peace between the two countries is not brought to a very speedy conclusion.—No opportunity to injure and insult us, is suffered to escape. I have now a letter before me from Bordeaux, that states that the Americans are denounced as Bonapartists, forced to take the cockade from their hats, and otherwise ill-used, through machinations set on foot by the English.

Nothing can equal their arrogance; I heard an officer say, addressing himself to another, at a restaurant's, that for his part he was surprised that their government should give itself the trouble to conquer such a miserable nation as the French. In the estimation of these modest gentlemen, he allies gold for nothing. The famous battle of Waterloo was gilded by the coming up of Balow, with his Prussians: the English were beaten, and the 18th of June would have witnessed their total and final overthrow, but for the protection of their entrenchments. They give the entrenchments at New-Orleans the credit of our victory; and take my word for it, at Waterloo, they were equally indebted to them for their success.

Paris, September 1815.—Fouché and Talleyrand have been dismissed. The princes' party, or that of the bloody nun, as the duchess of Angoulême is called, has prevailed. Alexander threw himself into that scale, for the disinterested purpose of having the place filled by his minion the duke of Richelieu, formerly governor of some Russian province. It is probable that Louis's other royal friends will not be behind hand in similar proofs of good will and attachment. No one can regret the disgrace of Fouché; but, perhaps, he was in some measure necessary to prevent, at least to temper the terrible reaction with which France, and indeed the whole of Europe, is threatened.

Surely "the world's last hope," "the bulwark of our religion," must felicitate herself on the fulness of her triumph. Through her means, the inquisition flourishes in Spain—the order of Jesuits has been re-established—the pope has been enabled to protest against the constitution of Belgium, because it contains principles of toleration; and the protestants throughout France are plundered and assassinated by religious fanatics, who during the revolution and even the despotism of Bonaparte, were kept down with a strong hand and prevented from indulging in anarchy and bloodshed. An address on this subject, circulated clandestinely in Paris: it is sold at the protestant church, where I purchased one, which I will send you.

The hopes, which have been entertained by some, of the liberality of the allies, have given way to mortification and rage: the public property, and the public works, the safety of which was guaranteed by treaty, have been given up to robbery and ruin. The gallery of the Louvre has been stripped of its pictures; and the statues and vases have disappeared from its splendid apartments. I consider it as a happy event of my life, that I had an opportunity of contemplating this wonderful collection of the chef-d'œuvres of the pencil and the chisel, before they fell into the sacrilegious hands of Goths and Vandals. Scattered as they will now be over Europe, no such opportunities will ever again be afforded. France had obtained them by conquest; they had been secured to her by treaty. What title has the prince regent to the apollo belvedere, and the venus de medicis? would not bacchus sui his royal insignia infinitely better? during the perpetration of this flagitious spoliation, groups of indignant Frenchmen collected around the building—the allies became alarmed—regiments of troops were brought up, and the crowd dispersed. The doors were soon closed. I applied for permission to enter; but, upon being asked first, if I were an officer; and next, if I were an Englishman, and answering in the negative, was refused admittance.

A triumphal arch had been raised by Bonaparte on the Carrousel; on it was placed a gilt car, drawn by the celebrated horses of Corinth. These horses, the workmanship of Leusippus, after having travelled from Greece to Rome, to Byzantium, from Byzantium to Venice, and from Venice to Paris, are again in motion: they are destined to return on their footsteps. For a while, they will stop at Venice; but who can say, if the impulse given to barbarism by kings and priests shall not be arrested, that they may not fall into the hands of the infidel Turk, and again be restored to their faithful owners and their native state?

—You are, no doubt, anxious to know what opinions are entertained of us in the parts of Europe I visited.—The people generally of England and France, are profoundly ignorant of our government, position on the globe, and even complexion.—I landed a few miles from Liverpool near the mouth of the Dee. After walking about a mile over a barren heath, which was used as a warren, I entered what might be termed a snug and comfortable tavern. The landlord, a dull and heavy fellow, expressed his respect for the American, and his pleasure at the re-establishment of peace between the two nations; He added, that he had always considered them a mild, decent and great people; but he could not account for their submitting to the government of such a ferocious and blood-thirsty tyrant as Mr. Madison: For his part, he believed he was worse than Bonaparte.—There was nothing rude nor insolent in his manner; so, I set about coolly and deliberately to convince him of his mistake. He listened with perfect incredulity, and believes to this day, that the President of the United States is as savage as a chief of Anthropophagi.

I mentioned to you my going to the theatre Ambigu comique, to see the performance of Washington or the Pennsylvania Orphan. On entering the passage, I observed to the box keeper, a woman, (the women in Paris do every thing) that they were to perform an American piece to night.—“Yes, sir.”—Of course there were a number of American characters introduced.” Où est lui, monsieur, il'd beaucoup des Nègres.”—“Well, but (said I,) the Americans are not negroes.”—“Ma foi! then you believe the French are all fools.”—I thought it was useless to argue the point further, and walked in. The same remark has been made to me in England.

The Americans here, very much to their mortification, are generally taken for Englishmen; if not for Englishmen, for Germans, Spaniards, any thing, but what they are. When you mention you are an American, then you are asked, when you left Martinique, or if you know Mr. such-a-one in Guadaloupe. I suppose in Spain you would be deemed an inhabitant of Mexico or Peru; and, in Denmark, of St. Thomas.—The people of England know little of us, and hold us in affected contempt or real hatred. The people of France are as ignorant; but admire and respect us. I do not speak of fanatics, or Bourbonists. During my residence now of some months in Paris, I never received the slightest insult; unless indeed, when I was taken for (to use their expression) a monsieur God-damn.—To obviate this inconvenience, some of our citizens, immediately previous to and during the siege, wore the cockade; but the eagle converted them into Prussians, or at all events marked them as strangers. All strangers were their enemies, except Americans; they were rarely thought of or recognized. The governments of Europe know our strength and weakness, abhor our institutions, and envy our prosperity. It would be well, if they were as unacquainted with and thought as seldom of us, as their illiterate and miserable subjects.

In the rude and hasty remarks, which I have submitted to you, it is probable that errors both of opinion and of fact may have found their way, silly were my impressions at the time; they are so generally still. The only mistakes which I now recollect, are those relative to the destruction of the porcelain manufacture at Seve, and the advice said to have been given to Napoleon, by Lucien Bonaparte on the subject of his resignation. The porcelain manufacture, although much injured and pillaged, was not destroyed.—And I have reason to believe that the conduct of Lucien Bonaparte was entirely different from what I supposed, when I wrote to you. He denounced, in the strongest terms, the feeble and foolish views of the legislature; opposed their reliance on the promises of the allies; predicted the deplorable events which have ensued; and urged the emperor to persevere in a resistance which if it had not saved France from subjugation, would at least have protected her from disgrace.

Kingdom of the Netherlands.

Hague, Oct. 16, 1815.

The opening of the session of the states general took place this morning. His majesty the king made the following speech:—

“In the course of the session which I this day open, according to the constitution, important interests will be submitted to your deliberations.

“Since the spring, extraordinary efforts have been prescribed by events which it was impossible to foresee. Every Belgian loves to turn his eyes upon this period, which is that of the establishment of the national independence—and a sentiment so general will lighten the sacrifices which it shall judge indispensably necessary to require. Treasures have been necessary to arm, in a short space of time, whole lines of fortresses, to double the national army, and to maintain the still more numerous armies of our allies. You will be informed of all that has been done on these different heads, as well as of the considerable burdens they have caused to our finances. In these circumstances, justice requires more than ever, that the state should acquit itself towards its creditors: a great number of them belong to the countries which have already felt the evils attendant upon war. However, in combining the measures relative to this subject, I have most carefully consulted the means of my faithful subjects. I have applied myself to alleviate the burden and to render it equal, by distributing it over several years and among all classes of society; so that I flatter myself that these measures will be found wholly worthy of the approbation of the states general.

“The estimates of the expences of the following year, and of the means of meeting them, will be an equally serious object of deliberation for your high magnificence. But I persuade myself that the result will be salutary in every respect, and that a prudent introduction of taxes of the same kind, will put an end to the constraints which the mutual communications of some parts of the kingdom render expensive for a moment.

“Among the laws already in force for some of our provinces, and which, under certain modifications, it will be proper to make applicable to all, that on the national militia deserves to be distinct; our common aim will doubtless be to make the execution of a uniform for all the Belgians, according to the principles of the union; and even though this institution may remain for years susceptible of progressive improvement no trial can appear to us too difficult—no effort too great, when the point in question is to establish the firmest bulwark of the general security.

"However your high mightinesses may indulge the hope that the next year, less stormy than this has been, will not require unforeseen or exorbitant sacrifices, it is probable that I shall speedily have to communicate to you a general treaty of the sovereigns at present in arms, which will give new guarantees for the tranquillity of Europe.

"Thus we shall at length behold the time when the legislator, restored to his true destination, will employ all his faculties in the amelioration of morals, as the encouragement of public instruction, in a wise reform of the establishments for the poor.

"Already have peace, and the confidence it inspires, revived several branches of ancient industry. Commerce will find now aliment, not only in the colonies which the low countries have recovered, and for the occupation of which very expensive preparations have just been completed, but also in those which I was obliged to cede last year.

"The supplementary convention on this head with Great Britain will be doubly agreeable to you, as confirming the loyal and beneficent dispositions of this powerful ally, as well as the care with which I watch on every side over the commercial interests of my kingdom. With the aid of divine providence, mean to persevere, without remission, and without deviating from impartial justice towards all, in the exercise of the duties imposed on me. Your co-operation in the general measures renders you witnesses, and, as one may say, guarantees of the purity of the views of the government.

"Employ the influence which your virtues and knowledge insure you, and which will be confirmed by frank and unanimous application, to the interests of the country, in confirming or reviving in peoples minds calmness and security. Let the time soon come when every one of our countrymen shall indulge with full confidence in his representatives and his king—for the peaceful enjoyment of the rights which the constitution secures to all the citizens, in a manner equally clear and irrevocable.

REMONSTRANCE OF THE BELGIAN BISHOPS TO THE KING OF THE NETHERLANDS.

The Belgian bishops have presented the following address to the king of the Netherlands:—

"Sire—We believe it our duty no longer to delay expressing to your majesty the surprise and the grief which your proclamation of the 18th of this month (July) has caused us.

"In the conviction that it is the first duty of the bishops to speak the truth to the throne, when the grand interests of religion are in question, we now fulfil this duty with the more confidence and frankness, as your majesty frequently testified to us your intention to protect religion with all your power, and as in that very proclamation which is the cause of our uneasiness, you assure to the catholic church its establishment and its privileges.

"Sire, the existence and the privileges of the catholic church, in this part of your kingdom, are inconsistent with an article of the plan of the new constitution, by which equal favor and protection are promised all religions.

"Since the conversion of the Belgians to christianity, such a dangerous innovation has never been introduced in these provinces, unless by force. The attempt of Joseph the second to maintain it was fruitless. The tyranny of the late french government established it in theory; but no religious troubles ensued, because the head of the state protected the protestant sects as little as he did the catholic church.—After this power, the declared enemy of all religion was overthrown, the Belgian church recovered aether spiritual rights. In the ordinance of March 7, 1814, which the commissioners of the allied powers expressly confirmed, the general government of Belgium declared, "Henceforward the ecclesiastical power and the temporal power will be inviolably maintained in their respective limits, as they are fixed by the canon law, and by the ancient constitution of the country.

"Sire, we do not hesitate to declare to your majesty, that the canonical laws, which are sanctioned by the ancient constitutions of the country, are incompatible with the projected constitution which would give in Belgium equal favour and protection to all religions.

"The canonical laws have always rejected schism and heresy from the bosom of the church. The christian emperors thought it their duty to maintain these laws, and to secure their execution, as may be easily seen in the collection of edicts upon this subject.

"From Charlemagne down to the unhappy epoch of 1781, and the following years, all the sovereigns of this country in every age, exclusively protected the apostolic and Roman catholic religion, and secured to it the undisturbed enjoyment of all the rights and privileges, in the possession of which they found it.

"The council of Trent, all whose resolutions were published in these provinces, and have there the force of ecclesiastical law, after confirming all the old laws of the church, which fix the jurisdictions, the rights of the bishops, of the chapters, of the universities, and in general of the regular and secular clergy, commanded the bishops to see the execution of them; and carefully to watch not only over the maintenance of the sacred pledge of the faith, but also that of the laws which concern the essential discipline of the catholic church, and secure the consistency and the inviolability of its government.

"These, sire, are the duties of the bishops of these provinces, and the laws of the country have constantly allowed and facilitated the fulfilment of them, till a higher power prevented them in part from discharging them.

"If your majesty, when you secure to the Belgic church her existence and privileges, has the intention, as we conjecture, to maintain the entire execution of the holy canon law, we are incapable of duty expressing our thanks to your majesty for it. But we most respectfully take the liberty to lay before your majesty, an article of the new constitution, which, in securing the same protection to all religions, would be incompatible with the free and entire exercise of our official duties.

"We are bound, sire, incessantly to preserve the people entrusted to our care, from the doctrines which are in opposition to the doctrines of the catholic church. We could not release ourselves from this obligation without violating our most sacred duties; and if your majesty, by virtue of a fundamental law, protected in these provinces the public profession and spreading of these doctrines, the progress of which we are bound to oppose with all the care and energy which the catholic church exacts from our office, we should be in formal opposition to the laws of the state, to the measures which your majesty might adopt to maintain them among us, and in spite of all our endeavours to maintain union and peace, the public tranquillity might still be disturbed.

"And since, by article 136 of the proposed constitution, the public exercise of a form of worship may be hindered, when it might disturb the public tranquillity, it follows that the free exercise of our religion might be hindered by a possible consequence of the rights and liberties of the catholic church in these provinces.

"We dare not conceal from you, sire, that such regulations, if they were confirmed by your majesty, could only tend to a renewal of the troubles which desolated these provinces in the 16th century: and that they must, sooner or later, alienate the hearts of your faithful subjects in this part of your kingdom, where the attachment to the catholic faith is stronger, and more lively than in any other country in Europe.

"Already the proclamation of your majesty, which announced that the new constitution should ensure the liberty of religion, and give all equal favour and protection, filled every heart with consternation. It is known that this dangerous system is one of the main articles of the modern philosophy, which has been the source of so many misfortune to us—that evidently aims at exciting indifference to all religions; at lessening their influence from day to day, and destroying them in the end entirely.

"We are bound, sire, to tell you the truth in its full extent. The clergy of these provinces have not observed without pain, that your majesty has been persuaded to exclude them from the assemblies in which the great interests of the state were discussed; that the plan of the new constitution contains distinctions for the nobility, and that the clergy, once the first class in the state, is deprived of them; that it will not even have the right of being represented in the provincial assemblies; that its influence on the acceptance of the new constitution is carefully removed, so that the expressions of your majesty's proclamations, are not among the persons most worthy of the confidence of their fellow-citizens: lastly, that they are not allowed to inscribe their disapproving votes on the lists of electors.

"All these are measures (we say it with grief to your majesty) which can appear to us only as an unhappy omen for the future, since your majesty's ministers already account the opinions and votes of the whole clergy for nothing—upon subjects which are as much within their cognizance as that of other private persons—nay, their peculiar province as far as the interest of religion is concerned.

"It is impossible to calculate all the ill consequences that may arise from the continuation of such a plan; for if the catholic clergy are no more to be consulted upon the concerns of the church, if it is decided that they can have no share, or at least only an accidental share, in making the laws, especially those relative to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, how can they hinder any encroachment upon the inalienable rights of the episcopal dignity which belong to the catholic church, and to the privileges which your majesty ensures to it? May they not be arbitrarily lessened in national assemblies, when the clergy have no influence, or at the most, a very precarious one?

"Experience has proved how important it is, that the clergy possess a high rank in the state. The respect they enjoy extends to the region itself, which teaches it. However great the personal merit of the servants of the church may be, yet in our times, if it is not supported by high rank and legal privileges, which ennoble the functions of the priesthood in the eyes of the people, the clergy can oppose but a weak bulwark to the disorders which it has continually to contend with. The interest, peace and welfare of a state, depend chiefly on the state of morals. There are no good morals where there is no religion. As things now stand, religion is more or less respected, in proportion as its servants are more or less honoured and respected, according to the existing laws. It is easy to confine the good in due bounds, but the wicked dare every thing against a clergy which does not enjoy a certain respect in the state.

"Your majesty has doubtless remarked, that the catholic religion, which was established again in France by the cordons, did not produce the expected effect, because by the system of the sovereign, the clergy enjoyed no rank, no consideration, no influence in the state. They were to be accounted as nothing; they were oppressed by all the inferior authorities; they soon became, as it was intended they should, incapable of exercising good, or of preventing evil.

"We have the confidence that your majesty will deign, in the submissive and respectful representations which we make to you, in the frank expressions of our sentiments, to see only the fulfilment of one of our most important duties under present circumstances, only a new proof of our devotion to your sacred person, only the sincere wish that your majesty may reign over these fine provinces in constant peace, by a perfectly paternal government, and by a powerful and durable union between the clergy and the royal authority.

"We are, with the profoundest veneration, your majesty's most humble, obedient, and faithful servants.

Blucher's Letter.

FROM A LONDON PAPER.

[The following letter, from prince Blucher to his majesty the king of Prussia, is in circulation; it is said to have been published to the whole army under his command.]

"Your majesty has been graciously pleased to order that the army shall receive its arrears of pay; but as no thing has yet been received in France, his highness the chancellor prince Hardenberg has given orders to M. Von Bulow, the minister of the finances, to draw the necessary sums from our own country. Your majesty will allow me to express to you openly and without reserve, my opinion and request, and that of the army. Upon our advance into France we were animated with the wish to acquire nothing for ourselves but honor; but on the other hand, to relieve our distressed country, and enable your majesty to heal the wounds which long miseries, and his ill arrogance have inflicted upon our country in general, and upon every individual family. For this reason I demanded a contribution of one hundred millions of francs from Paris.

and of this sum I wished to apply only a part to the use of the army, and therefore proposed to your majesty to allow the army two months' pay, which was graciously granted; but as all erol circumstances render this impossible, the whole army will not only joyfully renounce the two months' pay, but we most humbly beseech your majesty to let no more money be paid us a present, than what is absolutely necessary for the wounded. We will rather submit to the greatest privation, than draw to France the revenues of the state, which are raised with so much difficulty, and thus enrich this desolated country, and destroy in the bad the reviving prosperity of our native land.

Ferdinand & the Inquisition.

Among the curious but disgusting papers we are daily receiving from Spain, indicative of the debased state of that country, and the rapid progress of the inquisition and the Jesuits, under the benign auspices of the beloved Ferdinand, we present our readers with a translation of the Easter instructions, communicated by the holy office of the inquisition, in the diocesan bishops, for the information and government of the confessors of their respective districts.

Easter instructions of the holy office to confessors.

"Among the delicate and weighty matters which worthily occupy the attention of his majesty's council of the supreme and general inquisition, it finds that it is preferably called upon to attend to the true, good and spiritual relief of those persons, who, through debility and natural weakness, ignorance, malice, or perverseness of heart, are contaminated with any one or more of the errors and even heresies belonging to the different nations which have occupied the soil of Spain. Wherefore, availing itself of the opportunity of the approaching fulfillment of the Easter precept, and desirous that all the faithful should prepare and dispose themselves to comply with this, in a worthy manner, it has resolved to lay down the junctions of the holy office, for one year only, purporting, that all secular and regular confessors, approved by the diocesan bishop, shall be informed in what manner they are to conduct themselves towards their penitents, who may have incurred any external mixed heresy, and in the manner and form established and adopted in the holy office, with advantage to the faithful, even though they may have perverted whenever they may have acknowledged their errors, and subject themselves to the following instructions.

"1st. He shall, with the greatest efficacy, persuade the penitent to accuse himself to his own confessor, of the errors and heresies into which he may have fallen, without promising him the benefit of absolution under another form; assuring him of the inviolable secrecy he will keep, as well as is kept in the holy office, and that the least injury shall not result to him therefrom; on the contrary, it shall prevent him from being punished, if he should be accused by any person of the errors and heresies it may be proper to manifest; which if he should not do, he remains exposed to the usual penalties.

"In the second place, if the said penitent should consent, the confessor shall take down his declaration, under oath to speak the truth, which shall be headed in the following manner: 'In the town of N on N day of the year, N before the undersigned confessor, spontaneously appeared N,' &c. stating his age, country, and profession, &c. and he shall write down, in the most specific terms, all his errors, the circumstances thereof, time and place in which the same were committed, seen or heard; and if any persons were present, they shall be named, and he shall specify all that is known of them. The confessor shall cause him to sign the declaration, if he knows so how to do, and if not, he shall make a cross, and the confessor shall always sign with him.

"In the third place, he shall make him abjure the heresy, and absolve him, by reconciling him to the church; he shall enjoin him sacramentally to confess all his errors, and impose the penances he may consider adequate. When all has been done, the same shall be forwarded on to the tribunal of the holy office.

"Lastly—if the most efficacious persuasions should not be sufficient to overcome the penitent, on finding him well disposed and influenced by due detestation, he shall absolve him from the excommunication for the present, explaining this to the penitent for his own information and government.—When this measure shall have been adopted by the confessor, he shall send due notice of the same to the tribunal.

"And that if the above may have its due effect, the same is communicated to you to the end, that through your hands it may pass to the knowledge of the confessors of your jurisdiction and district.

"Our Lord preserve you many years, &c."

Legitimate Blessings of Spain.

FROM THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

"Tyrants (said Alonso the wise) prefer acting for their own interest, although contrary to the good of the country, to acting for the common advantage of all, because they always fear to lose their crown.—And that they may work their own will the more easily, they always use their power against the people, in three modes of subtle policy. The first is, to make their subjects foolish and fearful, because then they will not dare to lift their heads against them, or oppose their desires: the second is, to put discord amongst them, in such wise that they trust not one another, because then they will not talk against them, lest their secret should not be kept; the third is, to make them poor. And above all, they crush the powerful and the learned, and take care to forbid all meeting, and great concourse of people.

"This observation of the sapient king, his successors appear to have diligently reduced to practice. Every endeavor has been used to make the upper classes foolish and fearful; and we must say, with a success proportioned to the grandeur of the design. The grandees have not appeared in the cortes since the end of the fifteenth century. The court, indeed, never permits them to go out of its sight; they are always either at Madrid, or at the royal residences called the Sitios. There they are indulged with ribands, keys, and other playthings; but by no means allowed to have any connexion with their tenantry, or to derive any power but from royal favor. One of them having asked permission to visit his estates, was told that if he went there he must stay. Their property is consequently mismanaged; and six or seven estates, accumulated in one person, are often the bane of the country, but never give strength to their possessor. Thus, shorn of the natural influence of wealth, they consume their revenue in splendid palaces, in fees which have been known to cost 25 or 40,000 ducats, and in dress proportionably expensive. They view with fear and trembling the drawings of displeasure in the court favorite; and submit to any degradation for a permission to glitter in the society of the capital—the only scene in which they are fit to appear.

"The reign of the prince of peace compleded the dissolution of morals. The road to preferment, during that disgraceful period, lay through the prostitution of all principle—the surrender of a friend's secret, or of a daughter's honor. Vice, thus encouraged, soon led to want, which brought new sacrifices to her shrine; and the whole of the upper ranks were reduced to base unblushing, and beggarly couriers.

"The inquisition of modern times turned its attention from heresies in faith, to improvements in knowledge, and observances of society; in which it displayed equal vigilance, and caused equal terror. The pile, indeed, was no longer lighted for Jews or Protestants; but young men were dragged to prison from the bosom of their family, perhaps by the order of a relation, for venting too freely the abstract speculations of their college. Education, neglected among the nobility, was an ordeal to those who embraced a liberal profession. An improper book, or a useful invention, were equally denounced by the formidable ministers of the holy office.—Dulness and ignorance spread their wings over the whole land.

"It may give some idea of the system of the court, to mention their behaviour to the excellent and lamented Jovellanos. Some time after he had been disgraced for an attempt to improve his country, he was sent to a convent in Majorca. There he amused himself in the benevolent task of instructing the inhabitants of Palma; many of whom of the richest families knew not how to read and write.—His kindness and amiable manners soon made him beloved; which, being reported at Madrid, an order arrived for his close confinement in the castle of Bellver.

"The most striking defects of the nation, are the ignorance and corruption of the higher orders—the ignorance and apathy of the lower. The government has contributed largely to the former; and is far from guiltless in relation to the latter.

"Political economy seems to have been cultivated in Spain, only to show how contrary her laws were to all the precepts of science. Many branches of trade were monopolized by the government—agriculture was restrained, in order to promote manufactures, which have never flourished—the peasantry were subject to many heavy burdens—discouraged in their most laudable pursuits—and fettered in their most innocent amusements. The overwhelming estates of the grandees; the vast property of the church; the want of roads, canals, coals, and wood; the number of holidays; and many more impediments which it would fill a volume to enumerate—have so checked the industry of the middling orders, that they have long ago given up their hopes of wealth, for the blessings of ignorance and inactivity. The whole kingdom is one large castle of indolence. The people of the interior (for Andalusia has more muslin and duplicity) have all the rudeness, the frankness, and the romance of the dark ages; no mechanical inventions; no moral discoveries; have penetrated that tranquil region. The power which took away the means of improvement, extinguished with it the desire to improve; and a spell of enchantment seems to forbid any wish to escape from the easy insignificance in which the nation is bound. A Spaniard, with a tolerable house to cover him, money enough to pay for his subsistence and a bad cigar, is quite indifferent as to what the world may do or think. Sometimes a constable crosses his way; he grumbles, wraps himself in his cloak, and is satisfied with the sun of his climate. And without pretending to attach too great weight to physical cause, it is impossible to deny that the natives of a warm climate find a great consolation for all misfortunes, in the sensations inspired by fine weather, and the intoxication of a tepid air.

"It was known, that, besides all these imbecilities of superstition which disgraced his (Ferdinand's) return—besides the re-establishment of the inquisition—besides the exile, on various grounds or pretexts, of several thousand families, he had thrown into prison more than five thousand persons, for no other crime than that of administering or seconding a government which all Europe had recognized, which had resisted all the offers of Bonaparte, and under whom the resistance was made to which he owed his crown."

Spain.

[Translated for the Boston Palladium.]

MADRID, JULY 31

On the re-establishment of the Jesuits in Spain.

The king our master has received from his holiness Pius 7th, a letter of which the following is a translation:

"Our very dear son in Jesus Christ, health and apostolic benediction. The sentiments of generous piety, which have excited the royal heart of your majesty, have been confirmed as is manifest, when desirous of doing a distinguished benefit to the religion of Jesus Christ, your majesty has resolved to re-establish the Company of Jesus. We give your majesty the most affectionate thanks for the copy of your royal decree, which you have sent us, and much more for the filial deference which your majesty discovers for our counsels. May the father of mercies send down his blessing on his religious disposition of your majesty, and cause your reign to prosper more every day for the good of your most faithful subjects, and principally of the church, of which your majesty manifests yourself the defender in your states, with so much glory to yourself and consolation to us. We supplicate and will incessantly supplicate the Lord to pour his celestial grace on the person of your majesty, to establish your majesty more each day in the maxims which render you a king truly catholic in your submission to the Holy See, and in your love for the father of all the faithful; being able in the mean time to assure your majesty that we love you with the greatest tenderness, and that with the greatest effusion of our heart we give our paternal, apostolic benediction to your majesty and to all your royal family.

Given at Rome, Sta. Maria, Maggiore, the 22d of July, in the year 1815, 17th year of our Pontificate."

PIUS 7th.

His majesty has also received the following letters, which the vicar general of the Company of Jesus, and the Spanish monks of the same company, residents in Italy, have equally directed to him from Rome.

"Sacred Catholic Royal Majesty,

The re-establishment of the company of Jesus, ordained by your majesty in all your most happy dominions, is so glorious for it, that it not only makes it forget all the very heavy misfortunes which it has suffered for the space of half a century; but causes it also to rejoice in having suffered them, and even to count them among the most extraordinary favours of Heaven.—Therefore, with the liveliest expressions of our tongue, and with the most obsequious affections of our heart, we render thanks to your majesty, because you have, in a moment, effaced all stains with which our enemies have disgraced it for so many years, and have caused to appear in the face of the whole world more glorious than before. So singular a benefit will remain eternally engraven on our hearts, and will oblige the whole company to shew itself perpetually grateful, redoubling in activity to correspond faithfully to the most pious end for which your majesty has deigned to re-establish it.

"In the mean time we will all prostrate ourselves before the altars of the Most High to implore the completion of all spiritual and temporal blessings on your majesty, your royal family, and your beloved subjects. And I, in the name of all, presenting myself before the sublime throne of your majesty, beg our Lord to preserve and prosper your important life a long course of years.

"Your christian, royal majesty's humble, submissive and obsequious servant.

JUAN JEREVI, vicar general of the Company of Jesuits.

Rome, July 1st, 1815.

"Sire—We, the Spanish monks of the Company of Jesus, residents in Italy, most faithful subjects of your majesty, present ourselves at your royal feet to express to you our sentiments of loyalty, gratitude and obedience, for the royal dispatch of the 29th of May, with which you have condescended to call the Company of Jesus into your dominions.

"Sire, this beneficence has obliterated from our remembrance forty-three years of misfortunes; neither should we name them, if your majesty had not deigned to mention them with so much goodness. But all vanishes in our minds at the splendor of a sovereign, of a father so religious, so beneficent, and so worthy of our veneration.

"In adversity, we gloried to have shown ourselves faithful to our sovereign and lovers of our country. This is a very sure pledge of the love, respect and gratitude which animates us at a time in which your majesty has given us the greatest proof that a monarch can give of his benevolence and his piety.

"Correspondent to these sentiments are those of our eternal gratitude, which we would explain if any expressions would manifest it in full extent. The prompt obedience and submission to the orders of your majesty will supply the want of them and demonstrate it in part.

"We will fly, sire, to employ our forces, and what remains to us of life, in the exercise of our functions, to make the best return in our power, for the incomparable benefit which you have conferred upon us, to serve your majesty and our beloved country, and to fortify in the hearts of the loyal Spaniards the spirit of religion and of love for their sovereign, of which, to the astonishment of Europe, they have lately given such sublime examples.

"Our Lord preserve the precious life of your majesty the many years that christianity and the country require.

"Sire, at the royal feet of your majesty, your most submissive, obsequious and faithful subjects,

"The Spanish monks of the Company of Jesus, resident in Italy."

Rome, July 1, 1815."

The Pope's Allocution.

FROM THE LONDON COURIER.

ROME, SEPT. 6.

Allocution of his holiness pope Pius VII. in the secret consistory, held the 4th of September, 1815.

Venerable Brothers—You have perhaps been surprised that to this moment we have not imparted our joy to you; yet doubt not that it would have increased my satisfaction could you have sooner participated in it.

We would have wished to apprise you earlier of the restitution of several of our provinces, both that we might testify our gratitude to the sovereign dispenser of all good, with that solemnity which is due for so great a benefit, and also to the glorious monarchs from whom, next to God, we have received so great a kindness.

But now that the convention relative to the restoration of our provinces, in execution of the decree of congress, is concluded with the minister of our dear son in Jesus Christ, Francis II. Emperor of Austria, &c. and our jurisdiction completely established, we may give a free course to our joy, which we have with difficulty restrained, and following the custom of the Holy See, let us rejoice at our success in this business.

Scarcely had we been in the course of the last year delivered from our captivity, when we directed our first attention to the affairs of the catholic church over which, all unworthy as we are, we preside, and which will always have the first place in our thoughts. With regard to these affairs, it appeared to us that we ought to have nothing so much at heart as the obtaining the restitution of all the provinces which compose the patrimony of St. Peter, of the possession of which the holy See has been deprived in these times of error and wickedness, being bound thereto by our character of administrator, and by the oath which we took when raised to the supreme Pontificate.

In consequence, as soon as our dear son Cardinal Hercules Gonsalvi, Deacon of St. Agatha, alla Sabazia, had rejoined us, we sent him to Paris as well to offer to our dear son in Jesus Christ, the christian king Louis, our congratulations on the recovery of his hereditary kingdom, as to commence with him and the other sovereigns in that capital active negotiations for the restoration of the possessions of the holy See. For that purpose, we addressed to each of these princes a brief, not doubting but that these illustrious monarchs would, from their own magnanimity, justice, and equity, be disposed to protect the cause of the church.—Nevertheless it was not fit that we should remain idle in so important an affair, and we did not neglect to implore their succor in the recovery of our provinces already delivered from invasion by the power of their arms.

Cardinal Gonsalvi arrived speedily at Paris, fulfilled the commission to his most christian majesty with which we had charged him, and was received by the king with those demonstrations of interest and love for us which we had reason to expect from his high virtues and his piety; and then proceeded without delay to London, where the allied sovereigns, with the exception of our very dear son in Jesus Christ, Francis II. Emperor of Austria, were assembled.

How could we suppress the feelings of joy and gratitude with which we were filled, on learning how our envoy was received in the opulent capital of so mighty a kingdom. He there renewed what had not been seen for two centuries, the spectacle of a Cardinal Legate and appeared publicly in London, with the permission of the government, decorated ted with the distinguishing marks of his dignity, in the same manner as he would have done in the capital of the christian world.

Our legate was immediately admitted to an audience of his royal highness the prince regent; he delivered to him our brief, offered him our congratulations and our friendship, as well for his royal highness as for the valiant English nation, which has covered itself with such glory.

The cardinal was received at the court of the prince regent with such marks of kindness and attachment to our person, that it was impossible to manifest more. And for this reason professing ourselves strongly attached to the prince regent, and to all the classes composing that generous nation, for which we already cherished the strongest inclination, we most cheerfully embrace this opportunity to give them a public testimony of our esteem, and of our warmest gratitude.

After delivering our brief to each of the sovereigns, our legate submitted to them the cause of the apostolic See, and solicited urgently and severally the restitution of each of the provinces, of which the holy See has been successively despoiled, in consequence of the revolution which commenced in 1789. He represented in an official note all the reasons upon which the incontestible rights of the holy See are founded, and in our name implored the same sovereigns to be pleased to take the Romish church under their just protection. Such was the kindness of the allied princes—such are the proofs which they have given of their good disposition towards us, that we have more and more reason to congratulate ourselves on our resolution, and to acknowledge, in a more particular manner, what good grounds we had to place so much hope on their authority and their kindness.

When it was determined that a congress should be held at Vienna, to treat of the political system of Europe, the cardinal legate, by our order, repaired thither, and presided (which he had not the opportunity of doing at Paris,) to our very dear son in Jesus Christ, Francis emperor of Austria, our briefs, our felicitations, and our representations. You are too well acquainted with the religion, piety, and good faith of that great monarch, to render any detail necessary here, of the favorable disposition he has shewn towards us. From the report of the cardinal, we can assure you that his majesty evinced the most favorable intentions, that he constantly expressed those intentions in the most reassuring language, and that they experienced no alteration until the definitive conclusion took place. We are persuaded that the fortunate success of our negotiation is chiefly owing to his good will towards us.

The sovereigns, as you know, had resolved to pass some months at Vienna. During that time our legate was employed on many other objects, both spiritual and temporal, relative to the Holy See and the church. We shall give you in due time an account of all his transactions. Meanwhile we cannot pass over the manner in which he supported the dignity of the Holy See, and the prerogative of his representatives. When there was a question of adjourning to an indefinite term, the difficult question of the precedence of the ministers of the European courts, our legate took particular care on that occasion to maintain the dignity of the apostolic see, and to render it even more imposing. We owe to the magnanimity of the illustrious monarchs, even to those (which ought the more to excite our gratitude) who are not united in communion with the church of St. Peter, the decree declaring that there shall be no innovation made with regard to the le-gates and nuncios of the holy see, who occupy the first rank among the ambassadors of sovereigns. In passing such a decree the doubtless and not in view our character of a temporal prince, since in that respect we are so much below the power of many other princes; they considered the dignity of our priesthood, and wished to take merit to themselves for honoring it.

Our legate having continued to maintain our interests, and to remove numerous difficulties, the temporal affairs of Rome were definitively terminated by a solemn decree of the congress, purporting that the holy see should regain possession of the Marches of Ancona, Macerata and Fermo, the duchies of Cambrino, Benevento, Ponte Corvo, and the provinces of Romano, Bologna and Ferrara, known under the denomination of the three legations, that part of the legation of Ferrara which is situated on the left of the Po, being however excepted.

Such O venerable fathers, is the cause for joy, and which we this day communicate to you, persuaded that this happy event will give you no less pleasure than we have experienced from it. The Lord God, who mortified and vivified, who humbled and exalted, after the days and years which we have passed together in our adversity, moved with compassion towards us, now, in his bounty, restores to us those provinces, of which we have so long been deprived, and deigns to prepare for us a grand consolation by adding still further to the splendor of the Roman church. If we experience so much joy, it certainly is not on our own account, we being far remote from all ambition of temporal grandeur, but from respect to God and his holy church.

The more extensive indeed the patrimony of St. Peter is, the more the sovereign pontiffs have it in their power to provide as they ought, by their functions and their dignity, for the wants of the church and the faithful throughout the whole world. We are therefore of opinion, that all the princes who favored our applications at Vienna, either personally or by their representatives, as was done with so much interest by our dear sons in Jesus Christ, Louis the most christian king, and Ferdinand the catholic king, as well as the prince royal of the Brazils, regent of Portugal, have deserved well not only of us but of the catholic church.

This glory, also shared by those princes who do not belong to the Romish church, and whom we have likewise found filled with good dispositions and kindness towards us. And whom ought we to name with greater honor than the august emperor of Russia, Alexander, a prince as illustrious for his military glory and his vicories, as for the wisdom of his government. This august monarch took cognizance of our claims with peculiar friendship, and supported our interests with all his power and authority. Could we pass over in silence the services rendered us by Frederick, king of Prussia, who has constantly shewn himself disposed in our favor? We have the same obligations to Charles king of Sweden, who has voluntarily concurred in, and so ardently wished for the settlement of our affairs. But how can we abstain from anew expressing our gratitude to his royal highness the prince regent of England, who has been so earnest in our behalf, that the orders which he himself gave have been of great advantage to our interests in the congress of Vienna. We acknowledge that we are the more obliged to these princes, because they had fewer motives for supporting and protecting the cause of the apostolic see. We will not finally forget the ministers plenipotentiary by whom the important affairs of the princes have been discussed at the congress; their services have been marked in our behalf, and by seconding with their councils and influence the excellent dispositions of their sovereigns, they have greatly contributed to the happy issue of the business of the church.

Let us loudly confess, O venerable brothers, that the consolation which we experience at the restitution of the provinces of which we have spoken, has not been so entire as we had hoped, in that the province of Avignon, acquired by the holy see, and possessed for five centuries, the county of Venaisin, likewise possessed by it during a longer space; and lastly, the province of Ferrara, situated on the left bank of the Po; all districts belonging to the holy see as much as the other ecclesiastical domains, remain still separate from their legitimate sovereign. We have through the ministry of our legate laid our acclamations on this subject before congress: we have moreover petitioned our dearly beloved sons in Jesus Christ, Francis, emperor of Austria, and Louis, the most christian king, under whose government these countries lie, that they would, with that magnanimity which belongs to them, restore them to the holy see. We hope that our labours will not be unproductive. We have placed great confidence in the tried religion and piety of these two princes, and we doubt not but that sovereigns so great, so powerful, will perfect their glory, either by restoring to us the possession of territories which belong to St. Peter, or indemnifying us for their loss by some equivalent compensation.

Nevertheless, that the delay of restitution or compensation might not prejudice the rights of the holy see, our legate made a legal protest to congress against their retention both in our name and in that of the apostolic see. He delivered a copy of that protest to the ministers of all the princes who had signed the treaty of Paris of the 31st May, 1814, which treaty was ratified at Vienna. He joined thereto a note, in which he stated in detail, the reasons for making such a protest, and formally requested their insertion in the protocol of the congress.

You may, venerable brothers, take cognizance of the protest and note. We have ordered that these two documents, one written in Latin, the other in French, should be communicated to you, with the Italian translation, in order that all arbitrary interpretation may be avoided. You will also see, that our legate has, in these two documents, protested against the article of the decree of the congress of Vienna, by which the emperor of Austria and his successors are authorised to establish garrisons in Ferrara and Comacchio. That measure, which attacks the independent rights of sovereignty of the apostolic see, may disturb the exercise of the legitimate jurisdiction, prejudice the neutrality of the ecclesiastical state, and expose it to hostilities in time of war.

Having spoken of the temporal interests of the Roman church, it remains for us to advert to the ecclesiastical interests of Germany, which have not been forgotten by our legate. Flattered by the hope that the new order of things establishing in Germany might concur with our views in repairing the great injuries which the church has experienced in that country, we enjoined our legate to direct all his attention to that subject, as being one of the greatest importance. This he continued to do from the opening of the congress until its close. A commission was formed of the ministers and princes of Germany, to whom the affairs of that country were specially referred. A note, containing all our claims, was addressed to that commission, in which were given particular details on the injuries which the spiritual rights and interests of the church had sustained, and that the wisdom of the sovereigns was solicited to apply a remedy to these evils. The wishes long expressed by all good catholics, and those of our paternal heart, having been seconded, we hoped with the concurrence of said princes to provide for the urgent wants of the church. However, the congress was about to dissolve without settling any thing respecting the affairs of the catholic church. The same day the legate notified the protest of which we have spoken, and which was relative to the temporal affairs of the holy see; he presented another with a note of his hand to the ambassadors of the sovereigns, relative to the spirituals and temporals of the church of Germany. We shall abstain from farther observations on this subject, as copies of the protest and the note will be laid before you. After having definitively terminated every thing regarding our person, and which served to secure the rights of the holy see, we doubt not that the princes, convinced on their part of the importance of this object, and its interest to themselves, will devote their cares to promote the interests of the church, and take such steps as may enable them to regulate all the ecclesiastical affairs of Germany. We hope this the more confidently, as we have just learned, that at a new congress which is soon to open the affairs of Germany itself will be regulated on a permanent basis. We hope that in this congress, particular attention will be paid to the affairs of the church—Religion being the most solid basis of empires, and the firmest support of public felicity, sovereigns and all governments are essentially interested in defending and protecting it.

In order that we may not fail in our duty to support the rights of the church, and the holy apostolic see, which we are bound to preserve in all their integrity, we confirm with our full apostolic authority, the two protests made by our legate, relative to the rights and interests as well of the holy see, as of the church of Germany, in the same manner as is declared by the apostolic bull which we have already issued.

We cannot terminate our speech, without testifying our entire satisfaction of our legate, for having so worthily performed the duties we entrusted to his execution. Though his modesty rejects the praise, it is a homage rendered to truth, to manifest the sentiments of our heart. His justice, probity, and talents have merited our good will, since the commencement of our pontificate, and nothing could give us greater pain, than the being obliged to separate from him. In France, during the time of our captivity, he gave us proofs of his constancy and fidelity, we therefore conferred upon him a legation, full of difficulty, in which he perfectly fulfilled what we expected from his talents and his devotion to our person, and the interests of the catholic church, in conforming to our orders with the greatest punctuality, and a zeal above all praise. He has terminated with the most worthy success, the mission with which we charged him. He has therefore deserved well of the holy see, and we owe him this public eulogium.

It is now our duty, O venerable brothers, to unite our prayers, in order to render to God, the author of all good, and whose special protection we have lately experienced, the just tribute of the thanks we owe him; and since we are persuaded that he has granted us so many favors through the intercession and merits of the most glorious virgin Mary and the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, we wish on the day consecrated to the nativity of that holy virgin mother of God, after the solemn mass celebrated in our presence in the cathedral of the prince of apostles, address to God our thanks-givings with psalms and hymns, and we will then offer the tribute of our homage to the most holy Mary and to the glorious princes of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, in order that by their powerful intercessions, God, along with the most ample gifts with which he has gratified us, may grant a perfect tranquillity to the church of which we are the visible head, and give unto all the princes whose benevolence we and the holy see have experienced, an increase of glory and happiness.

Order of the Russian Emperor.

After the late review of the Russian army at Vertus, the emperor Alexander issued the following ORDER OF THE DAY.

Camp at Vertus, Aug. 30—Sept. 11.

"Treason and the perfidious designs of the enemy of public repose have brought you, brave warriors, to the same plains in which last year, after having vanquished him, you opened to yourselves, in following his tract, the road to Paris. Thanks to the Almighty, your valor already sufficiently known to the world, has not been put to new proofs.

"The general measures adopted by the allied powers put a stop to the audacity of Napoleon Bonaparte before your assistance in the field was necessary. He himself has been obliged to surrender a prisoner. You have not the less demonstrated, by a rapid march from the banks of the Dnieper and the Dwina to those of the Seine, that the tranquillity of Europe is not foreign to Russia, and that notwithstanding the immensity of the distance, you are always ready to combat for justice whenever the voice of your country and your sovereign may call you.

"In now sending you back to your country so dear to you, it is pleasing to me to have to express to my brothers in arms my gratitude for the zeal and order which I have observed in inspecting your ranks in the plains of Champagne. The remembrance of that review, in which before the allied sovereigns and their generals, the regiments of the line and the artillery rivalled each other in the order and precision of their movements, and in the good condition of their arms and equipments, will always be present to my memory. I thank you at the same time for the maintenance of strict discipline, and for the regular conduct which you have constantly observed in foreign countries, and to which the inhabitants do perfect justice.

[Here follows the emperor's thanks to the prince Barclay de Tolly, and the chief officers of the army, &c.]

"May the benediction of the eternal accompany you in your march to your homes.—His all powerful hand, in preserving you from the evils which accompany war, indicates to you the path which ought to re-conduct you to the bosom of your families; be grateful for his infinite bounty, by constantly following his laws, and unceasingly recollecting that divine mercy has been to you particularly favorable, because you have always placed all your hopes in God.

(Signed)

"ALEXANDER."

After the review of the Russian army, the emperor Alexander ordered a religious solemnity to take place, in which after returning thanks to God for having put an end to the calamities of Europe, he made a vow to the eternal to exercise all his soul and the strength of his empire for the preservation of peace.

Resolutions of the Bishops of Ireland.

At a meeting of the Roman catholic prelates of Ireland, held in Dublin on the 23d and 24th of August, 1815, the following resolutions were unanimously agreed on:—

The most rev. Dr. Kelly, president.

Resolved, That it is our decided and conscientious conviction, that any power granted to the crown of Great Britain, of interfering directly or indirectly in the appointment of bishops for the Roman catholic church in Ireland, must essentially injure, and may eventually subvert, the Roman catholic religion in this country.

Resolved, That this conviction deeply and unalterably impressed on our minds, we should consider ourselves as betraying the dearest interests of that portion of the church, which the Holy Ghost has confided to our care, did we not declare most unequivocally, that we, at all times, and under all circumstances, deprecate and oppose, in every canonical and constitutional way, any such interference.

Resolved, That though we sincerely venerate the supreme pontiff as visible head of the church, we do not conceive, that our apprehension for the safety of the Roman catholic church in Ireland, can or ought to be removed by any determination of his holiness, adopted, or intended to be adopted, not only without our concurrence, but in direct opposition to our repeated resolutions and the very energetic memorial presented on our behalf, and so ably supported by our deputy, the most rev. Dr. Murray; who in that quality, was more competent to inform his holiness of the real state and interests of the Roman catholic church in Ireland, than any other with whom he is said to have consulted.

"Resolved, That a declaration of these our sentiments, respectful, firm and decided, be transmitted to the holy see, which, we trust, will engage his holiness to feel and acknowledge the justness and propriety of this our determination.

Resolved, That our grateful thanks are due, and are hereby given, to the most Rev. Dr. Murray, and the right Rev. Dr. Millner, our two deputies to Rome, for their zealous and able discharge of the trust reposed in them.

Catholic Petition.

Dublin, June 26, 1815.

The following is a copy of a new petition, as read by Mr. O'CONNELL:

To the honorable the house of commons in parliament assembled.

We, the roman catholic people of Ireland again approach the legislature with a statement of grievances under which we labor, and of which we most respectfully, but, at the same time, most firmly solicit the official redress. Our wrongs are so notorious, and so numerous, that their minute detail is quite unnecessary, and would indeed be impossible were it deemed expedient. Ages of persecution on the one hand, and of patience on the other, sufficient to attest our sufferings and our submission.—Privations have been answered only by petition—indignities by remonstrance—injuries by forgiveness. It has been a misfortune to have suffered for the sake of our religion, but it has also been a pride to have borne the best testimony to the purity of our doctrine by the meekness of our endurance. Like the great type of our adoration, we have not merely been the passive victims of unjust infliction, but we have even endeavored to expiate the cruelty of our oppressors. We have sustained the power which spurned us—we have nerved the arm that smote us, with a gratitude always superior to our privileges, we have lavished our strength, our talent, and our treasures, and buoyed upon the prodigal profusion of our young blood, the triumphant ark of British liberty.

We approach, then, with confidence, an enlightened legislature. In the name of nature, we ask our rights as men—in the name of the constitution, we ask our privileges as subjects—in the name of God, we ask the sacred charter of unpersecuted piety as christians.

Are securities required of us? We offer them—the best securities a throne can have—the affections of a people. We offer faith, that was never violated—hears, that were never corrupted—valor, that never crouched. Every hour of peril proved our allegiance, and every field of Europe exhibits the example.

We abjure all temporal authority, except that of our sovereign—we acknowledge no civil tie, save that of our constitution—and for our lavish and voluntary expenditures, we ask a reciprocity of benefits.

Separating, as we do our civil rights from our spiritual duties, we earnestly desire that they may not be confounded. We "render unto Cesar the things that are Cesar's," but we must also "render unto God the things that are God's." Our church could not descend to claim a state authority, nor do we ask for it a state aggrandizement; its hopes, its powers, and its pretensions, are of another world; and when we raise our hands to the state, our prayer is not that the fetters may be transferred to those hands which are raised from us to heaven. We would not erect a splendid shrine even to liberty on the ruins of the temple.

In behalf then, of five millions of a brave and an insulted people, we call on the legislature to annihilate the odious bondage which bows down the mental, physical and moral energies of Ireland; and, in the name of the gospel, which excludes all distinction, we ask freedom of conscience for the whole christian world.

Mr. Charles Phillips having been declared the author of this composition, several members spoke highly in his praise; and Mr. O'Conner moved the following resolution:—

That the heartfelt gratitude of the catholic board be presented to the pious and patriotic friend of Ireland, Charles Phillips, Esq. barrister at law, for the exertions by which he has served and ornamented the cause of our common country.

This vote of thanks was passed with acclamation.

Army of Naples.

FROM A VIENNA PAPER—1815.

Captain count Thum, who arrived here last night, express from the head quarters of the imperial army of Naples, which he left on the 24th of May, has brought the following account of the remarkable events that took place subsequently to the military convention of the 20th May.

Capua was occupied by the imperial troops on the 21st at noon; the enemy's garrison in the place under the command of general Peppe, had disbanded itself of its own accord before the arrival of our troops, committing at the same time excesses and acts of violence of every kind. The general in chief, Carascosa and the marquis de Gallo, who had with difficulty escaped the fury of the soldiers, received at the same time news of an insurrection which had broken out at Naples against the late government. The city guard was no longer able to keep in check the mass of the populace and the lazaroni, and to prevent the most dreadful scenes.

In consequence of this, the said general and several deputations sent from Naples to the imperial head quarters, made the most urgent entreaties to hasten as much as possible the entrance of the imperial troops into the city.

Field marshal lieutenant count Neipperg accordingly received orders to proceed immediately to Naples with the Dichtenstein hussars and the Tuscan dragoons, to check the disorders and to assume the military command of the place. He arrived there on the 22d at twelve in the morning, at which time the tumult had risen to the highest pitch.—The city guard, assisted by some British marines who had been landed by admiral lord Exmouth, defended the royal palace, and the valour and the effects which it contained, against the furious mob. By the intervention of the imperial troops the plundering was prevented, and the property of the state preserved for the new government.

At noon the same day, the commander in chief, field marshal lieutenant baron Bianchi, with his royal highness prince Leopold of Sicily, made his solemn entrance into Naples at the head of 3,000 men, amidst the most lively expressions of enthusiasm from the people. The greatest part of the people had armed themselves with the muskets the troops had thrown away. All was now restored to order in the capital. The vigorous measures of the imperial commander in chief and of count Neipperg insure also the immediate and complete tranquillity of the environs, and of the provinces to which the spirit of insurrection might have been communicated by the disbanded and dispersed army.

On the 19th in the evening, king Murat, accompanied by generals Millit and Rocca Romani, by dukes Pignatelli, Cicarra and Schiavelli, and several other Neapolitans, embarked from Naples for Ischia, and thence on board a small merchantman, either for France or Gaeta. The queen, who was on board of the Tremendous, had, in a prior convention with commodore Campbell, been promised a free passage to France with her suite. Upon the declaration of lord Exmouth, that the commodore had exceeded his instructions, fresh negotiations were entered into with her on the part of Austria, with the co-operation of prince Leopold, and lords Exmouth and Burghersh; in consequence of which, she, together with her children, who are at Gaeta, throws herself under the protection of his imperial majesty, and with generals Macdonald and Livron, and also with the ministers Zurlò and Meesburg, goes on board an English ship to Gaeta, and thence to Trieste, where she is to await from the favor of his majesty the determination of her future residence, with the promise never to return to France or Italy without his majesty's special permission.

On the 23d, when this convention was concluded, the English and Sicilian expedition, under general Macfarlane, about 6,000 strong, appeared in the bay of Naples.

The army of king Murat, which on its march from Capua to Naples consisted of about 16,000 men of whom 2,300 were cavalry, and which by the convention was to take a position at Solerno, was all dissolved in a few days, so that not a single division belonging to it is now to be found complete.

Thus ended, after a six weeks campaign, which will confer immortal honor on the imperial troops and their distinguished commander, the perfidious attempt to revolutionise Italy with the flight of its author, the entire dissolution of his army and of his kingdom. The revolutionary measures recoiled upon those who had employed them, and they were indebted to the favor of the conquerors alone for not falling a sacrifice to the popular rage which they had themselves excited.

Barbary Pirates.

MEMOIR, UPON THE NECESSITY AND THE PRACTICABILITY OF PUTTING AN END TO THE PIRACIES OF THE BARBARY STATES.

Presented at Vienna, for the consideration of the congress, in August 1814, by sir Sidney Smith, president of the confederation of knights.

[Translated from the Leyden Political Journal, for the Boston Daily Advertiser.]

FIRST PART.

While the means of effecting the abolition of the trade in the negroes on the western coast of Africa are under discussion, and Europe is attempting to extend the benefits of commerce, and of security of person and property, to the interior of that vast continent inhabited by a people mild, industrious and capable of enjoying in the highest degree the advantages of civilization, it is astonishing that no attention is given to the northern border of that same country, inhabited by piratical Turks, who not only oppress the natives of their vicinity, but take them by force, or purchase them as slaves, to employ them in their cruising vessels to tear from their homes the honest labourers the peaceful inhabitants of the shores of Europe. This shameful piracy, is not only revolting to humanity, but it fetters commerce in the most injurious manner, since no mariner can at the present day navigate the Mediterranean or even the Atlantic, without fear of being seized by these pirates, and carried into African slavery.

The government of Algiers is composed of the officers of an orta or regiment of revolted Janissaries and soldiers, who do not pretend even in appearance to acknowledge the authority of the Ottoman Porte, which yet does not acknowledge their independence. The dey is always that one of the officers of the orta who is the most distinguished for his cruelty. He maintains himself at the head of the regency or divan, by enriching his adherents; that is by permitting all kinds of violence in Africa, and piracies by sea against the weaker Europe.

an nations, or those whose immediate vengeance he does not fear.

Even the Ottoman flag is not sufficient to protect her Grecian subjects, and to place them in security against the attacks of the Algerine corsairs. Lastly, the Dey, either from a caprice of cruelty, or from the barbarous policy of destroying the commerce of his rivals of Tunis and Tripoli, has captured the cargoes of some vessels of the Archipelago and of Egypt, loaded with corn, which had fallen into his power.

The Pacha of Egypt in his just anger, arrested all the Algerines whom he found in his states, and demanded in vain a restitution of the cargoes unjustly seized by the dey of Algiers.

The Ottoman Porte saw with indignation and anger, that a revolted vassal dared to permit acts the most outrageous, the most atrocious against his peaceful subjects, which impeded a commerce which he more than ever needed, to pay the troops of the Pachas employed on the eastern frontiers of the Ottoman empire, to resist the Wachiabites and other numerous Arabian tribes, who are constantly by their inroads threatening the existence of that tottering government.

On the other hand Europe is interested to support the Ottoman government, as a recognized sovereignty, and as a power which can restrain the Pachas and revolted Beys, and prevent them from committing piracies like Algiers. This interest of Europe is increased by the necessity in which she is often found of importing the corn of the Black sea or of the Nile, in one of which countries there is always an abundance, since the unfavorable seasons in the north of the Ottoman territory are always counterbalanced by a good season the same year in the south, and vice versa.

But if a Barbarian, calling himself an independent prince, but not recognized as such by the Ottoman sultan, his legitimate sovereign, can at will, threaten, alarm, and capture the Greeks, and the mariners of the small European states who alone carry on a commerce which the vessels of the great powers do not find sufficiently profitable to be pursued, because they cannot navigate their vessels at so small an expense—if this audacious chief can, when he thinks fit, intercept the cargoes of corn destined to Europe, the civilized nations are by this fact dependent on a chief of robbers, who to insult them can augment their distress, and even in a time of scarcity subject them to famine.

Thus the barbarian has a formidable means of extorting money from the christian princes; he threatens them, as he has done Sicily, with putting to death those of their subjects who have fallen into their power; his known cruelty rendering his menaces very formidable, becomes a means of raising money from one christian prince, to support a war which he has declared against another; he may thus put all Europe under contribution, and compel all nations in their turn to pay a tribute to his ferocity, by purchasing of him peace, and the lives of his unfortunate slaves.

It is useless to demonstrate that such a state of things is not only monstrous, but absurd; and is not less an outrage on religion, than it is on humanity and honour. The progress of light and civilization must necessarily do it away.

SECOND PART.

It is evident that the military means employed to this day by the christian princes to hold in check these barbarian states have been not only insufficient but have generally had the effect of consolidating more the dangerous power of these barbarians.—

Europe has appeared for a long time to repose upon the efforts of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and have not been sufficiently aware that this chivalrous order has had, in later times, neither enough power, nor perhaps enough energy, to counterbalance and repel the aggressions always arising from numerous pirates. Besides, by its very institution the order of Malta, obliged to enter into no engagement with infidels cannot avail itself of all these sources of policy in making treaties of alliance with those among them who are rather themselves the victims of the piratical system, than active co-operators; as for example Tunis and Morocco, governed both by princes born in those states, who have for a long time shown themselves well disposed, and are capable of maintaining with the European powers, the relations of commerce and good neighbourhood. Thus the resurrection of this order, after the political suicide that it committed on itself, cannot be alone sufficient for the object which was proposed by it. This honorable object is, to put Europe forever in security against the attacks of the African corsairs, and to cause to succeed the piratical states of Barbary, governments which shall promote commerce, and be in harmony with all civilized nations.

Now what are the means to be employed? the undersigned wishes it was in his power to impart to all Europe his conviction, the result of thirty years profound study and investigation. He has never ceased, during his embassy at the Ottoman court, to devote himself to the subject which he is now discussing. He has devoted himself to it in camps, on board the fleets of this same power, and during the whole course of his well known relations with the nations and tribes of Africa and Asia.

His thorough conviction of the possibility of putting a speedy termination to the piracies of the Barbary states, cannot be better proved than by the offer he makes of undertaking the direction of the enterprise, provided the necessary means be put at his disposal.

Animated by the remembrance of his oath as a knight and desirous of enkindling the same ardor in other christian knights, he proposes to the nations most interested in the success of this noble enterprise, to engage by a treaty to furnish their contingent of a marine, and if I may so call it, amphibious force, which, without compromising any flag, and without being influenced by the wars or political crisis of nations, shall constantly have the charge of guarding the coasts of the Mediterranean, and the important duty of watching, capturing and pursuing all the pirates by sea and land.—This power, acknowledged and protected by all Europe, will not only afford to commerce perfect security, but will finally civilize the coasts of Africa, will prevent its inhabitants from continuing their piracies, to the prejudice of their industry and their lawful commerce.

This imposing and protecting force will commence by a rigorous blockade of the naval forces of the barbarians wherever they may be found. At the same time the ambassadors of all the christian sovereigns and states, ought to unite in representing to the Ottoman porte, that it must itself be responsible for the hostile acts of its subjects, if it continues to permit the recruiting in its states of the garrison in Africa, which are of no utility to it, while these forces might be better employed against its enemies than against friendly European powers; and ought to demand of it a formal disavowal and an express interdiction of the wars which those rebel chiefs declare against Europe.

The Ottoman porte might be engaged to offer promotion and reward to those of the Janissaries, captains of frigates and other Algerine marines, who shall obey the orders of the sultan, and by this means the dey will soon find himself abandoned, and left in a defenceless state.

The same influence might be employed so much the more efficaciously with Tunis, as this country is at war with Algiers, from which she has every thing to apprehend. Besides, the head of the Tunisian government, is of a character totally different from that of the dey of Algiers. He will readily contribute to every thing that can civilize his state, and give prosperity to his empire. Peace between Tunis and Sardinia, which country has suffered so much from the seizure of its subjects, ought to be the first link in the chain, and nothing ought from this moment to be neglected in order to obtain it.

The other details will be easily pointed out, when the sovereigns shall have adopted the principle, and when they shall have deigned to give the undersigned the confidence and authority necessary for the success of the enterprise.

HISTORICAL SUMMARY, OF ALL THAT PASSED FROM APRIL 1st, 1814, TO THE 20th OF MARCH, 1815, RELATIVE TO NAPOLEON AND THE BRAVE MEN WHO ACCOMPANIED HIM TO ELBA.

The days of the emperor flowed in the sweetest occupation; all his hours were filled. This unalterable activity, which in other times he applied to the vast conceptions of genius, he then employed in study, in the embellishment of the above which he created for himself. The health of his majesty was always perfect. In the morning he shut himself in his library; even, sometimes, he rose before daylight, labored from three o'clock in the morning till seven or eight, and then went to bed again; in the forenoon he went out and visited all the works; he was almost always in the midst of his workmen, who, as has been seen, reckoned among them many soldiers of the guard. Two Italian architects, one old and the other young, M. Bargili, a Roman, M. Bélarini, a Tuscan, drew, by his orders, the plans of constructions resolved upon;—but he made them change their dispositions in such a manner, from his ideas, that he became as it were, the creator of their conceptions, and the sole and single architect.

Almost every day, however, the weather permitting, his majesty rode to his country seat of St. Martin, in the environs of Porto Ferrajo. There, as in the city, the emperor did not disdain to occupy himself in the interior administration of his house, caused an exact account of every thing to be rendered to him, and entered even into the smallest details of domestic or rural economy.

Often, after his breakfast, he passed his little army in review. He required the greatest regularity in the exercises and manœuvres; he especially enforced, that no one should fail in the duties of the most severe discipline.

It was after his review that he mounted his horse for his morning promenades. In his escort small in numbers, among his principal officers were distinguished marshal Bertrand and general Drouot, who hardly ever quitted him. On the road his majesty gave audience to all those whom he met. He listened to all the claims, of whatever nature they might be, and never left any one without having satisfied his demand. He afterwards went to dinner. All those that were admitted at his table were received with a perfect air of frankness, cordiality and ease. The emperor seemed to have discovered the secret, without losing of his dignity, to become a simple private man in the midst of private men, and around him the conversation had all the liberty and all the openness that one might have enjoyed at a table d'hôte.

When the emperor received the visit of some distinguished stranger, which often happened, he welcomed him with the same familiarity and the same grace. His majesty seemed principally to be desirous to prove that the strokes of adversity had not changed him.

He spoke to the philosophers and learned of the institute, of the royal society of London, upon the discoveries made in our days in the high sciences, chemistry, galvanism and electricity. He congratulated the rich English land owners upon the excellency of their country; in short he conversed with the military on the historical memoirs that he was writing upon his campaigns.

The evenings were passed in a family way. Among the persons of the city that were most habitually received, were the mayor, the intendant of the island, the chamberlain Vantini.

The counts Bertrand, Drouet and the other principal officers of the guard or the house of his majesty shared, under his orders, the various functions that he had distributed to them; and, full of gratitude or admiration for every thing that they saw him undertake of good and useful, were eager to second him with all their powers.

Such was the mode of living of the emperor, and this was known by the humble inhabitants of the island; it was the topic of all the conversations.—The recitals that the most illustrious travellers made of it in their courts, what foreign prints published of it, had contributed, in forcing to admire the noble simplicity of the sovereign of the island of Elba, to inspire in its guardians the most absolute security.

Dioclesian, in his garden of Salona, Charles the Fifth, in the monastery of Saint Just, did they offer a greater example for the meditations of publicists and philosophers?

What was undertaken and completed of works in ten months is inconceivable; imagination can with difficulty remember them all; yet, how can one deny oneself the desire to describe at least the most striking parts of them, however little order it may be possible to bring at this moment in the classification of so many objects?

Little satisfied, in fine, if he should have accomplished upon its sterile rock but the half of the precept of Zoroaster, who ordains to plant a palm-tree, and to conduct a spring of running water in the burning desert, the emperor went himself in search of a source in the environs of Porto Ferrajo to direct its waters into the city that was in want of them. These works were very much advanced when his majesty left the island.

Alas, what vows! what moving regrets accompanied his vessel at his departure! and what anecdotes might be cited, to prove how much he was interested in that good people whom he had momentarily adopted, and whose gratitude paid him so frankly for all his cares!

He was not less the admiration of foreigners:—Some merchants from different countries debarked one day that the emperor was in the port; he asked them what they came to do, to visit the country, to see the mines. Why, said he to them smiling, do you not own at once that it is I whom you come to see? Well, here I am.

Of the different nations that repaired to the island of Elba, the English especially seemed to attach the greatest price to contemplate him and hear him. They have often been seen to repair on the road from Porto Ferrajo to St. Marc, wait there his majesty five and six hours, and after having seen him, go immediately on board.

Others stopped at first at Ajaccio, visited the house where his majesty was born, uncovered themselves with a sense of respect before the portrait of him whom they considered as a great man, and in going away put in their pockets a fragment of stone or brick taken from that house which reminded them of all that which the history of this age shall offer most remarkable to posterity.

Lord Bentinck, Lord Douglas, an infinite number of other lords were received, caressed and entertained, thus to say, by his majesty; all carried back into their country the most moving recollections of the reception they had experienced.

One of them accompanied one morning his majesty, who after breakfast, visited on foot the works of Porto Ferrajo. The emperor met the grand marshal, who was coming from the port, and walked towards the palace, with papers under his arm. Are these French newspapers? Yes, sire. Am I well reviled? No, sire, there is not a word about your majesty to-day. Well, then, it will be to-morrow; it is an intermitting fever, but the fits will pass away.

The emperor took pleasure to talk with his grenadiers whose hear-s he had so well judged.—Like all the old military, they never seem quite contented; and by one of those expressions that denote to the soldier the affection that is borne for them, much better than the finest phrases, he called them his grumblers.

One day towards the latter part of his residence at Elba, ah well! grumbler, said he to one of them, you feel dull? No, sire, but I am not much amused, however. You are wrong, you must take time as it comes: and the soldier went away, girdling his money in his sash, where he had his hand, and humming through his teeth, this will not continue always.

Another time he approached a soldier: How much do you sell your wine, my dear? Five kreutzers sire.—That is too dear, you should only sell it at four, and put in a little water. But how simple I am! you know your business better than I do.

The soldiers of the guard liked to walk towards the country seat of H. M. In vintage time they ranged the hills, and enquired of the country people who were the owners of the vineyards—they belong to the emperor.—To the emperor! ah well! they are ours; and they merrily gathered the grapes in his stead.

H. M. whom count Bertrand informed of every thing that passed was much diverted with all these comical pretensions, and used to say smiling that they were right.

But of all the visits that H. M. received, those that most flattered his heart, those that were soon to arouse in his breast the great thoughts to which we shall owe the best half of his history, were the visits or rather the frequent arrivals of a considerable number of Italian, French and Polish officers, who come to offer him their services. I have, he said to them, neither places nor grades to offer you. We will serve as soldiers.—I no longer possess the means to pay you.—We shall live at our own expense and they remained, serving as grenadiers in the old guard; and now they are in Paris, in the midst of us. I should wish to name them all: I must beg leave at least to name the captain of cavalry Folasse, formerly aid-de-camp to general Octave, in Naples, and who has entered Paris in the ranks, carrying his knapsack like a simple soldier.

BONAPARTE AT THE GATES OF GRENOBLE.

Night came on; and it appeared likely that the result of these events would not be known till the next day. The troops had been marched back in to the city, and the gates of the city were closed. The ramparts were occupied by the third regiment of engineers, consisting of about two thousand old soldiers covered with honorable wounds; by the eleventh of the line; the two other battalions of the 5th, and by the fourth regiment of artillery of the line; the same regiment wherein, twenty years before, the emperor had been made a captain. The national guard and the whole of the populace of Grenoble were placed behind the garrison.

At half past 8, an advanced guard of polish lancers presented themselves at the gate of Bonne; and about the same time, his majesty entered the suburbs. The gate of Bonne was closed; general Merchad and had carried off the keys of it, as they said. The hussars, however, and the people of the suburbs insisted that it should be opened. They were only answered by cries of vive l'empereur! The troops, the inhabitants, and the gunners on the ramparts, to whom orders had been given to fire, all uttered the same accents. Without, as well as within, nothing was heard but vive l'empereur! It seemed to be the festival of palms.

The sappers and soldiers now attempted to batter down the gates; and the cartwrights of the suburbs lent them a hand with their axes. Already many of the pannels had given away, and the gate was half destroyed when the keys arrived.

The advanced guard entered; the citizens assembled with lighted torches, and the emperor appeared at the head of his army, and considerably in advance. An immense crowd obstructed his passage, and the cries of the soldiers and citizens were confounded in the enthusiasm inspired by the presence of their sovereign. The mayor and several other public officers paid their respects to his majesty, and wished to conduct him to the house of the prefect, or town house; but H. M. thanked them, and said that one of his ancient guides, of the name of Labarre, kept the hotel of the three dolphins, and it was his desire to lodge at the house of that brave fellow, whom he had not seen for many years. His majesty had taken possession of his new quarters, when the inhabitants, preceded by trumpets, brought the gate of Bonne on their shoulders, and deposited it under the balcony of the three dolphins, crying, "Napoleon, we have not been able to present you with the keys of the good city of Grenoble; but to make atonement for it, here are the gates"—Page 84, of "a year of the life of the emperor Napoleon."

[From the London Statesman.]

CONDUCT OF BONAPARTE, AFTER THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

After the fatal day of Mount St. Jean (or Waterloo, as we call it,) which might fairly be called a second day of spurs (une seconde journée de espérons), the emperor feeling sensibly that henceforward the salvation of France rested with the chamber of representatives, in the confidence reposed in him, and the resources which it should place in his hands, hastened immediately to Paris. He arrived there on the 20th, early in the morning, and his first step was to go, covered with the dust of the day of battle, to present himself to the national deputation, to expose to it frankly the dangers of the country, to point out the means of its salvation, to assure it that his person should never be an obstacle to negotiation with the enemy, and to return instantly at the head of his broken army. In this courageous resolution he was arrested, God knows with what intention.—He was told that a rising ferment amongst the deputies would infallibly compromise his dignity; and indeed from this moment the national representation, its most inflexible and best minded members, were so worked upon the remainder the day and all the night, that in the morning the president and the emperor's best friends came and besought him to abdicate, as the only means left of saving France. They supported their entreaties by authentic documents, which had just been sent them, and by writings considered as nearly official,* which would ensure to them, they said, the most happy results. The emperor, though far from being convinced, came to a speedy decision: "The honor and glory of France have been the objects of my life, (said he;) you know it; it shall not be said that my personal interests shall ever stand in the way of their accomplishment; may you succeed without me; I abdicate; may the allies have been really sincere in their communications." The emperor was then at the Elysee. The acclamations of the public were heard round the palace; as a simple citizen, he wished to avoid them, and departed for Malmaison. Still they followed him. On the morning even of the same day on which he set out, troops, which were marching upon the high road, made the air resound with their favorite cries, and accompanied him to his retreat, at which he was much affected.

A few days were devoted to family arrangements and preparations for the frigates, which were appropriated to his service.

In the meantime the enemy approached rapidly and arrived at the gates of the city; the cannon were heard. On the 29th, at the moment of ascending his carriage, Napoleon sent a confidential person to the provisional government with this message, "I know the position of the enemy, their advanced corps is not numerous. There is only occasion to show the moral force of our army, the hope of the soldiers would revive on seeing their old general.—In abdicating the power I have not renounced the glorious title of every citizen—that of defending his country. If it is required, I answer for beating the enemy and inspiring the army with dispositions, which shall procure you more favorable negotiations. This object gained, I engage on my word to re-ascend my carriage and to pursue the route to the place which I have chosen." An answer was returned that it was too late, and that negotiations were already commenced.

Napoleon departed. The route through Tours, Niort and Rochefort, was a real triumph. He was accompanied by many carriages without escort.—Of all his former power there remained only his glory and his name, and the acclamations of the populace who assembled about him were unanimous. It was the same during his stay at Rochefort on board of the frigates, and at the Isle d'Aix. Every where the same respect was paid him as if he was still emperor. Those to whose care he was confined said,

* This is affirmed to be a correspondence for a long time between Fouché and Metternich, in which the latter guaranteed the regency, if the emperor would abdicate.

"He is the man who has governed us with so much credit, he it is who has elevated to so high a pitch of glory the French name. The national representation has placed him under the safe guard of French loyalty, and its wishes shall not be disappointed by us. Whatever be our opinions and events this illustrious deposit shall be sacred as long as he remains among us." And the fact is, that the white flag was not hoisted till he was gone.

On his going on board the frigates, Napoleon sent one of his suite to the English cruiser to know if the passports had been received which were promised by the provisional government, permitting him to proceed to the United States. He was informed they were not, but that an application would be made to the English admiral upon the subject.—It was supposed that Napoleon might get out under the parliamentary flag. The answer was, that the frigates would be attacked. A passage was then mentioned in a neutral vessel. The answer was that it would be strictly searched, perhaps even taken to an English port; but it was intimated to him to go to England, and affirmed that there he had no harm to apprehend.

During the interval that he was waiting for the answer of the English admiral, Napoleon conceived the bold idea of embarking with a select suite in two chasse-marees, of from 18 to 20 tons burthen, and to try the chances of his fate and the dangers of the sea in a voyage to America.

In the mean time circumstances pressed and it became necessary for him to take his resolution.—He sent back the same negotiator on board the English cruiser to learn if an answer had been received. The English captain replied, that it was every moment expected, and he added, that if the emperor would immediately embark for England, he was authorised to receive him, and to take him thither. He added, that as a public character he could not guarantee the determination which would become to as to his fate; but he added, that as a private individual, and many other captains repeated it along with him, they had no doubt that Napoleon would experience in England all the respectful treatment which he might wish for. That the English had a generosity of sentiment, a liberality of opinion above even sovereignty. Napoleon's envoy, encouraged by such professions, said that he would go and communicate to the emperor the offer of the English captain, and the whole of the conversation. He added, that he thought he knew so well the esteem in which Napoleon held the English nation, that he would not be against even going with confidence to England, in order to find there the facilities of prosecuting his voyage to America. He developed his personal opinion upon this subject.—He described France, south of the Loire, as in a state of ferment; the hopes of the people always centering in Napoleon so long as he should be at hand; the proposals which were made to him every moment from all parts; his absolute determination to serve neither as a cause nor a pretext for civil war; the generosity he had shown in his abdication to facilitate the return of peace; the firm resolution he had made of banishing himself forever to more speedily and more completely; and the determination he had come to not to employ the frigates, lest a single drop of blood should be spilt for his personal interest only. He then left the vessel.

All this while the force of the English was known to be increasing every day—all the passages were closed—two or three lines of vessels extended in a crescent on the open sea—the boats at night stood near our shores, and shut up the most secret issues.

On another side the white flag was flying upon the neighbouring coasts; the agitation was great and civil war was at hand; it became urgent to decide on something. The emperor was advised to rejoin the army, or to throw himself into some of the troubled districts. The arrival of Davoust, the disposition of Clausel and Lamarque, those of the garrisons of Rochefort and l'Isle d'Aix, rendered success possible, or good terms certain. Napoleon rejected this advice to countenance civil war as unworthy of him.

Nothing presented itself but the chasse-marees or the English fleet. He had private conferences with many of his suite, as his situation was become extremely critical. It was more easy for them to make objections than to give him counsel; and on his part it was more easy to combat an objection than to remove it. One of them having expressed himself afraid lest if he went to England his personal liberty and rights would be violated, he exclaimed with warmth, "That is impossible. If I have a correct opinion of the prince of Wales, after what I have heard of him, he possesses the strength of mind and justice of an Edward, joined to the grace and gallantry of a Charles II. Characters of this stamp do not let opportunities slip of doing glorious actions. The manner in which I shall be treated in England may adorn one of the finest pages of history. Ill treatment of my person would be an outrage against the laws, and would cover that people with shame now that I can no longer do them any injury.

At last he assembled all his suite around him, and wished to have their opinion as to what should be done. The opinion was for the English fleet. Napoleon walked some time in silence, placing at times his hand upon his forehead. "The chasse-maree," said he, "are, doubtless, dangerous; but it is not the danger which I consider—it is the result; and I do not see it. If it be only to place our persons in safety, if it was in question to conquer an empire, to deliver a nation, in a word, to return from the island of Elba, there would be no room for hesitation; but, I repeat it, in this case I do not see sufficient results. As to going to the enemy, the emperor of Russia has called himself my friend—the emperor of Austria is my father-in-law—there is neither of these sovereigns, I think but would fix a great price to the high consideration I should manifest by going, in spite of the irritation of the moment, and throwing myself into their arms. However I prefer giving this testimony to the English people, with whom I have never had any connection, and whom I always fought. Gentlemen, we will go on board the English fleet;" and telling some one to take a pen, he dictated the letter to the prince regent, which has already appeared.

This letter was immediately sent on board the English vessel, with an intimation that Napoleon would repair thither on the morrow, which he in fact did, early in the morning. The first moments of his reception were cold and embarrassed; but, in a short time, scarcely had Napoleon looked over the crew, seen the officers and chatted with the captain, than the inevitable ascendancy of this extraordinary man, who for twenty years has employed all tongues upon his actions, operated like magic. As he was behaved to some years ago on board a French vessel, so now he experienced the same respect, the same attention from every one. On the same day the admiral came to pay his respects to the emperor; the latter desired to see his ship, and invited himself for the morrow to breakfast. He was received with all that distinction and politeness which appear particularly to characterize the noble and elegant manners of Sir Henry Rotham.

"They set sail on the same day, the 16th. Contrary winds or calms made the voyage long and tedious.—They made Torbay on the 25th, where orders were found, to have no communication with the land.—But all the boats of the country, on the news of Napoleon's arrival, surrounded the ship. On the morrow the whole population of the country were there, without distinction of rank or sex. Napoleon, who was principally occupied in reading, in conversation at intervals with some of his suite, and taking a walk regularly several times a day upon the poop, looked at all these curious people with the same countenance he would have done from the windows of the Thuilleries. One of the ship's officers enquired if he was not indignant at beholding such a multitude of gazers round him; and, without waiting for an answer, added, but, indeed, if he was, he might thank himself for it, since he had made himself so great and celebrated. He had the English papers read to him, which caricatured, in the most ridiculous manner, his coming on board, the reception he met with, and the conversations he had entered into. Some English officers reproaching all these follies as insults to him—"The multitude," said he, only judge from such Blue Beard tales; grave historians, who write for posterity, characterise men solely by their actions, and I leave my defence to them."

On the third day they were ordered round to Plymouth—where the ship seemed condemned to a more rigorous captivity. The papers and the reports from shore agreed in spreading a report that Napoleon was to be transported to St. Helena. "It is impossible," was his constant answer. "It is from a noble and magnanimous resolution that I am arrived on the shores of Britain, and not by the chances of war. I am come to place myself under the protection of its laws, and have not been dragged here by the force of arms. I am come to seek an asylum in this land of freedom, and shall I find only a prison, chains and death? I repeat, it is impossible; I have claimed the sacred rights of hospitality, and the prince regent, exercising the sovereignty of the English people, cannot refuse it. My voluntarily coming to him alone prevents all interference. We live in a day when the opinion of contemporaries, the judgment of posterity, are more dear, more necessary to us than ever. Great crimes are transmitted down to posterity as with as much care as great actions. The condemnation of Mary, queen of Scotland still soils the brilliant history of the great Elizabeth, and the condemnation of Stafford will always be a stain upon the memory of the unfortunate Charles I."

NAPOLEON TO THE FRENCH PEOPLE.

[This is copied from a London paper, and said to have been written by Napoleon on board the Bellerophon. It was circulated in France privately, but is altogether a fabrication. We insert only as presenting an excellent history of things.]—Ed. Reg.

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

SIR—The accompanying paper is the translation of an address to the French people, which is generally circulated in France, and which is believed to be an authentic document, written by him on board the Bellerophon.—

"Paris, Oct. 9.—The machinations of treason have obliged me to separate again from you; but victims of the same treason, I lament only your misfortunes.

"I coveted the sceptre but to sway it for your glory and welfare! the knowledge of my devotion to your honor and prosperity excited the hatred of the sovereignty of Europe. Had I sought only to reign without regard to the interests of my people I should have established in their eyes the legitimacy of my title to the throne. Had agriculture been neglected, had manufactures languished, had debt accumulated, and public spirit been degraded, then I had assured the friendship of rival potentates; had I circumscribed the prosperity of the empire to the embellishment of its palaces, or sacrificed the majesty of the throne to the preservation of the royal authority, then my dynasty might have possessed the inglorious inheritance.

"The sovereigns of Europe confederated against me as a legislator whose establishments nurtured and animated the talents and industry of the community of which I had been elected the chief magistrate, and they proscribed my person as the shield of the power and independence of the state. The enemies of a revolution which had triumphed over the abuses that occasioned it, and mercenary traitors insensible to the calamity of an invaded country, associated their efforts to paralyze national exertion, and to make you believe that war was my policy, and peace the boon which the governments of Europe solicited from France. Unwilling to sacrifice the illustrious remnant of your defenders, thus insulated from their country, I yielded to the wishes of your representatives; and, to consummate your security, I surrendered myself into the hands of my enemies.

"History offered no example where repose and independence were the rewards of submission; but many of individual devotion to the hopes of nations! since the fatal moment when France announced that she ceased to combat for her liberties and safeties; what misfortunes, crimes, and humiliations have devastated and degraded the empire. War, with all its devastations, conquests, with all its violence, tyranny with all its abuses, and subjection with all its shames, have overwhelmed you!—Outrage and perfidy have outstepped, even my forebodings! the perfidy of Austria, which uncovered my line, and occasioned my disasters in Russia—which bartered Poland, violated the military convention of Dresden, and negotiated but to betray; the perfidy of Prussia, whose monarchy I preserved, when cowardice and treason had undermined its throne; of Russia, whose civil, military, and political history is a series of systematic contempts of faith and equity; of Bavaria, whose unparalleled turpitude, obliged me to fight at Leipzig, for preservation, and not for conquest; of Switzerland, who, for a paltry bribe, sold the tranquility of her citizens, the safety of her country, and the sanctity of her neutrality; of England, whose sophisms have annihilated public law, and whose policy since the era of Pitt had unblushingly substituted power for principle, and expedience for justice! not the recollection of all these recent perfidies had prepared me for those which have now been emulously perpetrated—by sovereigns, who professed that they bore their arms against France only so long as I was seated on her throne! the most lawless barbarians have never manifested such contempt of solemn engagements.—The darkest ages have never presented such scenes of treachery and licentious direction of forces in an unresisting country.

"The miserable king who was content to surrender France as their prey! has even his wrongs to plead! The mock of his sway desecrates the divinity of his right, and he trembles least the vengeance of the nation should sweep him and the spoilers from the soil before the work of ruin is accomplished.

"Frenchmen! you are now told, that not only my ambition, but your concurrent spirit of conquest, demands punishment; even the acquisitions of former sovereigns and epochs are now cited as your crimes! And by whom are these charges advanced? By sovereigns whose empires have been formed by successful encroachments on the independence and existence of neighboring states! What was Russia in the beginning of the last century? How became the elector of Brandenburg monarch of a powerful kingdom? Has Austria absorbed no kingdom—dismembered no provinces, and does she now hold no domain by the sole tenure of force? Look at the map of Europe.—Has France only usurped? Do all the states recognised independent even by the treaty of Westphalia exist? Look round the globe.—See the English flag flying in every quarter, in countries where religion, laws and language are dissonant. Has she not subjugated the greater part of Asia? Is she not still endeavoring to force the ramparts that separate her from China; and has she not been waging a second war to recover her influence on the American continent? Our ambition was security. If England had not aspired to the dominion of three quarters of the globe, I should have temporised with the unfriendly councils of Spain; if Russia had not partitioned Poland, and aimed at empire in Germany, I never should have proposed to reprise her from the Vis ula to the Voiga. Europe has acknowledged the beneficial influence of England's usurpations; the blood that has flowed for this 25 years has flowed at her purchase; and Europe will further rue the event of a struggle that removes the ascendancy of a civilized people for the domination of northern barbarians. You are accused of having preferred war to peace, so long as war was successful; and your answers are those—who, first warred against your revolution? who violated the peace of Amiens, and violated it with shameless disdain of truth? who rejected negotiations repeatedly offered, or broke them off when conciliation was practicable? who made the war of which you are now the victims?—Is it not a war of their own decree? I regretted your sacrifices, I was moved to vindicate your indignities, but I adopted the policy of peace—the will of the nation, and I respected it as the bond between me and my people. Frenchmen! posterity will judge how far I am responsible to my country for the events of our military efforts. They will decide when the records are theirs, whether I could have mastered fortune; but my love for France, my gratitude for her confidence, and devotion to her welfare, can never be subject to suspicion. To France I owe my existence, and the consciousness of that claim has confirmed the right of nature. Frenchmen! I am not your emperor! but I hold the crown for my son and your interests. His succession can alone secure the fruits of your efforts against a dynasty whose reign is identified with your slavery. Foreign force may support the throne of a paricide king, but the power of 30 millions of Frenchmen is not to be permanently subdued. You have acquired mournful, but useful experience. You now are convinced that arms alone can redeem you from vassal age and ignominy. Cherish the brave men who have fought your battles—they will be the pillars of your army, and they will conduct you to victory.

"On the rock where I am doomed to pass my future days, by the disloyal sentence of your enemies, I shall yet hear the echo of your triumphs, and hail in the loom of its horizon, the flag of your independence!"

The following elegant sketch is from the classic pen of CHARLES PHILLIPS, Esq. a celebrated Irish barrister, well known as the distinguished orator and champion of catholic emancipation. It was first published at Sligo on the 13th of April, 1814.

CHARACTER OF BONAPARTE.

He is fallen! We may now pause before that splendid prodigy which towered among us like some ancient ruin, whose frown terrified the glance its magnificence attracted. Grand, gloomy and popular, he sat upon the throne, a sceptred hermit, wrapt in the solitude of his awful originality. A mind bold, independent, and decisive; a will despotic in its dictates; an energy that distanced expedition; and a conscience pliable to every touch of interest, marked the outline of this extraordinary character, the most extraordinary perhaps, that, in the annals of this world, ever rose, or reigned, or fell. Flung into life, in the midst of a revolution, that quickened every energy of a people that acknowledged no superior, he commenced his course, a stranger by birth, and a scholar by charity! With no friend but his sword, and no fortune but his talents, he rushed into the lists where ranks, and wealth, and genius had arrayed themselves, and competition fled from him as from the chance of destiny. He knew no motive but interest—he acknowledged no criterion but success—he worshipped no God but ambition, and stern devotion, knelt at the shrine of his idolatry. Subsidiary to this, there was no creed that he did not profess—there was no opinion he did not promulgate; in the hope of a dynasty, he upheld the crescent; for the sake of a divorce, he bowed before the cross; the orphan of St. Louis, he became the adopted child of the republic; and, with a paricidal ingratitude on the ruins of the throne and the tribune, he reared the tower of his despotism! A professed catholic, he imprisoned the pope; a pretended patriot, he impoverished the country; and, in the name of Brutus* he grasped, without remorse, and wore, without shame, the diadem of the Cæsars!

Though this pantomime of his policy fortune played the clown to his caprices. At his touch, crowns crumbled, beggars reigned, systems vanished, the wildest theories took the colour of his whim and all that was venerable, and all that was novel, changed places with the rapidity of a drama. Even apparent defeat, assumed the operations of victory—his flight from Egypt confirmed his destiny—ruin itself only elevated him to empire.

But if his fortune was great, his genius was transcendent; decision flashed upon his councils, and it was the same, to decide, and to perform.—To inferior intellects his combinations appeared perfectly impossible, his plans perfectly impracticable—but, in his hand, simplicity marked their development, and success vindicated their adoption. His person partook the character of his mind; if the one never yielded in the cabinet, the other never bent in the field. Nature had no obstacles that he did not surmount; space no opposition that he did not spurn; and, whether amid alpine rocks, Arabian sands, or polar snows, he seemed proof against peril, and empowered with ubiquity! The whole continent of Europe trembled at beholding the audacity of his designs, and the miracle of their execution. Scepticism bowed to the prodigies of his performance; romance assumed the air of history; nor was there aught too incredible for belief, or too fanciful for expectation, when the world saw a subaltern of Corsica waving his imperial flag over her most ancient capitols.—All the visions of antiquity become common places in his contemplation; kings were his people; nations were his out-posts; and he disposed of courts and camps, and church, and cabinets, as if they were the titular dignitaries of the chess-board.

Amid all these changes he stood immutable, as adamant. It mattered little whether in the field or drawing room; with the mob or the levee; wearing the jacobin bonnet or the iron crown; banishing a Braganza or espousing a Dorrance; dictating peace on a scaffold to the Czar of Russia, or contemplating defeat at the gallows of Leipzig; he was still the same military despot.

Cradled in the camp, he was to the last hour, the darling of the army. Of all his soldiers not one forsook him, until affection was useless, and their first stipulation was the safety of their favorite. They knew well that if he was lavish of them, he was prodigal of himself, and that if he exposed them to peril he repaid them with plunder. For the soldier he subsidized every people; to the people he made even pride pay tribute.

The victorious veteran glittered with his gains; and the capital, gorgeous with the spoils of art, became the miniature metropolis of the universe. In this wonderful combination, his affectation of literature must not be omitted. The gaoler, of the press, he affected the patronage of letters; the proscriber of books, he encouraged philosophy; the persecutor of authors; and the murderer of printers; he yet pretended to the protection of learning; the assassin of Palm; the silencer of De Sade, and the denouncer of Korzebue; he was the friend of David; the benefactor of De Lille; and sent his academical prize to the philosopher of England.*

Such a medley of contradictions, and, at the same time, such an individual inconsistency, were never united in the same character. A royalist, a republican, and an emperor; mahomitan, a catholic, and a patron of the synagogue; a subaltern and a sovereign; a traitor and a tyrant; a christian and an infidel; he was, through all his vicissitudes, the same stern, impatient, inflexible, original; the same mysterious, incomprehensible self; the man without a model, and without a shadow.

His fall, like his life, baffled all speculation. In short, his whole history was like a dream of the world, and no man can tell how or why he was awakened from the reverie. Such is the faint and feeble picture of Napoleon Bonaparte, the first (and it is hoped, the last,) emperor of the French.

That he has done much evil there is little doubt; that he has been the origin of much good, there is just as little. Thro' his means intentional, or not, Spain, Portugal, and France, have arisen to the blessings of a free constitution; superstition has found her grave in the ruins of the inquisition; and the federal system, with its whole train of satellites, had fled forever. Kings may learn from him that their safest study, as well as the noblest, is the interest of the people. The people are taught by him, that there is no despotism so stupendous against which they have not a resource, and to those who would rise upon the ruins of both, he is a living lesson, that if ambition can raise him from the lowest station, it can prostrate them from the highest.

— He is taken on board the Northumberland and sails for St. Helena, (an island in the Atlantic ocean, twenty miles in circumference, belonging to the British East India Company) by order of the allied powers.

FROM THE LEXINGTON REPORTER.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman residing near Boston, to his friend in Kentucky.

The emperor Napoleon touched at Madeira while I was there, in August, on his way to St. Helena. He did not, however, come on shore, nor was any person, except the British consul, allowed to go on board the vessel he was in, viz. the Northumberland 74—the pirate Cockburn commander; having in company one frigate, seven men of war, gun brigs, and two troop ships, with the 53d regiment 1400 strong, commanded by colonel Bingham, who had charge of the royal prisoner. The fleet remained two or three days, some at anchor, others laying off and on the harbour of Funchal, got off some bullocks, refreshments, wine, &c. and went to sea.

I saw several of the officers belonging to the squadron and to the 53d regiment. They had no animosity against the emperor or his suite, but spoke of him in friendly terms; every man in the fleet seemed to be partial to him; though it was whispered that Cockburn was not disposed to treat him as a superior. Some of the officers offered to make very unequal bets, for instance, "a hat full of guineas to five," that within two years, they should be escorting him back to Europe with a larger force, and more pomp than they were now carrying him out with. The evening before the fleet arrived off Funchal (the port town of Madeira) the emperor won from Cockburn 250 pounds sterling, at piquet, a game he often amuses himself with on board the ship. I was told there was nothing done on board the ship or in the fleet which came to his knowledge, but he investigated it, and wished to know the reasons why, wherefore, and how of all the particulars, even to the splicing of a rope, the manœuvring the ship, &c.

He will not speak English, nor allow any conversation to be held in that language in his family, of thirty three persons: all communications to him or them, he requires to be in French. If a note to him is in English, he has it translated into French before he will reply to it; he even carries this so far as to return an English note to be made into French before he will notice it. This was the only thing that I heard objected against him. The English thought he carried his contempt of their language farther than good manners admitted.

The English have retained all his immense property, giving him leave to make any distribution of it by bequest, he may think proper, and pledging themselves to pay it over after his decease.

FROM THE BRITISH NEPTUNE.

ST. HELENA.

St. Helena seems to have been one of those provisions for the future uses of mankind, which sometimes lead to, but oftener follow great improvements in the history of human intercourse. Mountains impregnated with iron and gold, at an immense distance from inhabited lands, bays and noble harbours thickly set upon coasts that have, from the deluge, seen nothing but seals and turtle, are indications that those spots were intended, from the original formation of the globe, for a time when commerce and population were to roll in upon them, and the mountains and the port to give their share to the happiness of the world. If St. Helena had been known to the navigators of Tyre or Carthage, we should, probably, have heard of the direct passage to India by some adventurous wanderer, and the renown of Greece and the power of Rome have given way before the fortune which had made the merchant state the inheritor of the most precious trade of the earth. St. Helena seems to have been placed in almost the centre of the passage, at once as a resting place and an incitement to further discovery, about a thousand miles to the southward of the line, and about a thousand from the west coast of Africa. From its great elevation and the purity of its atmosphere, it is seen at the immense distance of from 70 to 80 miles. Its first view is singular, and discriminates it from any of the forms which so often rise at sea in fog and vapor; a blue mountain, ragged and depressed at its extremities, light bright films resting on the summit of the mountain, the coast starting up abruptly from the water, and the whole having the aspect of an extinguished volcano. The history of the island is brief. Its discovery was due to the Portuguese, the great discoverers in the Ethiopic. They fell in with it on the day of the feast of St. Helena, the 21st of May, 1503.—The negligence of the Portuguese left it to their rising rivals in trade, and the English settled the island in 1660. The Dutch scarcely less active, and then beginning to be powerful, seized it by surprise thirteen years after.

The English returned, and in 1674 retook the island, with all the snipping which the Dutch had put in there on their homeward voyage. This was at least enough of human hostility for a spot in the centre of the ocean, but ten miles long, between six and seven broad, and measuring in its circumference but twenty-three miles. But as a resting place, it was interesting to the trade which has been always an object of ambition; it abounded with excellent water, it had turtle and fish, and was by nature almost impregnable. The face of the island is exceedingly irregular, deep cliffs, wild rocks, and patches of vegetation hid in basins of basalt. The hills on the shore rise from 800 to 1400 feet; those of the interior spring up higher. The most elevated ridge runs from south west to north east, and Diana's Peak is above the level of the ocean 2692 feet. This ridge forms a species of table land, and is interspersed with small valleys, irrigated with the constant moisture from the clouds on the summit, and covered with a deep and velvet pasture. The general appearance of the island conveys the idea of the action of fire at some remote period. The broken surface, the wild and spiry shapes of sudden crystallization, the strong and deeply defined hues, superb reds, broad greens, sanguine purples, and all that rich and fantastic variousness of colour, so often enamelled on rocks vivified in the furnaces of the volcano! show to what source the island is to be traced. The circumference is a line of steep precipices, divided by narrow valleys and almost totally formed of beds of rock. The hills of the interior, chiefly covered with clay, are verdurous and luxuriant. The central ridge, shaped into peaks and slender eminences, is one display of herbage and plants chiefly foreign to Europe. Lower down appear argillaceous hills, with conical summits, perfectly naked, but tinged with the most brilliant touches of colouring. Huge masses of detached rock, of several hundred feet high, are seen resting among the vallies of the second region. Below this sweeps the iron frontier, a circle of black, rude, burnt rocks, shattered and torn, and without the least appearance of vegetation. All that belongs to this little island partakes of the romantic. Its place in the centre of an unfathomable sea, lonely, and shut out from the world by that length of waves, scarcely strikes the eye with more surprise than the discovery of its town.

On approaching the coast nothing is seen but desolation, and at once on rounding the point of the harbour, a handsome town rises, batteries stretch along the heights, flags are waving, ships at anchor, and the whole variety and bustle of European life spreads before the stranger, who has for weeks or months together seen nothing but sea and sky.—James' Town, the residence of the government, lies in James' Valley, on the north west side of the island, tolerably built and neat in its appearance. The entrance of the valley is crossed by a fortified line; after passing this by a draw-bridge, the town is entered by a gateway, under a rampart, which forms one side of a parade of about 100 feet square. The governor's house and main guard room fill the left side of the parade. The garrison church, a tolerable building, fronts the gateway, the principal street commences between it and the company's garden. This street, which will scarcely remind Bonaparte of the Rue de Rivoli, is of only twenty houses, but those contain all the noblesse of the settlement. Two branches run from it, one to the east, leading into the country on that side, the other to the upper part of the valley, the barracks and the hospital. The principal shopkeepers have fixed themselves in this street.

This article has extended to the full length of our limits; we shall probably renew the description in our next publication.

There is but one circumstance which we shall now notice, from its connection with the probabilities of escape. James' town is the only station off which a ship can lie at anchor for any length of time, but the coast is not uniformly precipitous. Small vallies with sandy beaches, run in the intervals to the sea, and there is no imaginable precaution, short of actual confinement, which can guard against escape by those. A boat can be sent from any ship at anchor, to wait for the fugitive, and on his going on board, there is nothing to prevent her slipping off at once to sea.

A DESCRIPTION OF ST. HELENA.

To the Editor of the Democratic Press.

SIR—St. Helena is situated in the midst of the Southern or Ethiopic ocean, and is the most distant island from the continent of any in the known world, its extreme length don't exceed nine miles, and its circumference nearly twenty seven, as it is nearly round. All the English East India ships stop here in their way home, and are very cautious for fear of missing such a speck in the ocean. St. Helena lies in a most temperate and agreeable climate, the S. E. trade winds blowing there the whole year round, renders the air cool, pleasant and healthy.

This island is perfectly exempt from thunder or lightning and is refreshed by light flying showers, which produce a quick vegetation, as well as a continued verdure. It displays a most dreary and uncomfortable prospect from the sea, of high craggy rocks, many of whose summits are hidden in the clouds, and many of them projecting over their base of a dark brick colour.

The only two landing places on this island are RUPERT'S and JAMES'S. There are beside these two landing places a small place called Sandy Bay, where boats in very calm weather might land, but this is defended below by a strong battery, and on the heights are another from which a body of men with small arms, and by rolling down stones would ultimately destroy any number of men that would attempt to force a landing. Rupert's valley is not inhabited, except by soldiery, having no fresh water. In James' or Chapel valley stands Jamestown the residence of the governor. This valley, by my observations, which I paid great attention to, lies in latitude 15, 55 south, and longitude 5 deg. 50 min. west from the meridian of Greenwich. Its fort defends the valley by a very strong battery of 32 and 44 pounders, and is flanked by a high and incessable valley upon a rock on the larboard hand, called the Mundens, in honor of admiral Munden, who took the island from the Dutch in the reign of Charles the second. There is but one street in this town of James, and that is in the very depth of the valley and nearly half a mile long, and on each side are very beautiful and elegant frame houses painted white. At the steep end is a very pleasant walk between two rows of trees, I took them to be beach, but they are in bloom all the year round.

On the right side of the valley is a steep promontory, called ladder hill, which you will see by the survey I have made from the ship in the roads, it is perhaps 900 feet high, with many guns slung in chains and in hooks like unto Gibraltar. On the left is another mountain of stupendous height, but not so steep, there is a winding path on its side by which we had access to go into the upper country; and when arrived at the level of the island the prospect was most delightful, but terrific when we looked down on the sea-beaten rocks. From a rude barren brick colored rock you now view the most lively verdure, beautiful lawns, shrubberies, and landscapes.

This island now belongs to the East India company, who generally keep about 700 soldiers in their pay, but this force is not near sufficient in case of an attack, but every man without exception are trained to arms, (as we ought to be in the United States) and parties appointed to posts of alarm which they occupy with great alertness when a signal is made from mount Diana. On this mount there is a lookout-house with 6 cannon 24 pounders mounted, in war time when a ship is first descried to windward two guns are fired, this is called a single alarm, immediately the drums beat to arms and every man takes the post as assigned him. If more than one ship heaves in sight there is a gun fired for each one. Every man, white, black, malay or lascar must stand by his post, until the governor gives a telegraphic signal from ladder hill to return to their homes again. All ships to whatever nation they may belong, on their approach to the anchoring place, must first send their boat ashore to fort Munden for leave to anchor, if not, they will be fired upon instantly. After reporting the ship and nation to the governor, if he thinks proper, he will send a pass signed to the fort, and permission will be then granted to anchor. Without this all the batteries would thunder down with such advantage from these high and steep precipices, that a fleet of men of war could not do any execution against them.

Whilst in St. Helena I met with a namesake of mine who kept a very extensive brewery, and through his introduction amongst his acquaintance I had many invitations to spend the evening. I accepted of as many as was convenient, and I must confess, I never was among people in any clime who appeared to me to be more friendly and polite without affectation. The great quantity as well as the richness of the pasturage diffused over the face of the island, make beef and mutton extremely plenty. Another reason for which is the quickness of their growth, so, that the oxen are generally killed at two and three years old, and are then equal in size to English oxen of five years. They have abundance of poultry, good Irish potatoes; the growth of the island, plenty of yams, oranges, lemons, grapes, figs, apples, &c. &c. &c.

As ships meet with good refreshment at St. Helena their sick speedily recover from the scurvy. There is a good hospital there also, and plenty of good rock water, but wood is scarce. One watering place is at Jamestown fort, with a crane to strike the cask in and out of the boat, but there is another and better watering place in Lomon valley, where you may fill the water in the boat with an hose in despite of the surf, it is however a little farther to fetch it. The average height of the island on the seaboard, is about 300 or 400 perpendicular feet, and on the top are vast beds of sand which are thrown up in tempestuous weather, notwithstanding its height above the surface of the sea. It may not be unworthy remark, that the sun at rising don't shine on the town, until 9 o'clock, and the declining sun withdraws his rays by the shadow of ladder hill at 4, or half past 4, P. M. The distance across the valley from one hill to the other don't exceed 7 furlongs. There are 4 store ships constantly employed by the East India company from England and Ireland that supply this island with the luxuries of Europe.

There are very extensive shops in Jamestown principally stored with China and India goods. These goods are sold to the officers and crews of the Indian men, just to raise the wind as it is termed, being a part or the whole of their adventures. The population in my opinion may be about 3000 white people; English, Irish and Scotch families, and some French families, besides Hindoos, Lascars, and some Chinese.—The protestant church is the established church, and of course is predominant.

LONDON, October 23.

HOUSE AND FURNITURE FOR BONAPARTE.

The rumors that Bonaparte had, on the eve of his departure for St. Helena, provided himself and suite with a variety of costly articles of furniture for future use, are totally unfounded. The exiled captive sailed from England with few accommodations, either for his voyage or subsequent necessities, beyond those immediately furnished for his passage while on board. The only property of value which he was able to reserve at his departure from France, consisted of the imperial plate, and an admirable library. No orders were either applied for, or executed at Plymouth, when he sailed, as has been erroneously stated, and the trifling purchases made by his suite, were chiefly confined to a few packs of cards and chess boards, by the desire of madame Bertrand. So completely unprovided was the emperor for a long voyage, that when his linen was sent ashore to be washed and made up, he was under the necessity of borrowing from among his suite a few shirts for immediate use. He had hardly sailed when the attention of government was drawn to the consideration of his future wants.—

Our inhospitality was, under the exigency of the case, to be limited to our own island, and it was at length specially determined, by the express order of the prince regent, that the modern Themistocles, who sought refuge from fate, under his royal highness's protection, should be furnished in his banishment with every possible gratification and comfort which the taste and fitness of an ample supply for his domestic economy was calculated to afford. In furtherance of his royal highness's command, an order, alike worthy of the high station of the donor and the intended object of its application, was last month issued by earl Bathurst, to one of the most tasteful and ingenious artists of the metropolis.—This order comprised every species of furniture, linen, glass ware, clothes, music, and musical instruments, which Bonaparte and the whole of his suite can possibly want for a period of more than three years. The directions for it were given in the most ample and unrestricted sense—no price in the first instance fixed, no particular quality of articles specified, the whole were to be made up in a style of pure and simple elegance, with this only reservation—that in no instance should any ornament or initial creep into the decorations which would be likely to recal to the mind of Bonaparte the former emblematical appendages of his imperial rank. The order was to be completed within six weeks, and by the indefatigable exertions of four hundred men, it has been finished in the given period, and in great part packed up for immediate conveyance to Plymouth, where a transport is in waiting to receive it. The whole has been executed in British materials; the chairs and tables are, in general, formed of the finest British oak, inlaid with polished brass; the breakfast service is of Wedgeworth's most beautiful pale composition, with a white cameo device in relief, modelled by Flaxman, in his best style; the dinner service is white and gold, the centre of each plate, dish, &c. containing an elegantly executed landscape of British scenery; the glass, and of the finest quality, is plainly, but elegantly cut, with a fancy border of stars, supported by fluted pillars; the table cloths, napkins, &c. are of the finest damask; the evening service is white and gold; the imperial plate rendered it unnecessary to furnish him with a service of our own manufacture; but a few dozens of spoons, and other minor articles of that description, to meet the wear and tear of domestic accidents, form a part of the present supply.

The curtains and cushions are of light blue silk, with a black border, and small black wreaths. Some are of blue, with a rich border. Both the colors and style of this part of the furniture, and indeed of the whole, are admirably suited to the climate for which they are intended. There is, if we may use the expression, a grateful coolness in the tone and quality both of the materials and decorations, which is finely suited for internal ornament under an eastern atmosphere. In Bonaparte's wearing apparel, his favorite color (dark green) has been preserved—shirts, cravats, pocket handkerchiefs, boots, shoes, and stockings, of every description, are also provided for him. His friends and suite are no less attended to—they are equally to be furnished with suitable equipments. A piano-forte, and some articles of dress, are provided for Madame Bertrand.

To meet the difficulty of procuring for Bonaparte a suitable residence at St. Helena, the architect for the ordnance department has nearly completed, at Woolwich, not a wooden house, as has been men-nished, but a timber frame work, for a building to be erected on the island, in the cottage style. It will consist of twenty-four rooms, the general size of each will be about twenty-five feet by eighteen; and this architectural skeleton will accompany the furniture already mentioned, so that in a very short space of time a complete residence will be formed for the ex-imperator and his suite, amply calculated for accommodation, ease and elegance.

Some ornaments composed of green Anglesea marble, are also in preparation. It is right to add, that the extraordinary man for whom this extensive order is fitting up, has no knowledge whatsoever of the preparations which are furnishing for him.

October 24.—Yesterday we presented our readers with an outline of the orders given by government for the establishment of Bonaparte at St. Helena. We this day furnish the details, so far as they have been completed, by that able and ingenious artist, Mr. George Bullock, to whose superintendence the whole of this most extensive order was confided, with a latitude of discretion for the selection of the materials, their manufacture and subsequent arrangement, fully warranted by the acknowledged reputation and taste which this gentleman has universally acquired in the extensive walk of fashionable decoration.

The House.—We have already stated that the frame work for the house is nearly completed at Woolwich. The front is in the pure simplicity of the Grecian style. It is about 120 feet in length, containing fourteen windows and a fine open corridor. The depth of the building is about 100 feet, with a back corridor, almost making the whole structure square. It is two stories high, and will have an elegant cottage appearance. The ground floor of the right division of the house contains Bonaparte's apartments. In the centre of this wing is his drawing-room, which, as well as the other apartments for his accommodation, is spacious, being about thirty feet in length, by a breadth of twenty. This proportion runs through the whole. Next is his dining room with an adjoining library, behind which is a capacious billiard room.—His bed-room, dressing-room and bath are of course connected. The left division of the edifice contains spacious and well suited apartments for the officers or his suite. The rear comprises the servants' and store-rooms. The kitchen is somewhat curiously constructed, being detached from the regular building, and yet perfectly convenient to the dining room, without communicating any offensive fumes to the principal range of rooms. This is an improvement of no small value in a sultry climate. The hall is plain, and merely furnished with seats. The corridor will furnish a cool and shaded promenade.

The Furniture.—The drawing room is coloured with various shades of green—the curtains are pomona green, made of light silk taboret, bordered with rutil green velvet, and edged with gold coloured silken twist or gimp, to correspond. The green silk forms a fine ground for the border—and the style in fitting up the hoistery is new, chaste and simple; the curtain rings are concealed under a matted gold cornice, enclosing the rod on which they run. The supporters are gilt and carved putti, and the green velvet folds form into the architecture of the room by falling in straight lines at each side of the windows, where they draw smooth and compact, without interrupting the progress of those two useful but often excluded properties of nature, air and light. The centre table is formed out of one piece of exquisitely-veined British oak, polished in the very highest degree of perfection. The pier table is of the same timber and quality, inlaid with a slab of the verd antique marble of Monna, from Mr. Bullock's quarry at Anglesea, the only place at which this precious material is now found, and surmounted by a pier glass, with a frame of buhl and ebony. The chairs in this apartment correspond with the tables. There are also two Greek sofas with foot stools: these are peculiarly elegant, being enriched with highly finished ex-mota ornaments. The carpets are of the Brussels texture, in shades of olive, brown and amber, colours finely calculated to harmonize with the tone of decorations in the room. The walls are of light tints of sage green, with beautiful ornamented pannels in Arabesque gold.—The colors it will be observed, ascend from the darker shades upon the ground, until they are lost in the cream color of the ceiling. This produces a harmony in the decorations, which is in the highest degree elegant. One of the drawing room recesses is filled up by a piano forte, and a few tasteful chandeliers and candelabras are occasionally introduced with a pleasing effect.

The Dining-room.—A neatly finished table, supported by substantial claws and pillars, capable of being divided to suit a company of from six to fourteen. The side-board intended for the imperial plate is of a new form, pure and simple in its construction and decoration. The wine-cooler is of bronze and rich wood, and shaped after the fashion of the Greek bacchanalian vases. The chairs are plain. The curtains are of lavender-coloured silk, with a rich black border, relieved by a gold coloured silk lace and cord. The carpet and walls are shaded with the same colours, falling into blues, with a black and brown relief; the latter, of various hues, pervade the room.

The Library.—This apartment is fitted up in the Etruscan style, with a number of dwarf book-cases. The curtains are of a new material, composed of cotton, which produces the appearance of fine cloth. The library table is particularly elegant, and mechanical ingenuity has been laboriously applied to furnish it with desks and drawers, suited to every convenience of study and accommodation.

The sitting room.—This chamber is fitted up with several plain cabinets, formed of ebony, inlaid with polished brass; the carpets are ethereal blue, intermingled with black.

The bed-room.—This apartment contains a high canopy bedstead, with curtains of fine straw-colored muslin, and lilac draperies of Persian, the entire edged with a gold-colored fringe ornament. The dressing room possesses the usual conveniences required by taste and comfort. The adjoining bath is marble-lined, and so constructed, that it can admit either hot or cold water.

Yesterday we described the table services. They have been provided by Mr. Bullock, from the most eminent manufacturers in the kingdom, and consist of the fairest, though not the most extravagant specimens of our own proficiency in the various walks of mechanism and art. There is one breakfast set of ware, one dinner set, two deserts, one of china, the other of glass, one tea, and one for supper. The following are among the principal manufacturers who were employed to assist in providing the extensive and hurried order:

Messrs. Randle and Bridge—the plate.

Bolton, of Soho, the plated goods.

Parker and Perry, of Fleet street, the glass.

Wedgwood, the music.

Wormsley and Gooch, of Leeds, the cloth.

Struts of Derby, the hosiery.

The first manufacturers at Manchester—the cotton and Damask.

Bennett of Coleraine, and Richardson, of Lisburn—the Irish linen (of the first quality.)

The sets of China were selected from different manufacturers throughout the kingdom.

An immense quantity of stationery will also be sent. The cargo will weigh near 500 tons—it will be divided into about 200 packages, and several artificers are to accompany it, for the purpose of fitting up the establishment at its destination.

This order does credit to government, and the industry and taste of the artist employed upon the occasion are in the highest degree praise worthy.

Letter of the late French ministers to the king, explaining their motives for their retiring

"SIRE—Your majesty deigned to confide to us the administration of your empire, when the whole of Europe in arms occupied the northern provinces, when they menaced those of the east and the south, and when civil war was kindled and diffused over the west. A triumphant faction which was restrained but not discouraged; portions of the population who had become indifferent from the excess of their fears or their sufferings to any events which might ensue; equally ready to support alternately the tyranny of the faction and the yoke of foreign arms, until some greater misfortunes should at length unite them against their oppressors; such has been the situation of the kingdom since your majesty's return.

"The love of our country was no longer to be found, but under the tri-colored flag. The party which called themselves royalists, proscribed, in their projects, both the laws and the men who did not encourage the subversion of social order. Were France buried, beneath her own ruins, and your majesty reigned only over desert provinces, this party would prefer the destruction of the glory, the strength, and the political existence of France, to seeing her consoled for her misfortunes, and regaining her losses under the wise and liberal laws vouchsafed by our majesty. This party became hostile in the west, in the south, and in the north, because it believed itself supported by authority. Good citizens, waited in silence, to hear the voice of your majesty. At present they are preparing their arms in Auvergne, in the Cevennes, in the Vosges, in Franche Comte, and in Alsace.

"You cannot, sire, be ignorant what was our devotion to your sacred person; we had partaken of your dangers, your misfortunes, and your exile; we know the wishes and the wants of the French people; we expressed them to your majesty with a respectful candor. You seemed to listen to us; and now that we are quitting your councils, we hope that you will permit us to recall them to your recollection.

"Successive revolutions have changed the conditions of families, have overthrown the fortunes which they had amassed, have closed up the paths they had opened, have tarnished the national glory which they had exalted; but these revolutions have also taught the people, that there is no happiness for them except under a steady and fixed government, because that will replace the conditions of families in a state of harmony with existing manners, because it will consolidate existing fortunes, because it will permit the citizen to go on in that career which they have begun, and because it will establish the national honor on the principles of unalterable justice; results of the utmost importance to the nation, because it will place individuals in that native condition which the state of society requires.

SUPPLEMENT TO VOL. IX.

"If we could have given this direction to your majesty's government, France would have been united in heart and in conduct with the wishes of their king; their interests would have been confounded with the glory, the love and the safety of the prince. Those desires and those fatal passions which would have disturbed an order of things so auspicious to the general good would gradually have died away, or have been lost in the emptiness of an ineffectual opposition.

"Your subjects would have submitted to your laws, whatever their opinion might have been, or their former condition. The republican or the imperial party is no longer to be feared; the mass of the nation wish only for liberty and tranquility. Foreign cabinets, in seeing Frenchmen rallied round your throne, would have limited pretension, which then you might withstood.

"The constitution having rendered us responsible for the acts of your authority, we proposed to regulate it by those principles which we have here unfolded. We soon had to struggle with the ignorance, the passions, and the hatred of the persons who surrounded you; they soon began to interfere with the government. Orders were given, and measures adopted, in which we did not participate. Royal commissaries went and kindled civil war in the provinces, gave arms to the seditious, directed their ferocity against peaceful citizens, and spread around terror and dismay! They easily succeeded in this, when they announced that foreigners were their auxiliaries, when they profaned the name of your majesty, by invoking it in their addresses, and when in the south, which foreigners did not yet occupy, they permitted the entrance of eighty thousand Spaniards. A marshal of France was murdered on the bank of the Rhone, and his assassins were neither apprehended nor punished! Was it by oppression that the people were to be inspired with a love for your government? Outrage soon extended itself; in some cities colors were displayed which were not those of your majesty. Frenchmen themselves wished to dismember your kingdom, and separate the north from the south. Your majesty became sensible that it was necessary to recede to their submission the blind partizans of a cause whose legitimacy was acknowledged! Our orders were not listened to; magistrates whom we sent in your name were sacrificed; by those who acted in the name of the king; we remained without power; secret instructions rendered all our efforts and intentions unavailing. In such circumstances, what could your majesty's ministers do? The duke of Otranto, when Napoleon still reigned, had succeeded by negotiation, in disarming La Vendee. Your majesty was scarcely seated on the throne when the insurrection broke out in this same La Vendee with more violence than ever. What could be its object after your restoration? Your minister at war declared that he had no troops with which to subdue those provinces; it was not the intention of your court that this insurrection should be opposed.

"We cannot conceal from you, sire, that these attacks are levelled at your throne; you suffer legitimate authority to be despised and the authority of faction supplies its place. Factions produce revolutions, and those who triumph to-day, may be overthrown to-morrow; your throne will no longer have even the support of their illegitimate authority. Your ministers always devoted to your person still endeavored to oppose this re-action; the princes of your house, the nobles of your court, designated as crimes; and as attacks upon your crown; their efforts to restore order and submission to the laws; we lost all influence with your majesty; we became guilty in the eyes of the nation.

"The elections were made; a factious minority directed them; that minority alone is represented. The choice which they recommend to your majesty for the chamber of peers indicate the same spirit.

"Ministers, without authority, a prey to the persecutions of the court, without support in the public opinion, exposed to the opposition of the chambers, what should we be able to reply to the clamors of the people, when at length they shall demand the reasons for so many calamities?

"Meanwhile, foreigners possess France as a conquered country; to civil discord they add the ravage of provinces; they dissipate the funds which ought to find their way into the treasury; they devour the provisions of the people, who are threatened with an approaching famine; they carry off the magazines of arms, the ammunitions of war, and the cannons from the ramparts of our cities. The white flag floats only over ruins! They despoil us of our public monuments, the tokens of our former glory; they seize the monuments of art, which alone remain to us after twenty years of conquest. It is a dishonor, sire, which the people are most reluctant to pardon, and your majesty has remained silent in the midst of all these attacks on the national honor!

"We were, for a long time, ignorant that secret treason had connected you with foreigners—your majesty wished to negotiate yourself—we could not prevent the disbandment of the army, and this measure being completed, left France and your person in the power of foreigners. What had your house to fear from that army? Napoleon no longer existed for France. The national colors granted, and some concessions made to public opinion, that army would have become yours, it would have served you to resist the ambitious projects of your allies. Was every thing to be abandoned to the combinations and the seductions of your court, and of foreign princes? Your court is led a-tray by prejudices; the foreign sovereigns have interests opposed to yours. The emperor of Russia was, perhaps, the only one whom you could believe sincere in his promises.

"The allies at this moment oppose the recruiting of the departmental legions.

"Such are the misfortunes of the situation in which unwise councils have placed your majesty. Your subjects are almost every where in opposition or in arms against each other, and almost every where the partisans of your house are the smallest number. The French humiliated and discontented, are ready to proceed to the last extremity. Your majesty has no longer the means of opposing the pretensions of foreigners. They have presented a treaty, which would consummate the ruin of the nation, and which would cover it with eternal shame. We have not thought it became us to give an assent which would have rendered us culpable towards that nation, which may be humiliated, but which cannot be beaten down.

"Since your majesty has confided authority to our hands, we have constantly been without the power of doing good, without the power of preventing evil. Our opinions have no influence; the cabals of your court have prevailed. We have to obey, through respect to your majesty, and to sanction by our signature, acts which we disapprove. We would have sacrificed our lives to save your majesty and the country, but those who are near your majesty know that the revolution which they would excite, would surround the vessel of the state with new perils; that they would give to factions, to whom you are opposed, the means of seeing a resting place beyond the legitimate authority of your majesty; that they would raise pretenders to the throne where you are seated. It is not by means of a faction that your majesty ought to reign, but by a constitution, by a royal prerogative, recognized and established. Let that faction tremble, and suspend their efforts to substitute passion in their place. Their agents would be the first victims, and they would cause the greatest misfortunes to your majesty.

"We are, therefore, convinced, that we can no longer contribute to the welfare of your subjects, that we cannot govern the state in the spirit of the councils which direct your majesty. Your wisdom will doubtless do more than our zeal and our efforts to remedy the evils which afflict the state; we therefore venture to supplicate you to believe in the regrets that we experience, in not being able any longer to contribute to serve you, and in the wishes that we have formed for the prosperity of your house, and for the safety of the country."

THIRD AND LAST REPORT OF THE DUKE OF OTTAVIO. (FOURTH.) TO LOUIS XVIII.

[Translated for the Columbian.]

SIRE—In placing before your majesty's eyes the true, but afflicting picture of the moral and political situation of France, in pointing out the character and resources of the various factions which divide this unhappy country, I have only indicated the possibility of the existence of a court party which might counsel or favor a plan of counter revolution.

"Every plan of this nature," I remarked, "would overturn the throne with a tremendous crash, and would perhaps destroy our last remaining hope, the dynasty of our kings."

The existence of such a party is no longer a problem; it is generally known under the name of the party of the princes.

Europe knows, and France will never forget, with what a noble disinterestedness, truly French, your majesty defended the constitutional principles of the monarchy.

Called to the throne, your majesty followed the same system, and the constitutional charter, your work and our guaranty, proved that the happiness of the people continued to be the object of your vows and meditations.

But it must be avowed, this confidence as extensive as it is well founded, inspired by the information and exalted virtues of your majesty, does not extend to the members of your family.

The great majority of the French despair to find in those princes, who are to succeed your majesty, the same intentions and the same principles. This distrust, a stranger to the person of your majesty, cannot be so to your heart; and your goodness, sire, will not allow you to find enemies in those whom nature, misfortune, and gratitude have constituted your friends and protectors.

I am about to afflict your majesty; but I cannot, without betraying the confidence with which you honored me, suffer you to remain ignorant of the dangers that menace your most sacred rights. Can I fear to disclose to your majesty those evils which you alone can remedy?

Immediately after your majesty's return in 1814 a party pronounced itself emphatically against every thing that had been established since twenty five years. It was enough for them to make France retrace her steps back to 1789; they wished every thing to be for the king and by the king; they sought to re-establish the monarchy with its Gothic institutions; hence those alarms so universal of the re-establishment of the feudal rights and tithes.

The French, happy in their affection for your majesty, opposed to those antiquated pretensions nothing but songs and epigrams. But soon more serious acts provoked a more serious resistance, and this conflict of force and reason, against the mad sallies of religion and political fanaticism, were suspended by the return of the usurper.

At this period, the partisans of absolute monarchy confounded in their hatred all who were not within their line, and openly boasted of the support of those personages who were nearest the throne.

All those whose interests and opinions attached them to the revolution, waited only for a chief, in order to defend their rights, which were thus directly attacked.

The elements of civil war, fermented in every quarter of France, when the usurper made his appearance at two hundred leagues from the capital. He obtained, without apparent peril, without a contest, without opposition, what he would have vainly attempted to reach with a considerable army and the influence of his mighty fame.

The regrets, which then accompanied your majesty in your retreat beyond the frontiers, had only your person for their object; after making the greatest efforts to maintain a footing on the French territory, the princes of your house found themselves in a most humiliating state of solitude in the south and west. Since the last return of your majesty, this party has assumed a most alarming aspect, and no longer listens to moderation or reason. The authority of your majesty has been despised, another royal government has been organized, the magistrates appointed by you were repulsed from the cities, the administration of which had been confided to them by your majesty. This government proclaimed, instead of your name, that of monseigneur and madame.* The public acclamations saluted them under the titles of king and queen of the south. The colours of their house replaced the white of the lily, which is the national color.

Commissaries, who usurped the title and powers of ministers, organized a magistracy and an armed force, equally foreign to your sovereignty and your will. These abuses have been confined to certain provinces, and have not passed beyond their limits. Your majesty has solemnly protested against these scandalous usurpations; but who among the guilty has been pointed out and punished? how can we confide in the sincerest re-establishment of order, when foreign journals attack the personal right of your majesty to the inheritance of the throne? they no longer speak of a voluntary abdication in favor of another; but of a right independent of your will.

And this pretended right is invoked in favor of a princess in whose name was raised up that rival authority, the existence of which is proved by the numerous papers I have laid before your majesty.

What appeared, only two months since, a rash conjecture, is now an evident truth. Who can have excited in the English journals those long discussions upon the Salic law in whose favor are disputed the principles of this fundamental statute of the French monarchy.

It is not as a theoretical question of public law that the English journalists present this dissertation. They name you, sire; they name the princess, your niece, and doubtless without the knowledge of either,

And when we connect together the circumstances that have taken place in the south, and which have just transpired in certain parts of the north and west of France, can we for an instant doubt, that for fear of seeing a constitutional monarchy consolidated under your majesty's reign, its enemies wish to anticipate the order of succession consecrated by the usage of fourteen centuries? was our age then destined to be that of political calamities?

The whole history of France replies to these daring innovations, whose works reach us through the English gazettes, and which are supported and authenticated by forged acts every where circulated. Have they, then, forgotten that this law, constantly observed, was for the first time disputed in 1316, by Jane, daughter of Louis Huttin? but notwithstanding these pretensions, was not Philip V. maintained upon the throne of France? have they, then forgotten that Edward, King of England, vainly asserted the same pretensions as the son of Isabel of France, sister of Louis Huttin, of Philip the Long, and of Charles IV. who successively reigned and died without male children? the right of Philip of Valois, consecrated by the Salic Law, was it not proclaimed anew?

For the third and last time this law was again applied in favor of your ancestor, Henry IV. On the 28th June, 1593, a solemn act proscribed these same pretensions, hazarded by the chief of the Ligue, [League] of that Ligue whose madness and fury are exactly copied by the party I have described.—All these historical facts are well known to your majesty, whose profound erudition is admired by all Europe.

Those who would trample on your legitimate right, must distrust those ministers who are most devoted to your person, and it is through the same channels that circulate the most virulent diatribes against us. Such attacks have no terrors for me; and at any other time I would not have imperturbed your majesty with them. But such is the nature of the projects formed against the right of your crown, that I am without authority as I am without enmity against their authors and protectors.

A solemn declaration, a formal disavowal, might cause every thing to be forgotten. But this declaration, this disavowal, who is to demand it? where is information to be gathered? the attributes of my ministry cannot extend so far.

Sire, the public grief is at its height; you alone can console the French for all they have suffered.—It would have been as delightful as honorable for me to have contributed to this object under your auspices.

I supplicate your majesty to receive the port folio which you thought proper to confide to me, and to see in this request only an expression of my respectful devotion.

(Signed)

The DUKE OF OTRANTO.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON TO LORD CASTLEREAGH.

Paris, September 23.

My lord—A great deal has lately been said here respecting the measures I have been obliged to adopt in order to obtain for the king of the Netherlands his paintings and other things out of the museum; and as these reports may reach the ears of the prince regent, I communicate to you the following account of the whole affair, for his royal highness's information—

*The duke and dutchess of Angouleme.

†The dutchess of Angouleme, daughter of Louis XVI.

A short time after the arrival of the sovereigns at Paris, the minister of the king of the Netherlands demanded the pictures, &c. belonging to his sovereign, as did the ministers of the other sovereigns, and, as I was informed, could not obtain a satisfactory answer from the French government. After several conversations with me upon the subject, he sent to your lordship an official note, which was laid before the ministers of the allied powers, assembled at a conference, upon which the business was several times taken into consideration, in order to discover a means of doing justice to the claimants of the objects of art in the museum, without hurting the feelings of the king of France. Meanwhile the Prussians had obtained from his majesty, not only all the pictures belonging to Prussia proper, but also all those belonging to the Prussian territory on the left bank of the Rhine, and all those which were the property of his Prussian majesty; the affair now became urgent, and your lordship wrote a note of the — in which the matter was fully treated. The minister of the king of the Netherlands having not yet received any satisfactory answer from the French government, applied to me as commander in chief of the army of the king of the Netherlands, and asked whether I had any objection to employing his majesty's troops to obtain possession of what was indubitably his majesty's property; I laid this question also before the ministers of the allied monarchs; and as no objection was found, I thought it my duty to take the necessary steps to obtain what was his right. I spoke in consequence with prince Talleyrand upon this subject, communicated to him what had passed at the conference, and the reasons I had for thinking that the king of the Netherlands had a right to the paintings, who requested me to lay the matter before the king, and entreat his majesty to do me the favor to determine the manner in which I might obtain the object of the king of the Netherlands without in any manner offending his majesty. Prince Talleyrand promised me an answer by the next evening; but as I did not receive it, I repaired to him in the night, had a second conference with him, in which he gave me to understand that the king would give no orders upon the subject, that I might do as I thought proper, and negotiate with Mr. Denon, the director of the museum. In the morning I sent my aid de camp, lieutenant-colonel Freemantle to Mr. Denon, who told him that he had no orders to give up any paintings out of the gallery, and that he should suffer none to be taken away but by force. I then sent colonel Freemantle to prince Talleyrand to acquaint him with this answer, and to inform that the troops would go the next morning at 12 o'clock, to take possession of the paintings belonging to the king of the Netherlands, and to declare, that if any thing unpleasant should arise from this measure, the king's ministers, and not I, were answerable for it. Colonel Freemantle likewise informed Mr. Denon of the measure that was to be taken. It was, however, not necessary to send any troops, because a Prussian guard constantly occupied the gallery, and the pictures were taken away without any assistance being required from any troops under my command, except a few who assisted as labourers in the taking down and packing up.

It has been alleged that by having been the instrument of carrying away from the gallery the pictures of the king of the Netherlands, I had been guilty of a breach of a treaty which I had myself made; and as there is no mention made of the museum in the treaty of the 25th of March, and it seems now the treaty spoken of is the military convention of Paris, it is necessary to show how this convention is connected with the museum.

I do not want to prove that the allies were at war with France; there is no doubt that their armies entered Paris under a military convention concluded with an officer of the government, the prefect of the department of the Seine, and an officer of the army, who presented both authorities at that moment, present at Paris, and empowered by these authorities to negotiate and conclude for them.

The article of the convention which is alleged to have been broken, is the 11th, which relates to the public property. I positively deny that this article has any relevance whatever to the gallery of paintings.

The French commissioners introduced in the original project, an article to provide for the security of this species of property; but prince Blücher would not consent, saying there were in the gallery paintings which had been taken from Prussia, and which Louis 18th had promised to restore, which, however, had never been done. I repeated this circumstance to the French commissioners, and they prepared to accept the article with the exception of the Prussian pictures, and to this proposal I answered that I was there as the representative of the other nations in Europe, and that I must claim for other nations all that was conceded to the Prussians. I added, that I had no instructions concerning the museum, nor any grounds how the sovereigns would act; that they would certainly urge that the king should fulfil his obligations, and that I advised the omission of the article entirely, and the reserving this affair to the decision of the sovereigns when they should arrive.

Thus stands the affair of the museum in reference to the treaty. The convention of Paris is silent upon it, and a negotiation took place, which left the business to the decision of the sovereigns.

Taking it for granted that the silence of the treaty of Paris, of May 1814, respecting the museum, had given the French government an indisputable claim to the pieces contained in it, it cannot be denied that this claim was annihilated by this negotiation.

Those who negotiated for the French government, judged that the victorious armies had a right to take the works of art from the museum, and they therefore endeavoured to save them by introducing an article into the military convention. This article was rejected, and the claim of the allies greatly advanced by the negotiation on their side, and this was the reason that the article was rejected. Not only then was the possession of them not guaranteed by the military convention, but the above-mentioned negotiation tended the more to weaken the right of the French government to the possession, which was founded on the silence of the treaty of Paris of May 1814.

The allies having now legal possession of the pieces in the museum, could do no otherwise than restore them to those from whom they had been taken away, contrary to the usages of civilized warfare, during the dreadful period of the French revolution and the tyranny of Bonaparte.

The conduct of the allies with respect to the museum at the time of the treaty of Paris, must be ascribed to their desire to gratify the French army, and to confirm the reconciliation with Europe, to which the army seemed at that time to be disposed.

But the circumstances are more entirely different; the army disappointed the just expectations of the world, and embraced the first opportunity to rise against its sovereign, and to serve the genera enemy of humanity with a view to the renewal of the frightful times that were passed, and of the scenes of pillage against which the world has made so many gigantic efforts.

This army having been defeated by the armies of Europe, it is dissolved by the united council of the sovereigns, and there can be no reason why the powers of Europe should do wrong to their own subjects, in order to again satisfy this army; indeed, it never appeared to me to be necessary that the allied sovereigns should neglect this opportunity to do justice and favor to their own subjects, in order to please the French nation.—The feelings of the French people upon this subject can be no other than national arrogance.

They would desire to retain these works of art, not because Paris is the properest place for them to be preserved in, (for all artists and connoisseurs who have written on the subject, agree that they ought to be sent back to the places where they originally were) but because they have been acquired by conquests of which they are the trophies.

The same feeling that makes the people of France wish to keep the pictures and statues of other nations, must naturally make other nations wish, now that victory is on their side, to restore those articles to the lawful owners; and the allied sovereigns must feel a desire to promote this object.

It is besides to be wished, as well for the happiness of France as of the world, that if the French people are not altogether convinced, that Europe is too strong for them, they may be made to feel, that however extensive for a time their temporary and partial advantages over one or more of the powers of Europe may be, the day of retribution must at length come.

According to my feelings, then, it would not only be unjust in the sovereigns to gratify the French people, but the sacrifice they would make would be impolitic, as it would deprive them of the opportunity of giving the French a great moral lesson.

I am, my dear lord, &c.

WELLINGTON.

Translated for the Democratic Press.

LETTER CIRCULATED IN PARIS, ADDRESSED TO LORD WELLINGTON.

MY LORD—I have read with a mixture of indignation and regret, your letter addressed to lord Castlereagh, wherein you attempt to justify the sacking of the museum at Paris. You fight better than you write, my lord, tho' the principles which actuate in both, appear to be the same, to distress others and fatten on their spoil. You have admitted that these monuments are the trophies of former victories, and permit me to say, that even as such they ought to have been held sacred by a soldier. They were the right and fruits of conquest, nay more, they were given and received in diminution of the calamities and contributions of war. They were as much the property of the French nation as the soil of Malta is a gem of the British crown.

You say the convention of 1815, made no provision for them. Had that instrument been so worded as to guarantee them, you would no doubt have said, with all the subtlety of English probity and policy, that such a clause was of no avail from the illegitimacy of the provisional government. But what says the convention of 1814—that all the monuments of Paris shall be respected; do circumstances alter the case, or do you feel that you do not now as an ally, owe as much to Louis 18, as you did then, or has the weight of his misfortunes lessened your commiseration, for this afflicted venerable monarch.

Fie my lord, you weigh the finest sentiments of the human heart, rather by the depreciated scale of a London merchant, than by the noble feelings of a soldier or the generosity of an ally. You have taken from victory its reward, from a nation its ornaments; you have transported the arts from a genial clime to the smoke of London, or the frozen zone of the north, and though you strain hard as a conqueror, to pass unstained with the crime of blood, you appear to court the crime of treason. Yes treason, my lord, you stole into the capital under the sacred garb of a friend and champion and after betraying us, retired with that of a plunderer. Like a physician who comes to cure the plague, while he engenders the leprosy teeming from his own ulcers. You have been called the Washington of the age, but that hero would have supported and followed his friend to the scaffold, while you my lord, would not only abandon but drag him to it. It is in the power of the meanest to triumph over fallen greatness, but high and elevated minds soar above such depravity. You have forgotten, or never knew, my lord, that he conquers twice who conquers in victory. But admitting that it was necessary for you to attempt the justification of interposing your authority, in favor of these champions of the rights of men, these magnanimous allies; why after urging all in your power to palliate your injustice, that you may escape censure, why carry your animosity towards us so far as to seek to punish what you are pleased to style our arrogance. This my lord is the very quintessence of arrogance. And then our morals too must receive a lesson. An English general teaching morality to the French nation! And that too in a letter to that noted artful lord Castlereagh. Pray, my lord, where did you imbibe those lessons of morality?—on the shores of the Ganges, or the plains of Hindostan, where millions of human beings with their legitimate sovereigns have been isolated, to satiate the thirst of British dominion:—from the inquisitors of Spain, whom you assisted to raise the funeral pile and turn the inquisitorial wheel to enslave and subdue their fellow subjects, or from the conflagration of Copenhagen or Washington, the crimes of Hampton or Kingston, the revolting scenes of the Chesapeake, or the black hole of Calcutta, or from the desolating and destructive policy, which hangs over and prays upon your native country? But I will go no far her. You have retrieved my lord, the character of Napoleon, by the relief you have given it—you have brought into full view the odious policy of your infernal government, the inveterate foe of the repose of human kind, by attempting to degrade our country and disgrace her citizens. And since you could not with your imperial eagles and royal vultures, dismember and devour France, you have sought to retard her resuscitation:—that resuscitation will one day come, when it may be her turn, my lord, to set in judgment on your and their crimes.

In the mean time it will be said of the confederacy of which you are generalissimo; in arms they ravage the earth, and it is their delight to collect the recent spoils and live as plunderers.

Battle of the Moskwa.

FROM THE "EDINBURGH REVIEW" OF LAURENCE'S NARRATIVE OF THE CAMPAIGN IN RUSSIA.

The action commenced precisely at 6 o'clock on the morning of the 7th; and the chief object of contest, where our author was stationed, was a redoubt in the centre of the position. This redoubt was attacked and carried by the French, after a tremen-ous loss. It was then stormed by the Russians, under the fire of three hundred pieces of cannon, and they were advancing to strike a decisive blow against the French centre, when their progress was arrested by general Friand, who with a battery of twenty-four pieces of cannon, carried death and destruction into their ranks. The interesting narrative of our author thus proceeds:

"The viceroy seized this decisive moment, and flying to the right, ordered a simultaneous attack of the grand redoubt, by the 1st, 3d and 14th divisions. Having arranged all three in order of battle, these troops advanced with cool intrepidity. They approached even the entrenchments of the enemy, when a sudden discharge of grape shot from the whole of their artillery spread destruction through our ranks. Our troops were staggered at this fatal reception; but the prince knew how to reanimate their spirits, by calling to the recollection of each regiment the circumstances in which they had formerly covered themselves with glory. To one he said, 'preserve that courage which has gained you the title of invincible;' to another, 'remember your reputation depends on this day;' then turning towards the 9th of the line, he said to them with emotion, 'brave soldiers, remember you were with me at Wagram, when we broke the enemy's centre.' By these words, and still more by his example, he inflamed the valor of his troops to such a degree that shouting with joy, they again marched with ardor to the redoubt. His highness riding along the line, arranged the attack with the utmost coolness and led it himself at the head of Broussier's division. At the same instant, a division of cuirassiers, from the centre of the army, rushed on the redoubt, and offered to our astonished sight a grand and sublime spectacle. The whole eminence, which overhung us, appeared in an instant a mass of moving iron: the glitter of the arms, and the rays of the sun reflected from the helmets and the cuirasses of the dragoons, mingled with the flames of the cannon that on every side vomited forth death, gave to the redoubt the appearance of a volcano in the midst of the army.

"The enemy's infantry, placed near this point, behind a ravine, kept up so destructive a fire on our cuirassiers, that they were obliged immediately to retire. Our infantry took their place; and turning the redoubt to the right and left recommenced a furious combat with the Russians, whose efforts rivalled our own.

"The viceroy and his staff, in spite of the enemy's tremendous fire, remained at the head of Broussier's division, followed by the 13th and 30th regiments. They advanced on the redoubt and entered it by the breast work, massacred on their pieces, the cannoners that served them. Prince Kutusoff, who had witnessed the attack, immediately ordered the cuirassiers of the guard to advance and endeavor to retake the position. These were the best of the cavalry. The shock between their cuirassiers and ours was therefore terrible, and one may judge of the fury with which both parties fought, when the enemy, in quitting the field, left it completely covered with dead.

"The interior of the redoubt presented a horrid picture. The dead were heaped on one another.—The feeble cries of the wounded were scarcely heard amid the surrounding tumult. Arms of every description were scattered over the field of battle.—The parapets, half demolished, had their embrasures entirely destroyed. Their places were distinguished only by the cannon, the greatest part of which were dismounted and separated from the broken carriages. In the midst of this scene of carnage, I discovered the body of a Russian cannoner, decorated with three crosses. In one hand he held a broken sword, and with the other firmly grasped the carriage of the gun at which he had so valiantly fought.

All the Russian soldiers in the redoubt chose rather to perish than to yield. The general who commanded them, would have shared their fate, if his valor had not saved his life. This brave soldier had sworn to die at his post, and would have kept his oath. Seeing all his companions dead around him, he endeavored to precipitate himself on our swords; and he would inevitably have met his death, had not the honor of taking such a prisoner arrested the cruelty of the soldiers. The viceroy received him with kindness, and committed him to the care of col. Asselin, who conducted him to the emperor's prison—139—142.

The Russians having evacuated their position during the night, the field of battle was immediately occupied by the French; and never, perhaps, did any human eye behold such a spectacle of misery and slaughter. The ground for about the space of a square league, was literally covered with dead and wounded. In many places the bursting of shells had promiscuously heaped together men and horses. The fire of the howitzers had been so destructive, that heaps of bodies lay scattered over the plain; and where the ground was not encumbered with the slain, it was covered with broken lances, muskets, helmets, and cuirasses, or with grape shot and bullets, as numerous as hail stones after a violent storm. "But the most horrid spectacle (continues our author) was the interior of the ravines, where almost all the wounded, who were able to drag themselves along, had taken refuge to avoid further injury. Those miserable wretches heaped one upon another, and swimming in their blood, uttered the most heart-rending groans.—They frequently invoked death with piercing cries, and eagerly besought us to put an end to their agonies." Such are some of the details of this glorious battle, which we lay before our readers, not for the purpose of shocking their feeling, but because we think they serve to place what is called military glory in its true light—and thus in some measure, to correct those false impressions under which mankind have been, in all ages, so much blinded to the true nature of the warrior's exploits. They would answer a still greater purpose, if they would tend to soften the hearts of those cold and calculating politicians, who make war without any consideration of its miseries, and regard the plea of humanity as a vulgar common place, altogether unfit to be taken into the account of their magnanimous deliberations.

Battle of Waterloo.

Extract of a letter, dated Brussels, July 16.

I have visited the field of battle. The sleep of the dead is sound. On the spot where this day months thousands thronged and fought, where thousands sunk and bled, and groined, and died, there is now not a living soul, and over all hovers the stillness of the grave.

In Ligny 2000 dead were buried. Here fought the Westphalian and Berg regiments. Ligny is a village built of stone and thatched with straw, on a small stream which flows through flat meadows. In the village are several farm houses, enclosed with walls and gates. Every farm house the Prussians had converted into a fortress.—The French endeavored to penetrate through the village by means of superior numbers. Four times were they driven out: At last they set on fire farm houses in the upper end of the village with their howitzers. But the Prussians still kept their ground at the lower end. A whole company of Westphalian troops fell in the court yard at the church; on the terrace before the church lay 50 dead.

In the evening the French surrounded the village. The Prussians retired half a league: the position was lost; and it is incomprehensible why the French did not follow up the advantage they had obtained, and again attack the Prussians in the night. This was on the 16th. The same day a French column marched by the high road of Charleroi to Brussels.

At Quatre Bras they found the duke of Brunswick and the prince of Orange. Here the battle was as hot as at Ligny. The duke let himself be carried away by his ardor into the fire of small arms; a musket ball went through his bridle hand and entered the belly; the liver was penetrated; he fell, and breathed his last in ten minutes. His sufferings were short.

At the inn by the cross roads at Quatre Bras, the contest was the hottest. Here are the most graves. The wounded reeled into the inn yard, leaned against the walls, and then sank down. There are still the traces of blood on the walls, as it spouted forth from the wounds with departing life.

Where the battle was, the fields are completely trodden down for a circuit of about a league. On both sides of the high road, ways are made about 100 feet broad, and you can still follow the march of the battalions in all directions through the fine fields of maze.

On the 18th the battle was renewed four leagues nearer Brussels, on both sides of the high road. The spot is a plain sprinkled with hillocks.—The diameter of the field of battle may be about a league and a half. Bonaparte placed himself near the farm house of Mount St. Jean, on a rising ground, whence he could overlook the whole. Beside him was one Lacoste, a Walloon, who now lives near the hamlet of Belle Alliance, and who was employed as a guide. This man told me as follows:—When the Prussians came out of the wood of Fritschermont, Bonaparte observed them with his glass, and asked one of his adjutants who they were; the latter upon looking through his glass, replied, "they are the Prussian colours." That moment his face assumed a chalky whiteness, as if the ghost of the sainted queen of Prussia had appeared to him, whom he persecuted to death. He said nothing, but merely once shook his head. When he saw that the battle was lost, he rode off with his general staff and the above guide. He had told Lacoste that he wished to be conducted by a bye road to Charleroi."

Genappe is an open market town, a league and a half from the field of battle, through which runs the Dyle, a small stream. At the lower end of Genappe lies an iron forge, which it drives. A quarter of a mile lower lies the village of Ways, at which there is a bridge. An officer had arrived at Genappe about five in the afternoon with orders to withdraw the baggage. He had already considered the battle as lost, because the reserves had been brought into the fire.—When the flight became almost universal, the military waggons were driven sixteen abreast on the causeway. In the narrow of Genappe they were wedged in together, and Lacoste relates that it took an hour and a half to get through them. It was half past twelve at night before they got out of the town, with 150 horses of the staff. I asked him why he did not take Bonaparte by the bridge of Ways, where nobody passed; he replied, "I was not aware of this road."

Thus, with all the maps of the war depot, with all the engineer geographers, who with their repeating circles can set off the geographical position of places even to a second, and with a large staff, Bonaparte here depended on the ignorance of a peasant, who did not know that there was a bridge over the Dyle at Ways. People talk a great deal of military skill and military science, while oftener in decisive movements the whole depends upon the knowledge of a common man.

In the village of Planchenoir, the fourth of a league from Belle Alliance, the guards were posted. The principal house in the village is nearly burnt down. It is inhabited by a very intelligent farmer of the name of Bernhard.—He, like all the others, had fled on the day of battle, but witnessed, on an opposite height, the combat between Bulow and the French reserve, and could give a very good description of it. He carried me to the key of the position opposite Fritschermont. He told me that the peasant who guided Bulow's army, resolved not to come out of the wood at Fritschermont, but to descend into the valley lower down, and to penetrate by Planchenoir, nearly in the rear of the French reserves. "Then," said he, "we shall take them all." The period was truly most critical when the Prussians came to the attack. Wellington was hard pressed, all his reserves were already in action, he was already compelled to withdraw some of his artillery, and a countryman, from the vicinity of Braine la Lead, told me that he saw some of his army; (as he expressed it) en debandage. Bonaparte was probably only waiting for the moment when, with his guards, he should decide the day. We shudder when we reflect, that at this important moment, all depended on the local knowledge of a single peasant. Had he guided wrong, had he led them into the hollow way through which the cannon could not pass—had Bulow's army came up an hour later, the scale had probably descended on the other side. Had Bonaparte been victorious; and advanced to the Rhine, the French nation would have been intoxicated with victory, and with what they call national glory; and a levy en masse would have been effected throughout all France.

From late London papers.

The Museum at Paris.

[From Miss William's narrative.]

When the direful truth was promulgated, what language can paint the variety and violence of passion which raged in every Frenchman's breast! curses, louder and longer than those heaped upon the head of Obadiah, were poured out on the allies by the enraged Parisians. They forgot all other miseries; the project of blowing up bridges, pillage, spoliation, massacres, war-taxes, the dismemberment of empires; all these they wiped "away from their tablets." No longer were their heads plotting on tyranny, on liberty; they thought no more of the cession of fortresses, and the fate of the constitutional chart; all principles, feelings, hopes, and fears, were absorbed in this one great and horrible humiliation.

While the allied troops employed in the removal of the Corinthian horses, all passes to the place of the Carousel were guarded by Austrian cavalry, posted at the avenues of the streets that led to it. The place of the Carousel was forbidden ground only to the French. Foreigners had liberty to cross it as often as they pleased. I heard an officer call out to an Austrian guard who hesitated, "I am an Englishman and have a right to pass." The claim was admitted.

The gates the most vigilantly guarded during some days, against the intrusion of the French, were those of the gallery of the Louvre. It was said that this measure was taken from motives of tenderness to those feelings which the scene within must naturally have excited in the French; but it was rumored also, that exasperation might produce violence, and the pictures might be defaced, and the statues mutilated. The troops of each nation took this pos- by turns. It was that of the Austrians at my last visit. There they stood, defiance in their eye against all Frenchmen, and fresh green branches stuck in their caps; this is the usual ornament of the Austrian soldier's hat or cap, when in campaign; but these branches appear so much like symbols of victory, that they are highly offensive to the French. When foreigners required admittance, the doors were thrown open. The Frenchmen who were refused, glanced at the laurelled-cap, bit their lips, muttered imprecations, and withdrew.

Some few had, however, the address to procure entrance; they were but few; I found some artists pacing the gallery of paintings; they had an air of distraction, and were muttering curses, "not loud but deep."—Que le tonnerre du Ciel! On! c'en est trop! and other exclamations in the same style. A chill sensation came across my heart when I descended to the halls of the sculpture, and saw the vacant pedestal on which had stood "the statue that enchants the world." I gazed on the pedestal; one of the old liveried attendants of the hall, interpreting my looks, said to me in a sorrowful tone, "Ah! madam, she is gone, I shall never see her again!"—"Gone," said I, "Yes, madam, she set out but this very morning, at three o'clock, et sous bonne escorte." The old man seemed to mourn over Venus as if she had been his daughter.

The adjoining hall presented a few days after a most melancholy spectacle. There lay the Apollo on the floor in his coffin. The workmen were busied in preparing him for his journey, by wedging him in his shell; and an artist was tracing his celestial features, when the trowel with its white paste passed across his divine visage. His arm was majestically stretched out. The French artists who were present, wept over it; they pressed his hands to their lips, and bade him a last adieu! The scene was now closed on that perfect image worthy of almost divine honors. He was going to add a new glory to Rome, and draw new pilgrims to his shrine; but to Paris he was lost forever, and she might well deplore her calamity; she had indeed seized him as her captive, but she had gazed on him with unwearied admiration; she had hailed him as the most splendid trophy of victory; and she would have purchased his stay with her treasures, even with her blood, had not resistance been unavailing.

In the package of these divinities much apprehension was felt of their sustaining some injury. The necessary aids and tools were wanting. No rewards no menaces, however, could prevail on the French, crocheurs, porters, and laborers, plying in the streets for employment, to lend their aid. The French, of the lowest class, were too indignant and malicious to be the abettors of such spoliation. The ladders of the master of an exhibition of singes savans, learned monkeys, in the neighborhood of the Louvre, were, at length, put in requisition to unhang the pictures. The pythian divinity of olympus lay in the streets all night, and might have suffered from any accidental tumult; and the Venus de Medicis was fated, like an abandoned female, to take up her abode for some hours in a common guard-house.

The commissaries of the duke of Tuscany, having sent off the Venus, laid their hands on the Madonna della Seggia.

The Spaniards claimed their share in this general distribution, and succeeded better than they had done in their purpose of invasion; of which it appears that the principal motive was that of obtaining new cloathes, since they had heard, with some envy, that almost all the troops of Europe had made their toilette at the expense of France.

And lastly presented themselves the commissaries of the king of Sardinia.—They came at an unlucky moment. The Austrian guard at the museum had been called away to assist in the removal of the horses at the Thuilleries. The guardians of the museum, raised into indignation at the attack of these new commissaries collected their forces, consisting of numerous workmen, and with brush and broom swept the Sardinians out of the gallery.

Clerical Modesty.

It is not because the catholic clergy are particularly mentioned in the following article that we direct attention to it; but to exhibit another proof that clergymen of every denomination embodied by law, do not consider their kingdom to be situated entirely out of this world! Let us be grateful for exemption from the two grand scourges of mankind, an established church and monarchy!

"Yesterday says a London paper of August 20, two mails arrived from Holland and one from Flanders. From the papers and private letters by those conveyances, it appears that those bigotted catholic clergy of Belgium have zealously bestirred themselves, among their implicit and credulous followers, to procure the rejection of the new constitution for the United Netherlands, because it tolerates all forms of worship, and guarantees the admissibility of all citizens to office, without regard to their religious persuasion. The bishop of Ghent has particularly manifested his apostolic wrath against this encroachment upon the monopoly of the good things of this life, heretofore enjoyed by the faithful. In addition to a pastoral instruction on the subject, he caused his vicar-general to address the following godly epistle to the notables of his diocese.

"Gentlemen, from the pastoral instruction of the bishop of Ghent, and more especially from the authorities of the sovereign Pontiffs, Pius the Vth and VIth, you must be convinced that the project of the new constitution contains articles diametrically contrary to our holy religion, and that, consequently, it cannot be accepted by any good catholic. It is therefore our duty to enjoin you—and wo to us if we do not fulfil it, as also wo to you if you do not regard us as the organs of the catholic religion; who urge you to be zealous for its preservation—it is therefore, we repeat, our duty to enjoin you, as we by these presents do, to reject this project purely and simply. This the goodness of his majesty our king permits you to do, in selecting you to vote for the rejection or acceptance of the said project, and in securing to the catholic church its state and its liberties. We have the honor, &c.

The Grand Canal.

Memorial of the citizens of New-York, in favor of a Canal navigation between the great Western Lakes and the Tide-Waters of the Hudson.

To the Legislature of the state of New-York,

The memorial of the subscribers in favor of a Canal Navigation between the great western lakes and the tide-waters of the Hudson, most respectfully represents:

That they approach the Legislature with a solicitude proportioned to the importance of this great undertaking, and with a confidence founded on the enlightened public spirit of the constituted authorities. If, in presenting the various considerations which have induced them to make this appeal, they should occupy more time than is usual on common occasions, they must stand justified by the importance of the object: Connected as it is with the essential interests of our country, and calculated in its commencement to reflect honor on the state, and in its completion, to exalt it to an elevation of unparalleled prosperity; your memorialists are fully persuaded that centuries may pass away before a subject is again presented so worthy of all your attention, and so deserving of all your patronage and support.

The improvement of the means of intercourse between different parts of the same country, has always been considered the first duty, and the most noble employment of government. If it be important that the inhabitants of the same country should be bound together by a community of interests, and a reciprocation of benefits; that agriculture should find a sale for its productions; manufactures a vent for their fabrics; and commerce a market for its commodities; it is your incumbent duty, to open, facilitate and improve internal navigation. The pre-eminent advantages of canals have been established by the unerring test of experience. They unite cheapness, celerity, certainty and safety in the transportation of commodities. It is calculated that the expense of transporting on a canal, amounts to one cent a ton per mile, or one dollar a ton for one hundred miles, while the usual cost by land conveyance, is one dollar and sixty cents per hundred weight, or thirty-two dollars a ton for the same distance. The celerity and certainty of this mode of transportation are evident. A loaded boat can be towed by one or two horses at the rate of thirty miles a day. Hence the seller or buyer can calculate with sufficient precision on his sales or purchases, the period of their arrival, the amount of their avails, and the extent of their value. A vessel on a canal is independent of winds, tides, and currents, and is not exposed to the delays attending conveyances by land: and with regard to safety, there can be no competition. The injuries to which commodities are exposed when transported by land, and the dangers to which they are liable when conveyed by natural waters, are rarely experienced on canals. In the latter way, comparatively speaking, no risk is incurred, no waste is encountered, and no insurance is required. Hence, it follows, that canals operate upon the general interests of society, in the same way that machines for saving labor do in manufactures; they enable the farmer, the mechanic and the merchant to convey their commodities to market, and to receive a return at least thirty times cheaper than by roads. As to all the purposes of beneficial communication, they diminish the distance between places, and therefore encourage the cultivation of the most extensive and remote parts of the country. They create new sources of internal trade, and augment the old channels, for the more cheap the transportation, the more expanded will be its operation, and the greater the mass of the products of the country for sale, the greater will be the commercial exchange of returning merchandize, and the greater the encouragement of manufactures, by the increased economy and comfort of living, together with the cheapness and abundance of raw materials; and canals are consequently advantageous to towns and villages, by destroying the monopoly of the adjacent country, and advantageous to the whole country; for though some rival commodities may be introduced into the old markets, yet many new markets will be opened by increasing population, enlarging old and erecting new towns, augmenting individual and aggregate wealth, and extending foreign commerce.

The prosperity of ancient Egypt and China, may in a great degree be attributed to their inland navigation. With little foreign commerce, the former of those countries by these means attained, and the latter possesses a population and opulence in proportion to their extent, unequalled in any other. And England and Holland, the most commercial nations of modern times, deprived of their canals, would lose the most prolific sources of their prosperity and greatness. Inland navigation, is in fact to the same community what exterior navigation is to the great family of mankind. As the ocean connects the nations of the earth, by the ties of commerce, and the benefits of communication, so do lakes, rivers and canals operate upon the inhabitants of the same country: and it has been well observed, that "were we to make the supposition of two states the one having all its cities, towns and villages upon navigable rivers and canals, and having an easy communication with each other: the other possessing the common conveyance of land carriage, and supposing both states to be equal as to soil, climate and industry, commodities and manufactures in the former state might be furnished thirty per cent. cheaper than in the latter; or in other words, the first state would be a third richer, and more affluent than the other."

The general arguments in favor of inland navigation, apply with peculiar force to the United States, and most emphatically to this state. A geographical view of the country, will at once demonstrate the unexampled prosperity that will arise from our cultivating the advantages which nature has dispensed with so liberal a hand. A great chain of mountains passes through the United States, and divides them into eastern and western America. In various places, rivers break through those mountains and are finally discharged into the ocean. To the west there is a collection of inland lakes exceeding in its aggregate extent, some of the most celebrated seas of the old world. Atlantic America, on account of the priority of its settlement, its vicinity to the ocean, and its favorable position for commerce, has many advantages. The western country, however, has a decided superiority in the fertility of its soil, the benignity of its climate, and the extent of its territory. To connect these great sections by inland navigation, to unite our Mediterranean seas with the ocean, is evidently an object of the first importance to the general prosperity. Nature has effected this in some measure; the St. Lawrence emanates from the lakes, and discharges itself into the ocean in a foreign territory. Some of the streams which flow into the Mississippi, originate near the Great Lakes, and pass round the chain of mountains. Some of the waters of this state which pass into Lake Ontario approach the Mohawk; but our Hudson has decided advantages. It affords a tide navigation for vessels of eighty tons to Albany and Troy 160 miles above New-York, and this peculiarity distinguishes it from all the other bays and rivers in the United States, viz.

The importance of the Hudson river to the old settled parts of the state, may be observed in the immense wealth which is daily borne on its waters, in the flourishing villages and cities on its banks, and in the opulence and prosperity of all the country connected with it, either remotely or immediately. It may also be readily conceived, if we only suppose that by some awful physical calamity, some overwhelming convulsion of nature, this great river was exhausted of its waters; where then would be the abundance of our markets, the prosperity of our farmers, the wealth of our merchants? Our villages would become deserted; our flourishing cities would be converted into masses of mouldering ruins, and this state would be precipitated into poverty and insignificance. If a river or natural canal, navigable about 170 miles, has been productive of such signal benefits, what blessing might not be expected, if it were extended 300 miles through the most fertile country in the universe, and united with the great seas of the west! The contemplated canal would be this extension, and viewed in reference only to the productions and consumptions of the state, would perhaps convey more riches on its waters, than any other canal in the world. Connected with the Hudson, it might be considered as a navigable stream that extends 450 miles through a fruitful country, embracing a great population, and abounding with all the productions of industry: if we were to suppose all the rivers and canals in England and Wales combined into one, and discharged into the ocean at a great city, after passing through the heart of that country, then we can form a distinct idea of the importance of the projected canal; but it indeed comprehends within its influence a greater extent of territory, which will in time embrace a greater population. If this work be so important, when we confine our views to this state alone, how unspeakably beneficial must it appear when we extend our contemplations to the great lakes, and the country afflicted with them! Waters extending two thousand miles from the beginning of the canal, and a country containing more territory than all Great Britain and Ireland, and at least as much as France.

While we do not pretend that all the trade of our western world will centre in any given place (nor indeed would it be desirable if it were practicable, because we sincerely wish the prosperity of all the states,) yet we contend that our natural advantages are so transcendent, that it is in our power to obtain the greater part, and put successful competition at defiance. As all the other communications are impeded by mountains; the only formidable rivals of New-York for this great prize, are New-Orleans and Montreal, the former relying on the Mississippi, and the latter on the St. Lawrence.

In considering this subject, we will suppose the commencement of the canal somewhere near the outlet of Lake Erie.

The inducements for preferring one market to another, involve a variety of considerations: the principal are the cheapness and facility of transportation and the goodness of the market. If a cultivator or manufacturer can convey his commodities with the same ease and expedition to New-York, and obtain a higher price for them than at Montreal or New-Orleans, and at the same time supply himself at a cheaper rate with such articles as he may want in return, he will undoubtedly prefer New-York. It ought also to be distinctly understood, that a difference in price may be equalized by a difference in the expense of conveyance, and that the vicinity of the market is at all times a consideration of great importance.

From Buffalo, at or near the supposed commencement of the canal, it is 450 miles to the city of New-York, and from that city to the ocean, 20 miles. From Buffalo to Montreal 350 miles; from Montreal to the chops of the St. Lawrence, 450. From Buffalo to New-Orleans by the great lakes, and the Illinois river, 2,250 miles; from New-Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico, 100. Hence the distance from Buffalo to the ocean by the way of New-York, is 470 miles; by Montreal 800; and by New-Orleans, 2,350.

As the upper lakes have no important outlet but into Lake Erie, we are warranted in saying that all their trade must be auxiliary to its trade, and that a favorable communication by water from Buffalo, will render New-York the great depot and warehouse of the western world.

In order, however to obviate all objections that may be raised against the place of comparison, let us take three positions, Chicago near the southwest end of lake Michigan, and a creek of that name which sometimes communicates with the Illinois, the nearest river from the lakes to the Mississippi: Detroit, on the river of that name between lakes St. Clair and Erie; and Pittsburgh, at the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongohela rivers, forming the head of the Ohio, and communicating with Le Beuf by water, which is distant fifteen miles from Lake Erie.

The distance from Chicago to the ocean by New-York, is about 1,200 miles. To the mouth of the Mississippi, by New-Orleans near 1,600 miles, and to the mouth of the St. Lawrence, by Montreal, near 1,600 miles.

The distance from Detroit to the ocean by New-York, is near 700 miles. From Detroit to the ocean by Montreal, is 1,050 miles. From Detroit to the ocean pursuing the nearest route by Cleveland, and down the Muskingum, 2,400 miles. The distance from Pittsburgh to the ocean by Le Beuf, Lake Erie, Buffalo and N. York, is 700 miles. The same to the ocean by Buffalo and Montreal 1,050 miles. The same to the ocean by the Ohio and Mississippi, 2,150 miles.

These different comparative views show that New-York has in every instance, a decided advantage over her great rivals. In other essential respects, the scale preponderates equally in her favor. Supposing a perfect equality of advantages as to the navigation of the lakes, yet from Buffalo, as the point of departure, there is no comparison of benefits. From that place the voyager to Montreal, has to encounter the inconveniences of a portage at the cataract of Niagara, to load and unload at least three times, to brave the tempests of Lake Ontario and the rapids of the St. Lawrence.

In like manner the voyager to New-Orleans, has a portage between between the Chicago and Illinois, an inconvenient navigation of the latter stream, besides the well known obstacles and hazards of the Mississippi. And until the invention of Steam-boats, an ascending navigation was considered almost impracticable. This inconvenience is, however, still forcibly experienced on that river, as well as on the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Lake Ontario.

The navigation from Lake Erie to Albany, can be completed in ten days with perfect safety on the canal, and from Albany to New-York, there is the best sloop navigation in the world.

From Buffalo to Albany, a ton of commodities could be conveyed on the intended canal, for three dollars, and from Albany to New-York, according to the present prices of sloop transportation, for $2 80 and the return cargoes would be the same.

We have not sufficient data upon which to predicate very accurate estimates with regard to Montreal and New-Orleans; but we have no hesitation in saying, that the descending conveyance to the former, would be four times the expense, and to the latter ten times, and that the cost of the ascending transportation would be greatly enhanced.

It has been stated by several of the most respectable citizens of Ohio, that the present expense of transportation by water from the city of New-York to Sandusky, including the carrying places, is $4 50 per hundred, and allowing it to cost $2 per hundred for transportation to Clinton, the geographical centre of the state, the whole expense would be $6 50, which is only fifty cents more than the transportation from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, and at least $2 50 less than the transportation by land and water from these places, and that in their opinion, New-York, is the natural emporium of that trade, and that the whole commercial intercourse of the western country north of the Ohio, will be secured to her by the contemplated canal.

In addition to this, it may be stated that the St. Lawrence is generally locked up by ice seven months in the year, during which time produce lies a dead weight on the hands of the owner; that the navigation from New-York to the ocean, is at all times easy, and seldom obstructed by ice, and that the passage from the Balize to New-Orleans is tedious; that perhaps one out of five of the western boatmen, who descend the Mississippi, become victims to disease; and that many important articles of western production are injured or destroyed by the climate. New-York, is, therefore, placed in a happy medium between the insubstantial heat of the Mississippi, and the severe cold of the St. Lawrence. She has also pre-eminent advantages, as to the goodness and extensiveness of her market. All the productions of the soil, and the fabrics of art can command an adequate price, and foreign commodities can generally be procured at a lower rate. The trade of the Mississippi is already in the hands of her merchants, and although accidental and transient causes may have concurred to give Montreal an ascendancy in some points, yet the superiority of New-York is founded in nature, and if improved by the wisdom of government, must always soar above competition.

Granting, however, that the rivals of New-York will command a considerable portion of the western trade, yet it must be obvious from these united considerations, that she will engross more than sufficient to render her the greatest commercial city in the world. The whole line of canal will exhibit boats loaded with flour, pork, beef, pot and pearl ashes, flaxseed, wheat, barley, corn, hemp, wool, flax, iron, lead, copper, salt, gypsum, coal, tar, fur, peltry, ginseng, bees-wax, cheese, butter, lard, staves, lumber, and the other valuable productions of our country; and also, with merchandize from all parts of the world. Great manufacturing establishments will spring up; agriculture will establish its granaries, and commerce its warehouses in all directions. Villages, towns, and cities will line the banks of the canal, and the shores of the Hudson from Erie to New-York. "The wilderness and the solitary place will become glad, and the desert will rejoice and blossom as the rose."

The following will give an idea of the money expended on such works in England:

	Cost.	Miles.
The Rochdale Canal,	291,900 l.	31 1-2
Ellesmere,	400,900	57
Kennet and Avon,	420,000	78
Grand Junction,	500,000	90
Leeds and Liverpool,	800,000	129

The miles of canal are 385 1-2, and the cost 2,411,900*l.* sterling, or about 28,000 dollars per mile.

But in the estimation of the cost of these canals, unquestionably the price of the land over which they pass is included, and this is enormous. The land alone for one canal of 16 miles, is said to have cost 90,000*l.* sterling. With us this would be but small.

If we look at the history of the English canals, we shall see how many objects of great expense are connected with them, with which we should have nothing to do, and that most of them have encountered and surmounted obstacles which we should not meet with. For instance, the Grand Junction Canal passes more than once the great ridge which divides the waters of England; ours will pass over a country which in comparison is champaign.

But it is said that the price of labor in our country is so much above what it is in England, that we must add greatly to the cost of her canals in estimating the expense of ours. But that is certainly a false conclusion, for not only must the price of land and the adventitious objects which have been before referred to, be deducted from the cost of the foreign canals, but we must consider that there will be almost as great a difference in our favour in the cost of materials and brute labor, as there is in favor of England as to human labor, and it is well known that so much human labour is not now required on canals as formerly. Machines for facilitating excavation have been invented and used with great success.

Mr. Gallatin's report on canals contains several estimates of the cost of contemplated ones. From Weymouth to Taunton in Massachusetts, the expense of a canal of 26 miles, with a lockage of 260 feet, is set down at 1,250,000 dollars. From Brunswick to Trenton, 28 miles, with a lockage of 100 feet, 800,000 dollars. From Christiana to Elk, 22 miles, with a lockage of 148 feet, 750,000 dollars. From Elizabeth river to Pasquotank, 22 miles with a lockage of 40 feet, 250,000 dollars. These estimates thus vary from 48,000 to less than 12,000 dollars a mile, and furnish the medium of about 31,000 dollars a mile. But it must be observed, that they are for some small distances, calculated to surmount particular obstacles, and contemplate an extraordinary number of locks, and that they do not therefore furnish proper data from which to form correct conclusions, with respect to the probable cost of an extensive canal sometimes running over a great number of miles upon a level without any expense (or lockage or any other expense) than the mere earth works.

Mr. Weston before mentioned, estimated the expense of a canal from the tide waters at Troy to Lake Ontario, a distance of 167 miles, (exclusive of Lake Oneida,) going round the Cohoes, and embracing 55 locks of 8 feet lift each, at 2,200,000 dollars, a little more than 13,000 dollars a mile.

Fortunately however, we have more accurate information than mere estimates.

In the appendix to Mr. Gallatin's report, it is stated by Mr. Joshua Gilpin, that "by actual measurement, and the sums paid on the feeder, it was found that one mile on the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, the most difficult of all others, from its being nearly altogether formed through hard rocky ground, cost 13,000 dollars, and one other mile perfectly level, and without particular impediments, cost 2,300 dollars; from hence, the general average would be reduced to 7,650 dollars per mile."

The Middlesex canal in Massachusetts, runs over 28 miles of ground, presenting obstacles much greater than can be expected on the route we propose. This canal cost 478,000 dollars, which is about 17,000 dollars a mile. It contains 22 locks of solid masonry, and excellent workmanship, and to accomplish this work, it was necessary to dig in some places to the depth of 20 feet, to cut through ledges of rocks, to fill some valleys and morasses, and to throw several aqueducts across the intervening rivers. One of these across the river Shawline is 230 feet long and 22 feet above the river.

From the Tonewanta Creek, to the Seneca river, is a fall of	195 feet
From thence to the Rome summit, is a rise of	50
From thence to the Hudson river, is a fall of	350

The whole rise and fall, 625 feet
This will require 62 locks of ten feet lift each. The expense of such locks, as experimentally proved in several instances in this state, would be about 620,000 dollars.

We have seen that on the Middlesex canal, there are 22 locks for 28 miles, which is a lock for somewhat more than every mile, whereas, 62 locks for 300 miles, is but about one lock for every 5 miles; and the lockage of the Middlesex canal, would alone cost 220,000 dollars. It would, therefore, appear to be an allowance perhaps too liberal to consider the cost of it as a fair criterion of the expense of canals in general in this country, and of this in particular. Reservoirs and Tunnels, are the most expensive part of the operation, and none will be necessary in our whole route. The expense of the whole earth work of excavating a mile of canal on level ground, fifty feet wide and fifty feet deep, at 18 cents per cubic yard, and allowing for the cost of forming and trimming the banks, puddling, &c. will not exceed 4000 dollars per mile, and the only considerable aqueduct on the whole line will be over the Genesee river.

From a deliberate consideration of these different estimates and actual expenditures, we are fully persuaded that this great work will not cost more than 20,000 dollars a mile, or six millions of dollars in the whole; but willing to make every possible allowance, and even conceding that it will cost double that sum, yet still we contend that there is nothing which ought to retard its execution. This canal cannot be made in a short time. It will be the work perhaps of 10 or 15 years.

The money will not be wanted at once. The expenditure, in order to be beneficial, ought not to exceed 500,000 dollars a year, and the work may be accomplished in two ways: either by companies incorporated for particular sections of the route, or by the state. If the first is resorted to, pecuniary sacrifices will still be necessary on the part of the public, and great care ought to be taken to guard against high tolls, which will certainly injure, if not ruin the whole enterprise.

If the state shall see fit to achieve this great work, there can be no difficulty in providing funds. Stock can be created and sold at an advanced price. The ways and means of paying the interest will be only required. After the first year, supposing an annual expenditure of 500,000 dollars, thirty thousand dollars must be raised to pay an interest of six per cent; after the second year 60,000, and so on. At this rate the interest will regularly increase with beneficial appropriation, and will be so little in amount that it may be raised in many shapes without being burdensome to the community. In all human probability, the augmented revenue proceeding from the public salt works, and the increased price of the state lands in consequence of this undertaking, will more than extinguish the interest of the debt contracted for that purpose. We should also take into view, the land subscribed by individuals for this work, amounting to 106,632 acres.—These donations, together with those which may be confidently anticipated, will exceed in value a million of dollars, and it will be at all times in the power of the state to raise a revenue from the imposition of transit duties which may be so light as scarcely to be felt, and yet the income may be so great as in a short time to extinguish the debt, and this might take effect on the completion of every important section of the work.

If the legislature shall consider this important project in the same point of view, and shall unite with us in opinion, that the general prosperity is intimately and essentially involved in its prosecution, we are fully persuaded that now is the proper time for its commencement. Delays are the refuge of weak minds, and to procrastinate on this occasion is to show a culpable inattention to the bounties of nature; a total insensibility to the blessings of Providence, and an inexcusable neglect of the interests of society. If it were intended to advance the views of individuals, or to foment the divisions of party; if it promoted the interests of a few at the expense of the prosperity of the many; if its benefits were limited as to place or fugitive as to duration, then indeed it might be received with cold indifference, or treated with stern neglect; but the overflowing blessings from this great fountain of public good and national abundance will be as extensive as our country, and as durable as time.

The considerations which now demand an immediate, and an undivided attention to this great object, are so obvious, so various and so weighty, that we shall only attempt to glance at some of the most prominent.

In the first place, it must be evident, that no period could be adopted in which the work can be prosecuted with less expense. Every day augments the value of the land through which the canal will pass; and when we consider the surplus hands which have been recently dismissed from the army into the walks of private industry, and the facility with which an addition can be procured to the mass of our active labor, in consequence of the convulsions of Europe, it must be obvious that this is now the time to make those indispensable acquisitions.

2. The longer this work is delayed, the greater will be the difficulty in surmounting the interests that will rise up in opposition to it. Expedients on a contracted scale have already been adopted for the facilitation of intercourse. Turnpikes, locks, and short canals have been resorted to, and in consequence of those establishments, villages have been laid out, and towns have been contemplated.—To prevent injurious speculation, to avert violent opposition, and to exhibit dignified impartiality and paternal affection to your fellow-citizens, it is proper that they should be notified at once of your intentions.

3. The experience of the late war has impressed every thinking man in the community, with the importance of this communication. The expenses of transportation frequently exceeded the original value of the article, and at all times operated with injurious pressure upon the finances of the nation.—The money thus lost for the want of this communication would perhaps have defrayed more than one half of its expense.

4. Events which are daily occurring on our frontiers, demonstrate the necessity of this work. It is of importance that our honorable merchants should not be robbed of their legitimate profits; that the public revenues should not be seriously impaired by dishonest smuggling, and that the commerce of our cities should not be supplanted by the mercantile establishments of foreign countries? Then it is essential that this sovereign remedy for maladies so destructive and ruinous, should be applied. It is with inconceivable regret we record the well known fact, that merchandise from Montreal has been sold to an alarming extent on our borders for 15 per cent. below the New-York prices.

5. A measure of this kind will have a benign tendency in raising the value of the national domains, in expediting the sale, and enabling the payment.—Our national debt may thus, in a short time be extinguished. Our taxes of course will be diminished, and a considerable proportion of revenue may then be expended in great public improvement; in encouraging the arts and sciences; in patronizing the operations of industry; in fostering the inventions of genius, and in diffusing the blessings of knowledge.

6. However serious the fears which have been entertained of a dismemberment of the Union by collisions between the north and the south, it is to be apprehended that the most imminent danger lies in another direction, and that a line of separation may be eventually drawn between the Atlantic and the western states, unless they are cemented by a common, an ever acting and a powerful interest. The commerce of the ocean, and the trade of the lakes, passing through one channel, supplying the wants, increasing the wealth, and reciprocating the benefits of each great section of the empire, will form an imperishable cement of connexion, and an indissoluble bond of union. New-York is both Atlantic and western, and the only state in which this union of interests can be formed and perpetuated, and in which this great centripetal power can be energetically applied. Standing on this exalted eminence, with power to prevent a train of the most extensive and afflicting calamities that ever visited the world, (for such a train will inevitably follow a dissolution of the union,) she will justly be considered an enemy to the human race, if she does not exert for this purpose the high faculties which the Almighty has put into her hands.

Lastly. It may be confidently asserted, that this canal, as to the extent of its route, as to the countries which it connects, and as the history of mankind. The Union of the Baltic and the Euxine; of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean; of the Euxine and the Caspian, and of the Mediterranean and the Atlantic, has been projected or executed by the chiefs of powerful monarchies, and the splendor of the design has always attracted the admiration of the world. It remains for a free state to create a new era in history, and to erect a work more stupendous, more magnificent, and more beneficial than has hitherto been achieved by the human race. Character is as important to nations, as to individuals, and the glory of a republic, founded on the promotion of the general good, is the common property of all its citizens.

We have thus discharged with frankness and plainness, and with every sentiment of respect, a great duty to ourselves, to our fellow citizens and to posterity, in presenting this subject to the fathers of the commonwealth. And may that Almighty Being, in whose hands are the destinies of states and nations, enlighten your councils and invigorate your exertions in favor of the best interests of our beloved country!

Legislature of Virginia, HOUSE OF DELEGATES,

December 27, 1816.

The committee of Roads and Internal Navigation, to whom was referred so much of the Governor's Message as relates to Roads and Canals, have, according to order, had that subject under consideration, and prepared the following report thereupon, which they beg leave to submit to the House of Delegates:

Whatever difference of opinion may have, at any time, subsisted, as to the expediency of controuling the voluntary direction of the wealth and labor of individuals by the application of legal constraint, there never has existed a doubt, but that it is the duty, as well as the interest of every good government to facilitate the necessary communication between its citizens.

Next to the enjoyment of civil liberty itself, it may be questioned whether the best organized government can assure to those, for whose happiness all governments are instituted, a greater blessing than an open, free and easy intercourse with one another, by good roads, navigable rivers, and canals. Their tendency, by extending the commerce, to promote the agriculture and manufactures of a nation, and thereby to augment its wealth and population, is too obvious to require much illustration.

The planter and farmer realize their share of this benefit, in the augmented value of their lands; the manufacturer and the merchant, in the increased and diversified demand for their industry and capital.

Nor, are the higher interests of society less indebted for their advancement to the multiplication and improvement of these channels of useful improvement of useful intercourse. They afford the means of exploring the natural resources of a country, and invite the genius of speculation to fit them for the uses of man. Lands too remote from market to tempt cultivation; forests, hitherto regarded as inaccessible; beds of minerals and fossils unknown or neglected, are brought within the reach of ordinary enterprise, and rendered subservient to the convenience and comfort of the citizen, or to the defence and safety of the state.

They confer on an extended empire the promptitude and energy of action which are considered peculiarly characteristic of one of narrow dimensions; since, without contracting the limits of its territory, they reduce the distance, and expedite the communication between the seat of its government and its remotest extremities.

Whether the public force is to be spread out for defence, or combined for attack, they alike contribute to the rapidity and to the vigor of its operations.

In a republic, especially, where public opinion exerts a controuling influence, and public virtue should be the spring of all public action, they may be considered an important auxiliary, if not a necessary ingredient of political liberty. They tend to diffuse more equally the knowledge which experience acquires, and the leisure which wealth alone can purchase; they strengthen the cords of social union, and quicken that generous feeling of patriotism, which is ever ready to exclaim at the contemplation of an extended scene of public improvement "I love my country, because she is worthy of my affection."

The duty, which is obligatory upon all governments, is peculiarly incumbent on one, whose territory, like that of Virginia, nature has done so much both to unite and to separate—to whom she has presented so many advantages to improve, and so many obstacles to overcome. No State in the Union is intersected by so many navigable rivers, nor divided by so many chains of lofty mountains: none, perhaps, abounds with such happy varieties of climate and soil, and so many resources for internal commerce. In her coal, iron, lead and salt, she is unrivalled. Her tobacco and grain command the highest prices abroad. The fertile banks of her rivers, and the moist vallies of her mountains yield abundant crops of flax and hemp. Her low-lands would supply her with cotton for her own consumption, and the fleeces of her flocks, which pasture on her hills, are not surpassed in quality. Notwithstanding these advantages, the principal part of her commerce, and almost the whole of her navigation, pass out of her hands to enrich the coffers of her neighbours. There is scarcely a village to the West of the Blue-Ridge, and very few above tide water, from the Roanoke to the Potomac, which derive any part of their supplies of manufactured commodities, either foreign or domestic, from the seaports of Virginia.

While many other States have been advancing in wealth and numbers, with a rapidity which has astonished themselves, the ancient dominion and elder sister of the Union has remained stationary.

A very large proportion of her western territory is yet unimproved, while a considerable part of her eastern has receded from its former opulence. How many sad spectacles do her low-lands present, of wasted and deserted fields! of dwellings abandoned by their proprietors! of Churches in ruins! The genius of her ancient hospitality, benumbed by the cold touch of penury, spreads his scanty board in naked halls, or seeks a coarser, but more plenteous repast in the lonely cabins of the West. The fathers of the land are gone, where another outlet to the ocean turns their thoughts from the place of their nativity, and their affections from the haunts of their youth. Beyond the Allegany, an unexpected revolution threatens the Atlantic States in general, the accomplishments of which will create new interests and views in that flourishing and important section of America, and bar, forever, the hope of re-uniting it by commercial ties to the markets of the East.

If it be true, as your committee confidently believe, that in a connection between the Roanoke, the James, or the Potomac river, with the waters of the Kanawha or Ohio, this commonwealth possesses the best means of arresting the progress of this revolution, it is a duty which she owes not only to herself, but to the Atlantic States, and to the Union at large, to call those means into action.

Independent of the minuter circumstances, in the natural course and volume of her rivers, and the breadth and elevation of the intervening mountains, which point out Virginia as the proper channel of this connection, the superior mildness of her climate to that of her northern sisters; her position on the Atlantic coast of the U. States; and the capacious bay which serves as the common estuary of her rivers, assure to her very high claims to the emporium of this commerce.

The U. States of America, restricted by the territory of England to the North, and of Spain to the South, describe an arch on the intervening ocean, of which Virginia is the centre, and should be the key-stone, sustaining the Western States upon its broad and lofty summit, and bending the Eastern and Southern in solid, just and fair proportion.—First in asserting the Independence of America, this Commonwealth will not be the last in giving to that independence stability, by confirming the union, upon which it rests.

Your Committee are far from intimating that the General Assembly of Virginia has been totally unmindful of those natural advantages, or wholly regardless of their improvement.

The Commonwealth required time to recover from the pecuniary losses she sustained during the war of the Revolution. It found her citizens laboring under very heavy private debts, and left her government encumbered with a debt of a much greater magnitude.

Yet, under circumstances so inauspicious, the statesmen of that day, and especially the illustrious men to whom, under heaven, this nation was indebted for the establishment of its freedom, did not disdain to enquire into the humblest means of giving to that freedom, value. From his zealous exertions, sprung the Potomac and James River Canal Companies. To the first of these, the Commonwealth is indebted for a water communication of three hundred and thirty-eight miles; and upon it, and the contemplated works on the Shenandoah, she relies for the farther improvement of a navigation of three hundred and ninety miles. She has shared with a sister state, the benefits of the labor already performed on this river; in that, which remains to be accomplished on the South Branch of the Potomac, the Cacapehon and the Shenandoah, she has an exclusive interest.

The James River Company, have opened a navigation of three hundred miles.

The Appamattox and the Dismal Swamp Canals naturally followed into existence, those which were indebted for their origin, to the patriotism of Gen. Washington. The former opened a navigation of one hundred miles. The latter was designed merely to connect waters already navigable; but, in its present use, and remote consequences, is not inferior in importance, to any public work within the Commonwealth.

The expense of the first of the preceding works, does not exceed fifteen hundred dollars per mile upon the navigation already opened; that of the second, is about twelve hundred; an average expense which will be annually diminished in the progress of future improvements on the branches of those rivers, as the principal obstructions to their navigation, were removed before their waters could be brought into partial use.

The actual cost of those public works, does not exceed one third of the expense usually attendant upon the structure of Turnpike roads; which, in the absence of navigation, are the only substitute for them. It is due to the latter, however, to remark, that the addition recently made to them of parallel iron rails, immovably set in the earth, at proper intervals, for the wheels of waggons, has more than equalized the advantages of such roads, with the best ascending navigation which the rivers of Virginia afford above their principal falls; and that the additional cost, which this improvement occasions to the structure of the Turnpike, though great in itself, is inconsiderable, when compared with its effect in reducing the expense of land carriage.

The Turnpike roads of the Commonwealth, except a few short passes of particular mountains, and a road recently begun from Fredericksburg, towards the Blue Ridge, are confined principally to the county of Loudon, the adjacent counties of Fairfax, Fauquier and Frederick, and to the vicinity of the seat of Government.

There is but one, to which the funds of the Commonwealth have contributed any aid.

All these public works are alike in one respect: they purpose to defray the expense of their first cost, and of their subsequent repairs, out of the toils collected upon them; and these are equitably levied upon those who use them, in sums proportioned to the benefit which they respectively derive from such use. Where is it absolutely certain that such works can subsist upon this basis alone, the revenue of the Commonwealth, although it may expedite their progress, is not indispensably necessary to their creation.

Private wealth will, of itself, take the direction which personal interest prompts. But there are many such works essential to the prosperity of the Commonwealth; the persons immediately interested in which, have not capitals sufficient to commence their foundation, and there are many others of like utility, which, if completed, would require the lapse of many years to make them profitable to the individual subscribers to their stock. The population and commerce which infallibly follow their direction, spread out upon their borders and swell their toils, cannot be expected to precede their existence.

Although almost all the Turnpike roads within the Commonwealth, have been made without any other Legislative aid, than their respective acts of incorporation; yet, it is probable, that neither Potomac nor James river could have been rendered navigable above tide water, with such assistance alone. Maryland and Virginia, subscribed more than one half of the capital stock of the former, and Virginia alone, more than one third of the latter.—The tolls hitherto collected on the one, would not have justified a subscription to its stock, with a view to more profit; and although those of the latter have, for some time, realized the most sanguine expectations of its friends, and its stock is eighty per cent. above par, yet the revenue of the Company, apart from the appreciation of its stock, would not nett to its members six per cent. per annum upon the sums which they have actually expended on that river, from the commencement of their labors to the present period. Yet, your committee confidently believe, that there is not an individual within the Commonwealth, alive to a sense of her true interests, who would have desired, for the sake of a higher profit to the treasury upon the stock of the public in either of these works, to withdraw the funds which were required for their completion, and permit those noble rivers to return to a state of nature. Those who reside near to their banks, have directly participated in the benefits thus afforded them, of a cheaper mode of transporting the productions of their labor to market; and those even, who antecedently possessed the superior advantages of tide water, or who were compelled by their distance from both, to resort to the common highways in order to reach the same market, have greatly profited by those improvements of navigation, which augmenting the extent and value of that market, could not fail, proportionably, to enhance the price of their produce. So true, it is, that whatever contributes to increase the population and wealth of the towns, must contribute to the growth and improvement of the country. And this effect is wrought not solely on the vicinity of those towns—it is seen not merely in the wealth which glitters in their suburbs; but discovered in the augmentation of their means of consumption, and the enlargement of their commercial capitals.

In this necessary and reciprocated relation of commerce and agriculture, the country below tide water in Virginia, has an immediate and even local interest in the progress and perfection of all those public works, exclusive of its general interest, in whatever advances to the growth and prosperity of the Commonwealth.

The inhabitants of the low lands will, therefore, partake of the benefit of every application of the public revenue to the improvement of the connexion between their market towns and the country above them. It should be peculiarly their policy to turn the commerce of the west from its northern direction into the bosom of their own territory. In the efforts which are contemplated to improve the roads passing immediately through their own country; they have an interest more sensible to the eye, but less to the understanding.

Although much has been done for the improvement of the interior of Virginia, more yet remains to be accomplished. Roanoke and its tributary streams, including the rivers Dan, Nottoway, Meherrin and Blackwater; the head waters of James, Potomac and Shenandoah rivers; those of the Rapahannock, Matapony and Pamunky, on the east side of the Allegany. The great Kenawha and its waters, including, along with Greenbrier, and New River, Gauly and Elk; the little Kenawha, Middle Island, the Monongalia and the branches which swell its current before it leaves the boundary of Virginia, are all entitled to public consideration.

If nature has divided the territory of the Commonwealth by numerous chains of lofty mountains, it is only to incite the genius of man to climb them; and the period is not unattainable—nay, it rests with the Legislature, to determine whether it be remote, when the roads which cross those natural and formidable barriers, shall not be surpassed by those which run along their base.

The experiment of the United States to connect, by a national road, the waters of Potomac, with those of Ohio; and a comparison of the surface over which that highway has been already conducted, with the corresponding ranges of mountains to the South, assure your committee, that such a hope is not chimerical.

Should the General Assembly determine to patronize by the application of the public revenue all such works as are likely to be of great public utility, it becomes important to decide whether an improvement may not be made in the mode heretofore pursued, of extending to them that patronage.

Your committee are fully satisfied that much loss has hitherto been sustained by all the canal companies which have been incorporated, for want of skill in their conduct. Their directors have served, it is true, without compensation. They have generally been public spirited private gentlemen; but neither professional engineers, nor capable from experience and observation, of guarding against the errors and frauds of agents who pretended to be so.

No single company could afford to purchase or could fully employ, in a country where few public works were begun, the services of a distinguished engineer; and yet, without the previous surveys, plans and estimates of such an officer, no very arduous public work could be confidently begun or successfully conducted. To supply the defect of such an officer, would be the obvious interest of the Commonwealth, who, if not sufficiently compensated by the general utility of his labors, might demand of each company, such an interest in its stock, as should be equivalent to the value of the service rendered to the company by such officer.

Whatever fund the Legislature may be inclined to appropriate to internal improvement, a difficulty must occur in settling the relative importance of its proper objects; and, if the appropriation were also required to designate some particular object, it would be often impracticable, from the variety of opinions always existing in an Assembly representing many local interests; to procure an union in the choice of any one. The first of these difficulties may be obviated by organizing a proper body to collect and prepare for the General Assembly, the facts and information necessary to cast upon every application for a portion of the fund, light enough, to guide the sound discretion of the Legislature in the selection of subjects:

And these facts will be entitled to the higher confidence, if reported under the sanction of official responsibility.

To allay such local jealousies as might obstruct an agreement in favor of any single object of internal improvement, the fund may be previously consecrated and set apart for the accomplishment of all, by one appropriation. If the terms of its future application to any, be at the same time prescribed, a like participation, in the benefit of the fund, will be assured to every interest which it is calculated to promote; and the speedy enjoyment of that benefit will be secured to each by proportioning the magnitude of the fund, so set apart, to the number and importance of the objects, for which it is designed to provide.

It may be sound policy for the Commonwealth, in order to accomplish some great commercial or political purpose, to throw open to general use, without the charge of tolls, a particular canal or road; but it can never be its interest, for many reasons, to become the sole proprietor of all the public works within its territory. Experience testifies that they will be more economically made, and better repaired, if their management be left to the individuals who subscribe to their stock with a view to private gain, than if confided to public officers or agents. The Commonwealth should subscribe so much, to their stock, and on such terms, as will suffice to elicit individual wealth for public improvement—and the control which she retains over the conduct of the individual subscribers, should extend no farther, than to prevent or correct such abuses upon the community at large, as might be apprehended from the two eager incentive of gain.

By yielding to the individual subscribers the profit of the State on its shares of the stock of any Company, where required to secure such individuals against temporary loss, a much smaller subscription of public money will suffice to draw forth private enterprise.

The Commonwealth can never be a loser, if a public work judiciously begun, be finally perfected; and the public security against such loss, will be found in the discretion which the Legislature retains over the choice of the objects, for which its patronage is sought.

As the market rate of interest decreases in every commercial country, with the growth of its capital, the maximum profit of the stock of each company may be reduced, after the lapse of a limited period of time.

The least profit allowed by law should be great enough to create the hope of private advantage in those whose enterprise can have no other object; and that minimum, which the community have so much interest in reducing, may be safely fixed at a lower amount, in proportion as the magnitude and conditions of the public subscription afford to private adventurers, an indemnity against any ultimate loss.

The principles laid down in the preceding part of this Report, the committee have embodied in the Resolutions which are subjoined to it, but they would not have performed their duty to the house, if, before they recommended the application to objects of internal improvement, of all the public stock of the Commonwealth, as well as of the premiums which may be hereafter received for the incorporation of new, the extension of the capitals, or the duration of the charters of the existing Banks; they had not enquired into the actual state of the debts, and of the annual Revenue and Expenditure of the Commonwealth.

That enquiry has resolved itself into the establishment of the following proposition:

1st. That for fifteen years, prior to the commencement of the late war, the ordinary Revenue of the Commonwealth had not only been adequate to meet the ordinary expenditure charged upon it, but to enable the Commonwealth to arm from time to time, a large part of her Militia—to lay the foundation of her Literary Fund, to erect several very costly public edifices, and to complete the purchase of the stock subscribed by the Commonwealth to the Bank of Virginia; objects which occasioned a disbursement from the ordinary revenue of a sum, exceeding one million of dollars.

2dly. That since the commencement of that war, the revenue of the Commonwealth, more than doubled, by additional taxes, and farther augmented by considerable loans from the banks, has not only sufficed for the ordinary peace expenditure, but enabled the Legislature to assume the state quota of the direct tax of 1814, and to apply to the defence of the United States, a sum exceeding eighteen hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the interest paid upon those loans.

3dly. That the Commonwealth has at present a claim upon the United States of unquestionable justice, for more than seventeen hundred thousand dollars of the above amount, together with the interest on such portions of it, at least, as were obtained on loan, which claim, when satisfied, will furnish a sum competent to discharge all the debts of the Commonwealth, to provide for the expenditure of the current fiscal year; and to leave at the end of that year a balance in the treasury of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be applied to any other object of internal interest.

4thly. That the present taxes may be reduced to the amount levied before the late war, provided the United States shall reimburse the sums advanced for the defence of the Commonwealth; and, even, should the payment of those sums be withheld, which a just confidence in the good faith of the General Government forbids your committee to expect, a repeal may yet be effected of such portion of the war taxes, as are not absolutely pledged for the payment of the interest, and the redemption of the principal of the public debt.

From all which it evidently appears that the fund which it is proposed to apply to the purposes of internal improvement, may be spared from the revenue of the Commonwealth, without any embarrassment of her finances, any violation of her engagements, or pressure upon her Citizens.

Should the appropriation recommended by the committee receive the sanction of the Legislature, the fund for internal improvement, will consist of the following stock:—

5547 shares of the Stock of the Bank of Virginia, on which a dividend is now received, and which computed at par, is worth	554,700 00
2400 Shares of the Stock of the Bank of Virginia, whereupon no dividend will accrue until after the 1st day of May, 1818,	240,000 00
3334 Shares of the Stock of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia,	333,400 00
250 Shares of the Stock of the James River Company, also estimated at par,	50,000 50
125 Shares of the Stock of the Appomattox Company,	12,500 00
70 Shares of the Stock of the Dismal Swamp Canal Company,	17,500 00
70 Shares of the Stock of the Potomac Company,	31,111 11 1-9
100 Shares of the Stock of the Little River Turnpike Company,	10,000 00

Making a total value of 1,249,211 11 1-9

Of which the sum of 938,100 dollars is now productive of an annual revenue exceeding ninety eight thousand dollars; and two hundred and forty thousand dollars will become alike productive after the first day of May, 1818.

In the present state of the fund, the progress of the public works to which it may be expected to give rise, will be until the first day of May, 1818, at the rate of 245,000 dollars per annum. After that period, it will be further augmented by the addition of sixty thousand dollars. So that the total value of the Internal Improvements of ten years will be 2,777,500; and this calculation is grounded on a supposition, that the portion of the stock which is now unproductive, will continue to be so; and that no augmentation of the fund will have been made by the creation of new Banks.

But your committee confidently anticipate a considerable increase of the fund from the premium of future charters, without impairing the productiveness of the stock of the existing Banks.

A very large proportion of the paper medium of Virginia is, at present, derived from the Banks of the District of Columbia, and of the adjacent states. A banking capital might be created which would supply that medium, and yielding to the state a premium in stock, of 600,000 dollars, would add to the revenue of the fund for Internal Improvement, at least fifty thousand dollars, to the annual disbursements for internal improvements 125,000 dollars, and to the total value of the works accomplished in the period of ten years, 1,125,000 dollars. Nor do your committee consider the expectation too sanguine, provided this fund receive the application which is here proposed, that the present Banking capital of the Commonwealth may be doubled in a period of ten years, and, consequently, the revenue arising from that portion of the fund.

If the latter calculation be admitted to be correct, a continued application of this fund for a second period of ten years, will defray the cost of public works, of the value of 10,452,500 dollars, exclusive of any allowance, whatever, for the dividends upon the shares acquired by the Commonwealth in the stock of any public work which may be hereafter commenced, and of any estimate of the value of such works, as shall owe their existence to the sale and re-investment of any part of the public stock.

Finally, your committee beg leave to subjoin, that, of the whole fund thus usefully applied, a very inconsiderable part, if any, will have been derived from the pockets of the people, by the imposition of taxes. If an allowance be made for the dividends on the state shares of the stock of the Bank of Virginia, down to the period at which the last instalment of the sum subscribed by the Commonwealth for that stock, was paid to the Bank, this amount will be found not to exceed the subsequent dividends on the state shares in the stock of both Banks.

The General Assembly has an absolute and unquestionable right to make any other disposition of this fund, which, to its wisdom, may seem best; but your committee are assured that the institution of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, and the unexampled premiums for Banking in this Commonwealth, are ascribed to the confident expectation of the Legislature and the people, that the profits of this novel though productive system of finance, were to be turned into the channel of public improvement. By giving to these premiums, this direction, the stock of the nation will be retributed for the reduction which they occasion of its amount, and the constraint which they put on its activity.

Be it therefore Resolved, That a fund be created by law, to be denominated "The Fund for Internal Improvement," and to be exclusively applied to the purpose of rendering navigable the principal rivers of more intimately connecting, by public highways, the Eastern and Western waters, and the market towns of the Commonwealth.

2. That this fund shall consist of the shares now held by the Commonwealth in the stock of the Little River Turnpike Company, of the Dismal Swamp, Appomattox, Potomac and James River Canal Companies; of the Bank of Virginia, and Farmers, Bank of Virginia, together with such dividends as may, from time to time, accrue on such shares of stock, and such bonus premiums as may be hereafter received for the incorporation of new, the augmentation of the capitals, or the extension of the Charters of the existing Banks.

3. That for the purpose of preserving and improving this fund, and of disbursing such portions of it as the General Assembly may hereafter direct to be applied to any object of internal improvement, it shall be vested in a corporate body, to be styled—"The President and Board of Public Works."

4. That the Governor of the Commonwealth shall be ex-officio, President of the Board of Public Works; that the Board, a majority of the members of which, shall be competent to transact any business devolving on the Corporation, shall consist of the Treasurer, and the Attorney General for the time being, and of Citizens of the Commonwealth; whereof shall reside Westward of the Allegany Mountain, between the Blue Ridge and Allegany, & the residue between the Blue Ridge & the sea coast.

5. The members of the Board shall be chosen annually by joint ballot of the two Houses of the General Assembly, and receive such compensation for their services as may be allowed by law.

6. That in the absence of the Governor the Board may elect a President pro tem. from their own body.

7. The President and Board of Public Works, shall have power to appoint a principal Engineer or Surveyor of Public Works, a Secretary and Treasurer, together with such other officers and assistants as they shall find necessary, each of whom shall receive for his services, such compensation as the President and Board of Public Works may allow, to be paid out of the Revenue of the Fund for Internal Improvement, and to be reimbursed the fund by an allowance to the Commonwealth of so much of the stock of any Canal or Turnpike company, as shall constitute a reasonable compensation for the services rendered such company, by the Surveyor and his assistants.

8. That the President and Board of Public Works shall be authorised to subscribe in behalf of the Commonwealth, to such public works as the General Assembly may, from time to time, agree to patronize, such portions of the revenue of the fund for Internal Improvement as may be directed by law; but that no part of the fund shall be subscribed towards the stock of any Canal or Turnpike company, until three fifths at least of the whole stock necessary to complete such Canal or Turnpike, shall have been otherwise subscribed, nor until of the stock so subscribed, one fifth part shall have been paid in by the respective subscribers, or the payment thereof effectually secured.

9. That the dividends upon the stock which may be subscribed by the President and Board of Public Works, shall go exclusively to other subscribers than the said President and Board, until such portion of the stock of those subscribers, shall have nett to them six per centum per annum, from the specified time of such payment.—That any increase of profit, after that nett income has been assured to those subscribers, shall belong exclusively to the fund for Internal Improvement, until the nett annual income of the whole stock actually expended by any company shall reach six per centum per annum, after which, the President and Board of Public Works and the other subscribers to the stock of the company shall divide the nett profits on such stock, in proportion to their respective interests.

10. That whenever the nett income of any company shall be found for two succeeding years, or upon an average of five succeeding years, to surpass fifteen per cent per annum, the General Assembly may reduce the tolls from which such income is derived, so as to limit the nett revenue of the company to that amount—Provided, that should the tolls for any two succeeding years fail to yield a nett income to the company of ten per cent per annum, the President and Board of Public Works, on satisfactory evidence being adduced thereof, may authorize the tolls to be augmented so as to assure to the company such nett income; And Provided also, that after the lapse of sixty years, the maximum profit of the company may be reduced to twelve per cent; and after the lapse of one hundred years, to ten per cent per annum.

11. That the President and Board of Public Works, shall have power to vest in any productive fund, the unappropriated dividends accruing upon any of the stock committed to their charge, until the same shall be specially applied by law to some object of Internal Improvement: that they may from time to time, subject to the controul of the General Assembly, sell the whole or any part of the shares held by the Commonwealth in the stock of any Canal or Turnpike company, for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds of sale in the stock of some other similar public work.

12. That the President and Board of Public Works shall have power to appoint, in behalf of the Commonwealth, so many directors of every public work, as shall bear to the whole number of directors of such work, the proportion of the Commonwealth's shares of stock in such work, to the whole number of shares subscribed thereto.

13. That it shall be the duty of the President and Board of Public Works to keep a fair and accurate record of all their proceedings, to be at all times open to the inspection of the members of the General Assembly, and of the President, Directors, and other Officers of any company interested therein, that they shall report to the General Assembly at, or near the commencement of every annual session, the exact state of the funds for Internal Improvement, the progress and condition, nothing especially the nett income, of all the public works within the Commonwealth; the surveys, plans and estimated expence of such new works, as they may recommend to the patronage of the General Assembly, together with all other important information which may be in their power to collect relative to the objects committed to their trust.

14. And lastly, Resolved, that the appropriations contained in these resolutions shall continue in force, until the first day of January, 1900, except, at such times as the United States of America may be involved in war, when the Legislature may withdraw, during the period of actual hostilities, the whole or any part of the said fund for the purposes of defence, provided such withdrawal can be made without a breach of public faith.

¶ The preceding Report of the Committee of Canals and Roads, bears a strong resemblance to that which has been unanimously adopted by the General Assembly of North Carolina, at its present session.—We are informed that it is, in fact, an almost literal transcript from certain resolutions which were submitted to the House of Delegates in January, 1813, and which the House did not, than, finally act upon in consequence of the cotemporaneous invasion of the state.

REPORT ON BANKS

Submitted to the House of Delegates, on Friday, January 5th, 1816.

The Committee to whom were referred sundry petitions for Branches of the existing banks, or the incorporation of Independent Banks within various parts of the Commonwealth, with instructions to make the following enquiries—whether there exists any depreciation of the current paper medium? and if there be such depreciation, the actual extent, true cause and proper remedy thereof? whether any unchartered Banking companies have been recently formed within the Commonwealth, and what means should be devised to guard the chartered Banks against the infraction of their privileges, and the Commonwealth against the abuses of private Banking? have prepared a Report, which they respectfully submit to the House of Delegates:

In performing the duty assigned to them, your committee deem it necessary to premise some general observations upon the nature of the subject, on which they have been required to act, before they call the attention of the House, to the result of the enquiries which they were instructed to make.

An individual, possessed of money or stock, "may derive a revenue" either from "employing it," himself, or "lending it" to others. "In the one case, his revenue is profit, in the other interest." The first constitutes the revenue of a Merchant, the last of a Banker.

Were every individual, who has money which he can lend more profitably, than he can himself employ it, to become a Banker, or attempt to draw the whole or the greater part of his income from loans, he would lose the benefit which he proposes to himself from lending at all. As the rate of interest is restrained both by law and necessity, unless his stock was great, his income would not maintain him.

Before large capitals are amassed in any country, the lending of money will be connected, therefore, with some other lucrative business. The capital which might be productively loaned, will often lie idle in the hands of the lender—and sometimes, for the sake of extraordinary gain, he will demand, and receive for it, a higher interest than the law authorises.

What every stockholder, with a small capital, must labour under great disadvantages in doing separately, a number of individuals associated together, and acting, by a common agent, may render alike profitable and convenient.

Their capitals, however small, when taken apart, will together be large enough, after paying the salary or wages of their agent, and the rent of his house, to yield to them a considerable income.

A number of persons, so dealing in money, and binding themselves, by their agent in their individual capacity, to those with whom he transacts their business, constitutes in the simplest form, what is usually termed "A Bank." And if the employment of such a Bank consisted in lending to men of good credit, or upon approved security, the gold and silver coin of a country, the common representative of value and medium of exchange, it is presumed that no objection could be made to such an institution, which would not equally apply to any other employment of Stock or labour, or to any other means of augmenting the wealth of a nation.

The benefits which it assures to the stockholder or lender, are economy of time; the certainty of receiving his income, when it becomes due—increased security against the total or partial loss of the capital on which it accrues; and a new facility of converting his money, while in continuous productive, into any other species of stock, either for the purposes of agriculture, manufactures or commerce.

The price of Bank Stock, fluctuates more than the value of a dead capital in money, but less than the notes or bonds of individuals; and the danger of losing the capital itself, by violence, fraud, or accident, is less than that which attaches either to the current coin of the country, or to such obligations.

The benefits which the borrower derives from such an institution, are scarcely less important. They may be comprised in the increased facility and certainty of obtaining his required loan, upon giving security for its re-payment, at a fixed period.

To this he is indebted, not only for the more active employment of whatever other capital he possesses, but for being able to devote his undivided attention to his peculiar occupation. The condition on which he may hope for the renewal of his loan, being its punctual re-payment, when due, his integrity is guaranteed by this interest.

A minute inspection of the simple mechanism of a Bank evinces that as a labour saving machine, it is of a great value to the commerce of any country. A fire proof house and a half a dozen persons in a large City, perform by its means, the purpose of countless bolts, and numerous clerks! It saves many anxious nights and laborious days.

Such would be the effects of a Bank, if its office were confined to the mere receipt of gold and silver coin for safe keeping, and the loan of it, upon the notes or obligations of its customers. And were it debarred by law, of the liberty of issuing its own notes, in lieu of specie, such would be its actual condition.

But if a Bank loaned, at legal interest, no more than its real capital, the revenue or dividends of its Stockholders would be less than such interest, by the annual expenses of the Bank; the insurance, repairs, and interest of the fixed capital, vested in its buildings and furniture, and the salaries of its officers and servants.

Even if it extended its loans to a part of its deposits, unless they were very considerable, the additional revenue, thence arising, would not supply this annual expenditure.

Under such a restraint, Banks could exist only in very large cities, or commercial countries, where great capitals had been previously accumulated.

But the actual profits of those institutions in America, have been greater in territories interspersed with small villages, and with very little foreign trade, than in the most populous and wealthy cities. Some of the Banks in America have divided among their Stockholders an annual revenue exceeding twenty per cent. upon their capital. The price of the Stock of the first Bank incorporated in this Commonwealth, rose, not long after its existence, to one hundred per cent. above par. This effect results from the authority with which they have been invested of issuing their own notes payable to bearer. The sum, which this authority enables a Bank to lend, may exceed its specie capital, in the proportion in which the demand for a circulating medium in the country whose currency it supplies, exceeded the quantity of gold and silver coin in circulation before the creation of the Bank, and in which that demand is, itself, subsequently augmented by the loans of the bank.

Whatever power the laws may confer on a Bank to issue its own notes, the extent to which it can carry that emission, must depend also upon the public confidence in their value.

While a Bank remains faithful to its engagement, to redeem its notes, whenever required, by the payment of the gold or silver coin, which, on their face they purport to represent; those notes cannot depreciate below the value of both these species of coin. On the contrary, they will often possess a higher value than either, from the superior facility which attends their transportation.

Before the late war, the notes of the Eastern Banks, commanded, in the Western States, a premium of, from two to three per cent. The war which, in its progress, occasioned so many remittances to the West, speedily reduced this premium; and, finally, created to the East, a greater premium in favor of the notes of the Western Banks. These effects appear to differ, but their cause was the same; the greater facility of transmitting paper, than even the precious metals. Since the peace, the balance has settled down to its condition before the war. Nothing can destroy the operation of the cause. Its effect would, undoubtedly, be diminished by an extension of the navigation of the eastern and western waters, and good roads across the mountains which divide them.

So long as a Bank continues to fulfil its obligations, the permission which it has to issue paper instead of specie, will be alike, attended with a public advantage of no inconsiderable importance. By supplying a substitute for coin, it prevents that reduction of the weight of its pieces by constant use, which requires, and augments the expense of a periodical recoinage; or subjects the nation, whose currency is gradually worn out and debased, to an unfavorable exchange abroad, and to all the inconveniences at home, of a slow, though certain fluctuation in the value of its circulating medium.

The institution of Banks has another valuable effect in increasing the facility of obtaining foreign capital, for domestic use. There has been a singular prejudice in the United States, against the employment of foreign capital; as if, its use, did not sufficiently prove its value.

If it be the policy of a nation, in time of war, to borrow money which constitutes its sinews from its foe, it cannot be less its interest in peace, to employ the capital of other nations for domestic improvement.

The establishment of Banks affords the facility above mentioned, because the mode of their government, renders the distance between their capital and the residence of its proprietors, wholly immaterial, provided there are, in the vicinity of the seat of their operations, a sufficient number of competent persons interested in their good conduct, to prevent the abuse of power by those, to whom their direction is confided. A very considerable part of the stock of the Banks of the District of Columbia, is now held by inhabitants of Virginia; as the greater part of the stock of the late Bank of the United States was held by foreigners.

Where there are many Banks in a country, the motives of strangers, for investing their capital in any particular one, will doubtless depend upon the comparative profits afforded by such Bank, and the comparative security which it offers in the terms of its charter, and the respect entertained for that charter, by the Legislature which grants it, that those profits will continue, and that capital be preserved from waste or destruction. It is a remarkable fact, that while the confidence of the people of Virginia, in the benefits secured to them by the charters of the existing Banks, has induced them to pay for those charters a bonus of twenty per cent. upon the sum which they subscribed to their stock: to purchase that stock encumbered with this premium of the Commonwealth, at seven, and of each other, at seventeen per cent. there were, a few years ago but two foreign holders of Virginia bank stock, and notwithstanding the subsequent extension of the banking capital of this Commonwealth, that number does not now exceed ten.—Yet a comparison of the price of this stock with the annual dividends upon it, and of those again, with the price and dividends of the stock of other Banks in America, afford abundant proof, that capital, thus vested in Virginia, is more productive, than that, which is similarly employed in the Atlantic states, to the North or East.

Your committee believe, that a prejudice has gone abroad, which, they confidently trust, experience will prove to be unfounded, even to the satisfaction of those by whom it is entertained, that the policy of Virginia is essentially hostile to commerce, and to the rights of commercial men. Upon the removal of this prejudice, must depend the future contributions of this Commonwealth towards the prosperity and glory, if not the happiness, and safety of the United States. Without the confidence of foreigners, there can exist no foreign commerce. Without foreign commerce, there can exist neither ships, seamen, nor a navy; and a tremendous lesson has taught Virginia, that without a navy, she can have no security for her repose.

There is no higher evidence of the justice and policy of a nation, than that which exists in the general sentiment of mankind: there can be, indeed, but one other human test; that, usually flattering and always fallacious, which is to be found in the opinion which a nation entertains of herself.

He is not a wise man who does not sometimes profit by the malice of his enemies.—Nations are but associations of men.

Your committee are aware, that some of the positions laid down in the early part of this report, are not universally admitted.

It has been said, that the currency of any country bears a fixed proportion to its commerce, and consequently that a Bank cannot circulate notes, to a greater value than the gold and silver coin which it displaces. But the institution of a Bank, not only promptly supplies any pre-existing defect of specie, but increases the commerce and the circulating medium of the nation, by the same operation. This double purpose, it effects by its loans. Money is power; and the loan of money, the transfer of power; power to command, and set in motion all the sinews of labour, and to quicken all the efforts of industry.

It has been urged, against the institution of Banks, that they cannot create a single additional dollar. It is literally true; but they can obviously create a new demand for one, by giving rise to new contracts which require the use of money, the common medium of exchange. Whatever multiplies the uses of money, cannot fail to create a new demand for it; and money necessarily follows that demand. In this sense, money may be truly said, in contradiction of a Grecian philosopher, to beget money, and Banks to create it. In a country advancing in population and wealth, with the rapidity of the United States of America, furnishing so many, and such diversified uses for money, this creative power has had ample scope for activity. Hence the multiplication of Banks in the Northern and Eastern states never occasioned, until the commencement of the late war, any considerable diminution of their profits, or the smallest depreciation of their circulating paper. Nor would the war, which drew its recruits from the least productive classes of society, have had either of these effects, had it not been accompanied by the prostration of the foreign trade, on which, even the interior commerce of the United States, was so materially dependent. On the contrary, the consequent augmentation of the public taxes, and the numerous contracts, to which, the war itself, gave rise for paying, substituting, cloathing, arming and transporting from place to place, the national force, for the erection of fortifications, the extension of the navy, and the purchase and distribution of military stores, supposing other circumstances to have remained unchanged, would have occasioned an immediate demand for a new circulating medium, or have required an increased activity from the old.

It is not pretended that the demand for the medium of exchange, in any country, may be extended, indefinitely, or at the pleasure of its banks, and to the full amount of their loans. Experience alone can decide to what extent those loans may be safely carried. That experience every bank acquires in the course of its operations. If the circulation of its paper does not increase with its loans, some part of that paper will be brought into the bank to exchange, for what is of universal demand, the gold or silver coin which it represents. Should there be already more gold or silver coin in the country than in its interior commerce requires, however extended by the loans of the bank, it will be exported, in the course of its foreign trade, to supply the currency of some other country, or the redundancy will be applied, at home or abroad, to some of the cases which render the precious metals, at all times, articles of commerce.

If such be the general character and operation of banking, it remains for the committee to enquire, in relation to the numerous petitions for new bank charters, whether any danger is to be apprehended to the Commonwealth, from their multiplication beyond their present number.

The chief hazard to which a bank is exposed, is that of overtrading or issuing so many of its notes, as may deprive it of the ability to take them up with specie, when presented for payment. Should a bank thus put itself in a situation, to be compelled to violate its most solemn engagements, it will deservedly lose all public confidence, since punctuality on its part and that of its customers, constitutes the very principle of its existence. It is that, alone, which makes it expedient, or even safe, for the Commonwealth to permit the issue of its paper; it is that which stamps upon this paper any value, or affords to it any circulation whatever.

It has been found possible, though not without great public injury, for political reasons, sanctioned by all the patriotism of a nation, to suspend the specie payments of a bank, and yet, sustain its credit to a certain extent. In such a state of things, the public expectation will be kept alive, that the period, although indefinite, is not very remote, when the faith which has been once solemnly plighted will be honestly redeemed, and great prudence in the interim, may enable the bank to prevent a total depreciation of its notes in circulation.

But should it continue to refuse the payment of its just debts and permit its character to be dishonoured, either for the sake of illegal gain, or in consequence of past mismanagement, the public confidence will be speedily converted into general distrust—to distrust will succeed universal alarm among the holders of its paper, and a run upon the bank for the specie which it has so unjustly withheld, will involve with itself and the country in common ruin.

The best preventive of this evil will be found in the multiplication of banks, and their consequent competition. Sensible of the length to which these preliminary remarks have been already extended, your Committee forbear to enlarge upon the influence of this valuable agent, which has ever proved itself to be the public friend, in all the occupations of man, to which it is applicable. If there be one, to which it is peculiarly so, your Committee believe it to be that under consideration.

Your committee are, however, inclined to believe, that the multiplication of banks will be sufficiently restrained in this Commonwealth, by an adherence to the policy which has hitherto dictated the terms of their charters.

It is scarcely possible, that, under a government, which requires a bonus equivalent to 20 per cent. for the charter of every bank which it incorporates, those institutions can be multiplied beyond the wants and convenience of the citizen or the security of the state, and the more especially where such state is united under one common government with similar political communities, in which no such premium, or none, of such magnitude, is required—Money will naturally seek the most productive channel, and pass from Virginia, if she too heavily taxes its use, to where it can be more advantageously employed.

If a more effectual limit can be devised, to the unnecessary multiplication of banks, than that which the policy of this Commonwealth has already created, your Committee confess that they have not been able to discover it, a limit, they beg leave to add, which is fortified by the maxims of public justice. The General Assembly of Virginia having exacted of the Stockholders of the existing banks 20 per cent. as the price of their charters, should not in justice grant to other institutions equivalent privileges without a consideration.

It is not in this, as in other cases involved in greater obscurity, that public faith can be regarded as hostile to public interest. There would be at once an end of all future premiums, if it were even suspected that the Legislature would charter other banks, with equal privileges, on better terms, than it has annexed to the existing charters. And should this copious stream of revenue be turned into the channel of public improvement, as it was expected on the incorporation of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, its source will be watched and guarded by the vigilance of all the local, as well as general interests within the Commonwealth.

Such a foundation for the limitation of the number of its banks, no State in the Union has provided. Within this limit, it appears to your Committee that individuals may be safely trusted with the use of their capitals in banking, provided it be made a law of those institutions, that when they cease to pay specie, without the express permission of the Legislature, they shall cease to exist.

If it be at all incumbent on the General Assembly to grant no new charters, without an adequate premium it is alike so, to protect the privileges of those which have been already, or may be hereafter granted. This can be effectually done only by suppressing the practise of private banking.

In several parts of the U. States, this practise has assumed the character of the most atrocious swindling; and the danger of its imitation within the territory of the Commonwealth, calls for the just and wise precaution of the Legislature. Hitherto, it does not appear to your committee that any extensive injury has been sustained by the community, in consequence of the creation of sundry associations within the Commonwealth, which exercise under various denominations, the functions of a bank. They have been instituted, it is believed, without any criminal design.—They have aided the collection of the public taxes; they have contributed, after the suspension of specie payments by the banks, had made the coin of the United States a subject of universal speculation, retain some part of it within the Commonwealth, and they have rendered to the country in which they exist, no inconsiderable relief, during a period of great and threatening calamity.

It does not appear to your committee that their incorporation, under the conditions which have been already impressed in this report, would be injurious to the chartered banks, since these, at present, supply the country in which they exist, with a very small part, if in any, of its paper currency. The demand for that part has arisen solely, from the circumstances, that the public taxes are payable either in the notes of the Chartered Banks, or in specie, which is at present of superior value; and the exclusive privilege which occasions this demand, your committee propose to preserve to them.

The country, from which petitions have been presented, praying for branches of the existing, or the incorporation of independent Banks, lies either to the westward of the Allegany; between that mountain and the Blue Ridge; or just below the latter, and near to the river Potomac. Except the lower and least improved extremities of Fauquier and Prince-William, no part of this extensive and very flourishing territory, derives its commercial supplies from the towns of Virginia, in which the Chartered Banks and their branches, at present exist. It neither does, nor can draw the greater part of its paper currency from the present Virginia Banks, by any possibility, short of a total change of its commercial connections. Such a revolution, your committee consider most desirable; but, they beg leave to suggest, that it will be rather expedited than delayed by granting the prayer of those petitions. If, until it actually happens, the paper currency of this opulent and thriving country, cannot be derived from the banks now chartered, it will be supplied, as it is, and has been, from the Banks of the District of Columbia, and the adjacent states.

The question which these petitions submit to the decision of the Legislature, is not, therefore, whether a paper medium of exchange shall be introduced into the territory inhabited by the petitioners. That already exists, and cannot be excluded by the mere operation of law. The question, really is, whether a paper currency already depreciated, over which the Commonwealth has no sort of controul; from the supply of which, neither her citizens nor her government, derive the smallest advantage, shall be supplanted by one safer to those who use it, because guarded by their vigilance; productive to them of profit, because supplied by their capital; and yielding to the state, in the form of premiums, for permission to make such profit, a stock exceeding half a million of dollars; and an annual revenue which cannot be imputed at less, than fifty thousand dollars.

The petitioners, in some instances, prefer, and in all, would probably accept a branch of either of the existing banks, instead of a new and independent bank, if such were the pleasure of the Legislature, and the wish of the stock holders of those banks.

Your committee have, therefore, felt it incumbent upon them to learn the decision of the stock-holders of the Virginia Banks, upon this question; and have obtained it, as will appear from the annexed communication in a shape which puts to rest, the hopes of the petitioners from that quarter.

Your committee do not mean to condemn the determination of the stock-holders of the Chartered Banks. A proper regard to their own interest, must have prompted such a decision: and your committee are fully persuaded that the interest of the petitioners, themselves, will be better promoted by leaving the institutions, which they pray to have incorporated, to the guidance of their stockholders, subject to such general restraint as their charters may provide. The capacity as well as the vigilance of the directors of any bank, will be great in proportion, as the sphere of its operations is narrow; and upon these qualities in the direction of such an institution, must depend the security of its loans, as well as the purity and value of its paper. That inconvenience which individuals may sustain, from the circumscribed limits of their respective circulation, though certainly an evil, is more than counterbalanced by the increased public security, which their multiplication affords. So long as the Banks in general emit specie for their notes, they will possess nearly the same value; and this inconvenience will be felt only in proportion, as it is the result of the balance of trade, or the rate of exchange between different parts of the same country.

This evil could not be prevented by multiplying and extending to the territory in question branches of the existing Banks. as the experience of the late Bank of the United States most conclusively demonstrated.

The branches of that Bank were spread along the coast of America, through all her sea-ports; but, great as its profits were, it could not afford to take upon itself, the expense of equalizing the balance of trade between those ports. Much less would a Virginia Bank venture on such an experiment, in relation to the eastern and western territory, and the markets of the north.

Your Committee cannot close this important branch of their enquiry, without noticing a prevalent opinion that the credit, which a Bank affords to its customers, is applicable only to the pursuits of commerce, and the inference which may thence be drawn, that they cannot subsist beyond the limits of large commercial towns, and are not calculated for the country, from which the petitions under consideration, have been presented. This opinion seems to be confirmed by a very high authority, on every question relative to political economy, an authority which has been frequently consulting in the preliminary part of this Report, and for which your Committee entertain the highest respect.

The prevalence of the opinion itself, is perhaps, solely ascribable to the circumstance, that it has a place in the admirable treatise, entitled 'The Wealth of Nations.' Its foundation will, therefore, be best ascertained, by a recurrence to the language in which it is there expressed:

"What a Bank can with propriety advance to a merchant or undertaker, of any kind, is not either the whole capital with which he trades, or even any considerable part of that capital; but that part of it only, which he would otherwise be obliged to keep by him, unemployed, and in ready money, for answering occasional demands."

But your Committee can most confidently affirm, that this authority is contradicted and refuted by the experience of every Bank in America, and they believe it to have been long since exploded, in the very country in which it originated.

In England, however, where much wealth had been previously amassed, a sufficient capital may have existed to carry on the commerce of the nation before the creation of any bank whatever, it may have been expedient to give to such capital, no other aid than the enclosed facility of operation which a bank so limited in its dealings, would be calculated to afford. And in England and Scotland, where a crowded and stationary population rendered it somewhat difficult to discover new employments for stock, the uncertainty of returns would augment the hazard of lending at all.

In America, however, where, comparatively speaking, very little commercial capital exists, the uses for it are so numerous as to ensure success to almost every mercantile enterprise. The Banks which draw this capital from the country, to the towns, may not only with safety, but are compelled by necessity to extend its use to objects which, if they warrant, do not perhaps require in Great Britain.

If the accounts of any American Bank be examined, it will be seen that more than one half of its outstanding debts are founded on, what is called, its standing accommodations; that is, on the discounted notes which the Bank may, but it is understood, will not call in at the end of sixty days. Much of that debt will be found to have arisen from an assurance on the part of the Bank, that the actual payment of it will not be required for many months, and some part of it for several years.

The proportion of the business which any bank could do, to that which it does, would be small indeed, if its loans were, in fact, as they are almost universally in form, for the short period of sixty-days only.

It is believed, indeed, known by your committee, to be true, that the capitals of the Banks in America, constitute not only "a part," but a very large "part" of the "mercantile capital" of the nation. That it is employed in commercial adventures, the returns of which can rarely be expected in sixty days, most of which exceed four months, very many six, and some a twelve month.

Nor is perceived by your committee, wherein the danger of this indulgence consists, if the Bank retains a sufficient control over so much of its specie capital as is necessary to keep up the value and circulation of its paper.

The capital adventured, is usually insured against the accidents of the voyage in which it is invested; the payment of the note or bond, on which it is obtained, is endorsed by approved security, and new indorsers may be required, every sixty days, should a change of fortune be discovered or suspected by the Bank in the circumstances of the drawer, or endorser.

In America, Bank dividends which have exceeded twenty have seldom fallen short of eight per cent; they are punctually paid, carefully preserved, securely transmitted without delay or the expense of commission to the stockholders entitled to receive them, and the stock which yields this revenue can generally be converted by assignment, into specie, at or above par. Hence the effect of such Bank in drawing together all the floating capital of such a country; and if that capital were to be afterwards withheld from all the various uses to which it was before applied, the creation of any Bank would occasion, to such a country, a most serious calamity. The evil would speedily cure itself. The bank would become unprofitable to those who sought its establishment.

But if Bank credits are applicable to the foreign commerce of a country, they are yet more so, to its internal trade which feeds and sets on motion a greater share of its industry; alike so, to its manufactures; and strictly, though perhaps not equally so, to its agriculture.

If those credits be extended to twelve months, there is no return from the soil, in the culture of America, which they will not embrace. To all those arts which assist or are combined with the labours of the plough, as grazing, tanning, milling, coopering, the trades of the carpenter, smith and saddler, and indeed, to every branch of manufactures, they are unquestionably applicable.

An industrious and frugal artizan in America, may safely borrow the price of his rude materials, and the subsistence of his labour, and trust to the sale of his manufactured commodities, to replace the sum, which he has obtained on loan, with a profit to himself, exceeding the interest which he is charged for its use. It would be difficult to convince a Loudoun farmer, that he may not safely go in debt, until the ensuing harvest, for his plaister and cloverseed, to supply, a horse which he has lost from his team, or to purchase, or repair the waggon which takes his crop to market.

It is not perceived by your Committee, that such customers are not as safe and as useful to a Bank, as the merchant himself; that their contracts, so far as they extend, will not, like his, support, or increase the circulation of the notes of such Bank, and yield to the wealth of the nation as substantial and speedy a return.

The improvement which is introduced by the agriculture of a state, adheres to its soil, and participates in all the vicissitudes of its good or bad fortune. That of the arts is incorporated with the state of society from which they spring, and becomes as fixed as itself. The wealth of the merchant is, as it should be to make it useful, ever floating. If he has a country, as, doubtless, he often has in his affections, his fortune has none. It seeks employment; and will go, where profit calls it

It is the interest of Virginia to disperse a prosperous and happy people over an extended territory, let her villages and her country be fostered, as well as her towns and cities? There is a harmony amidst all the seemingly jarring interests of society, which it is the duty of the laws to maintain. The Commonwealth is the genuine parent, not the step mother of her children. According equal favours to them all, she will preserve and cherish among them, the sentiment of filial love.

By affording to the small towns and to the country, the same facilities for the employment of their capital, which have been already granted to the large towns and cities, that capital will, it is true, remain and find employment nearer home, but it does not follow that it will not indirectly promote the growth of those very towns and cities by increasing the wealth and population of the country.

There are superior and very great advantages attending the operations of a Bank within the former, of which the country cannot and ought not, if it could, to deprive them. Not only will the deposits of such a Bank be much more considerable, than if it be situated amidst a less crowded and wealthy population, and the circulation of its notes be, therefore, more easily sustained, but it must enjoy a larger share of that profit, which, not dependent upon that circulation, arises from a transfer of credit in its books, among the proprietors of that part of these deposits, which arise from its discounts.

There are advantages, as your Committee have shown, common to those institutions in both situations. These, the city may, but ought not to deny to the country!

Could all the commercial capital of Virginia be confined within the limits of the Commonwealth, and be drawn to a single town, as in such case, it could be, by denying to it any employment as advantageous elsewhere, such town would doubtless grow with unexampled rapidity: but it would remain to be proved that the Commonwealth would be the gainer by such a result. Justice and policy are too intimately blended in the order of Providence, to permit the real prosperity of a nation to grow out of the tyranny of its government.

Your Committee have yet to perform a very important part of their duty.

The extent of the depreciation of the notes of the chartered Banks within the Commonwealth, cannot be stated at less than nine per cent. below par. It has not been required of the Committee by the House, to point out the evils resulting from this depreciation.

Experience has read to America, in the history of her continental money, a lesson on this subject, which can never be forgotten. A depreciated and fluctuating paper currency is one of the greatest calamities which can overtake a commercial people. It strikes at the root of all contracts and undermines the foundations of morality. It leaves industry, without an object, and labour without the hope of a certain reward. It creates a host of speculators and usurers who prey on the necessities of individuals, and fatten on the vitals of the nation.

The cause of this evil, so far as it at present exists within the Commonwealth, is doubtless to be ascribed to the suspension of specie payments by the Virginia Banks. If every paper dollar which they have in circulation would produce a silver dollar, when required, there could be no depreciation. It would not be necessary to give one hundred and nine paper dollars for one hundred dollars of silver or gold.

Were your Committee to end their enquiry at this point, the benefit of the enquiry itself would be of little importance.—A remedy for the evil, would, doubtless, be found in the resumption of specie payments by the Banks. But the General Assembly once sanctioned their suspension, and should not lightly withdraw that sanction.

It is proper, therefore, to carry this enquiry a step higher. The causes of that suspension were alleged to be the antecedent suspensions of specie payments by the Northern Banks, and the existence of a balance of trade against Virginia, in favor of the states in which those Banks are located. The unfavourable balance was said and truly said, to arise from the blockade of the coast of Virginia, and the consequent suspension of her exports; which consisting of heavy products, would not bear the expense of land carriage, while her imports, comprizing a greater value in less weight, were not so sensibly affected by this cause, and therefore continued.

The suspension of specie payments to the North operated especially against one of the Virginia Banks which happened to have a very large balance due to it from the North, which that suspension, left it no prospect of immediately adjusting, as in preceding years, by the demand of specie. Its effect, at any rate, would have been, while the balance of trade was against the Commonwealth, to occasion a drain of specie from the Virginia Banks to supply the deficiency of her exports.

Another cause must be assigned for the suspension of specie payments, to the North, which, with the exception of the Banks of Massachusetts and Connecticut, prevailed throughout the commercial states. This cause will be found in the extraordinary loans of those Banks, to the federal and state governments, in the moment, when the paper, which those loans forced into circulation, had not its former foundation to sustain its value; the existence of commerce and the good faith of the Banks themselves.

The extent of this cause may be readily conceived from the fact that some of the Philadelphia Banks have trebled their dividends since the commencement of the war, and while their notes are much below, their stock is as much above par.

With the war itself, all these causes of the suspension of specie payments, as regards the Banks of this Commonwealth, may be said to have ceased to operate.

The exports of Virginia have never, in the aggregate, commanded so high a price, as in the past year. The value of those shipped from Richmond alone in the first six months after the restoration of peace amounted to 4,500,000 dollars, or more than one half of the total value of the exports of Virginia in any former year, and one tenth part of the value of the exports of the native products of the United States of America, in the best commercial year preceding the war.

Nor was the peace less propitious in removing the other causes of this suspension. The price of the United States stock immediately advanced to very near par, in the markets of Europe; and, in consequence of the unfavorable exchange then subsisting, between this country and England, there arose a demand for it, as a substitute for bills of exchange, which raised it above the value of the paper currency of the middle states.

The Banks, in general, by selling their public stock, which supplied the place, without answering the purpose of gold and silver in their vaults, might have called in their paper, to the full amount of the stock which they had subscribed, and have reduced their circulation to its ordinary extent. The revival of foreign commerce, and, with that, of domestic trade and industry, would have given full activity to that circulation, and prevented a run on them for specie.

As regards the Virginia Banks, especially, this policy could not have failed of success, supported as it was, and must have been, by a return of that favourable balance of trade which always subsisted before the war, between this Commonwealth and the Northern and Eastern States.

If any event was wanting to complete this happy result, it was furnished in the rapid decline of the value of bullion in England, and the accompanying fall of English bills, in America.

So confident was the public expectation, that the concurrence of all these causes would promptly lead to the resumption of specie payments, that in the joyous feeling inspired by the return of peace, the coffers were unlocked, in which the precious metals had been hoarded, during the war; and, for a moment, no want of specie for the ordinary purposes of change was discovered in this Commonwealth.

The Banks of Virginia, however, did not second this expectation, or if they did, it was but for an instant.

Although the opportunity had been afforded them of reducing, on advantageous terms, the balance due to them from the Northern Banks, they preserved, and in fact it is believed, continued to increase those balances; and they have sold, if any, but a small part of their public stock. Instead of transferring, for their own paper, the public debts due to them, they have called in, and are continuing to call in their private debts. As the unexampled foreign demand, increases the value of all the native products of Virginia, they are reducing the mercantile capital required to purchase and transport those productions, to the markets opened for their consumption.

They have thus departed from the primary purpose of their institution, in order to retain the public debts, which it required a special law to enable them to hold.

Nor do your committee perceive, how the banks can promote the interest of their stockholders, by this preference of their public to their private debtors.

On the contrary, they believe that the public debts of the banks cannot yield to them, a revenue, equivalent to that derived from their standing accommodations to individuals, while the obvious effect of the discount of real paper, in sustaining the circulation of their notes, should give to the latter description of their customers, a preference over every other.

The curtailment of the discounts of a bank, with a view to enable it, by reducing its circulation, to renew the emission of specie, is to charge upon its customers, the necessity of importing specie, while the means of making the importation are denied to them.

Nor does it appear to your committee, to be reasonable, that the whole burthen of such importation should be suddenly devolved on the private dealers with the banks, when the necessity of that curtailment has arisen, not from their act, but the act of the banks themselves, and an act, by which they have greatly profited. The interest paid by this Commonwealth, to the Bank of Virginia since they suspended the payment of specie, or in other words, the discharge of their own debts, has exceeded sixty thousand dollars.

When a Bank departs from the spirit of its early institution, it must be regarded as having violated the principles of its charter. When in thus acting, it involves itself in the necessity of withholding the payment of its just debt, it ceases to be a Bank; and if its existence does in fact survive the effects of this deterioration, it must be ascribed to the defects, or remissness of the laws.

The duties which devolve upon the Chartered Banks in the present circumstances of the Commonwealth, appear to your Committee, to be 1st.—To adopt the speediest remedy for enforcing the payment of the outstanding balances due to them, from the Northern Banks, and to maintain no intercourse with any of those Banks, which do not issue specie.

2. To receive in the course of their transactions no other paper than their own, or that of such Banks as have never suspended, or have actually resumed the payment of specie.

3. To sell whatever public stock they possess.

4. To favour the importation of specie in the course of commerce, by discounting real paper, or extending to their mercantile customers such accommodation as shall terminate within a period fixed by law for the resumption of their specie emission.

5. To import, if necessary, by the purchase of bills, the current coin of the United States, or gold and silver bullion, from wherever it can be had.

Be it therefore Resolved, That it is expedient to establish, subject to the conditions herein expressed, a Bank at Abingdon in the County of Washington, at Charleston in the County of Brooke, at Wheeling in the County of Ohio, at Morgantown in the County of Monongalia, at Clarksburg in the County of Harrison, at Parkersburg in the County of Wood, at Staunton in the County of Augusta, at Winchester in the County of Frederick, at Romney in the County of Hampshire, at Martinsburg in the County of Beakeley, at in the County of Jefferson, at in the County of Loudoun, at Warrenton in the County of Fauquier, at West End in the County of Fairfax, and at Dumfries in the County of Prince-William; upon condition that the said Banks shall pay to the Commonwealth a premium for their charters, equivalent to that paid by the Bank of Virginia, and Farmers' Bank of Virginia; that they shall be compelled to emit specie; that they shall thereafter hold their charters subject to revocation by the General Assembly, should they at any time cease to emit specie without the authority of Law: that the public taxes shall continue to be receivable as hitherto in specie or the notes of the Bank of Virginia, or Farmers' Bank of Virginia.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law additional means of enforcing the issue of specie by the Bank of Virginia.

Resolved, That it is expedient to devise by law, the most effectual means of protecting the privileges of the chartered Banks, and the rights, interest and dignity of the Commonwealth, against the abuses of unauthorised Private-Banking.

DOCUMENTS.—Three documents accompany the above Report.—1. A letter of the 1st inst. from Mr. Mercer, as Chairman of the Committee, addressed to the President of the two existing Banks, requesting them to consult the Stockholders to be convened on that day, whether they would incorporate the petitioners as branches of their respective institutions.—2. The reply of Dr. Brockenbrough, President of the Bank of Virginia, stating the resolution of the Stockholders that it was "inexpedient at this time to augment the Capital of the Bank of Virginia, or to create the branches thereof"—and 3rd, The reply of Mr. Hatcher, President of the Farmers' Bank, stating as the resolution of its Stockholders that it was "inexpedient for the corporation of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, to accede to the wishes of the petitioners at this time."

Lock Navigation.

The Committee appointed by the Board of Managers of the Schuylkill Navigation Company, to view the Improvements, by means of dams and locks, of the Navigation of the Connecticut River,

REPORT:

That they have viewed several of the improvements on that river, and obtained information respecting others from gentlemen of intelligence, which your committee believe may be entirely relied on.

The perpendicular fall which has been overcome on Connecticut river by means of dams and locks, is about two hundred feet, which is between Springfield in Massachusetts, and Hanover in New-Hampshire; a distance of one hundred and thirty miles. The first fall, going up, which has been improved, is the Willimantick, where there is about eight feet fall in one mile. This improvement is made by a dam in the river near to and running parallel with the shore, so as to confine the water in such manner as to form a good boat navigation down the River; but on the return of the boat, it can only ascend by means of a team of horses or oxen. The next improvement is at South Hadley, and consists of a dam across the river, eleven hundred feet long and four and a half feet high, and a Canal seven hundred and twelve perches in length, and seventeen feet in width at the bottom, with five locks near the lower end, overcoming a fall of nearly fifty feet. The dam is of wood and its construction simple. It is built upon a ledge of rocks, which in a dry time rise near the surface of the water. Large blocks of wood are laid longitudinally with the stream, five or six feet apart, and bolted to the rocks; upon these and extending quite across the river is a very large beam, or piece of timber, raised by the blocks to the necessary height and trunnelled to them. To this beam are pinned with wooden pins, pieces of sawed scantling, nine inches square and twelve feet long, projecting up the river and laid close together. The end extending up stream, of each alternate piece of this scantling, is bolted with iron to the rocks below. The dam is perfectly level on the top, so that the water may flow over every part of it at all times to preserve it from decay. About one third of the whole length of the Canal is cut through a solid rock ten feet deep, and near the locks it is cut through the solid rock more than forty feet deep and three hundred feet in length. The locks are not well built, being of stone laid without mortar, and lined with pine plank spiked to timbers, built in the wall. The gates are opened with windlasses and the locks are filled by opening a valve or small gate in the lower part of the large gate.

The next improvement as you ascend the river is at Montague. The river at this place is divided by a ledge of rocks. A dam five hundred feet in length and thirty feet in height is built from the left bank of the river to the ledge of rocks, and another dam five hundred and forty feet in length from the ledge of rocks to the right bank of the river. These dams are built with timber, in the manner of crib dams, secured to the rocks below with iron bolts—From the top of the breast of the dam, heavy scantling laid so close together as to be water tight, is extended up the river, with their up stream ends bolted to the rocks at the bottom, and the other ends upon the breast of the dam. Some stone is thrown into the river upon the ends of the scantling thus bolted, as a further security to them. These dams are level on the top, so that the water flows over every part of them to preserve them from decay. From these dams there is a Canal nearly three miles in length, and eighteen to twenty feet in width, and of such depth that the water in it is always three feet deep. At the upper end of the Canal, between it and the breast of the dam, is a guard wall two hundred and fifty feet long and forty feet high, rising ten feet above the surface of the water in the Canal, and extending about sixty feet above the mouth of the Canal—this being necessary to prevent Boats attempting to enter the mouth of the Canal, from being carried over the dam; which would be to them inevitable destruction. At this place also is a guard lock which is used only at the times of freshets, and is absolutely necessary, not only for the preservation of the Canal, but also for the use of Boats when the River is high. Near the lower end of the Canal are eight locks, built like those before described, with an average rise of from seven to eight feet. About three miles above the last described dam is another about eleven feet high, with a lock at one side. This improvement with that at Montague, above described, overcomes a fall of about seventy feet.

At Bellows's Falls, about forty miles higher up the River, there is a dam seven or eight feet high, and a Canal half a mile long, upon which there are seven locks overcoming a fall of about fifty feet.

At Quechey, thirty miles above Bellows's Falls, is another dam, eight or nine feet high, and one lock—the fall overcome at this place is not exactly known.

At White river, about eight miles from Quechey, there are, near each other, two dams and five locks, overcoming a fall of nearly forty feet.

These last three improvements your committee have not seen, but have received a short description of them from Mr. Cooley, the Engineer at the South Hadley works, upon whose information they entirely rely.

The improvements made on this River have been by several companies. The South Hadley dam and canal being done by one company, and the Montague works by another; and one or more companies made those above. There are still several intermediate parts of the river requiring improvement, which leaves the navigation imperfect; yet as the worst parts have been done, boats can descend and ascend with tolerable facility.

The boats which navigate that river are from fifty-eight to sixty-two feet in length, and from nine to eleven feet in width, from twelve to twenty tons burthen, and drawing, when fully laden, from twenty-two to twenty-eight inches water, and all navigated by three hands. These boats on their return up the river, usually take two thirds of a load, and are, in the improved parts of the river, navigated with the same number of hands up, as down the river; but when they arrive at the worst places in the unimproved part, they employ as many landmen, as will, with their usual complement, make their whole number of men equal to the number of tons they have in their boat.

Your committee conceive that the construction of dams with slopes for the passage of rafts, and road ways upon the breast for the passage of waggons, is utterly incompatible with the safety of the dams; and so far as respects the road ways absolutely impracticable for any useful purpose. Upon this subject the opinion of Mr. Cooley, the chief engineer at South Hadley, who has viewed the lower part of the river Schuylkill, and examined the law under which this company has been incorporated, has been taken; and is contained in a letter from him to Mr. Evans, dated November 9, 1815. It is as follows, viz:—

"The most unaccountable part of your law is, that the dams are to be made with fording places. Strange, indeed, that it should have entered into the mind of man, that any good could arise to the publick in this way. It might answer very well on small streams, where railings might be placed, but upon the river Schuylkill, with a dam not more than six or eight feet in height, and with thirty feet in the middle, one foot lower than the rest, no man in his senses will attempt to pass; or if he does, and gets through with safety, the work will not escape his curses. Besides, how is the waggon to pass the guard lock, which must be placed opposite the dam? The walls of the lock must be as high as the highest; and if a bridge is erected over the Canal it must be many feet higher. I think the people living near the Schuylkill may be thankful to the company if they do not make the fords, considering the danger attending them; and that every dam will form a safe and easy pond for a ferry.

"The dams in your river are to be made one foot lower in the channel of the river than elsewhere.—This, if done, will endanger the other parts of the dam. The great safety of a dam is to have it all the way upon the top smooth and level, and the front made tight so as to throw all the water over with an equal depth—Throw away all your notions of ford-ways, slopes and notches in your dams, and go to work in the proper way, to complete the navigation in question. It is a very laudable and praiseworthy undertaking, which, if carried into effect, will prove a great and lasting benefit to the country."

After Mr. Cooley had viewed the lower part of the river Schuylkill, he gave it as his decided opinion, that there would be very little difficulty in effecting a complete dam and lock navigation on that river, if a proper plan was adopted; and that compared with the Connecticut river, the expense and trouble would be very small. In this your committee entirely concurred. It appeared to them that the Connecticut river was more than three times as large as the Schuylkill, that it was subject to as great freshets, and to be incommoded with as great quantities of floating timber, and bodies of ice, as the river Schuylkill. That if some alterations are made in the law, and the company are aided by their publick spirited fellow citizens, no doubt could be entertained of the work being completed in a much shorter time than is contemplated by the law.

Legislature of North Carolina.

Report of the Committee on Inland Navigation, submitted to the Legislature of North Carolina, November 30th, 1815, by Archibald D. Murphy, their Chairman.

The Committee to whom were referred the Resolution on Inland Navigation, and so much of the Message of His Excellency the Governor as relates to the same subject, REPORT—

That the time has come when it behoves the Legislature of North Carolina to provide efficient-ly for the improvement of the Inland Navigation of the State. To delay this provision, is to postpone that national wealth, respectability and importance which follow only in the train of great internal improvements. With an extent of territory sufficient to maintain more than ten millions of inhabitants, under a system which would develop the possible resources of our agriculture, we can only boast of a population something less than six hundred thousand; and it is but too obvious that this population, under the present state of things already approaches its maximum. Within twenty-five years past, more than two hundred thousand of our inhabitants have removed to the waters of the Ohio, Tennessee, and Mobile; and it is mortifying to witness the fact, that thousands of our wealthy and respectable citizens are annually moving to the West in quest of that wealth which a rich soil and a commodious navigation never fail to create in a free State; and that thousands of our poorer citizens follow them, being literally driven away by the prospect of poverty. In this state of things our agriculture is at a stand; and abandoning all idea of getting rich by the cultivation of the soil, men are seeking the way to wealth through all the devious paths of speculation. In this way individual prosperity contributes but little to the national wealth; and what is still more lamentable, habits of speculation are succeeding to habits of steady industry; and our citizens are learning to prefer the fortuitous gains of the first, to the slow yet regular gains of the second. This perversion of things is gradually undermining our morality, and converting the character which we bore of being industrious, enterprising farmers, and thriving mechanics, into that of shop-keepers and speculators. This rage of speculation has given a factitious value to houses and lots in the several towns of the state, but has not advanced the price of lands in the country; and whilst the people whom we have sent to work the soil of other states and territories have raised the price of their lands from two to fourfold, the price of ours has remained stationary—What is the cause of this strange condition of things? Is the soil of this state too poor to reward the labors of the husbandman with its products? Have we no navigable streams by which these products can be taken to market? We have as good a soil as any of the southern Atlantic states can boast of; fine rivers intersect our state in different directions, furnishing superior means and facilities for an extensive internal commerce to those enjoyed by any of our neighboring states—But hitherto we have not availed ourselves of the means which Providence has thrown in our way; we have suffered year after year to pass by without seizing opportunities to improve our condition; and whilst we admit that internal improvements are essential to our prosperity, we seem to act upon a contrary principle, and to expect that national prosperity will come without national labour. It is surely worse than folly to expect the rewards of industry without its toils, or national prosperity without exertion; and we ought always to bear in mind that it is the duty of the government to aid the enterprize of its citizens, and to afford to them facilities of disposing to advantage, of the products of their industry.

At this day, when the science of political economy is so well understood, and with the examples before us, not only of France and of England, but of many of our sister states, where the principles of this science have been carried into practical effect, no doubt can be entertained as to the great importance of directing both the wealth and the attention of the government to objects of internal improvement. It is real economy to expend the public money upon these objects. The blessings of the government are thereby brought home to every man's door. The comforts, the conveniences of life are increased; the public labour is rewarded, and the wealth of the state keeps pace with the wealth of its citizens. It is time for North-Carolina to enter upon this career of prosperity; to take effectual steps to develop her territorial resources, and to enlarge them by all the means which the science of political economy points out. The late change in the system of her finances, and the increased revenue arising from her interest in the several banks, at length put it in her power to carry into effect the wishes of the Legislature upon this subject.

Among the various objects of internal improvement, the opening of our rivers, the cutting of canals, and the making of turnpike roads, are of primary importance, and first claim the attention of the Legislature. Six large and commodious rivers intersect this state in different directions; the Roanoke, the Neuse, the Tar, the Cape Fear, the Yadkin, and the Catawba. These rivers, with their tributary streams, water almost every country in the state; and were it practicable to adopt a general system for the improvement of the navigation of each of these rivers, and various streams that run into them, it is impossible now to calculate the advantages which would result from it. It would certainly not be improper to say, that within five years after this improvement shall have been made, the value of all the lands in the state will be doubled, and the productions of our agriculture increased three-fold. Taking the value of our lands at $53,506,519, the amount of the late assessment under the act of Congress, at the end of those five years, we might safely estimate the value at $107,000,000. And taking the annual productions of our agriculture at $30,000,000, which is certainly below the present amount, at the end of those five years, we might estimate their value at $90,000,000. And if we take into view the inducements which those improvements would hold out to our citizens to remain amongst us, we might well calculate that at the end of twenty years from this time, our population would amount to one and an half million. In this estimate of national prosperity, should also be considered the comforts and conveniences of life, which would be brought to the door of each of our citizens—the steady habits of industry which would be established; and the consequent morality which would follow those habits: And not the least of all, we should notice the abundant revenue which would accrue to the state; thereby affording to the Legislature, the means not only of lessening the public burthens, but of providing effectually for the establishment of schools in every section of the state, and of making ample provision for the cultivation of the sciences and the arts. Your committee deem it their duty, further to state, that those improvements in our inland navigation, would necessarily lead to the growth of three large commercial towns, one upon the Roanoke, one upon the Neuse, and one upon the Cape Fear. The extensive fertile country, watered by the Roanoke and its branches, would concentrate its produce at some port near the head of Albemarle Sound; and we should soon have in that quarter a market that would rival that of Norfolk. If we except the Hudson, there is not, perhaps, in all the Atlantic states, a river, down which so much produce would be transported. All that section of our sister State, which is watered by the Staunton and its branches, would seek a market on the Roanoke; and by closing Croatan Sound, and opening for the waters of the Albemarle, that outlet to the ocean through which Sir Walter Raleigh first entered, we might indulge the hope, that a commercial city would grow up in that quarter, equal in importance to Philadelphia, Baltimore, or Charleston—A country whose productions are incalculable in value, would adopt this for their course of trade.

The waters of the Neuse, rising near the Virginia line and passing near the city of Raleigh, intersect the State from north to south. The dangers of the navigation through Ocracoke Inlet, are likely to be avoided, by the canal, which will furnish an Outlet at Beaufort. The company which has been formed for opening this canal, will complete the work, probably, in a few years; and whilst Newbern will be the place of depot for the productions of the country watered by the Neuse, Beaufort will become a port for shipping those productions to the most advantageous markets.

The waters of the Cape Fear, in like manner, rising near the Virginia line, intersect the State from north to south. The main branch of this river may be made navigable for boats to the county of Rockingham, within less than thirty miles of the northern extremity of the State. The immense quantity of produce which at this time finds its way to different markets through this river, renders it unnecessary for your committee to remark upon the importance of improving its navigation. Already a vast commercial capital is employed at Wilmington and Fayetteville; and to what extent would not this capital be enlarged, were the navigation of the Cape Fear and its waters improved?

Your committee are informed, that it is deemed quite practicable to unite the waters of the Yadkin with those of the Cape Fear, along a route through the counties of Richmond and Robeson, and thus to bring to the Cape Fear the productions of all that extensive and fertile country which is watered by the Yadkin and its branches. As this river, a little below this contemplated route, passes into the State of South Carolina, it becomes an object of great national importance to open a communication between it and the Cape Fear, that the wealth of the Yadkin may be made to contribute to the growth of our own commercial towns, and the numerous population upon its waters may find within their own State, a market for the products of their industry.

The growth of our commercial towns is of peculiar importance to the character of the state. Whilst we continue to send our products to the markets of other states, we shall be destitute of that independence of character which it should be the pride of our citizens to cherish. One species of dependence begets another; and having hitherto been dependent upon Virginia and South Carolina for markets for the greatest parts of our produce, we have in some measure become dependent upon those states for our opinions and prejudices. It is the duty of the Legislature to contribute as far as possible to break the spell that binds us to this dependence and so to change the political orb of North Carolina, that she shall move as a primary, and not a secondary state in the system of the Confederacy.

To effect these grand objects, your committee have endeavoured to devise a plan by which the wealth of the state may be brought to the aid of individual enterprise; and by which certainty of success shall be guaranteed to those who will embark in the undertaking of improving our inland navigation.—They will exhibit in this report, the general outlines and features of this plan; and should they be approved by the Legislature, your committee will be ready forthwith to submit a bill to carry the plan into effect.

Your committee propose, in the first place, to amend the several Navigation Charters heretofore granted to the Roanoke, the Neuse, the Deep and Haw River and Catawba Companies, in such way that those Charters shall be alike in every respect.

2d. To incorporate companies for the Tar and Yadkin Rivers, and grant to them similar Charters.

3d. To establish a Board of Commissioners of three Members, who shall hold their meetings in the city of Raleigh.

4th. That the Stockholders in the Roanoke, the Neuse, the Deep and Haw River, and Catawba companies shall make known to the Board of Commissioners, on or before the first day of May next, their acceptance or rejection of the amended Charter proposed to be granted to them: And the directors of the companies accepting the amended Charter, and also the directors of the Tar River and Yadkin companies, or those designated to act as directors for the time being, shall, on or before the first day of May, make known to the Board of Commissioners the places where books should be opened for receiving subscriptions of stock for each company, with the names of the persons under whose direction the books shall be opened; and that thereupon, the President of the Board shall give notice in the public papers printed in this State, South Carolina and Virginia, of the times and places of opening books for receiving subscriptions of stock for each company, and of the names of the persons under whose direction the books shall be opened. The books shall remain open for the space of fifty days, at the end of which time they shall be closed, and the directors of each company shall certify to the Board of Commissioners the amount of stock subscribed upon their books; and also make known to the Commissioners what amount of stock, if any, be, in their opinion, required in addition to that subscribed, to complete the navigation proposed to be completed by the said Directors—and thereupon, the President of the Board shall subscribe on behalf of the state upon the books of each company the amount of stock so required; provided, that the said amount does not exceed one third part of the whole sum required to complete the navigation.

5th. If the amount of stock so subscribed shall be found insufficient, the Directors of each company may, from time to time, open Books for receiving further subscriptions for stock.

6th. The President of the Board of Commissioners shall be a Director in each Company in which the state holds stock, and shall represent the state in the meetings of the Stockholders.

7th. The rights and privileges of the Companies shall extend from the sources of the rivers to their mouths or to the boundary line of this State, and shall extend to all streams running into those rivers, so that there shall not be conflicting companies upon the same river; and as to the junction of the waters of any two or more of the said rivers by means of Canals, it shall be effected in such way as the Directors of its Companies interested shall agree upon; and if they cannot agree, it shall be referred to the Legislature to determine the manner.

8th. The Board of Commissioners shall employ one or more scientific engineers to make surveys under their direction, and to make charts with notes and observations explanatory thereof for the use of the State.

9th. Annual reports shall be made to the Legislature by the President of the Board, of the state of our Inland Navigation and the sums expended on behalf of the State in improving the same; and he shall recommend such measures as the Board may deem necessary for the furtherance of the views of the Legislature upon the subject of our Inland Navigation.

10th. Payment for Stock holden by the State shall be made by the Public Treasurer upon warrants drawn by the President of the Board; and dividends which shall accrue to the state upon her navigation stock, shall be paid to the Public Treasurer by the treasurers of the respective companies upon warrants drawn by the President of the Board.

11th. Your committee proposes to attach to the Board of Commissioners duties of another kind; the duties of collecting information for the use of the Legislature, upon the climate, the soil, the agriculture, the productions and the manufactures of the state;—and as far as it may be convenient, of each county therein; and from time to time, to submit to the legislature regular series of statistical tables upon those subjects. Statistics now constitute the main branch of the science of political economy. At this time we are destitute of regular statistical information; and your committee deem it an object worthy of attention to employ intelligent men to collect and arrange such information for the use of the Legislature.

Your committee, in considering the subject referred to them, have not overlooked the advantages which might one day accrue to the state, from the extensive interior navigation, which, with some improvements, may be carried on through the waters of the different sounds, extending, with little interruption from the Virginia line along the whole coast of this state to the line of South-Carolina—and your committee would recommend that the board of commissioners be instructed to have a survey made of those sounds and report to the legislature the probable expense, as well as the best mode of opening, this extensive internal navigation.

It becomes now the duty of your committee to point out the ways and means by which the plan, which they have devised may be carried into effect; and to show the ability of the state to advance the requisite fund without increasing the public burthens. They have therefore endeavoured to ascertain the probable income of the state which will hereafter accrue annually from the present sources of revenue; and also the amount of the civil list and contingent charges of government.

The lands of the State were valued by the Assessors under the late act of Congress for laying and collecting a Direct Tax, to the sum of $53,506, 519—Taking this valuation as the basis of calculation, the product of the Land Tax will be nearly $43,000: And if we deduct from this sum Sheriff's commissions and incidental charges, we may estimate the product of the Land Tax at $40,000. The other taxes, excluding the tax on Bank Stock and including the sum received at the Treasury for entries of land, amounted for the year 1814 to $50,272. To these sums may hereafter be added the tax on Bank Stock amounting to $13,500; and the dividends which will accrue to the State, upon her stock in the Cape Fear and Newbern Banks; which calculated at 8 per cent. will amount to $15,980. The income of the state may therefore be stated as follows:

Land Tax	$40,000
Tax on Bank Stock	13,500
Other Taxes including sums received for entries of Land annually.	50,272
Dividends on Stock in the Newbern and Cape Fear Banks	15,000
	$118,000

Your Committee find that in ordinary times $60,000 will cover the amount of the present civil list and the contingent charges of government.—If therefore the amount of the civil list and the contingent charges of government were not to be increased, there would be an annual surplus in the Treasury of $58,852. But your committee suppose that the Legislature, in making amendments to their judiciary system and to their other civil institutions, may deem it expedient to increase the amount of the civil list, and the charges upon the contingent fund will necessarily increase by carrying into effect the proposed plan for the improvement of our inland navigation.—They therefore take the sum of $40,000 as the annual surplus fund which may be applied to the purposes of our inland navigation.

Your Committee however, cannot forbear to observe that the surplus fund will in all probability, greatly exceed this amount. The product of all the taxes will be much increased. The increase of population will of course increase the amount of the poll tax: the tax on stores which for the last year yielded $2,474,65 cannot fail hereafter to yield $6 or 8,000—and the mere adoption by the Legislature of some efficient plan to improve our inland navigation, would immediately add at least ten millions of dollars to the present value of our lands; and their value would annually increase as the work of internal improvements progressed—add to all these sources of revenue the sums which will be received into the Treasury from the sale of vacant lands in that extensive tract of country, the lines of which have been lately defined in our treaty with South Carolina, and the dividends upon the stock holden by the State in the State Bank, which will remain subject to other disposition, so soon as the paper currency shall be redeemed. It will be no extravagant calculation to estimate the amount of the annual surplus fund at the end of fifteen years at $100,000.

Upon the credit of this fund, the Legislature, if they should find it necessary, may make ample loans for the prosecution of other enterprizes for the internal improvement of the State: and the monies so to be borrowed, can be paid at convenient periods without increasing any of the present taxes.

In the mean time, your committee recommend to the Legislature to avail themselves of the right secured to the State by the late amended charters granted to the Banks of Newbern and Cape Fear, of having on loan for any period that shall suit the convenience of the State, a sum equal to one tenth part of the capital of those Banks. This sum amounting to $160,000, aided by such surplus funds as may from year to year remain in the Treasury, will probably enable the Board of Commissioners to meet the engagements of the State, with the several navigation companies, without resorting to other loans.—But should such a resort become necessary, it will surely be wise to make it, that the work of internal improvements may progress and every obstacle to the wealth and prosperity of the state be surmounted.

Your committee can see no reason why this great work should be any longer delayed: it is a duty which the members of the legislature owe to the state, to themselves, their children, and to future generations, to delay it no longer. Upon this subject let party spirit be hushed into silence; and uniting together in one feeling for North Carolina, let us all aspire to the honor of laying the foundations of her glory and her prosperity. Your committee therefore recommend to the two Houses the adoption of the following resolution.

Resolved That it is expedient to provide by law for carrying into effect the plan proposed in this report, for improving the Internal Navigation of the State."

Respectfully submitted.

A. D. MURPHEY, Chairman.

FROM THE ANALECTIC MAGAZINE.

Account of Rais Hammida,

THE LATE ALGERINE ADMIRAL.

Communicated principally by an American gentleman, who resided several years at Algiers, and was well acquainted with RAIS HAMMIDA.

RAIS HAMMIDA, the admiral of Algiers, who fell gallantly defending his ship, in the late action with commodore Decatur, was an Arab, or one of the tribes, or kabyles, of Berberbers, who inhabit the mountains of Atlas, north of the city of Morocco. They live principally in tents, are hardy, nervous, robust, and capable of great abstinence and fatigue. Their language is said to differ entirely from the Arabic, which is the general dialect of Africa, and is supposed to be derived from the ancient Carthaginian. Mr. James Grey Jackson, who travelled among the Berberber kabyles of Ait Imure, and Zemure Sholluh, says that he noticed among them a great many physiognomies that were truly Roman.

The usual occupation of these people is husbandry, and they make vast quantities of honey and wax, which they dispose of in the commercial towns. Being active, hardy, acute and enterprising, the young men often come down to the cities to seek their fortunes, where the pride and indolence of the Moors secure them employment. In this pursuit Rais Hammida came to Algiers when quite a boy, and either choice or accident threw him on board an Algerine cruiser, in which he made his first essay on the element whose dangers and hardships seem to give a hardihood and fearlessness to the human mind, that are not generated in any other sphere of life.—The particulars of his early career, and the gradual development of his character and talents, are not known to us, for in Algiers they have neither newspapers nor chronicles to acquaint the people with passing events, and preserve the memory of gallant actions. The fashionable doctrine of the east, is, that those who can read will find the elements of all human knowledge in the Koran, and the khalif Omar gave a practical illustration of this great precept, when he set on fire the Alexandrian library. Another fashionable axiom is, that the people ought to know nothing of the administration of the government, except through the medium of the single sense of feeling, by which they are from time to time reminded that they have a master. Of this master they are exceedingly fond, and it is inconceivable with what contempt they treat people who have no bashaw, or bey, to tickle them now and then with the bowstring, or fine them for being rich, when they have no business to be so. They resemble those horses, who are said to be proud of their riders, and value themselves, not on their own strength, beauty, or swiftness, but solely on account of the dignity they carry on their backs. Men indeed must have something to be proud of, and the sources of that gratification are so various and whimsical, that we sometimes see nations valuing themselves on the glory of a tyrant, whose reputation is acquired at the price of their own blood, and pointing the attention of the stranger to the splendors of a court, the luxuries of which are bought with their daily bread, and daily toils. Two poor slaves were once disputing about the dignity of their masters, and the preference was at last accorded to the master who whipped the most often, and was of course the greatest man.

The Arabian boy, Rais Hammida, was perhaps about seventeen when he made his first cruise, and soon became distinguished among the lazy Algerines, for his talents and enterprising spirit. By rapid steps he attained to the command of a frigate, and in the year 1801 took a Portuguese frigate of equal or superior force to his own, which had been fitted out expressly to cruise against the Algerines. The Portuguese was boarded and carried without the loss of a single man on the part of the infidels, while that of the Portuguese was upwards of seventy killed and wounded. People easily find excuses for being beaten, as we know by late experience, and the Portuguese alleged that they were taken by surprise, though the affair happened about noonday. It is certain that the Portuguese had been the day before in company with an American frigate bound to Tripoli, and supposing the Algerine to be the same, made no preparation for defence until it was too late. Whether taken by surprise or not, is, however, of little consequence in lessening the glory of Rais Hammida, or the disgrace of his enemies. To be taken by surprise, at such a time and in such a situation, is almost as disgraceful as to be guilty of cowardice, and the boldness of the attempt is not diminished on the part of Rais by these circumstances, because he could not have anticipated the negligence of his enemy. The capture of this vessel affords no ground of triumph to a brave man, however we may consider it; for both the Spanish and Portuguese naval establishments have, for a long time, been on the worst possible footing. Their outfits are altogether deficient, their officers generally without experience, as happened to be the case in the instance we have just mentioned, where the captain of the frigate, as we have been assured by a Portuguese gentleman, was then for the second time in his life at sea, and the men for the most part entirely destitute of a knowledge of even the rudiments of the profession.

The impressments of these two nations are not like those of England, confined to seamen, but extended to every vagabond of the streets, who is hurried on board and carried to sea, utterly destitute of every habit and qualification of a sailor. It is a fact well known at Cadiz, and supported by the testimony of half the city, that at the battle of Trafalgar, a great portion of the Spanish sailors, as they are called, were sea sick. It is evident, therefore, that victories over such enemies are no ground for extraordinary exultation; and we should not have thought of giving Rais Hammida credit for this affair, if greater than he had not assumed such triumphs as a foundation for the most arrogant presumption.—Among the Lilliputians, Gulliver was a giant; among the natives of Brobdingnag, he was a dwarf. Such is the way of the world: the same man may be a giant, among dwarfs, and a dwarf among the giants, and be relatively great or small according to the size of his rivals or associates.

In the year 1810, we find Rais Hammida admiral of Algiers; but how he got to be so, history does not tell. In this situation, however, he again signalized his boldness in the presence of his old enemy the Portuguese. In the summer of that year, he went into the Atlantic with three frigates, and cruised for some time off the rock of Lisbon, where he took several valuable prizes. The Portuguese, who always kept a force in the bay of Gibraltar, determined to intercept him on his return through the straits, and on his approach, put to sea with a ship of the line and three heavy frigates. The Algerines passed the bay of Gibraltar under easy sail, and when they saw the Portuguese ships coming out, hove to off Europa Point, with a view to offer them battle. One of the Portuguese ships, commanded by an Englishman of the name of Thompson, bore down on the Algerines, and gave them a broadside, but was immediately called off by signal from the admiral. The two squadrons lay some time looking at each other, and the Portuguese finally returned into Gibraltar, while the Algerines quietly passed up the Mediterranean, where they cruised some time without molestation before they returned to Algiers. When the engagement between the two squadrons was supposed to be about to take place, the inhabitants and garrison of Gibraltar, flocked to Europa Point in expectation of the event, and while they admired the boldness of Rais Hammda, in offering battle to a force so superior, expressed their disgust at the conduct of the Portuguese admiral. He was afterwards tried at Lisbon and it is understood was acquitted with high compliments to his exemplary gallantry in looking at a superior enemy.

In the war between Algiers and Tunis, which still continues, Rais Hammda distinguished himself as usual by his boldness and activity. He scoured the coasts of the enemy, blockaded his ports, and occasionally made descents and attacked the smaller towns, by which means he became the terror of the Tunisians. In 1811 he fell in with and captured the Tunisian admiral in a frigate of thirty-two guns, after a sharp action.—Rais Hammda, however, did not claim any credit for this victory; because the Tunisian fleet deserted its admiral on the approach of the Algerines; and although Rais forbade the other vessels of his squadron to come near while he engaged alone, yet, as his ship was superior to her opponent, and he considered the presence of the other ships as calculated to discourage resistance, he never plumed himself on this affair.—We cannot help wishing that other nations would take example from this mountain Arab, and refrain from the disingenuous artifice of ascribing victories to a single ship that were gained by a squadron.

But the character which Rais Hammda had established by long service, and so many bold and successful enterprises, could never raise him to a level with the most insignificant Turk, in the estimation of his legitimate government. His talents forced him into the confidence of the dey, and caused him to be selected for the conduct of every naval enterprise; but he was frequently subjected to the most mortifying insults and indignities, even from the lowest of the Turkish soldiers. "One instance of this," says the gentleman who furnished us with the greater part of this article, "came to my knowledge. The country seat, or garden as it is called in Algiers, of Rais Hammda, joined that which I occupied. The ground between our houses was much broken and over-run with brush-wood. Some car-biles (laborers) in the employment of Rais Hammda, came one day on that part of the ground which belonged to my garden, and cut some of the brush-wood to burn a lime-kiln for him. They were seen by the janizary, or Turkish soldier, who had the care of the garden, who obliged them to bring all the brush they had cut into my enclosure, and then dismissed each with a severe bastinado. This was in the winter season when I resided in town; but my janizary soon informed me of what he had done, for which I reprimanded him severely, as the ground was useless, and what they had taken was useless to me. He justified himself on plea of their not having first obtained permission to cut the wood. A few days after I met Rais Hammda, who complained very bitterly to me of the conduct of my janizary.—I told him I disapproved of the act, and had reprimanded him very severely for what he had done. But, said I, Rais Hammda, why do you not take Sidi Ali to task for this act? You have my full permission to do so as far as it depends on me. Ah! senior consul, replied he, don't you know Sidi Ali, although a poor soldier, and far inferior to me in every other respect, is a Turk, and that here on shore I dare not reprimand him, though I feel myself, and am known to be so much his superior. I was not born in the dominions of the grand seignior."

Such is the nature of despotism every where. Its imbecility forces it to employ the talents of men of inferior rank, whose genius is absolutely necessary to the support of the miserable pageant who occupies the throne, and who, while availing himself of their exertions, still takes care to let them know, that he considers the accidental distinction of birth as far superior to those endowments which are emphatically the gift of the Creator.

After being long the terror of the Mediterranean, Rais Hammda, at last, had the ill luck to fall in with the American squadron under commodore Decatur. Finding it impossible to escape, he determined to defend his ship in such a manner as to justify the reputation he had acquired. His ship was taken; but Rais Hammda was killed before she surrendered, and it is said died as he had lived, without ever having struck his flag to an enemy. In his person he was of a middle size, well formed and active, with an intelligent countenance, and keen expressive eye. His manners were easy and agreeable, and his disposition partook much of that of a sailor all over the world. In his various cruises he acquired very considerable wealth, but seemed to have little regard for money, which he spent in the luxurious indulgencies of the most dissipated Mahometans. Although a bold and successful freebooter, according to the modes of thinking among civilized nations, he never was accused of committing a cruel and ungenerous action, but was liberal and courteous to his prisoners, so far as accorded with the customs of the country which he had adopted. From all that is known of Rais Hammda, it seems extremely probable, that had his talents been properly cultivated, and his services engaged by a government that knew how to appreciate them, he would have acquired an extensive fame, and risen to the highest honors of his profession. Still, under such disadvantage of situation he did arise to great distinction, in the sea which was the theatre of his exploits, and will probably long be remembered by the nations bordering on the Mediterranean.

Mariner's Wages.

Of the effect of capture and detention upon the contract between masters and seamen, whether the latter are bound to wait a first adjudication.—The seamen's wages are lost when the voyage is defeated and no freight earned. The seamen having been employed by the master to refit the vessel in a foreign port were allowed a part of their wages for the time they were so employed, although the voyage was lost. The seamen having been discharged in a foreign port and the two months wages, directed in that case, to be paid to the consul, for their use, not having been paid, a libel was sustained for the same.

United States' Circuit Court—First Circuit.

October Term, 1814.

THE SARATOGA—Keating, claimant.

The libellants shipped, as mariners, on board the ship Saratoga, on a voyage from Boston for Amelia Island, at and from thence to port or ports in Europe, and at and from thence to her port of discharge in the United States. The ship sailed from Boston in October, 1811, for St. Mary's, where she took in a cargo, and from thence proceeded to Portsmouth in England, where her cargo was discharged. The agents of the owners having engaged a cargo on freight, at Londonderry in Ireland, for the United States, the ship sailed in ballast for that port on the 23d of April, 1812, and on the 26th of the same month, was captured by the French privateer Espadon, and carried into Roscoff in France for adjudication. Prize proceedings were here instituted against the ship, and her hatches sealed, and all the crew, except the mates, who were permitted to remain on board, were sent to Morlaix, as prisoners. In August, 1812, the captain came down from Morlaix with all the crew, excepting three, and by permission they were there employed fifteen days in tarring the rigging, and other ship's duty, and at the end of that time the crew returned to Morlaix. The ship was restored to the captain by order of the court, and taken possession of by him, on or about the first of January, 1813. On the 4th of the same month, the crew came on board and went to work, graving and painting the ship; and on the 7th of the ensuing February, the ship sailed for Morlaix, and arrived in the roads there on the same day; but did not get up to the town until the first of March following. The crew remained and slept on board until about the middle of July, in the same year, doing duty as required by the officers, and then left the ship, with the consent of the captain and the American consul, and sailed in a cartel for the United States. During the time of detention under the prize proceedings, the crew were principally maintained by the French government; and the expense, at the restitution, was made a charge on the ship. The crew frequently during their residence in France, applied to the captain for their wages and discharge. The captain as often told them, that they might go where they pleased, but he had no money to pay them their wages, and they might, if they pleased, arrest the ship, and he would not oppose them. But they did not choose to leave the ship without payment of their wages, and the captain, from time to time, permitted them to go on shore and work, whenever they could get employment. He seemed however to have exercised his control over them, and declared, that if they worked on board of the cartel, before their discharge, their wages would be forfeited.

After the discharge of the crew, the Saratoga was finally made a cartel, to carry prisoners to England at a stipulated price; and from England she came with prisoners to the United States, where she arrived on or about the second of September, 1813. For this last voyage no compensation had as yet been received.

The libellants had been paid their full wages up to the time of the ship's departure from Portsmouth; and now claimed wages from that time to the time of their discharge in France: and, in addition, the two months pay provided by statute of the 28th of February, 1803, ch. 62, sect. 3, in cases of the discharge of seamen in foreign ports.

STORY, J. (after reciting the facts.) The question for the consideration of the court is, whether the libellants are entitled, under all the circumstances of the case, to any wages beyond what they have already received; and if so entitled, for what period wages are to be allowed.

It is argued, on behalf of the respondents, that the libellants have no further claim for wages, no freight having been earned, and the voyage having been, by the capture and subsequent declaration of war between Great Britain and the United States, completely broken up and defeated.

The general rule is often asserted, that to entitle the seamen to wages, freight should be earned on the specific voyage for which they engage; and that if, by any disaster happening in the course of the voyage, the owners lose their freight, the seamen also lose their wages. [1] The reason or policy of the rule is alleged, in 1 Sederfin 179, to be, that if in case of the loss of the ship by tempest, enemies, &c. the mariners were to receive their wages, they would not hazard their lives for the safety of the ship. The rule itself also is not without exceptions; if the voyage or freight be lost by the negligence, fraud or misconduct of the owner or master, or voluntarily abandoned by them; if the owner have contracted for freight upon terms or contingencies differing from the general rules of maritime law; or if he have chartered his ship to take a freight at a foreign port, and none is to be earned on the outward voyage; in all these cases the mariners are entitled to wages, notwithstanding no freight has accrued. [2] Reasonable, however, as the rule may seem to be, under these limitations, to those who are conversant with the maritime law of England, it does not seem to have obtained the universal sanction of the commercial world, though it has the weight of the authority of Bynkershoek [3] to support it. Roccus [4] holds, that wages are due, notwithstanding the voyage is not performed, if it happen from any fortuitous occurrence, and the mariner is not in fault. Cleirac seems silently to adopt the regulations of the ordinance of Philip 2d, as reasonable, [5] and Pothier considers that maritime contracts, subject to few exceptions connected with the French ordinances, are governed by the same principles as other contracts of hire, and consequently that if, after its commencement, a voyage be defeated by accident, or superior force, the mariners are entitled pro rata for their term of service. [6]

It has been argued, that the capture put an end to the contract for wages, and, therefore, that no services, performed afterwards, can entitle the libellants to recover wages upon the footing of that contract. Admitting that capture, followed up by condemnation, would extinguish such contract, still such effect cannot be attributed to a capture, where there has been a re-capture or restitution. And notwithstanding some contrariety of opinion, it may be safely affirmed, that such capture operates, at most, but to suspend the contract, and that, by restitution or re-capture, the parties are remitted to their former rights in the same manner, as if no such interruption had occurred. [7]

It has been further argued, that by the capture the relation between the owners and mariners ceases; so that the latter are not bound to remain by the ship, but are at liberty, without the imputation of desertion, to abandon the voyage. Without deciding, whether the rule assumed in some of our own courts be not more reasonable, that the mariners are bound to remain by the ship until a first adjudication, [8] it is clear, that the mariner is not bound to leave the ship. He has a right to remain by her, and wait the event. If restored, he is entitled to his wages if the ship proceed and earn a freight; if condemned, he may lose his wages, though perhaps, under circumstances, with a recompense for his actual services, pending the prize proceedings. And this doctrine seems founded in the interests of all parties. It would, indeed, be highly injurious to commerce, to establish that in every case of capture, upon whatever pretence, or however unfounded, the mariners were obliged immediately, without waiting the event, to quit the ship in a foreign port. It would often expose the owner to a loss of the voyage, from the difficulty of obtaining a new crew, or to extraordinary expense in securing his property. On the other hand, the mariners would be no less exposed to inconvenience. They might be turned ashore without money or credit, in a foreign country, against the manifest policy of our laws. It would seem fit, therefore, to hold, that a contract entered into by mutual consent, should not be dissolved unless by that consent, until such proceedings were had, as left no ordinary hope of recovery in the original tribunal of prize.

Upon the principles, then, which have been stated, the capture did not dissolve the contract for wages; at most, it was but suspended during the prize proceedings, the event of which the parties had a right to await, and by the subsequent restoration of the ship, the contract revived in its full force, and remitted the parties to their former character and rights. If the ship had then been in a condition to perform her voyage, and had actually performed it, there can be no doubt, that they would have been entitled to their full wages during the whole time of service. [9]

But, at the time of the restoration of the ship, war existed between Great Britain and the United States; and the farther prosecution of the voyage was not only impracticable, but highly criminal in both parties. The legal effect, therefore, of such an interdiction of commerce was to absolve both parties from any further performance of the contract. [10] The question then arises, whether a loss of the voyage, in consequence of an interdiction of commerce after its commencement, deprives the owner of his freight, or the mariners of their wages.

It seems to be a doctrine of our law, that if a voyage be broken up by an interdiction of commerce with the port of destination after its commencement, no freight is payable. And the same rule is applied to cases where the voyage is lost by accident or superior force. [11] In short the principle seems to be that there must be an actual delivery of the cargo at the port of destination, to entitle the party to his full freight. [12] If, indeed, there be a voluntary acceptance of the cargo at an intermediate port, and a dispensation of farther proceeding, then a pro rata freight is due. [13]

In these respects our laws appear to differ from the maritime laws of other countries. Roccus [14] declares, that if the ship has begun her voyage, and from accident is prevented from completing it, freight is payable for the part of the voyage actually performed. This also is the opinion of Strac-shu [15] and seems, with some distinctions to be adopted in the maritime regulations of France. [16] Indeed in the case of an interdiction of commerce after the voyage is begun, the full freight of the outward voyage is allowed. [17]

If we pass from the consideration of freight to that of wages, we shall find, as I have already stated, that foreign writers do not consider that wages are wholly lost, but recoverable pro rata itineris, where the voyage has been in part performed, and its further accomplishment has been prevented by inevitable casualty or superior force.

As to an interdiction of commerce with the port of destination, occurring in the voyage, Cleirac, [18] adopts with apparent approbation, as conformable to the civil law, the regulation of Philip 2d, that the mariners shall, in such case, receive a quarter part of the wages agreed upon for the whole voyage. [19]. The French ordinance [20] declares, that, in the like case, the mariners shall be paid in proportion to the time they have been in service, and this Pothier says, is conformable with the general rules of the contract of hire. [21]

No case has been cited, in which this point has been settled in our own courts; and, as far as I have been able to ascertain, after a pretty diligent search, it yet remains for a decision in our maritime law, but if the doctrines, already settled in relation to freight are to apply, and it seems impossible to distinguish them, the interdiction of commerce must be deemed to dissolve the contract, and leave the mariner without any title to wages pro rata itineris peracti. Indeed the moment it is held, that where freight, by the general law is not earned, wages are not due, the case falls directly within the authorities, which have been already examined.

My opinion as to this point, therefore, is, that war existing at the time of the restoration of the ship, and the farther prosecution of the voyage being illegal, the original contract was completely dissolved, and up to that time no further wages were due. If the case had rested here, the claim for wages must have been repudiated.

But the mariners, with the consent of the master, come on board, and did duty from the time of the restoration of the ship, until their final discharge. It was clearly competent for the master to hire and employ a crew for the preservation and equipment of the ship, and the services so performed, cannot by any reasonable construction, be referred back to a contract which then had no legal existence. The libellants then must be deemed to have gone on board, and to have done duty, under an implied contract to receive a reasonable recompense, in the nature of wages, pro opere et labore.—Upon the footing of this new contract, I have no difficulty in sustaining their claim for wages, during the time of their connexion with the ship after restoration. Full wages, however, ought not to be given for this period, because the services performed or required were not equal to the usual services in the progress of the voyage. In case of a detention, under the arrest of a sovereign, the French ordinance [22] provides that the mariners hired by the month shall be entitled to a moiety only of their wages during such detention. Under all the circumstances of this case, I shall adopt this as an equitable rule, and shall decree wages accordingly.

The next question that arises, is, whether the libellants are entitled to the two months pay under the act of the 28th of February, 1803, ch. 62. The third section provides, that whenever an American ship shall be sold in a foreign country, or an American seaman shall, with his own consent, be discharged in a foreign country, the master of the ship shall pay to the commercial agent of the United States, for every seaman so discharged, three months pay, over and above the wages due to such seaman, two-thirds thereof to be paid to such seaman on his engagement on board of any vessel to return to the United States, and the remaining third to be retained, for a fund to relieve destitute American seamen. I agree with the council for the respondents, that the cases here alluded to are cases of voluntary discharge, and not cases, where the discharge has resulted from inevitable necessity or superior force, such as a total loss by capture, tempest, or other fortuitous occurrence. But I can by no means, admit, that the present case comes within the exception. The ship was in a capacity to return home, or perform any lawful voyage, and at the time of the discharge, the libellants were attached to her service. The case falls, therefore, within the words and the meaning of the statute, and though the money is required to be paid into the hands of a public agent for the use of the libellants, yet as they did all the acts, which gave them a perfect title to it, and it was not paid, this court will enforce their title directly against those, who were circuitously compellable to pay it. The two months wages, however, are to be calculated, not on the original wages; but on the wages growing out of the new contract of hire.

Before I close this opinion, I will advert to one or two considerations, which have been thrown out in the argument. It has been argued, that if the seamen were entitled to wages, they were bound to contribute towards the expenses of procuring the release of the ship, as a general average.—But I know of no rule of law, which subjects the seamen to contribution in such a case. The general doctrine is that they do not contribute to general average. The only admitted exception is, in case of ransom, and, perhaps, by parity of reasoning, of recapture. [23] If the doctrine were otherwise, it would not apply to the present case, for the wages to contribute must be those, which are saved by the expenses incurred; and not by the wages accruing under another contract. Here the very subject matter for contribution was totally lost.

It has been argued, on the other side that a capture of a neutral by a belligerent differs from capture by an enemy as to its effects. That it either affords prima facie evidence of illegal conduct in the neutral, which subjects him to condemnation, and such conduct ought not to affect seamen, who are innocent parties; or such capture is wrongful, and the owners are entitled to damages equivalent to the freight. It might be a sufficient answer to this argument, that no such distinction as to legal effects, has as yet been recognized; and so far as authorities proceed, they indiscriminately apply to neutral as well as enemy captures; and further, that if the voyage be not performed, and freight be not in fact allowed, by way of damages, upon restitution, which may arise without any default of the owner, he would be compelled to pay wages, where the general law had, as a case of the vis major, exempted him.

The case also of Frothingham vs. Prince [24] has been pressed upon the court as a direct authority to prove, that the payment of wages does not depend upon the earning of freight, if the ship or any of her materials equal to the wages, remain after the voyage. That case is very imperfectly reported. I have, however, examined the original record, and from a memorandum on it, I find the full wages for the homeward voyage were allowed, although the cargo was totally lost by shipwreck, and the ship herself was so much injured, that the materials sold for little more than the wages. No reasons are given for this decision, and, perhaps, it may have turned, as the defendant's counsel have suggested, upon the ground, that under the circumstances, the seamen were entitled to a salvage equal to their wages. [25] If, however, it be incapable of this explanation, as I confess, on the examination of the record, I think it is, the most that can be said is, that it is a single case standing alone against the current of authority.—Decree of the district court reversed.

The Important Law Decision.

MESSRS. GILES & SEATON

The opinion of the judges of the general court of Virginia, declining jurisdiction of certain cases arising under the laws of the United States, having excited much remark, the presiding judge has been applied to by a gentleman of high standing to furnish a statement of the opinion of the court, which I now enclose you with a request that it may find a place in your paper. A SUBSCRIBER.

JACKSON, } Upon a case adjourned to the General Court of vs. } Virginia, by the superior Court of Law, for the ROW. } county of _____

This case was adjourned to the last June term, and continued over for consideration to the November term. At that term it was argued by the attorney for the United States, for the district of Virginia, before the court, consisting of judges White, Carrington, Stuart, Holmes, Brockenbrough, Allen, Semple, Randolph and Daniel; and at a subsequent day of the same term, judge White delivered the opinion of the court, as nearly as can now be recollected, to the following effect.

This is an action of debt, brought by the plaintiff to recover a penalty inflicted by an act of congress to insure the collection of the revenue of the United States, which penalty, the same act says, may, under circumstances such as exist in this case, be recovered in a state court; and the question submitted to the general court is substantially this: could congress constitutionally give to a state court jurisdiction over this case, or can such court be authorised by an act of congress to take cognizance thereof?

The very statement of the question points out its extreme delicacy and great importance.—It involves the great constitutional rights and powers of the general government, as well as the rights, sovereignty and independence of the respective state governments. It calls upon this court to mark the limits which separate them from each other; and to make a decision which may possibly put at issue, upon a great constitutional point, the legislature of the United States, and the supreme criminal tribunal of one of the states.

Such a question, involving such consequences, ought to be approached with the utmost circumspection, with the most cool, dispassionate and impartial investigation, and with a fixed determination to render such judgment only as shall be the result of solemn conviction. The court has not been unmindful of these things—it has approached the subject with those feelings, and with that determination. It has bestowed its best consideration, its deepest reflection, upon it; and after viewing it in every point of light in which it has been placed by others, or in which the court has been able to place it, has made up an opinion in which all the judges present concur, and which it has directed me to pronounce.

But before that is done, it will be necessary to lay down and explain certain principles on which it is founded.

First—It is believed, that the judicial power of any state or nation, forms an important portion of its sovereignty, and consists in a right to expound its laws, to apply them to the various transactions of human affairs as they arise, and to superintend and enforce their execution—and that whosoever is authorised to perform those functions to any extent, has of necessity to the very same extent the judicial power of that state or nation which authorised him to do so.

Secondly—That the judiciary of one separate and distinct sovereignty, cannot of itself assume, nor can another separate and distinct sovereignty either authorise or coerce it to exercise, the judicial powers of such other separate and distinct sovereignty.

It is indeed true, that the interest of commerce, and the mutual advantages derived to all nations by their respectively protecting the rights of property to the citizens and subjects of each other, whilst residing or trading in their respective territories, have induced civilized nations generally to permit their courts to sustain suits brought upon contracts made in foreign countries, and to enforce their execution according to their true intent and meaning. And in order to ascertain that our courts do permit the laws of the country, where the contract was made to be proved to the jury, or the court of chancery, as the case may be, as facts entering essentially into the substance of the contract. But, in doing all this, they do not act under the command, or by the authority of the sovereign of that nation. Nor are they exercising any portion of its judicial powers. They are only expounding, applying and superintending the execution of the law of their own state which authorises that mode of proceeding.

But though there are the best reasons for permitting our courts to sustain suits of this description, there is no good reason why one nation should authorise its judiciary to carry the penal laws of another into execution, and it is believed, that no nation has ever done so. And, as has already been stated, there is no principle of universal law which authorises one sovereign to empower or direct the judiciary of another to do so. Such a right can be acquired by compact only. And we shall presently see whether congress has so acquired it. Without such compact, a fugitive from justice cannot even be demanded, as of right, to be delivered up to the tribunals of the nation whose laws he has violated, much less can he be tried and punished by a foreign tribunal for violating them.

If such a system shall once be adopted it will introduce a strange kind of Mosaic war into the judiciary of nations. Here a Cadi sitting in judgment upon an Italian denying the Pope's infallibility. There the stern Fathers of the Holy Inquisition, putting a poor Turk to the rack because he denies that Mahomet is the Prophet of God. The judges of republican Virginia pilloring an Englishman for libelling royalty.—And the court of king's bench inflicting the same punishment upon an American for libelling the government of the United States, for the late declaration of war.

Thirdly—That the government of the United States, although it by no means possesses the entire sovereignty of this vast empire, the great residuum thereof still remaining with the states respectively, is nevertheless, as to all the purposes for which it was created, and as to all the powers vested therein, unless where it is otherwise provided by the constitution, completely sovereign.—And that its sovereignty is as entirely separate and distinct from the sovereignty of the respective states, as the sovereignty of one state is separate and distinct from that of another. So that, unless as before excepted, it cannot exercise the powers that belong to the state governments, nor can any state government exercise the powers which belong to it. And that there is no one thing to which this principle applies with more strength than to the revenue of the United States and things appertaining thereto. It being notorious that a desire to give congress complete and entire control over that subject was the great and moving principle which called the present constitution into existence. It is admitted, however, that there are some exceptions to this last principle, they are such, however, as only prove the rule itself. Thus, by the second section of the third article of the constitution, among other things it is declared that "the judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies between citizens of different states, between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states," &c.—These powers in the nature of things belonged to the state sovereignties, and they were at the time of the adoption of the constitution, in complete possession of them, nor could the courts of the United States, merely as such, by any principle of construction have claimed them; but there were reasons, at that time deemed sufficient to justify the extending the judicial power of the United States to them, and they were extended to them, without, however, taking away the jurisdiction of the state courts; so that as respects those matters, the state courts and the courts of the United States, have concurrent jurisdiction, by compact.

These things being premised, I return to the question: Can congress, by any act which it can pass, authorise the state courts to exercise or vest in them any portion of the judicial power of the United States; more especially that portion of it which is employed in enforcing their penal laws?

I shall not stop here to prove that the act in question is, as respects this case, a penal law, or that to enforce the payment of its penalties, in any way or form whatsoever, would be to execute, to enforce it. These are self-evident propositions which would only be obscured by any attempt to elucidate them.

Nor shall I waste much time in considering whether our courts can resist an unconstitutional law. That question, as it respects our state laws, has long since been settled in Virginia, and the decisions of her courts have been acquiesced in by the general assembly, with that wisdom and magnanimity which belongs to it.

This argument is much stronger as respects the laws of congress, the legislature of a separate and distinct sovereignty, by whose laws we are not bound, unless, to use the very words of the constitution, they are "made in pursuance thereof." Was it otherwise, were the state courts obliged to execute every law which congress might pass, without enquiring whether it was or was not made in pursuance of the constitution, it is most manifest, that the justly dreaded work of consolidation would not only be begun, but that, in principle, it would be completed: and that states sovereignty and state independence would soon cease to exist.

We have already seen that the government of the United States, is, as to the purposes for which it was created, a separate and distinct sovereignty, having rights, powers, and duties, which it is bound to exercise and discharge itself, and which it cannot communicate to the states over which it presides, and which they cannot intermeddle with, and that the judicial power forms a portion, and a most important portion it is, of its sovereignty.

We have seen that there is nothing in universal law, or the usage of nations which will authorise one sovereignty to invest its judicial power, or any part of it, in the courts of another, or direct them to execute it: more especially that portion which respects its penal code.

If then congress has a right to vest that, or any other portion of the judicial power of the United States, in the state courts, it must be in virtue of some compact. But there is no other instrument from which such a compact can be inferred but the constitution of the United States. Let us then see where it has deposited the judicial power of the general government, for, where it has placed it there it must remain.

That instrument does not take the least notice of the state courts as respects this subject. But it declares, section 1st of the 3d article, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress may from time to time ordain and establish." And by the 8th section of the first article, power is given to congress "to constitute tribunals inferior to the supreme court."

This judicial power then, the whole of it, without any exception, is given to this supreme court, and those inferior courts to be ordained and established by congress. It has never yet been contended that congress can compel or authorise the state courts or any of them to perform the functions of the supreme court. By what kind of reasoning then can it support a claim to exercise such a power with respect to the functions of these inferior courts? Did congress ordain and establish the state courts? Did it decree their existence? Did it appoint their judges? Did it institute, did it settle, did it constitute them? Most certainly, it has done none of those things. It found them already ordained and established, and finding them so ordained and established, it has by its law directed them to exercise this portion of the judicial power of the United States.

But the judges of these inferior courts are to have offices which they are to hold during good behaviour. Now I take it for granted, that the man who holds an office is an officer, and an officer too of that government whose business it is the duty of his office to perform. And by the 3d section of the 2d article of the constitution, "all officers of the U. States are to be commissioned by the president," which the state judges are not.

But who does the constitution intend shall decide upon the good behaviour of the judges of these inferior courts? Most unquestionably the senate of the United States, upon impeachment by the house of representatives. So great an absurdity cannot be supposed, as that the constitution intended to put the judicial power of the United States, or any part of it, into the hands of judges in no wise responsible to its government. Yet no man can pretend that the state judges can be impeached and tried by that government.

Besides, the constitution of the United States does not provide that the state judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour. Congress cannot direct that it shall be so by law, and, in fact, some of them are elected for a limited period, and others may be removed by a vote of their state legislatures. So that if a law of congress should be very unpopular in one of those states, the judges could not execute it but at the risk of their commissions.

Moreover, the judges of the state courts are called upon by this act to exercise judicial power, which they hold at the will of congress, and which may be taken from them by the very breath which gave it—and which, it is almost certain, will be taken from them, whenever by a firm and independent exercise of their own judgments they shall much offend that honorable body. So that under this system, neither the people, nor the government of the United States, would have that security for the uprightness of their judges which the constitution contemplates.

But the judges of these inferior courts are also to receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office, nor during the existence of a particular law, calling for particular services.

From whom are they to receive this compensation? Certainly from the general government, to which those services are to be rendered. But do the state judges receive, or are they to receive, any compensation for these services to be rendered to the United States? Every body knows that they do not. And we know, that if any judge of the state was to accept either commission or compensation from the general government, he would by that act vacate his office.

But it is said, that the state courts do take cognizance of suits brought to enforce contracts made in foreign countries, and that they will take notice of those foreign laws, under the faith of which such contracts were made, and enforce them agreeably thereto, and that this suit sounds in contract. But how does it sound in contract? Has the defendant contracted to pay the amount of this penalty to the plaintiff? No, it is answered, it is not precisely so. But it is understood to be a principle of universal law, that every citizen and subject has entered into an implied contract, that he will obey the laws of his country—that the laws of his country subject the defendant to the payment of this penalty—that this suit is founded on that contract, and the state court has for that reason jurisdiction over it. Indeed! But before we yield our assent, let us see how far this reasoning will carry us. It is sometimes said, that an argument which necessarily proves too much, proves nothing.

By this same implied contract, every citizen and subject of every government, has agreed to submit his head to the block, or his neck to the cord, whenever the laws of his country require him to do so. If, therefore, this implied contract will give us jurisdiction over this penal law, and justify us in ex-forcing its sanction, the same principle will give us jurisdiction over the entire penal code of every nation upon the earth, which no man can pretend to say we have.

Upon the whole, however painful it may be, and actually is, to us all, to be brought, by a sense of duty, into conflict with the opinions and acts of the legislature of the United States, for which we entertain the highest respect, and the constitutional laws of which we feel it our duty to obey and execute with cheerfulness, when their execution devolves upon us; yet we cannot resist the conviction, that this law is, in this respect, unconstitutional. It is the unanimous opinion of this court, that to assume jurisdiction over this case, would be to exercise a portion of the judicial power of the United States, which, by the constitution, is clearly and distinctly deposited in other hands; and that by so doing we should prostrate that very instrument which we have taken a solemn oath to support.

Miscellaneous Scraps.

In the course of our editorial labors, we have laid aside a great many scraps, amusing, interesting, or useful—some of them of importance. We have thought they ought not to be lost—and shall be, indeed, much mistaken, if the possessor of the WEEKLY REGISTER does not often refer to this part of the work to pass a leisure moment agreeably.

NATURAL CURIOSITY.

FROM THE CATSKILL RECORDER. In the town of Bethlehem, twelve miles from Albany, have been discovered two remarkable caverns, which merit to be classed with the first of natural curiosities, and claim the attention of the curious, and the admirers of the works of nature. They were explored a short time since by a party of young gentlemen from Cairo, who were no less gratified, than astonished that so great a phenomenon should so long remain unnoticed and unexplored.

The first one we entered descends from a place which is nearly level in a wood, the entrance of which was about sufficient to admit the entrance of a barrel; the descent was about the steepness of common stairs, until we reached the bottom, which was tolerably smooth and level; it was from 10 to 15 feet wide, and about the same in height, the passage widened from the entrance until we reached the bottom, which was supposed to be about 100 feet below the surface of the earth; in some places the roof was arched and smooth, and in others composed of ragged rocks which in some places appeared to be almost ready to quit their hold and threaten the intruder with instant death. After proceeding about half a mile, we came to a place where the timid are apt to have their curiosity damped, and relinquish their researches: which was a narrow passage about 40 feet in length, and not more than 3 in height, and getting through it was attended with considerable exertions and difficulty; after which we entered the most remarkable part of the cavern—proceeding about one quarter of a mile further, we came to a pond of pure and exceeding cold water, which was about 70 or 80 feet in circumference, and apparently in some places very deep; we threw in pieces of broken rocks which descended with a roaring rumbling noise for some time before they reached the bottom; the water from this circumstance was judged to be as much as 40 feet in depth. This place is the extremity of the cavern, the roof here was very high and a regular self-supported arch, from which hung great quantities of carbonate of spar, resembling icicles, some of which were transparent and beautiful—but to describe the curiosities of this place would exceed the bounds of a newspaper and the talents of the writer.

After leaving this cavern, curiosity excited the party to visit another which was about a quarter of a mile distant from the former, and which had never been explored. The entrance into this is at the foot of a precipice of rocks about 50 or 60 feet in height, a current of air issues from its mouth almost sufficient to blow out a candle—the entrance was quite narrow, not more than large enough to conveniently admit a person: the descent was quite steep until we reached the bottom, when we were ushered into a capacious room but rather rough and rocky. There was a number of winding passages leading from them, all of which were explored, but were found to terminate in going a few rods; at length a narrow passage was discovered, which being followed a short distance, opened into a large and vaulted natural ball-room, which was straight, about 20 feet wide, and about the same in height, and when illuminated had the most brilliant and romantic appearance imaginable, drops like dew hanging from the spar, and glittering in the rays of the candle, rendered the scene truly brilliant, and cannot fail of enrapturing a person who is susceptible of the feelings caused by the contemplation of grandeur, sublimity and beauty. This cavern is about a quarter of a mile in extent, and exploring it is attended with no difficulty, it being capacious and smooth after leaving the entrance.—On one side is heard the murmurings of a stream of water which is discernable at different places through avenues resembling port holes—(a stream of water runs in the same manner through the whole length of the former cavern)—at the extremity of the cavern are a number of passages leading different ways, which are as perfectly straight, smooth, and as regularly arched, as if they had been hewn by the hand of an artist, though not very extensive. A pistol fired in one of the passages made as loud a report as a six pound cannon would in the open air.—In some places the sides of the cavern are composed of a chrysalized substance which is transparent and appears to have been formed by the oozing of lime water from the rocks, which is petrified and very much resembles ice. At one place in this cavern was discovered a hole in the rock about 12 feet from the bottom of the cave, so small that it admitted a man with some difficulty; but on entering was found to be the passage to a large room, where were found the horns and bones of a deer, which appeared to have lain there a great number of years, and probably were carried there by some beast of prey, the fear of which has probably been the restraining cause of leaving this subterranean curiosity so long unexplored.

Cairo, July 25, 1815.

"A GOOD SHOT." Northampton, Mass. Feb. 14.—Mr. Elijah Allen, jr. of this town, lately killed, at one shot, 3 wild turkeys, weighing 60 lbs.—he also killed two at another shot, from the same flock, weighing together 40 lbs.

RETRIBUTIVE JUSTICE. An officer and a lawyer, talking of a disastrous battle, the former was lamenting the number of brave soldiers, who fell; when the lawyer observed, that those who live by the sword, must expect to die by the sword. "By a similar rule," answered the officer, "those who live by the law, must expect to die by the law."

PUNISHMENT FOR TREASON. From the Democratic Press. As our naturalized fellow citizens are threatened by the proclamation of the prince regent, to be punished (if taken in arms) with the utmost severity of the barbarous law of England, in cases of high treason, and as it is hardly possible to picture to the world an idea of the savage cruelty of that horrid punishment without having witnessed its infliction, it may not be amiss to present our readers with the following lively description of it, by an eye witness; it is taken from a collection of extracts from authentic manuscripts, published at London in the year 1789, and the part selected is an account of the execution of sir Thomas Blount and one Bennet Seely, in the reign of Henry IV. for having adhered to the unfortunate Richard II. On them was literally executed the inhuman and shocking sentence of the law of England, as threatened to be inflicted on our brave defenders. Let our naturalized citizens look on this bloody buoy, and they will not be at a loss to determine on the line of conduct which duty and honor call upon them to pursue. They will remember at the same time that they have a country that will at every hazard protect their persons and avenge their wrongs.

Extract from an English pamphlet.

"Sir Thomas Blount, and one Bennet Seely, his companion, were drawn from Oxford (above three miles) to the place of execution, where they were hanged; but the ropes were soon cut and these gentlemen were made to talk, and sit on a bench before a great fire, and the executioner came with a razor in his hand, and knelt before sir Thomas Blount, whose hands were tied, begging him to pardon him his death, as he must do his office. Then sir Thomas asked him "are you the person appointed to deliver me from this world?" The executioner answered, "yes," saying, "sir, I pray you pardon me," and sir Thomas kissed him, and forgave him his death. The executioner knelt down, and sir Thomas Blount made himself ready; and then the executioner opened his belly, and cut his bowels straight from below the stomach, and tied them with a string, that the wind of the heart should not escape, and threw the bowels into the fire. Then sir Thomas Blount, was sitting before the fire, his belly open, and saw his bowels burning before him. Sir Thomas D'Arpaghen, king Henry's chamberlain, insulting Blount, said to him, with detision, "Go seek a master that can cure you." Blount only answered by putting his hands together, saying "Te deum laudamus, and blessed be the hour that I was born, and blessed be this day, for I shall die in the service of my sovereign lord, the noble king Richard."

"Arpaghen wished to compel him to reveal the accomplices of his treason. "The words traitor and treason," said he, "belong to thee and the infamous Rutland, by whom the flower of English chivalry is this day destroyed. I summon you both, before the face of Jesus Christ, for your great treason against our sovereign lord the noble king Richard." The executioner then asked him if he would drink? "no," said he, "you have taken from me the place into which I should put it. God be praised, my bowels are in the fire." He afterwards entreated the executioner to deliver him from this world, saying "it hurts me much to see the traitors who are present." The executioner then knelt down before him, and kissed him in a very humble manner, and soon after his head was cut off, and he was quartered."

National Picture. From a Charleston paper of Aug. 6. 1813—A national picture, from the pencil of J.B. White, esq. is offered gratis to the view of the public. It is now exhibiting in the court room of the exchange, over against the portrait of Washington, which seems to frown indignantly upon the scene.

The picture represents the horrible tragedy which was lately acted at Frenchtown, on the river Raisin, by the British and their Indian allies, under the command of col. Proctor. The subject will doubtless be too well recollected by every American.—"The wounded," says the informant from the spot, "were left on the ground with promises of protection from the commanding officer, colonel Proctor, and that they should be carried on the next morning on sleds to Malden. On the morning of the 23d January, about sunrise, a large body of the Indians came, plundered the wounded of their clothing and every thing of value, and tomahawked and scalped all that were unable to march."

Capt. Hart, whose fate has excited so much interest, not less on account of his sufferings from the hands of the Indians, than from the perfidy of the still more hideous savage, captain Elliott, is here seen receiving the unsolicited assistance from his classmate and perfidious friend. — Captains Mead and McCracken are lying on the field of honor, above whom is seen the lamented captain Hickman, whose situation excites the warmest interest. He is struggling under the grasp of a determined savage, who appears to be certain of his prey, while two other Indians render the fate of the victim sure, each ambitiously striving to give the fatal stroke.— On the foreground is exhibited a scene, the idea of which freezes the blood with horror. An Indian of gigantic stature, armed cap-a-pie, bestrides the body of the fallen Simpson (a late member of congress) and with exulting triumph, holds to our view his fresh and reeking scalp, while the unhappy sufferer writhes at his feet in anguish. At a distance are seen colonel Proctor and suite, with the Indian chief Round Head, on horseback; who, to use the language of the colonel himself, "with his band of warriors, rendered essential service by their bravery and good conduct." These monsters in human shape, with a regiment of British soldiers in their rear, are beholding this scene of unprecedented barbarity without stretching forth their hands to arrest the bloody deed. The picture is composed of a multiplicity of other figures, which interest the beholder, and embellish the composition; but which, being minor in the scene, cannot here be minutely described.— The subject, though horrible beyond measure, is rich and glowing, and cannot, particularly at a moment like the present, but elicit the interest and excite the indignation of every friend of his country.

EDUCATION. During the short-lived reign of Napoleon Bonaparte, after his return from Elba, Carnot, minister of the interior, made a report on the subject of national education. It began as follows:

"There exists an example for the progress of reason, furnished by a country of the new world, more recently, but perhaps better civilized than most of the nations of what is called the ancient world.— When the Americans of the United States resolve upon founding a town or even a village, their first care is to introduce a public institution, as soon even as they transmit the instruments of agriculture—these men of sense, the pupils of Franklin and Washington, well knowing that what is equally necessary for the real wants of man, as the cultivation of land, the covering of houses, and the preparation of clothing, is the cultivation of his mind." The reporter, after this exordium, descends upon the durable advantages of elementary instruction, in the lower orders of society, and informs the emperor, that there are at present in France 2 millions of children in want of primary education. He says, he does not speak of that education which forms half philosophers, or men of the world, but only such as will form good arizans and moral men, by affording the elements of indispensable knowledge, good habits, and respect for the laws. He then proceeds to state how this system may be most easily reduced to practice, and concludes with a high eulogium upon Dr. Bell and Mr. Lancaster, whose systems have been introduced to the remotest settlement of America, and for which he solicits the patronage of the super .

Then follows a decree of the emperor, ordaining of an experiment school for primary education, as a model for subsequent national schools, to bring up tutors for the system.

EXCELLENT FENCE. From the Albany Daily Advertiser. Travelling lately upon the banks of Connecticut river, in the vicinity of Hanover, I observed hundreds—and I believe thousands of roods of strong, substantial and durable fence, made of white pine stumps, extracted from the ground with their roots. Curiosity led me to enquire by what power and machinery the operation of extraction was performed. An obliging stranger shewed me one of the machines and explained the manner in which it was applied; and as I apprehend these machines may be used to great advantage in many parts of the United States where they have not been heard of, I will endeavor, as far as I can recollect, to describe the machine, and explain the manner of using it.

The machine consists of a very strong pair of wheels, say 18 feet diameter—the axis about 15 or 16 inches diameter. Near to, and the inside of one the wheels, a third wheel, somewhat less than the others, is framed to the axis as a hub. A large rope, or hawser is fastened to the periphery of the small wheel and coils upon it. To the end of this hawser are hitched four oxen—a large chain is made to fasten to the centre of the axis and round the stump.—The oxen, drawing upon the hawser, turn the small wheel and axis, while the two large wheels remain stationary, only supporting the operation.—The stump when thus extracted, is borne off, swinging under the axis, to the line where the fence is to be made.

It may be necessary to add, that where the stump is large and holds a strong grasp upon the earth, the most prominent top roots should be cut off three or four feet from the stump.

The fence is constructed by throwing the stumps into line, and stopping in here and there a root to secure the widest openings. To those acquainted with the durability of pine stumps, it is hardly necessary to observe that the fence constructed of them will remain sound for at least one generation.

A machine constructed as above, and applied by four men and four oxen, will extract from 70 to 80 stumps per day. Its usefulness needs no comment. There is nothing visionary about it. The experiment has been tried upon a large scale, and many a farmer who heretofore dreaded the pine stump as an enemy which would survive himself and annoy his heirs, now swings his undisturbed scythe or cradle over the strong ground which his fallen foe once occupied.

THE PEAKS OF OTTER. We copy from the Lynchburg Press the following nice geometrical calculations, which are the result of the unwaried industry and scientific character of the venerable JEFFERSON, then on a visit to his farm at Poplar Forest, in that neighborhood. It is delightful to witness the serenity and elasticity of the eve of a well-spent life, as exemplified in the present pursuits and habits of this illustrious republican philosopher.

The height of the Peaks of Otter, deemed the highest mountains (from their base) of Virginia are amongst the highest in the United States, which has hitherto been a subject of uncertain conjecture, has lately been taken by geometrical operations with an excellent instrument and great care. They are found to be much short of the conjecture which has prevailed.

The following are the particulars most worthy of notice.

The latitude of the sharp peak (which is the south one) taken by a single observation made on its apex, is $37^{\circ} 33' 17''$ North.

By a mean of the observations, the height of the north peak, above the surface of Otter river, is $3103\frac{1}{2}$ feet—of the south or sharp peak, $2946\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Their difference of height 157 feet.

The distance of the summits nearly 1 and 8 10 of a mile, but exactly $9507\frac{1}{2}$ feet.

The magnetic bearing of the summit of the South from that of the south peak, is $N. 35^{\circ} 50' E.$ —from which 2° must be subtracted for the present variation of the needle.

The base lines measured—the one of 2806 feet or $55\text{--}100$ of a mile; the other of 6589 feet or $1\text{--}1\frac{1}{4}$ miles, were on the plains of Otter river, belonging to Christopher Clark, Esq. and the heirs of Andrew Donald, near the mill of the latter; the former line in exact direction to the axis of the south peak; the latter nearly parallel with the bearing of the one peak from the other.

The distance of the base lines measured from the points in the basis of the mountains, vertically, under their summits, was, the nearest 19002 feet; the farthest 24523 feet, or about 4 miles generally.

Supposing the radius of the earth 3965 miles, the north peak may be seen over a level country to the distance of 62 $1\text{--}4$ miles; this will include the whole or a part of the counties of Amherst, Nelson, Albemarle, Fluvanna, Buckingham, Cumberland, Franklin, Bedford, Campbell, Prince Edward, Charlotte, Patrick, Henry, Pittsylvania and Halifax, and it may be seen over the summit of the Blue Ridge, in Rockbridge and Botetourt.

The British in India. "In 1779, an enquiry took place before the house of commons, as to the conduct of the East India Company. General Burgoyne was chairman of the committee. He says, that "such a scene of iniquity, rapine and injustice, such unheard of cruelties, such open violations of every rule of morality, every tie of religion, and every principle of good government, was never before discovered; and that, through the whole of the investigation, he could not find a single spot, whereon to lay his finger, it being all equally one mass of most unheard of villainies, and the most notorious corruption." This passage occurs in the first of more than 300 pages, all in the same style."

Dr. Richard Price was honored with the thanks of the city of London, and presented with the freedom of that metropolis, in token of approval of the publication from which we make the following extract:

"Turn your eyes to India: there more has been done than is now attempted in America: there Englishmen, actuated by the love of plunder and the spirit of conquest, have depopulated whole kingdoms, and ruined millions of innocent people, by the most infamous oppression and rapacity! The justice of the nation has slept over those enormities! Will the justice of Heaven sleep? Are we not execrated on both sides the globe?"

Conquest of South America. "All the murders and desolations of the most pitiless tyrants that ever diverted themselves with the pangs and convulsions of their fellow creatures, fall infinitely short of the bloody enormities committed by the Spanish nation in the conquest of the new world!—a conquest, on a low estimation, effected by the murder of TEN MILLIONS of the species! [Bryan Edwards' West-Indies, 4to v. 1, p. 83.]

[The British, in like manner, destroyed THIRTY MILLIONS in India. Ed.]

The Beauties of English Law are so manifest in the following narrative, as to raise our admiration of Magna Charta and the equal rights of Englishmen! We take it from the Morning Chronicle of October 24, 1815.

Killing no Murder! Wednesday last, a man named Smith, a game keeper, observed some wires planted in Bisham Wood, and accordingly engaged some persons to assist him in watching them: in the course of the evening a man came to a wire, which was near Smith, who immediately challenged him, threatening to blow his brains out if he did not surrender. The man, astonished at such an unexpected salute, replied, "my friend, be not so hasty," and with a stick pushed the muzzle of the gun on one side, and immediately retreated a few paces; when, dreadful to relate, Smith fired and killed him on the spot. A coroner's jury was summoned, and returned a verdict of justifiable homicide!

The following statement is from authority:

"Early on the morning of Wednesday last, a party of poachers were discovered by Mr. Vansittart's keeper, destroying game in Bisham Woods. In consequence of threats having at different times been used towards the keeper, he was afraid alone to attack the party, and went to the village of Bisham and called two men from their beds, between 3 and 4 in the morning, to assist him in securing them. The keeper, with his assistants, returned to the wood, and after laying in wait a short time, one of the poachers was taken by the keeper, and has since been committed—immediately afterwards one of the keeper's assistants endeavored to secure another—but being unable to do so, he being armed with a bludgeon and refusing to surrender, upon being repeatedly called upon to do so, he was shot at and killed upon the spot—a third made his escape. It appears that the deceased had game in his possession. We are informed that the jury, upon an inquest held on the body of the deceased, differed—seven being of opinion that every endeavor having been previously made, and that as the deceased could not otherwise be taken, the shooting was justifiable. The remaining five for manslaughter." We trust, however, that the case will go before a jury at the assizes—for human lives ought not thus to be sacrificed.

BRITISH HUMANITY.—From the Aurora.—When the poor French people were flying from St. Domingo in the year 1793, very few escaped feeling the exercise of British humanity; they were almost all taken, carried into Providence and Bermuda, and literally stripped! it may be said, without going too far, that they were skinned! The little remnant of property saved by each fugitive from the bayonet and the flames, was confiscated by the humanity of the British judges! even the ladies' clothing was often examined, to a chemise! all that appeared saleable was considered cargo. Body and bed linen, bracelets and watches, trinkets and toys, were all sent to auction! but it is said, "they are not so bad now." A recent instance will exhibit their present character.

Lord James Townsend, a nobleman, son of an English earl, commander of his Britannic majesty's ship Æolus, captured the ship Amanda, of Philadelphia, from Bordeaux to this port, and sent her to Halifax; a considerable portion of the cargo was condemned as prize, but his lordship, commanding a British frigate, not content with his booty, took from a most amiable and accomplished lady of this city, passenger, a trunk of wearing apparel into his own cabin, opened and pillaged it, taking even a few pictures, to ornament his cabin! all these acts were in time of peace.

[There is nothing more notorious than the fact stated above, that the miserable fugitives from the exterminating blacks of St. Domingo, even the ladies—women of the first consideration and recently of immense fortunes, were actually stripped by the Vandal English, while escaping the murderous negroes. I say, were totally stripped, to search for watches or any little trinkets, they might have saved, to purchase bread in a strange land! Many at this late day, can tell us tales of horror—of deeds that any other than a brute (on two legs) would suppose a man incapable of doing. But we also, now know, the "booty and beauty"—"butcher's of religion!"—whose "cup of abominations" we trust is full, for the vengeance of that BEING, whose great attribute is justice to the offender, and mercy to his suffering creatures.]

SCOTCH LAWS.—From a British paper.—The Scotch historians inform us that king EVAN the 3d, of Scotland, a prince who, our ancient legends pretend, reigned some years before the birth of our Saviour, made a law by which it is enacted, that superiors should in all cases, have the first night of the brides introduced into their lands. A right which no doubt, our ancestors took care to exercise. The law seems to have been once actually made, and to have continued long in force. For it was not repealed until the days of Malcolm Canmore. He made those first fruits, the Marchet mulierum, as they are called, redeemable by money. The precise sum with which they might be redeemed, varied with the rank of the person.

SEVERE LAWS.—From a late London paper.—The Old Bailey sessions concluded last morning, when no fewer than twenty-five prisoners received sentence of death; several of them were boys. Thirty-eight were sentenced to transportation for seven years, five for fourteen years, and a great number for various periods of imprisonment. The court will sit again the 15th of next month. Should crimes continue to increase as they have done for some time past, the court must sit permanently.

JOHN WESLEY.—The character of this celebrated man is amply described in the following short paragraph:

It was said of the celebrated John Wesley, "he believes as if he were to be saved by faith; and he labors as if he were to be saved by works."

BRITISH PARLIAMENT.—The common prostitution of the members of the British parliament is as notorious as that of Mary Anne Clarke; their favors and votes being purchased and paid for with greater regularity, in all probability, than that lady received her pay of the "illustrious" Frederick Gulph. An opinion prevails that the present ministry may be ousted—in consequence, they have addressed the following circular to their friends, honorable members of parliament.

"Division, Treasury, Wednesday, Jan. 25, 1815.

"Your attendance is most earnestly and most particularly requested in the House of Commons, on Thursday, the 8th of February, it being confidently expected that a division will take place on that day."

Let the thinking people of the United States, who have heard so much of the wisdom and virtue of the British government, reflect one moment, and conclude how they would esteem our members of congress, if thus summoned to say aye or no!

THE HUMAN HAND. The finest European lady would look with envy on the beautiful symmetry and dainty littleness of the coarsest hand of India. We have seen rather a small-handed European attempt to grasp the sword of the late Tipoo Sultan, which was by no means a childish implement as to weight—he could barely insert his three fingers into the handle; yet, upon casing himself in the helmet and coat of mail that usurper,* the weight would have prevented him from walking an hundred yards.

Critical Review.

LITERARY. From a French paper of 1813.—A very splendid monument of Parisian typography has been recently consecrated to "Napoleon the Great." It is an edition of Homer, in 3 vols. great folio, each consisting of 370 pages, with the text only from the most magnificent dress in the universe, that of Bodoni of Parma. The artist employed six years in preparations, and the printing occupied eighteen months. One hundred and forty copies only were struck off. That presented to his imperial majesty was upon velvet, of a size and brilliancy altogether unparalleled. The edition is said, moreover, to possess great intrinsic excellence, having been diligently superintended by the most accomplished hellenists in Italy, and corrected by a comparison of all the most approved readings of the text.

ITALY. From an English paper of Oct. 1814. The excavations of Pompei are pursued with the most unremitting zeal by the Neapolitan government.—The most recent discoveries have been three new magnificent tombs, adorned with sculpture, and a hall which is supposed to have been a court of justice, and which is decorated with a triple row of columns. Bronze stoves were also found in the same place, of the most beautiful form, with a Faun and Bacchus two feet high, and exquisitely formed. Lastly, a small bronze gladiator, precisely similar to that which has already been so much admired, and which is in the attitude of supplicating life from the spectators. A short time ago, there was also found a beautiful silver vase, which seemed to have been used in religious worship—it is covered with figures in relief, and resembles in form that of the royal cabinet of France, which has been published by Caylus and don Martin. There is a third vase quite similar in the cabinet of the late cardinal Borgia.—There has been discovered in the cabinet of medals at Milan, a Chinese work, published in 1750, by order of the emperor Kien Long, containing drawings of upwards of 909 vases, resembling those denominated Etruscan. Several appear to be of very remote antiquity.

PHENOMENON. The inhabitants of Blagdon witnessed a remarkable phenomenon on Saturday night: about 4 o'clock p. m. a quantity of hay, supposed to be 200 weight, was caught up in a whirlwind from a field in the occupation of major Partridge, whilst the air around was perfectly calm, and was carried high above the clouds over Mendip hill. A number of rooks and swallows immediately collected together, and darning up with much clamor among the scattered hay, were seen pursuing it in circles through the air.—Liverpool paper.

Diamonds. At the third annual course of lectures at the Birmingham Philosophical Society, which closed a short time since, a very curious description and estimate of all the large diamonds, known to be in existence, were given by Mr. Thomason. The number of known diamonds of 36 carats and upwards, he stated to be no more than nineteen, two only of which were in England, viz. the Pigot diamond, weighing 45 carats and worth 16,000*£—and one in the possession of the Hornsby family, of 36 carats, 8000£. Holland has but one, which weighs 36 carats, and valued at 10,368£—its form is conical, and it was for some time in the possession of Messrs. Rindell and Bridge, of London. France has two—the largest was bought by the duke of Orleans, during his regency, and thence called the regent diamond—its weight is 136 1/2 carats, and value 149,058£. Germany has one, weighing 139 1/2 carats, and in value 155,632£. Russia is rich in these gems; its largest is that of the sceptre, which is said to weigh 779 carats. If this be true, it must be worth, according to the general mode of estimating them, the enormous sum of 4,854,728£*.

The history of this diamond is rather curious—for a long time it formed the eye of an East India idol, from which post it was removed by a European soldier. From him it passed through several hands, and it was finally sold to the empress Catharine for 90,000*£* a handsome annuity, and a patent of nobility—Russia has several others, one of which is estimated at 369,800*£*.

A seaman's notion—a real anecdote. From the Essex (N. J.) Patriot. During the present blockade of New-London, the celebrated Dr. F——, of Hartford, Conn. made a visit to the former place with the view of examining the state of the fortifications, &c.—While there, he concluded to deliver a discourse—a crowded audience attended, principally composed of the soldiers and sailors on duty there. The Dr. took for his text "fear God and honor the king."—In the course of his sermon he had frequent occasion to repeat the words of his text. One of the sailors belonging to the Macedonian was observed to be very restless: at length, on the Dr. once more repeating the words "honor the king," the tar could no longer restrain his indignation, supposing the Dr. alluded to the king of England; he rose up and audibly exclaimed "fear God, and honor the congress—but let the king alone;" at the same time looking very angrily at the preacher. The audience were much agitated, and an orderly sergeant stepping up to the gallery, ordered the sailor to be quiet, or he would turn him out of the church—the sailor sternly replied "if the lubber says so again, I'll pull him out of his bunk."

"Unsurper." The British, and especially of that class which edits the "Critical Review," esteem all things illegitimate that do not come into the infallible opinions and views of such enlightened and holy persons as the prince regent and lord Castlereagh.—Ed. Reg.

SHIPWRECK—Deal, (Eng.) Dec. 30, 1814.—In the dreadful storm of Saturday, a vessel called the Conception, bound from Dublin to Wexford, was driven ashore, and wrecked, at Rylinafeer, near Wexford harbor. The crew took to their boat, and with the exception of one man drowned reached the shore; but they left behind them, fastened in the weather shrouds, a mother and a daughter, over whom the sea beat furiously, and every moment threatened to tear them from this, their last refuge. A poor fisherman, named Wm. Hanson, saw from the shore their dreadful situation, he collected some of the boldest of his fellows, who, with infinite difficulty, towed him towards the wreck, now lying on her side, and consequently the mast along on the surface of the sea. On the utmost point of the mast he fastened himself (for his boat dare not approach the hull of the wreck) and from thence clambered to the body of the vessel. Here a new difficulty arose; the contest between the mother and daughter, which should, by the offered aid, first attempt the shore; nor was it ended till their gallant deliverer assured them that he would return for her who should remain. He first brought to the shore the mother, and scarcely waiting to take breath, returned for the daughter, whom he afterwards, through the tremendous surge, landed in safety.

These facts can be attested by the printer hereof, who says, that he has known the underwriters, when any quantity of merchandize has been saved from a wreck, liberally reward the persons who have ventured their lives on such occasions. How much more is due to him, who, through the most imminent peril, has saved the lives of two helpless females, he submits to every feeling man, particularly to those concerned in commerce, whose interest, as well as inclination he thinks, is to reward courage employed in the cause of humanity.

THE GIRTYS.—From the Missouri Gazette.—That western portion of Pennsylvania and Virginia bordering on the Ohio has been considered by the Indians as a country highly favored by Heaven; covered with every kind of game, it was not supposed they would tamely surrender their right to the soil; but when the whites commenced the settlement of western Virginia, (now Kentucky) the spirit of the savage warrior assumed an attitude of phrensy in their attacks, which called forth a corresponding spirit to repel. At this period, the Girtys with Shawanoes, Delawares, Mingos, &c. &c. gave a new character to Indian warfare.

Old Girty was one of those peasants who early emigrated from Europe to Pennsylvania, in pursuit of liberty and ease, but, like many of his fellows, he was incapable of enjoying it, for his hours were wasted in idleness and intemperance, and he was finally knocked on the head by a neighboring boor who bore off Mrs. Girty as a trophy of his prowess; he had four sons, Thomas, Simon, George and James.

George, Simon and James, were taken prisoners by the Shawanoes, Delawares and Senecas in that war which developed the military talents of general Washington. George (the supposed son of colonel C.) was adopted amongst the Delawares and continued with them until his death; his manners were perfectly Indian, combining with them the daring intrepidity of a frontier whiteman. His bravery at the battles of Kenhawa, Blue Licks, and Sandusky, are yet spoken of by his red brethren; in his latter days he resigned himself to intemperance, and died drunk sometime ago on the Miami of the lakes.

Simon was adopted by the Senecas, and became as expert in hunting as any of them. His character as related in Kentucky and Ohio, "of being a savage unrelenting monster," is much exaggerated.—It is true that he joined the Indians in most of their war parties and conformed to their mode of warfare, but it is well authenticated that he has saved many prisoners from death. And that he was considered an honest man, paying his debts to the last cent, and it is known that he has sold his only horse to discharge a claim against him. It is true that he was a perfect Indian in his manners, that his utmost felicity was centered in a keg of rum, and that he was abusive to all around him, even to his best friends. Yet we must recollect that his education was barbarous, and that man is more apt to sink into barbarism than he is to acquire the habits of civilized life.

For the last ten years he had been crippled by rheumatism, yet he rode to his hunting grounds in pursuit of game, and would boast that he preserved a warlike spirit in the midst of bodily pain, and would often exclaim, "may I breathe my last in the field of battle." In this wish Simon has been gratified; for in the battle of the Moravian towns, on the river Thames, he was cut to pieces by colonel Johnson's mounted men.

James Girty was adopted by the Shawanoes, and became an expert hunter, and imbibed as he arrived to manhood the sanguinary spirit of the most ferocious savage with the vicious habits of the whitemen whom he associated with.

It is said that he joined the Indians in all their attacks on the first settlers of Kentucky; neither age nor sex were spared at his hand, and it was his boast, although unable to walk from rheumatism and other diseases, that neither women or children ever escaped the tom hawk, if he got within reach of them. Traders who are acquainted with him say, that he never turned on his heel to save a wretched prisoner from the torments of the fire, but would rather instruct the Indians in new and more refined torture.

To this ruthless tiger may be justly attributed most of the barbarities said to be perpetrated by his brother Simon. With Elliot and Proctor, James Girty was caressed; for genial souls ever mingle in sentiment.

For the above biographical sketch, we are indebted to a gentleman of this place, possessing superior information in matters relating to Indian affairs, &c.

Volcano at Java.—A letter from the island of Java dated the 3rd of May last, says, "A few days since a dreadful volcanic eruption took place in the island of Sambaroa, to the eastward, which has been attended with the most destructive consequences.—At Sourabaya the atmosphere was in entire darkness for two days, so as to give the appearance of midnight. At this place, which is a considerable distance, the ashes discharged from the crater fell in heaps. The noise produced from this awful visitation is beyond description, and caused a sensation among the inhabitants peculiarly afflicting. The sea rose six feet above its ordinary level, almost instantaneously causing the destruction of many lives, and also vessels. In short the damage sustained has been exceedingly great, and many who were in affluence before this dreadful catastrophe took place, are reduced to the greatest distress."

A HEROINE.—From a late Boston paper.—In the obituary notice of the celebrated Dr. LITTLETON, who died lately in London, his labors in diffusing the blessings of vaccination are mentioned to his honor, and justly so; but let us not omit the merit of those of our own country, especially a most worthy LADY,* whose recent death has filled the hearts of her numerous acquaintance with no common sorrow.

*Mrs. Elizabeth W. Waterhouse.

This excellent woman did more in establishing the credit of the Kine Pox Inoculation in America, than is generally known beyond the neighbors of Boston and Cambridge. Every body must remember that when vaccination was struggling on to establish itself here, there were more people by far, who disbelieved its efficacy in preventing small pox, than there were who had confidence in its power. Many strong facts and specious arguments were, besure, advanced by the physician who first introduced the Kine Pock inoculation in America, but the proof of its safety and preventive power, was wanting in this country. Even those who so far believed in it as to be inoculated themselves, did not feel such entire confidence in this yet untried practice as to venture in among small pox; for it should be remembered that very few persons indeed had yet undergone the operation in London, at the early period now alluded to.

In this delicate state of early vaccination did the lady, the subject of this memorial, step forward and voluntarily offered to go with her four children into the small pox hospital at Brooklyn. These children were, from seven years old, to an infant in arms. "The first step is every thing;" and it always requires the most fortitude. The exposure of her children to small pox inoculation, was but an ordinary trial; but the ridicule, the derision, the absolute disgrace that would infallibly have been entailed on her family, had they not resisted the small pox, after they had been declared to have undergone the kine pock, constituted, at this early period of the new inoculation a terror almost equal to death: yet did this heroic woman encounter it, amidst the gloomy predictions of all around her, for at that time persons were with her in the hospital under the old inoculation.

During the ten days, which this lady spent at the small pox hospital, with her children, there were twenty hours spent in agony and suspense not easily to be described; and which she often mentioned as the most trying and anxious that a mother, a wife, and a woman could undergo. It should be borne in mind that the celebrated small pox inoculator, who was then trying to communicate the small pox to her children, would lose a very handsome annual income if they escaped infection; on the other hand, the lady, her family, and her nearest connexions would sink in the public estimation if her children, after all that had been said and done, should not resist the small pox. A more trying situation can hardly be imagined. But thanks to heaven! the cause of humanity triumphed, and all the children resisted all the efforts to infect them.

The feelings of the parties immediately concerned can be easier conceived than described. Suffice it to say that from that moment the protecting efficacy of the kine pock inoculation was forever established in America, in the opinion of a celebrated small pox inoculator, whose interest was the other way, and this first and decisive proof of its wonderful power, was perfected by the praiseworthy fortitude of a female. The after trials and tests at Noddles island, and other places were nothing compared with this first step.

In the history of American vaccination by Dr. Waterhouse, this anecdote, was through delicacy touched but slightly; it nevertheless was the most important experiment made in America relative to vaccination, considering its very early period. Eight or nine years in succession were the same children tested with the small pox to do away the mischievous notion, that the kine pox would preserve the constitution only for a limited time. Never was there so beneficial a discovery in the annals of medicine, nor any experiment more open, fair and decisive.

This anecdote is worthy to be recorded in the Centinel, because that paper early devoted its columns to the cause of vaccination; and it is equally proper to be the vehicle of preserving the memory of a lady whose whole life was one bright commentary on all the female virtues.

FOOT-ROT IN SHEEP.—The following recipe is copied from the Belfast Commercial Chronicle. It furnishes important information to the American agriculturist.

Foot-rot in sheep.—A gentleman attached to agricultural pursuits, being lately in Holland, purchased from the shepherd of the count de Rosenberg, near the Hague, the following recipe for curing the Foot-rot in sheep:

RECIPE.

Gold leaf	2 ounces
Verdigris	6 do.
Virriol	3 do.
Burnt allum	3 do.

All to be pounded and reduced to a fine powder, and afterwards to be boiled in a pound and a half of ordinary honey. It is to be used cold, the foot to be anointed as soon as the malady is discovered, and once a day if it has lasted any time. It has never been found to fail even with the merinoes, so liable to that disorder.

NEW PATENT WATER WHEEL.—Concord, N. H. September 5.—The re-acting water wheel, lately invented and put in operation by Samuel Morey, esq. of Oxford, is likely to supercede any other now in use.—Many mill owners have laid aside their tub wheels, and are getting this kind. The advantages are, that the first cost is about one-third as much as their tub wheel; they take up very little room, and require not more than one half the quantity of water, while they do much more work than the tub. The floats are made of thick sheet iron, and the repairs cannot be any thing for many years. They will go in back water better than any other wheel. The water passes through the wheel in such a manner as to re-act on the opposite floats, and actually operates on every float at the same time. The effect is really astonishing to every beholder. Hundreds of people have seen these effects, and nothing of the kind has excited so much attention in the country, considering how recently the invention has been known.

The patentee, willing to put the right of using this wheel within the reach of every one, has, (for the present) fixed the price at twenty-five dollars.

On the capacity of Steam Boats.—Mr. Dodd, the engineer, in his examination by a committee of the house of commons, who were enquiring into the most expeditious, and the safest mode of conveying the mail to Dublin, gave the following account:

He had just arrived in London, after performing a voyage from Glasgow in a steam boat; during the voyage he experienced some extremely heavy gales of wind and high seas, and found her more sea-worthy than any vessel he had ever been in, being fully capable of going head to wind in violent gales and over high seas. He ran into Dublin against wind and tide, and a very considerable sea, and beat the mail into Wexford, by about three hours. In Milford-haven, he ran round the Waterford packet two or three times whilst she was on her course, and he writing a letter to Dublin. This voyage demonstrated that steam engines are applied to propel vessels at sea in all kinds of weather; that they have the peculiar advantage of going against winds and tides and in a calm, when another vessel could not at all proceed, would go at the rate of from seven to nine knots per hour; they are more secure than vessels with sails, as they cannot be lost on a lee-shore. While this vessel was off Port Patrick, in Scotland, it blew a complete gale of wind, and Mr. Dodd found her to go upwards of three knots and a half over the sea, and directly against the wind; during a voyage of one thousand and five hundred miles, she passed every sail she came up with on the ocean.

The burthen of this vessel, which is called the Thames, is upwards of 72 tons, and draws from 4 to 4 feet six of water, with passengers on board. The engine is fourteen horses power, and upon an average requires a ton of coals to work an hundred miles.

[London paper.]

A singular act of bravery and presence of mind.—In the time of the revolutionary war, on the 6th of October, 1777, when fort Montgomery, on the Hudson river, was invested by the British troops, and afterwards on the evening of the same day carried by storm—general Campbell, who had command of the assault, had, in the course of the afternoon, sent in a flag, demanding the surrender of the fort, upon certain terms; and that if the Americans did not comply, every man who should be found in the place in the event of a final surrender, should be put to the sword. The reply of the veteran governor, George Clinton, who commanded the fort, was to this effect: that, if they took the fort, they should buy it; which they accordingly did, and dearly too.* General Campbell after two vain attempts to carry the place, made a third and successful one, under cover of the smoke of the battle, and dusk of the evening, having previously given orders to his column to make but one fire, which was to be aimed principally at the artillerymen, to dislodge them from their pieces, and then avail themselves of the embrasures, being the most convenient places through which to rush into the fort. A sergeant of artillery, acting as gunner to a 9 pounder in the west redoubt, which piece was at that instant loaded with cannister shot, was in the act of clapping fire to it, when he received a ball in the right arm; the lin-stock fell to the platform; he took it up with his left hand, and discharged the piece; by which fire, general Campbell and a very considerable number of his men were killed—they being in solid column.

In consequence of general Campbell's fall, the command devolved on general Robertson, who not only gave quarter, but acted with considerable humanity towards the prisoners, which, as we were afterwards informed by deserters, would not have been the case had Campbell survived, as he was heard to say, that he was determined to put his threat into execution. Our informant, who resides in this town (Patterson) was an eye witness to the above transaction.—Patterson, (N. J.) Bee.

ECONOMY OF FUEL.—An experiment on this subject has lately been made with the most complete success at the Patapsco Cotton Factory, near Baltimore. The person who has the management of this concern, having last winter failed in producing the necessary degree of heat in so large a building, even at an enormous expenditure of fuel, and wishing to avoid the expence of a steam apparatus, applied to Mr. MILLS,

*It was acknowledged in Rivingston's Royal Gazette, published in New York, that the British loss was upwards of seven hundred killed and wounded, when the whole American force in the fort, at the commencement of the assault, did not exceed five hundred men.

the architect of the Washington Monument, to remove the difficulty. The plan proposed by Mr. Mill's appearing to possess the requisites demanded, viz. a sufficient quantity of heat, perfect safety, and economy; it was determined to make the experiment.—The house required to be heated is 100 feet long, 40 feet wide, and 60 feet high, making 240,000 cubic feet. The furnace is placed against one side of the building. The fire place opens without—At 3 o'clock in the morning the fire is lighted—at about 6 o'clock in the morning the wood is nearly carbonated when the register is let down, and during the whole day an agreeable and wholesome heat is produced, which is perfectly under the control of the superintendent, who can increase or diminish the quantity of heat in each room at his pleasure. At 8 o'clock in the evening a small fire is made which keeps up the heat until 3 o'clock, when the same operation is repeated. By actual experiment made during the coldest weather this season, not more than one-eighth of a cord of dry oak wood was consumed in the 24 hours, and the rooms were at no time under the temperature of 70 degrees of Far. Last winter one cord per day was consumed with not 1 4th the effect. The furnace being almost entirely composed of soap stone and brick, and the flues of the latter material—and pure atmospheric air being the agent employed in conveying the heat, no unwholesome or disagreeable smell is produced; and what is of infinite importance the heat is equally diffused through each room; the room being as warm 50 feet distant from the flue as within 10 feet of it—and instead of cold air rushing in through any crevices which may be in the doors and windows, warm air rushes out. None of that disagreeable feeling is produced which is usual in open fire-places, where in cold weather (as is commonly said) your back is freezing while your face is burning. On the contrary you feel in the factory the mild temperature of May. To place the matter in a clear point of view, we subjoin the following statement—

A steam apparatus sufficient to heat the column of air in the Patapsco factory will cost at least	$3000
Cost of the furnace, flues, &c.	700

Difference in favor of the furnaces,	$2300
Fuel necessary for the steam apparatus, 63 cords per week, at 4 dollars,	$26 09
Fuel necessary for the air furnace, by actual experiment, 1 cord per week,	4 00

Saved per week by the air furnace	$22 00
-----------------------------------	---------

Mr. Mills states that his plan can with facility be adapted to any sort of large buildings where heat is required, as also to dwelling houses; and that the result as to saving and comfort will be the same. A firm impression that the public may be benefitted, and a desire that the merits of this most deserving and modest individual may be more generally known, is the sole object of the writer in making this communication.—*Fed. From the Delaware Gazette.

"Aristides and Penn, Cato and Tillotson."

For the following copies of letters we are indebted to a friend, into whose hands they fell, during a late peregrination into the country:

Copy of a letter addressed by ———, to Thomas Jefferson, dated 29th, 8th mo. 1813.

Esteemed friend Thomas Jefferson—I have for years felt, at times, affection towards thee, with a wish for thy salvation: to wit, the attainment, while on this stage of time, (in the natural body) of a suitable portion of divine life, for otherwise we know little more than the life of nature, and therein, are in danger of becoming inferior to the beasts which perish, in consequence of declining the offers of divine life made to every rational being.

But I have long had better hopes of thee and have thought (particularly in our little quiet meeting yesterday) that thou hast been faithful (at least) over a few things, and wish thou mayest become ruler over more, and enter into the joy of our Lord, and unto his rest; and it occurred in order thereto, that we should become Christians, for he that hath not the spirit of Christ, is none of his, and this knowledge and belief is, I think, strongly insisted on by divers of the apostles, who had personally seen, and were eye witnesses to his majesty, particularly in the mount, and others who had not that in view, which, however, was insufficient to perfect them, and was to be taken away, that they might be more effectually turned to that spirit, which leadeth into all truth, whose power alone is able to reduce the spirits of nature to suitable silence and submission.

Thy friend,

Reply by Thomas Jefferson.

SIR—I have duly received your favor, of August 29, and am sensible of the kind intentions from which it flows, and truly thankful for them, the more so as they could only be the result of a favorable estimate of my public course—as much devoted to study as a faithful transaction of the trust committed to me would permit.

No subject has occupied more of my consideration, than our relations with all the beings around us, our duties to them, and our future prospects. After hearing all which, probably, can be suggested concerning them, I have formed the best judgment I could, as to the course they prescribe, and in the due observance of that course, I have no reflections which give me uneasiness. An eloquent preacher of your religious society, Richard Mott, in a discourse of much unction and pathos, is said to have exclaimed aloud to his congregation, that, "he did not believe there was a quaker, presbyterian, methodist or baptist in Heaven." Having paused to give his congregation time to stare and to wonder, he added, that "in Heaven, God knows no distinction, but considered all good men as his children and brethren of the same family."

I believe with the quaker preacher, that he who observes these moral precepts, in which all religions concur, will never be questioned at the gates of Heaven, as to the dogmas in which all differ: that, on entering there, all these are left behind us, and the Aristides, and Catos, the Penns and Tillotsons, presbyterians and papists, will find themselves united in all the principles which are in concert with the Supreme mind.—Of all the systems of morality, ancient or modern, which have come under my observation, none appears to me so pure as that of Jesus. He who follows this steadily, need not, I think, be uneasy, although he cannot comprehend the subtleties and mysteries erected on his doctrines by those, who, calling themselves his special followers and favorites, would make him come into the world to lay snares for all understandings but theirs. Their metaphysical heads, usurping the judgment seat of God, denounce as his enemies all who cannot perceive the geometrical logic of Euclid, in the demonstrations of St. Athanasius, that three are one, and one three.

In all essential points, you and I are of the same religion, and I am too old to go into the unessentials. Repeating, therefore, my thankfulness for the kind concern you have been so good as to express, I salute you with friendship and brotherly love.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Monticello, Sept. 12, 1814.

emarkable Preservation. A very surprising instance of temal- courage and fortitude lately occurred in Lyndeborough, in this state, the particulars of which were nearly as follows:

A Mrs. Cram of that town, having missed two children (one about 5, the other two years of age) from the house, after a fruitless search for them around it, was providentially led to look into the well, where she discovered her infants, one lying on its back partly on the surface of the water, the other with its head above the surface, supporting itself by the wall. The feelings of a mother were aroused—no assistance was near, nor a moment to be lost in hesitation. She instantly descended the well, caught up her infants, and ascended a few feet.—Here she remained till an elder child called a brother from a little distance, who succeeded in descending and ascending with one child, and the courageous mother had still sufficient fortitude to enable her to regain the mouth of the well with the other. Happily, neither parent nor children sustained any injury, except one of the latter being excessively chilled. The well was found by admeasurement to be 30 feet deep, and 10 feet water.—The astonished parents manifested their gratitude by a public acknowledgment to Almighty God, who had so mercifully appeared for them in the hour of danger.—New Hampshire Patriot.

Cutting a child's throat to save its life.—This, though extraordinary, is literally true; a fine boy, the son of Mr Peter O'Brien, ship chandler, of this city, about the age of four years, playing with some of the implements used in his father's business, entangled himself upon a hook, which passed through his winipipe; he remained in this state, suspended for a few seconds, when extricated from it, by his parent. The air which rushed from his lungs, passed into the aperture made by the instrument, and pervaded the entire of his frame (after the manner in which butchers blow meat) particularly the head, so as to obliterate his features altogether. Surgeon Wilkinson, being called in, found him in this state, felt it necessary to make a free opening through the winipipe, in order to allow of respiration. He performed this extraordinary operation with his usual success—the expedient completely succeeded. The boy breathed through the aperture and to the inexpressible joy of its parents, was shortly able to swallow some drink. The tumefaction of the body and head was then relieved by making punctures for the air to obtain vent, and a gradual, and we may now say from our own observation, a most perfect and complete recovery has been the consequence.

Commencement of the slave-trade—In 1434, a Portuguese captain, named Alonzo Gonzales, having doubled Cape Boyador, landed in Guinea and carried off some lads, whom he sold advantageously to Moorish families, settled in the south of Spain. Six years afterwards he repeated this act of piracy; and as the practice seemed to answer, many adopted it, and in 1481, built a fort to protect this traffic. The whole stock of slaves now in America and the West Indies, whose annual consumption is supplied from Africa, is as follows:

English and North American stock, 1,500,000; French, 400,000; Spanish, 2,500,000; Portuguese, 1,000,000; Dutch and Danish, 1,000,000.

It appears, by the foregoing, that Spain alone does nearly as much as all the other states put together, in this traffic.

Important discovery.—We understand a gentleman of this city (says a New-York paper) has lately discovered an entire new process for manufacturing Acetate of Copper or Verdigris, for which he has obtained a patent from the president of the United States. The simplicity of the process is such that the most ignorant laborer may perfect the article in a very short period. It is not yet known whether the article made by this process possesses all the properties, or that it will serve all the purposes for which the Verdigris of Commerce is now used; but it is ascertained to be of equal value to the three great consumers of the article—the painter, the hatter and the dyer. For these purposes alone, it is a subject of congratulation to our country to be, by this discovery, rendered independent of France for supplies of so important an article.

Domestic improvements.—We are told that in the district of Maine there is established a manufactory of fine porcelain, which turns out large quantities of ware, which good judges are not able to distinguish from the best Liverpool ware. It is to Messrs. King and Wingate, we are told that the public are principally indebted (under the embargo) for this beneficial establishment. At the very eastern boundary of the state, so lately an howling wilderness, are also produced fine broadcloths, cutlery, &c. equal to the best English, and in large quantities.

Stone coal for manure.—From the Greensburg (Pa.) Gazette, April 29, 1815.—It is remarked in a letter written in 1793, by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg, and published in an old volume of Agricultural Transactions, that if “Mr. Meyer (the first that used gypsum, or plaster of Paris, and recommended it so strongly to the world) is not mistaken, stone coals pulverized, are safer, and go further in meliorating lands than gypsum.” The doctor presumes that about 350 pounds of coal would be sufficient for one acre. If coal be really as fertilizing as plaster of Paris, it may appear strange that proofs of its efficacy have not been made public; but when it is considered that in the eastern counties of this state, plaster has hitherto remained cheap and coal comparatively dear, and that in the western counties, where coal is cheap, the lands have been fresh and required little attention—it need not surprise us that fair experiments have not been made. The period, however, has probably arrived, when our older farms begin to need a meliorating treatment. Would it not, therefore, be highly satisfactory, if some enterprising and careful farmer, who has the means within his power, would make in the course of the present summer, experiments of the effects of pulverized stone coal on grains and grasses of various kinds and on different soils, and communicate the result through some newspaper in the fall.

A valuable discovery has been lately made by some German travellers in the isle of Egina, under the ruins of the temple of Jupiter Panhellenius.—They have found eighteen marble statues, nearly as large life, and in the most antique Greek style.

It is said that a manufactory has been instituted in France for the purpose of forging English bank notes of various denominations. A parcel containing the nominal value of 20,000*£*. was recently received in England, and before the imposition had been discovered, several notes were put into circulation, which, however, were afterwards recalled, on the fraud being detected by the consignee.

[Now according to the decisions of the British judges and the practices of the people of the “bulwark of religion,” it was no crime in the Frenchmen to establish a manufactory of English bank notes!

This is an absolute fact. Indeed, we know that the British government, itself, has made forgery one of its engines of war. Witness the American “continental paper” and the French assignats—immense quantities of which were attempted to be imitated by British officers high in command. [ED. REG.]

An Englishman having once asked an Irishman “if the roads in Ireland were good?” “Yes,” said he, “so fine that I wonder you do not import some of them into England. Stay, let me see—there’s the road to Love, strewn with roses—to Matrimony, through nettles—to Honor, through the camp—to Prison, through the law—and to the Undertaker’s, through Physic.” “Have you any road to Preferment?” said the Englishman—“Yes: but that is chiefly trodden by hypocrites and knaves, by pimps and pinders.” [London Statesman.]

The honorable Miss Lucretia C. (a near relative of lord Chatham) to whom nature had been lavish in regard to design, spirit and character, but so niggardly in coloring that she was fain to have recourse to artificial improvement, was one day intensely engaged in the examination of a graphic exhibition, when she was accosted by his lordship: “What, my fair cousin, fond of pictures?” “Of course, my lord, (she replied, with the utmost naivete) I paint, MYSELF.”

Pheasants.—From a Philadelphia paper of Feb. 16, 1815.—We learn from Dr. Channing, that on Saturday afternoon last he was called to Dr. Rosseau whose life for several hours was in the utmost jeopardy in consequence of his having dined on pheasants, which were found to have fed on the poisonous berry of the laurel.

We state this fact in order to caution the public against the use of the pheasant at the present time, and to suggest to the municipal authorities of the city, the propriety of prohibiting these birds being brought to market during the existence of deep snows.

The Gazette de France gives some curious particulars of experiments made on the 22d of October with a new diving machine, by Mr. Melville, the inventor. He descended twice in the Seine, near the Pont Royal, to the depth of from 10 to 20 feet, and passed 56 minutes at the bottom. He took with him 2 wans, 2 ducks, and some bread and wine. He let loose the aquatic animals while under the water, went from the Pont Neuf to the Swimming school, and came out dressed as usual, without being the least wet. The machine does not resemble any thing of the kind hitherto employed; it is neither a barrel nor a bell, but has the form of an egg. It is not bulky and contains only five cubic feet of air. This air is prepared in such a manner, that pressure can do it no harm, but it is kept pure and fresh. Mr. Melville says that he has taken with him different animals, as cats, rabbits, dogs, &c. but the latter cannot bear this kind of air longer than five minutes, as they go mad in it; but he declares that he could stay half a day under water without the slightest inconvenience. He has the use of all his limbs and can do what he pleases, saw wood, bore gimblet holes, and pick up the smallest objects. Though his pulse rises from 120 to 160 he asserts that he feels from it an agreeable sensation, a kind of electrical effect. He promises several other interesting inventions; for instance, that he shall this winter make a little carriage, in which two persons may next summer take the most pleasant excursions at the bottom of the Seine, in the ponds of Versailles, or in any river.

New-York military stores.—According to the last returns from the commissary of military stores for this state, there are in the different depots and arsenals, the following ordnance, arms, military stores, &c. the property of the state of New-York, viz. 87 iron cannon, mounted; 2 do. dismounted; 48 brass do. mounted; 7 do. dismounted; 4 brass mortars; 24057 round shot; 589 shells; 180 rammers and sponges; 102 worms for do.; 69 ladders for do.; 491 filled cartridges; 26 blank do.; 4460 wads; 1158 rounds canister shot; 755 rounds strapped shot; 16099 muskets, complete; 12649 complete sets of accoutrements; 118 sword belts; 75 rifles; 231 pairs horseman's pistols; 22 horseman's swords; 359 artillery swords; 43 trums; 40 files; 87,078 flints; 384,250 cartridges; 5 markers; 150 horsemen's tents; 25 hospital do.; 777 common do.; 1042 tent poles and pins; 228 blankets; 6078 knapsacks; 3030 canteens; 853 camp kettles; 202 cutlasses, &c. [Columbian.

The New-York state prison report, for the year 1814, makes the total number of convicts, remaining in prison on the last day of the year, to be 494, of which 213 were received into the prison during that year; and 215 had been discharged in the same term, viz. 10 by expiration of sentence, 176 by pardon, and 29 by death. Of the 494 remaining, are 419 men, and 75 women; 350 are whites, and 144 blacks; 400 are Americans, and 94 foreigners; 45 are sentenced for life, 8 for more than 15 years, 33 for more than 12, 36 for more than 9, 26 for more than 7, 116 for more than 5, and 230 for 5 years and under. Of these sentences, 18 will expire the present year. Among their crimes, 348 were sentenced for grand larceny, 73 for forgery, 21 for burglary, 14 for assault and battery, and 38 for various offences. Of the foreigners, 33 are Irishmen, 23 Englishmen, 11 West Indians, 6 Scotchmen, 4 Frenchmen, 4 Germans, 4 Nova Scotians, 4 Canadians, 2 Guineans, 1 Hollander, 1 Swede and 1 Portuguese.

Triangular Valve Pump.—We have lately attended an experiment made with the triangular valve pump, lately invented by Mr. Perkins. It was found to deliver double the quantity of water of the best chain pumps with the same number of men, with much less exertion and fatigue, by a new application of the power. Two holes, two inches in diameter, were made between the floor timbers of a brig, and the water let in through these holes in 16 minutes, was discharged by this new pump in one minute.

A particular description of this pump will not at present be given, as the inventor, we understand, will shortly send to England and France for patents.

From experiments made in our river, we have no doubt that the inventor will succeed in making the vessel which has one of these pumps, discharge the water, in certain cases, by her own motion. If this invention should prove as useful as we trust it will, it certainly will deserve the attention of every ship owner, and the patronage of the proper guardians of our gallant navy. Mr. Murr, the famous brewer, of London, has petitioned parliament to have remitted the excise on the beer he recently lost by the bursting of his vats. 2560 barrels of ripe beer, 10 months old, were lost. Total loss 23,000£.

NATURAL CURIOSITIES.—The author of the following is Elder E. Smith.—Being at Aurelius, New-York, on the 17th September, 1810, I was requested to preach in a large hollow tree, in the town of Mentz, in the same state. After assembling in the tree and singing a psalm, in the tune America, I addressed the throne of grace, and delivered a discourse from Luke ii, 12. There were present in the tree, nineteen men, twelve women and four boys, from twelve to fifteen years of age, (thirty-five in all;) and it was conjectured it would have held fifteen more. Two women and nineteen men stood in a circle around the inside of the tree, which measured on the outside three feet from the ground, thirty-three feet in circumference. The top of the tree was broken off about nineteen feet high, and it was hollow to the top. The tree, though a mere shell, was green, its wood only four inches thick, was perfectly sound, excepting the door which had been cut. On the body of this extraordinary tree, there were several small green limbs, and one large one near the top.

On the same day, I examined an uncommon salt well in the town of Montezuma, New-York. It was dug more than ninety feet without finding water—a few feet further a rocky substance was discovered, supposed to be salt. This was bored, and water as salt as smart brine, burst through and filled the well. From the top of the curb to the bottom of the well, it measured 101 feet—the water ran over the top of the curb, and the owner told me it made three times as much salt from a gallon as the neighboring salt water.

The late empress Josephine's jewels.—At a lapidary's, in New Bond street, was exhibited yesterday privately a magnificent suite of ornaments, lately the property of Josephine, and consigned to this country by her son Eugene Beauharnois; they are intended for sale, at a fixed price for the whole, viz. 50,000 guineas. They consist of three sets, comprising a diadem, tiara, aigrette, rings and broaches. The principal article is the first named: it is of rare and beautiful workmanship, and adorned with opals, said to be matchless in the whole world, being collected together with great difficulty in countries remote from France; these precious stones are surrounded by brilliants of the finest water. Among the others are sapphires, emeralds and pink topazes; the emeralds are of the deepest color and perfectly clear. A sapphire brooch attracted much notice, it being of a matchless size, an inch and a half one way, and an inch the other. They have been in London only a few days, and were consigned hither for a very short space of time. The merchant to whom they were intrusted declined shewing them in the evening of yesterday; and all applicants were informed that they would not remain many hours longer in town. Eugene Beauharnois stated in his communication that the object he had in view was to raise a sum of money to pay off the demands on the estate of Josephine, and in so doing he acted agreeably to her last will and testament. [London paper.

The comedy of Matrimony was lately performed in London, the principal parts by Thomas Coutts, esq. an eminent banker worth four millions of dollars, and Miss Mellon, of the theatre Drury-lane, with accompaniments, as expressed on his bills—being for the benefit of Miss Mellon, whose last appearance was in the play of "How to grow Rich," with the afterpiece of "Fortune's Frolics."

CURE FOR POISON.—The legislature of South-Carolina have published "Cæsar's cure for poison, and the bite of a rattlesnake," discovered by a negro slave of that name; for which the assembly purchased his freedom, and granted him an allowance of 100l. per annum, during life.

The Receipt.—Take plantain and wild hoar-hound roots, fresh and dried, three ounces; boil them in two quarts of water, to one quart. Of this decoction the patient must take one-third part three mornings fasting successively. If he finds relief, continue it until cured. If he finds no effect from it after the third dose, it may be discontinued. The patient must live on spare diet. If both ingredients cannot be obtained, one will answer; and in summer one handful of the roots and branches of each, will serve in place of three ounces of the roots of each. The drink of the patient to be a decoction of the root of golden rod, with a small addition of hoarhound and sassafras, strengthened by a glass of rum and sweetened.

CÆSAR'S cure for the bite of a rattlesnake—Take of the roots of plantain or hoarhound (in summer roots and branches together) and a sufficient quantity; bruise them in a mortar, and squeeze out the juice—of which, as soon as possible, one spoonful; if he is swelled, you must force it down his throat. This generally will cure; but if the patient finds no relief in an hour after, you may give another spoonful—which never fails. If the roots are dried, they must be moistened with a little water. To the wound may be applied a leaf of good tobacco, moistened with rum.

STEAM MILLS.—From a Cincinnati paper.—Messrs. Printers.—As several publications have lately appeared relative to the operation of steam, the result of an experiment lately tried in the Cincinnati Steam Mill may not be unacceptationable to your readers.

On one pair of Barr stones, six feet diameter, 19½ bushels of wheat were ground in 59 minutes.

On another pair of the same diameter, 17 bushels were ground in one hour.

The whole was adjudged by millers to have been ground in the best merchantable manner; and I am informed, that it still remains in the mill, for the inspection of judges.

It may be proper to remark, that the high water having stopped the mill for some days, gave the millers an opportunity of dressing the stones in the best manner.

Improvement in lamps.—M. Bordier Marcet, relative and successor of Ami Argand Marcet of Geneva, inventor of the lamps with a current of air, has been long advantageously known from the progress he had made in the art of illuminating in France. To add to the good opinion which our readers have conceived of him, we copy a certificate delivered by M. the mayor of the city of Valogne, dated May 21, 1814.

"We, the mayor and assistants of the city of Valogne, certify that after an experiment continued from October last, the merit of the reverberators with parabolic reflectors, invented by M. J. A. Bordier Marcet, is established beyond all doubt; that the wind and rain injure very little the fine light, which they reflect to a great distance; that their effect is such as to enable a person to read with ease at a distance of 20 metres; that the expence of oil is very trifling, each reverberator not consuming on an average more than one ounce and one fifteenth per hour.

"We further certify, that our very extensive city is now much better lighted with eighteen of M. Bordier's reverberators, than it was formerly with forty of the old construction."

A fact, or fair retaliation. About eighteen months since, Ali Bashaw, of the Morea, bordering on the Adriatic, fitted out and loaded two vessels for ports in that sea, to enter which, the British required every cargo to be accompanied by a licence. This the honest Greek despised. His vessels were taken, carried to Malta and condemned, with their lading, after a regular, formal, and what the British term, a fair trial. The moment the intelligence reached the bashaw, he seized the property of every British subject within his reach. They complained, remonstrated, referred him to the laws of nations and the British prize courts, he answered—"this is the true law, mere simple retaliation; out of your property I will pay my subjects what those of your king has stolen from them, with interest; the surplus shall be returned, but I command you all to quit my dominions immediately." And accordingly compelled their consul, and every one of that nation, to depart without delay.—This narrative is given by a gentleman of unquestionable veracity, acquainted with the fact, and who saw them at Malta. *Nat. Newcastle, Del. 14th May, 1812.

Calcutta, June 8.—By a letter from Banka of the beginning of April, we learn that a most gallant action was fought on the 29th of March off Pulo Pandan, by captain Hall and the crew of the honorable company's cruiser "Antelope," who with the ship's boats, assisted by two armed prowes, attacked and dispersed an immense fleet of Malay pirate boats, at least eighty in number, taking thirty, of which four sunk after they had struck. The engagement lasted from 9 A. M. till 4 P. M. and so desperate was the resistance made by the Malays, that only 14 prisoners were taken alive out of the 30 boats which had been captured. Each of the pirate boats had four small brass guns mounted and a numerous complement of men.

When we recollect the severe loss which ships of war have frequently sustained in taking and destroying vessels of this description, we are at a loss to express our admiration of the skill and gallantry which could have enabled so small a force as that of captain Hall's, to engage successfully with such desperate odds. We are informed that capt. Hall speaks in warm terms of the conduct of his first lieutenant, Mr. Smith, as well as the rest of his officers and ship's company.

ROYAL BANQUET. Vienna, Nov 25, 1814. A splendid entertainment lately took place in the great hall of the riding school. One side of the galleries had been reserved for the diplomatic corps, the other for the guests of the court and the nobility. The second gallery was for all the other guests. The court occupied at one of the extremities an apartment magnificently decorated; twenty-four ladies, dressed in the most brilliant gothic costume, and covered with jewels, occupied the other extremity, seated upon chairs ranged in a single line. They were divided into four parties, distinguished by the color of their apparel. Their hats and their robes were entirely embroidered with diamonds, and reflected a most dazzling splendor.

At eight o'clock, as soon as the court of the ladies were seated, twenty-four knights, clothed in the most brilliant style, made their appearance upon horses richly caparisoned. Each knight was decorated with a scarf of the same color with his lady. After having saluted the sovereigns, they all proceeded likewise to salute their ladies, and then the game commenced. They struck down with the lance and the javelin, many casques placed at different distances. They afterwards coursed the ring, and the entertainment ended by evolutions and marches executed with the greatest precision. When the court had retired, the knights went to offer their hands to their ladies to conduct them to the dining hall, where the table was spread of forty-eight covers, magnificently served up. The appearance of this supper was very remarkable. The ball commenced at 7 o'clock. Two thousand persons were invited to it, and it was the most brilliant that had yet been given. In general, this entertainment not only satisfied the expectations of the spectators, but even surpassed them. The beauty of the ladies, their dresses, and the prodigious quantity of diamonds they wore, above all things, excited admiration.

Premature burial. On Sunday last, after the performance of the funeral service over the remains of a woman in Shoreditch church-yard, and when the coffin had been nearly covered with earth, a moan was heard from the grave, which arrested the hand of the grave digger; it was followed with another, which convinced him that the sound came from the coffin. No time was lost by the persons still remaining around the grave to open it, when the woman was found struggling for breath. She was immediately carried into the vestry room, where she revived, and was shortly afterwards carried home.—Lon paper.

Emerick Preny, an Hungarian nobleman, who was travelling on the 31st of August, near Debreczen, alighted from his carriage to shoot some ducks, directing his servants to proceed. The report of the gun roused eight or ten shepherds' dogs that were tending numerous flocks in these extensive uncultivated plains—who tore him in pieces before assistance could arrive.—ib.

DARING SWINDLER. From a London paper of Oct 28, 1814. Last night, a lady, with the exterior of a woman of fashion and fortune, drove up to the door of an eminent haberdasher's, in the vicinity of Soho, in a splendid carriage, with footmen in rich liveries. On alighting and entering the shop, some of the young men attended to receive her commands—but she called for the master, said she wanted a variety of things, and would not communicate with any one else. The master being apprised of her wishes, and fearful of affronting a customer of her rank and distinction, although not in the habit of attending customers, came from his parlor to serve her. She immediately proceeded to look out a variety of goods—particularly lace, of which she purchased to the amount of almost 500*l*. The articles being packed up, she desired one of her footmen to bring her banker's book from the pocket of the carriage. The footman returned and said he could not find it, on which she expressed considerable surprise and disappointment, being certain she had put it there on leaving home. Turning to the haberdasher, she then said he must send one of his young men to get the money.

but he declined the proposition, and went himself, conceiving it the safer course. After a drive to a remote part of the town, the carriage stopped at a very large and handsome house, the door was opened, and they went in. The haberdasher was shewn into a parlor, where there were two persons when he entered—one of them a youth, the other a grave-looking middle aged gentleman. The lady not returning with the money, he expressed some surprise, of which the strangers for some time took no notice—but on his becoming impatient in consequence of suspecting a fraud, they proceeded to use violence and force him into a strait jacket. An explanation ensued, which led to a discovery that he was in a private mad-house; that the lady had been there on the preceding day, and made every preparation for the reception of her husband, whom she described as a madman who fancied that he was a haberdasher, and had been robbed and ruined by thieves and swindlers, that from the documents and references which she had furnished them with, they had no suspicion of a trick, and that on delivering him to them she drove away, but whither, they knew not, she being a perfect stranger. It appears that the lady, the coachman, and the two footmen, are all one knot of swindlers.

THE BASTINADO. London, Jan. 3, 1815. The Turkish frigate called the Camel, Abdullah Hamed, commander, was recently employed in collecting the annual tribute of the inhabitants of the islands in the Grecian Archipelago. While at anchor off Mytilene, the following tragical circumstance took place. A Greek, being unable or unwilling to pay the assessment, had been conveyed on board ship, and after undergoing repeated bastinadoes, was threatened with further punishment. Having next day refused compliance, his wife and daughter were, by Hamed's order, put to death, after treatment too cruel to describe. This scene took place in the presence of the wretched husband, who, maddened by the sight, devoted himself to destruction to obtain revenge for such outrages on the common feelings of nature.—While the crew were asleep, he gained the powder chamber, and fired it. An instantaneous explosion, which scattered burning fragments over the neighboring islands, announced the terrible catastrophe to the inhabitants. What remained of the frigate was speedily consumed; and, of the crew, 160 perished. The survivors, including Hamed the commander, were dreadfully mutilated.

ANIMAL SAGACITY. From a London paper. The following remarkable proof of animal sagacity was given last week at Nousard, in France. The neighborhood had long been infested by a monstrous wolf, and the inhabitants, at length, succeeded in decoying him to a spot under which they had dug an immense pit. When it was announced that the murderer was a captive, a great crowd assembled to view him, and a fine little boy, in his eagerness to have a peep, fell in by the side of the animal. A shriek of terror instantaneously burst from the crowd—and it was supposed that the child would be instantly devoured; their expectations, however, were agreeably disappointed, the wolf seemed more intent on ruminating on his embarrassed situation, than in satisfying his appetite: a rope was then let down to the boy, and he was desired to lay hold of it, in order to be drawn out: here a ludicrous scene took place—the wolf and the boy both eagerly seized the rope, but the former possessing superior strength, succeeded in grasping it between his paws and teeth. The stoutest of the persons assembled, then prepared to end his existence with clubs and other weapons when he should ascend, but he eluded their vigilance, by several bold springs, and got off clear.—The poor boy was drawn up, without having suffered, even from the effects of fear.

CHARLESTON MARKET.—Messrs. Skyrine & Duke.—Please to publish for the information of the citizens generally, the following statement of articles brought to the Centre Market, from the 1st of April, 1814, to the 31st of March, 1815, inclusive, viz:

CURIOUS CASE OF BIGAMY.—From a London paper. On Saturday Elizabeth Shaw was charged by Mr. James Brooker with bigamy, she having married him during the life time of her first husband, Charles Shields, well knowing at the time of her second marriage, that her first husband was living: the prisoner is a young woman of respectable connections, and extremely interesting in her appearance. From the circumstances of the case as they were detailed, it appeared that Mr. Shields and Mr. Brooker had both been declared admirers of the lady for some time. At length the preference was given to Mr. Shields—Mr. B. was dismissed; and on the day fixed, the 23d February last, she was married at Christ Church, to Mr. S. Scarcely had they quitted church, before she repented the choice she had made, and before an hour had expired eloped from her new lord, and a second time gave permission to Mr. Brooker to address her: the preliminary steps were soon arranged, and on the 27th of February, four days after her first marriage to Mr. Shields at Christ Church, she was led to the parish church of St. George the Martyr, by Mr. Brooker, and a second time pronounced the marriage vows. It appeared from the testimony of Mr. Brooker, sen. who was present at his son's marriage, that she stated the circumstance of her previous marriage with Mr. Shields, but said it was of no force, inasmuch, as it had not been consummated. She was fully committed for trial at the assizes.

CURE FOR WENS.—From a New-York paper.—Mr. Editor.—Reading an account of a wen extracted, a friend of mine (Mr. William G. Forbes) mentioned a case wherein he had witnessed an entire cure of one of the largest wens, by the most simple means. His son was unfortunately afflicted for many years by one of those tumors, when a very respectable neighbor (Mr. Samuel Hallock) told the circumstance of a young school girl effecting a cure of one by rubbing it every day, as she passed to and from school, with the juice of MILK OR WILD COTTON WEEDS which finally destroyed the wen. This remedy was then resorted to by the young man, and in the course of the summer the tumor disappeared. This juice must be applied several times a day for a length of time, and it will give a happy result to all who may choose to adopt it for a remedy. W.

Singular accident.—On Sunday last several persons of the Baptist persuasion were baptised by immersion in the East river, Corlear's Hook. Among the assembly of spectators who attended to witness the solemn performance, a number of women with a few children had got on board a sloop which lay aground careening towards the shore. On the clergyman walking into the water, the people in the sloop went to the upper side of her deck, the better to view the proceeding. The sudden change of their weight to the other side righted the sloop and threw her down off shore with such violence that the people were precipitated into the river, and the vessel's mast broken off near the deck and dropt overboard. An alarming cry was uttered, and the anxiety of the concourse directed to the scene of danger; where, after the scattered umbrellas, bonnets, &c.

were picked up, and the wet females had reached the shore, it was happily found that not one of them was struck or received the least injury from the mast and rigging which fell among them, and all escaped with no other hurt than what their minds received from the fright and their bodies from the ducking.—N. Y. Columbian.

Singular good luck.—On the farm of Mr. Peter Hageman, at Cow Neck, Long Island, his hogs lately rooted up a quantity of gold and silver amounting to 220 dollars—the gold being English guineas. It is supposed to have lain there since the revolutionary war.

Diving Bell.—The gentlemen who manage the diving bell, and who, last summer, were daily bringing up curiosities from the sunken wreck of the British frigate Hussar, C. M. Pole, commander, at Hurl Gate, are now employed in diving into the hull of the sloop of war Mercury, J. Montague, commander, sunk in 1777, in the North river, opposite Mr. Roulet's seat, 7 miles from the city. From the wreck of the Mercury have been brought up, most of her guns, in a perfect state, some demijohns of liquor, bottles of wine, rum, porter, china bowls rivetted with silver, &c. &c. attached to which are oysters and clam shells. These articles, particularly the liquor, sell for enormous prices, owing, no doubt, to their improvement from nearly 40 years seclusion from the air.

A friend having put in our possession Steel's List for October, 1782, we find that the Hussar was sunk by running on the rocks at Hurl Gate in 1779, and that the Mercury went down in consequence of running foul of a cheveaux de frize in 1777.

Thief catching—We have seen a recipe—how to cook a dolphin—which commences with—catch him first.—The following is an illustration.

One night last week, the Blackstone Company's store in this town was broken open, and a valuable piece of gingham stolen. A few days after, it was discovered concealed under some boards on a wharf. Tuesday night last being very dark, the gingham was replaced, and a man set to watch in a store hard by, who fearing the game might escape, attached a cord to the gingham, the other end of which he took with him into the store, and patiently waited the event. He had hardly seated himself ere he felt a nibbling, and very soon a full bite, when, rushing from his concealment, he succeeded in securing a full grown villain, who, with an accomplice, were shortly after safely lodged in the jug.

Saw Fish—Two Saw Fish were caught, on Saturday and Monday last, in Mr. W. S. Bennett's Mill Pond, on James Island. The one measured 14 feet long and 4 1-2 feet across the fins; the other 15 feet long, and 5 feet across the fins.

Running.—Recently two young men, sons of Mr. Josiah Dunham, of Woodbridge, New Jersey, when hunting for rabbits in a late deep snow, did actually start a red fox, well grown and firm, and after chasing him for five hours, from field to field, and wood to wood, overtook and killed him with a club.—A severe task for a horse.

Mortality.—Lord William Stewart, commander of the Conquestador, captain Duff, of the marines, 4 midshipmen, and 24 men, died, between the 27th June, and the 16th July, of fever.

Personal bravery—From a Milledgeville, Georgia, paper of February 23, 1814.—In the heat of general Floyd's engagement, one of capt. Thomas's pieces of artillery, had, at one time, but three men left, and the matchmen were shot down in succession. At this important crisis, when the savages, rushing with the impetuosity of a torrent, seemed determined to take possession of the cannon; when ten men, out of thirteen, were weltering in their gore; and nothing but inevitable destruction appeared to await the remaining three, Ezekiel M. Attaway with heroic firmness, wrested the traversing hand-spike from the carriage of the gun, exclaiming to his two brave comrades—"with this I will defend the piece, as long as I can stand—we must not give up the gun, boys—seize the first weapon you can lay your hands upon, and stick to your posts, until the last!" At this critical juncture, when nothing but savage destruction stared our heroes in the face, a company of musketmen, came up to their relief, and by a sharp and well directed fire, soon repulsed the enemy.

We notice this example of deliberate bravery, because we think Mr. Attaway deserves more attention and gratitude than he has received. At Newman's ever memorable battles in East Florida, this young man distinguished himself, and publicly received the approbation of that gallant officer. When Indian audacity compelled another resort to arms, to chastise them for their aggressions, Attaway was again the first, among his youthful compatriots, to enrol himself a volunteer in the ranks, for the defence of the state; and he deserves its gratitude.—No other motive than that which springs from a well directed amor patriæ, could induce him to fly to the banner of his country; for his exertions, as a respectable citizen, always insured him a decent competency.

North Carolina riflemen.—A little circumstance not otherwise important than as marking the character and skill of the North Carolina riflemen, occurred some time ago in Forsyth's corps, which we have not yet seen in any newspaper of this state, and which ought before this to have appeared in the Star. As the story is told, a schooner from the Canada side of the St. Lawrence sailed along the river at no great distance from Ogdensburg, where a centinel of this gallant corps was posted on the bank, who thought the opportunity of trying his rifle too favorable to be missed. He accordingly singled out the best dressed man on board the vessel and fairly knocked him over. The British schooner not suspecting a formidable enemy so near, immediately opened a tremendous fire of great guns and musketry, while the Carolinian stood quite unconcerned behind a large beech tree, and very leisurely reloaded his rifle. As soon as the British slackened fire, he peeped out from behind his covert and brought down another tall fellow. The schooner now thought it prudent to claw off, and had just escaped out of rifle shot (not however without a parting salute from Beech fort) when the guard from Ogdensburg came up and enquired about the firing. The sentry very coolly observed that he had just had an engagement with a British schooner, but she had unluckily for him succeeded in getting off with only a small loss in killed and wounded!—Raleigh Star.

RESIGNATION! Washington, M. T. 10th Sept. 1813.

SIR—I pleased col. Constant to put me under arrest, a day or two after the departure of the 3d regiment from New Orleans—in which situation I have continued bereft of my sword in those eventful hours of danger. It appears to me from a clause of gen. Fournoy's letter, which you were pleased to read to me, that no order or arrangement for my trial has yet taken place; which continues my privations in a degree beyond the power of human fortitude to sustain.

I have, therefore, to apply to you for alleviation of my condition; by permitting me to remain at or in the vicinity of Natchez, until informed of the seat of my trial, where I shall promptly attend.

I cannot conceive it within the spirit of our laws, that I should be carted about like an European malefactor to the assize, for the purpose of adjudication.

To a situation so horrible, and oppression so severe, any resort is preferable; I have, therefore, through you, to request of general Fournoy to accept this as my letter of resignation, to take effect on the 31st December. The distance from my home justifies the request.

In leaving the service, I am not abandoning the cause of republicanism, but yet hope to brandish the glittering steel in the field, and carve my way to a name which shall prove my country's neglect; and when the mortal part shall be closeted in the dust, and the soul shall wing its flight for the regions above, in passing by the pale-faced moon, I shall hang my hat upon brilliant Mars, and make a report to each superlative star—and arriving at the portals of Heaven's high chancery, shall demand of the attending angel to be ushered into the presence of WASHINGTON.

I am, sir, &c.

ROSS BIRD, Captain

Lieut. col. G. C. Russel.

Sailor's letter. The following, says a London paper, is a genuine letter from a sailor, on his return from an India voyage:

Warren Hastings' East Indiaman, off Gravesend, March 24, 1813

Dear Brother Tom,—Tis cum's hoppin to find you in good health, as it leaves me safe anchor'd here yesterday at 11 A.M. after a pleasant voyage, tolerable short and few squalls. Dear Tom—Hopes to find poor old father stout, and am quite out of pig-tail. Sights of pigtail at Gravesend, but unfortunately not fit for a dog to chor. Dear Tom, captain's boy will bring you this, and put pigtail in his pocket when bort. Best in London at the black boy in seven diles, where go, acks for the best pigtail, pound pigtail will do and an short of shirts, only took two whereof one is wore out, and tother most, but don't forget the pigtail, as I not had a quid to chor since Thursday. Dear Tom, as for shirts, yor size will do only longer, I like them long—get one at present—best at Tower hill, and cheap—But be particular to go to 7 diles at the black-boy for the pig tail, and Dear Tom acks for pound best pig tail, and let it be good—captain's boy will put the pig tail in his pocket, he likes pig tail, so ty it up. Dear Tom, shall be up on Monday, there or thereabouts—not so particular for the shirt, as the present can be washed, but don't forget the pig tail without fail, so am your loving brother.

T. P.

P. S.—Dont forget the pig-tail.

Fire. Between the hours of 9 and 10 o'clock of the 11th July, 1814, the inhabitants of Wilmington, N. C. were alarmed by a cry of fire. This alarm immediately followed a severe clap of thunder. The lightning had struck the house near the New Market belonging to Messrs. John and E. Hall, in which John Sinclair, captain of the private armed ship General Armstrong resided, and which contained between 30 and 40 stand of arms and about 50 lbs of powder made up in cartridges. The powder exploded, carrying away the roof and making a total wreck of the building. No one was in the house except captain Sinclair, who had been some time in bed and asleep on the second floor. A storm of heavy rain was falling which prevented the fire from spreading. Lanterns were procured and a search made for the remains, if they possibly could be found, of the captain. To the astonishment of all he was discovered in the entry of the ground floor, scarcely hurt. The first notice he had of this dreadful event was, when he awoke, to find himself seated on the lower floor, with the descending ruins tumbling about his head. Two wounds he had received on the head which the doctor did not think required a dressing, and a small contusion on the right hand. His escape is next to miraculous.

Fall of Stones. M. Lemoureux, an able naturalist, an eye-witness of the fall of stones at Agen on the 5th, has transmitted the following relation to the institute, the general depot of all that is scientific and curious in France. "At eleven in the morning, the sky was pure, calm and transparent, as it is almost always in the southern provinces, and as it so rarely is on our foggy banks of the Seine. On a sudden, in the north-west, appeared at a great distance, a dark cloud with a very slow motion, and apparently circumscribed dimensions; for, at the great latitude at which it was, its diameter did not appear more than a few feet. Presently, its motion increased, the cloud rolled over itself with a noise resembling that of continual thunder. A terrible explosion took place; the noise ceased; the cloud divided itself; at the same instant, the inhabitants of several communes were struck with terror at seeing falling around them, stones of a very considerable size, making holes in the earth several inches in depth.—The count de Villeneuve, prefect of the department has collected several of them. M. Lemoureux has sent his brother, who is very curious in such researches, to the place, to obtain all the information he can procure. The stones collected at Agen resembled those found at L'Aigle, Landes, and other places; but they are of a clearer grey and a thinner consistency. If they came from the moon, they must belong to a more refined manufacture, than we have hitherto seen. M. Lemoureux proposes to deposit these beautiful specimens at the institute, and we shall then be better able to judge of them.—Journal de Paris, Oct. 2, 1815.

Wonderful Travelling. The steam-boat FELTON, capt. Bunker, sailed from this place on Sunday morning, after 9 o'clock; arrived at Albany in 20 hours, remained there 7 hours; left there on Monday, after 12 o'clock, and got back here in 19 hours, before 7 o'clock yesterday morning—thus having performed a passage from New York to Albany, a distance of 160 miles, and back again, besides stopping at the different landings going and coming, in forty-six hours—an occurrence, we presume, never equalled in this country. The whole distance was at least 320 miles, and was run without a sail up, or any advantage whatever from the wind, in 29 hours, making a general average of 8 miles and one fifth in an hour. [The engine was stopped over 20 times on passages, 8 of which each way, were at regular landing places. And the weight on the safety-valve averaged less than 3 lbs. during the whole time; when 8 lbs. would have driven the boat nine miles an hour.] Ten or even seven years ago, nothing short of supernatural agency was supposed capable of effecting what we now see accomplished by the genius of Mr. Fulton. Since the invention of balloons, no human contrivance has given to motion and conveyance such speed and certainty, with equal safety and comfort, as the establishment of steam-boats; by which a person is now carried 160 miles in one day, and brought home the next, and performs his journey in about the same time it formerly required to go to Amboy, Sandy Hook, or any distance of 20 miles and back again. So astonishing and beneficial is this truly admirable American invention.—N. F. Columbian.

THE COLUMBIA BRIDGE.—From the Philadelphia Gazette—This bridge, over the Susquehanna, at Wright's Ferry, is finished and accommodates travellers with a safe and speedy passage over one of the largest rivers in North America. This work may be justly considered the proudest monument of the arts ever erected in the United States.

When the project was first stated, it appeared so stupendous and so far above the reach of human exertion, that it was generally ridiculed for its extravagance. Even eminent practical architects considered it as chimerical. The idea of building a permanent bridge over a bold, rapid and turbulent stream of more than a mile in extent was too vast for minds only accustomed to contemplate ordinary difficulties; and most of the few who perceived the practicability of the undertaking, believed that no thing short of a great national exertion would be adequate to carry it into effect.

The great enterprize, however, has been accomplished by a private company in about two years. The state it is understood holds a part of the stock, but advanced no money until the work was done.

The bridge is built on 53 massy stone piers or pillars, including the abutments, all of the most substantial workmanship. The piers are 40 feet long in the direction of the stream; 12 feet thick and 23 feet high above low water. The huge columns are built in the most solid manner with very large stones (many of which may be seen in each pillar of several tons weight) and are all founded on solid rock below the bed of the river. Competent judges pronounce them amply sufficient to resist the greatest fury of the flood.

The piers are placed at equal distances of about 110 feet, measuring from and to their respective centres. The breadth of the stream is 5343 feet; the length of the bridge is 5686 feet—the excess of 353 feet is taken up in reaching from the water's edge on each side, to each side of the bank.

The superstructure is of wood—long pieces of timber are put together on architectural principles, and from pier to pier, giving the bridge a small curvature between each. Those timbers are so large, numerous and skilfully put together, that loaded waggons passing over the bridge produce scarcely any perceptible shaking of the frame.

The bridge erected on the piers is thirty feet wide, with a partition in the middle of strong frame work; which, as well as the parapet or side wall, is about five feet above the floor, weather-boarded on both sides and capped with shingles, by which the timbers are well secured against the weather—exciting the idea of great strength and durability, and the whole presenting as complete a specimen of architecture, on as great scale as any perhaps to be found in any other country. It cost about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

The citizens of Columbia, in Lancaster county, were the projectors of this great undertaking, and by their perseverance have accomplished a work which entitles them to a high rank among the benefactors of the nation.

The undertakers were Messrs. Henry and Samuel Skymaker, of Lancaster county, and Mr. John Wolcott of Connecticut—the last of whom we understand was the principal architect, all of whom have a just claim to the gratitude of their country and of posterity.

The first stone was laid in September, 1812, and the bridge was opened for public use on the 1st day of December, 1814—the very day on which the contractors had, two years before, bound themselves to have it finished, and it gives us pleasure to add, that no serious accident happened during all that time, to any of the hands employed or others concerned.

The bridge is built where the main road from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh crosses the river.

American Files. From the Boston Patriot. The writer of this article has lately seen a specimen of Files manufactured in this vicinity, which has every appearance of being equal to any which are imported. They have been used for various purposes, and are highly approved.

It deserves notice that these files are made by a machine, wholly the invention of Mr. JOHN HATCH, a young mechanic now residing in Hingham, where his connexions are living. It is said that no machinery has ever before been invented, even in England, for making files. For this the inventor has obtained a patent. The cost of erecting a machine of this kind is only about three hundred and fifty dollars, and when in operation, makes from eight to twelve dozen of 12 inch files in a day. A short time before the close of the late war, this machine was brought into operation. It has cost the inventor much time, labor, and expense, and claims for him the patronage of the friends of the useful arts. This young, enterprising mechanic has succeeded in his undertaking by the force of his genius and persevering application, unassisted by superior advantages. Mechanics are invited to patronize this useful acquisition.

Cast Iron.—From a late London publication—It has been mentioned that cast-iron, when at a certain degree of heat, may be cut like a piece of wood with a common saw. The discovery was announced in a letter from M. Duford, director of the iron-works at Montaluire, to M. D'Arcet, and published in the Annales de Chimie. This experiment was tried at Glasgow, with complete success, by a gentleman of the philosophical society there; who, in the presence of the workmen belonging to an ironmonger, cut with the greatest ease a bar of cast-iron, previously heated to a cherry red, with a common carpenter's saw, in the course of less than two minutes; the saw was not in the least injured by the operation.

BRITISH NATURALIZATION—1740, 13th year of Geo II—Chapter 3, the act entitled, "An act for the better supply of mariners and seamen to serve his majesty's ships of war, and on board merchant ships and other trading ships and privateers."

Sec. 2 "An act for the better encouraging of foreign mariners and seamen to come and serve on board ships belonging to this kingdom of Great Britain, be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that every such foreign mariner or seaman who shall from and after the first day of January, 1739, have faithfully served during the time of war on board any of his majesty's ships of war, or any merchant or other trading ship or ships, vessel or vessels, or privateers (which at the time of such service shall belong to any of his majesty's subjects of Great Britain) for the space of two years, shall to all intents and purposes be deemed and taken to be a natural born subject of his majesty's kingdom of Great Britain, and have and enjoy the privileges, power, right and capacities which such foreign mariner or seaman could, should or ought to have had and enjoyed in case he had been a native born subject of his majesty and actually a native within the kingdom of Great Britain.

[Statutes at large, 6th vol. p. 379.]

Musketry. It is an important fact, that 84 shots are fired by hired troops, to kill one man; the battles of Marengo and of Austerlitz, are in proof that the number killed was in that proportion.—Aurora.

Masonic. A short time since, the French privateer Le Puret captured the Irish brig Two Friends, when a short conversation commenced between the French and British captains; and the signals of masonry were interchanged between them: Meriencourt, the French captain, generously bestowed the prize, with her cargo, on captain Campbell, as a token of respect for the ancient and illustrious craft; and the brig proceeded unmolested on her voyage.—Several lodges have testified their approbation of this gallant Frenchman's conduct; and the Union Lodge of Limerick has resolved to present him with an elegant cup, value 100 guineas, with an appropriate inscription to commemorate this illustrious example of masonic virtue.—Halifax paper.
